[16] It may be accepted that a sentence of life imprisonment, passed under s 109 of the 2000 Act, is, in part at least, punitive in purpose and effect. The minimum term specified by the judge to be served before release is imposed as retribution for the crime committed. It may also be accepted as wrong in principle to punish those who are unfit to be tried or who, although fit to be tried, are not responsible for their conduct because of insanity: see, generally, R v H [2003] UKHL 1, [2003] 1 All ER 497, [2003] 1 WLR 411. But the appellant did not claim to be unfit to plead and advanced no defence of insanity. Instead, he pleaded guilty to an offence of which an essential ingredient was an intention to cause grievous bodily harm to another. The Recorder of Cardiff did not regard the appellant as other than criminally culpable. Had he done so he would not have specified a minimum term based on a notional sentence of eight years. The appellant's mental illness could properly be relied on as mitigating the criminality of his conduct but not as absolving him from all responsibility for it. Mr Davies laid stress on the stigma attaching to a sentence of life imprisonment, which he criticised as unfair in the case of a mentally disordered defendant such as the appellant. It is of course true that conviction of serious violent crime carries a stigma. But the appellant will have been stigmatised less by the sentence passed upon him than by his voluntary admission of guilt.

[17] Section 82 of the 2000 Act imposes additional duties on sentencing courts where offenders appear to be mentally disordered. Save where a custodial sentence is fixed by law (as in cases of murder) or falls to be imposed under s 109, the court must consider the offender's mental condition before imposing a custodial sentence. The humanity and fairness of this requirement are obvious. But it cannot, as a matter of national law, be stigmatised as wrong in principle to pass a sentence of imprisonment on a mentally disordered defendant who is criminally responsible and fit to be tried. This is made clear by the terms of s 37 of the 1983 Act, for even where the conditions in sub-s (2)(a)(i) or (ii) are found to be satisfied the court may make a hospital order only if it is also of opinion under sub-s (2)(b) that a hospital order is 'the most suitable method of disposing of the case'. If it is not of that opinion, a sentence of imprisonment may be imposed even on an offender in whose case the conditions in sub-s (2)(a)(i) or (ii) are satisfied. The Court of Appeal in R v Birch (1989) 11 Cr App R (S) 202 at 215, pointed out that prison might be chosen as an alternative to hospital either because the offender was dangerous and no suitable secure hospital accommodation was available or because there was an element of culpability in the offence which merited punishment, as might happen where there was no connection between the mental disorder and the offence or where the offender's responsibility for the offence was reduced but not wholly extinguished. There is no divergence in this respect between national law and Strasbourg jurisprudence: in X v UK App No 5229/71 (5 October 1972, unreported) the Commission rejected as manifestly inadmissible a complaint by a mentally disordered defendant that he should be held in a psychiatric hospital and not in a prison.

[18] There would be strong grounds for challenging the compatibility of s 109 of the 2000 Act with art 3 of the convention if its effect, read with s 37(1) of the 1983 Act, were to deny a mentally disordered defendant qualifying for an automatic life sentence the medical treatment which his condition required. To subject such a defendant to unnecessary suffering, humiliation, distress and deterioration of his mental condition could properly be regarded as inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. But that is not a necessary result of these provisions, since s 47 of the 1983 Act gives the Home Secretary power to transfer a defendant sentenced to imprisonment to a hospital where he will receive any medical treatment he needs, and the Home Secretary is obliged to act compatibly with the convention. Thus, as the Recorder observed in this case, the effect of the sentence may be very much the same whether he is sentenced to imprisonment or made subject to a hospital order.

[19] If it were shown that a mentally disordered defendant was held in prison, that he was there denied medical treatment, available in hospital, which his mental condition required and that he was suffering serious consequences as a result of such denial, he would have grounds for seeking judicial review of the Home Secretary's failure to direct his transfer to hospital under s 47 of the 1983 Act: see Keenan v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 319. But this would not be a challenge based on the compatibility of ss 109 and 37 with art 3. Nor is it the ground of challenge which the appellant makes, or could make, in this case, since the Home Secretary exercised his transfer power promptly. While the interruption of the appellant's medication during the eight days following sentence caused him ill effects, these were not in our opinion of sufficient severity to engage the operation of art 3: see Ireland v UK (1978) 2 EHRR 25 at 79 (para 162), Aerts v Belgium (1998) 5 BHRC 382 at 404, (para 66).

[20] In R v Buckland [2000] 1 All ER 907 at 912–913, [2000] 1 WLR 1262 at 1268, the Court of Appeal described s 2 of the 1997 Act as—

> 'founded on an assumption that those who have been convicted of two qualifying serious offences present such a serious and continuing danger to the safety of the public that they should be liable to indefinite incarceration and, if released, should be liable indefinitely to recall to prison.'

In a case where the evidence showed this assumption to be soundly based no issue of compatibility with the convention was likely to arise, but there were very obvious issues of compatibility in any case where it appeared that the court was required to pass a sentence of life imprisonment on a defendant who appeared to present no danger to the public. This was the problem which confronted the Court of Appeal (Lord Woolf CJ, Steel and Richards JJ), after the Human Rights Act 1998 came into force, in R v Offen [2001] 2 All ER 154, [2001] 1 WLR 253. The court neatly resolved the problem by holding ([2001] 2 All ER 154 at 171, [2001] 1 WLR 253 at 272 (para 79)):

> 'It therefore can be assumed the section was not intended to apply to someone in relation to whom it was established there would be no need for protection in the future. In other words, if the facts showed the statutory assumption was misplaced, then this, in the statutory context was not the normal situation and in consequence, for the purposes of the section, the position was exceptional.'

Taking advantage of the interpretative licence conferred by s 3 of the 1998 Act, the court concluded ([2001] 2 All ER 154 at 175, [2001] 1 WLR 253 at 277 (para 97)):

'In our judgment, s 2 [of the 1997 Act] will not contravene convention rights if courts apply the section so that it does not result in offenders being sentenced to life imprisonment when they do not constitute a significant risk to the public.'

In his argument for the Home Secretary, Mr David Perry expressly accepted the correctness of this approach, as would we. He moreover accepted that it would apply equally to a mentally disordered defendant, relieving the court of the need to impose an automatic life sentence, and permitting the making of a hospital order, if it were established that there was no need to protect the public against him in future. The making of a hospital order in such circumstances is expressly envisaged by s 37(1B) of the 1983 Act. Thus the complaint of arbitrariness and excessive punishment which might otherwise be made with some force under arts 3 and 5 of the convention is met, first, by pointing to the court's release from the obligation to impose a life sentence where a defendant is shown not to be dangerous and, secondly, where a life sentence is passed, by the imposition of a minimum term reflecting the culpability of the individual defendant (see R v Lichniak, R v Pyrah [2002] UKHL 47 at [16], [2002] 4 All ER 1122 at [16], [2002] 3 WLR 1834).

[21] Interpreted in accordance with R v Offen, s 109 does not lack an objectively justifiable protective purpose. (1) Defendants sentenced to determinate sentences of imprisonment must be released after serving a specified proportion of their sentences and are subject to recall for a limited period only. If on release they are still dangerous, they are a source of risk to the public. (2) Defendants made subject to hospital orders, whether restricted or not, are entitled to release when the medical conditions justifying their original admission cease to be met: see R v London South and South West Region Mental Health Review Tribunal, ex p Moyle [2000] Lloyd's Rep Med 143 at 150, R (on the application of Von Brandenburg (aka Hanley)) v East London and The City Mental Health NHS Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 239 at [18], (2001) 61 BMLR 206 at [18], [2002] QB 235. Further, they are liable to recall only on medical grounds. They may be a source of danger to the public even though these medical conditions are not met. While it is possible to argue, as Mr Davies did, about the magnitude of this risk, it cannot be said not to exist. (3) A defendant sentenced to life imprisonment under s 109 is not deprived of all his rights. He may appeal against imposition of the sentence. He may appeal against the minimum term specified by the judge. He is eligible for release on the expiry of that term and is entitled to be released if he is no longer a source of danger to the public. But the decision whether it is safe to release him will be taken by the Parole Board, as an independent body acting judicially, which will not be confined to the medical considerations of which, alone, a Mental Health Review Tribunal may take account, and he is liable to recall indefinitely if he appears to present a danger to the public, the grounds of recall, again, being broader than in the case of a restricted patient. In short, an automatic life sentence affords a measure of control not available under the other available orders. Had it been open to the Recorder to make an order under s 45A (which it was not, because the appellant was not suffering from psychopathic disorder) it seems likely that he would have done so. This would have avoided the ill effects which the appellant undoubtedly suffered as a result of his confinement in prison. We hope that further thought may be given to exercise of the power conferred by s 45A(10).

[22] In the course of his argument for the Home Secretary, Mr Perry gently suggested that Court of Appeal decisions generally encouraging the making of hospital orders where the relevant medical criteria were met might, in the absence of adversarial argument, have given less than adequate weight to the differing conditions governing the release and recall of restricted patients as opposed to life sentence prisoners. He instanced authorities such as R v Howell (1985) 7 Cr App R (S) 360, R v Mbatha (1985) 7 Cr App R (S) 373, R v Mitchell [1997] 1 Cr App R (S) 90, R v Hutchinson [1997] 2 Cr App R (S) 60. There may be some force in this criticism, and we would accept that these differing conditions are a matter to which sentencing judges and appellate courts should try to give appropriate weight. The difficulties caused to prison managements by the presence and behaviour of those who are subject to serious mental disorder are, however, notorious, and we would need to be persuaded that any significant change in the prevailing practice was desirable.

RECOMMENDATION

[23] We agree with the Court of Appeal that ss 109 and 37 of the 2000 and 1983 Acts respectively are not incompatible with art 3 (or, for that matter, art 5) of the convention and the appeal should therefore be dismissed. We so recommend.

Appeal dismissed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

Inter Lotto (UK) Ltd v Camelot Group plc

[2003] EWCA Civ 1132

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

PILL, KEENE AND CARNWATH LJJ

8, 9, 30 JULY 2003

Trade mark – Registration – Effect of registration – Whether owner of registered trade mark having statutory right to use mark overriding another person's common law passing off rights – Trade Marks Act 1994, ss 2, 5(4), 9(1).

The claimant operated lotteries in public houses under the registered trade mark HOTSPOT. The defendant operated the National Lottery under licence from the National Lottery Commission (NLC). Both parties used the name HOTPICK in relation to their own lottery games. The claimant contended that it had chosen the name HOTPICK in July 2001, had begun to promote that name in August 2001, and that by 17 October 2001 several hundred pubs had already signed up for the game, although it was not until 28 November 2001 that operation of the claimant's HOTSPOT game with a HOTPICK feature was actually commenced. The defendant contended that it chose the name HOTPICKS for its game in August 2001. On 17 October 2001 it caused the NLC to apply to register that name as a trade mark for lottery services. The defendant's HOTPICKS game first became available for play by the public in July 2002. The defendant's application for registration of the sign was opposed by the claimant. In January 2003 the claimant brought proceedings against the defendant for trade mark infringement and passing off. A preliminary issue was ordered to be tried, namely whether 17 October 2001 (the date of the defendant's application for registration as a trade mark, from which the rights of the proprietor of a registered trade mark took effect), was the relevant date at which the claimant's reputation and goodwill for its claim in passing off fell to be assessed. The judge held that the relevant date was the date upon which the defendant had started using the sign HOTPICKS in relation to its product, not the date of the trade mark application. The defendant appealed. It argued, inter alia, that whilst it could not use its trade mark application to defeat any rights acquired by the claimant prior to the application, if no such 'earlier rights' were established by the claimant under s 5(4)[a] of the Trade Marks Act 1994 then any infringing use post-application would be unlawful and could not be relied upon in support of a passing off claim, since to allow it to do so would undermine the 'exclusive rights' given by s 9[b] of the 1994 Act to the proprietor of the trade mark registration. Section 2(2)[c] of the 1994 Act provided that nothing in the Act 'affects the law relating to passing off'.

Held – On its proper construction, the clear effect of s 2(2) of the 1994 Act was to confirm that the law of passing off, and accordingly for the purposes of the instant case, the principle that liability in passing off fell to be determined as at the date when the defendant went to the market under the mark or name in question, was a Section 5, so far as material, is set out at [9], below

b Section 9, so far as material, is set out at [10], below
c Section 2, so far as material, is set out at [8], below preserved, notwithstanding any apparent conflict or overlap with the provisions of the Act. Whilst the 1994 Act 'by s 5' gave special recognition to rights acquired by use before the date of application for registration of a trade mark, there was no equivalent recognition of the possibility of superior rights being acquired by use after that date. However, that did not mean that such subsequent use was to be disregarded in determining the extent of any potentially competing rights. Section 2(2) left no room in the context of the instant case for the implication of terms, designed by purposive interpretation, to resolve an apparent conflict with passing off law. Accordingly, the appeal would be dismissed (see [35], [36], [44], [45], [53], [54], [56], below).

Decision of Laddie J [2003] 3 All ER 191 affirmed.

Notes

For rights conferred by registered trade mark and date from which right runs, see 48 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2000 reissue) paras 79, 80.

For the Trade Marks Act 1994, ss 2, 5, 9, see 48 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2001 reissue) 110, 114, 119.

Cases referred to in judgments

British Telecommunications plc v One In A Million Ltd [1998] 4 All ER 476, [1999] 1 WLR 903, CA.

Cadbury Schweppes Pty Ltd v Pub Squash Co Pty Ltd [1981] 1 All ER 213, [1981] 1 WLR 193, PC.

Campomar Sociedad Ltda v Nike International Ltd (2000) 169 ALR 677, Aust HC.

Marleasing SA v La Comercial Internacional de Alimentacion SA Case C-106/89 [1990] ECR I-4135.

Percy v Hall [1996] 4 All ER 523, [1997] QB 924, [1997] 3 WLR 573, CA.

R v Johnstone [2003] UKHL 28, [2003] 3 All ER 884, [2003] 1 WLR 1736.

Appeal

The defendant, Camelot Group plc, appealed from the decision of Laddie J on 6 June 2003 ([2003] EWHC 1256 (Ch), [2003] 3 All ER 191) whereby, upon determination of a preliminary issue, set out at [4], below in proceedings for passing off brought against the defendant, by the claimant, Inter Lotto (UK) Ltd, he held that the relevant date for assessing Inter Lotto's reputation and goodwill for its claim in passing off was the date upon which Camelot started using the sign HOTPICKS in relation to its product, not the date of the application by Camelot for registration of the mark HOTPICKS. The facts are set out in the judgment of Carnwath LJ.

Michael Silverleaf QC and Michael Hicks (instructed by Jones Day Gouldens) for Camelot.

Geoffrey Hobbs QC and Philip Roberts (instructed by McDermott Will & Emery) for Inter Lotto.

Cur adv vult

30 July 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

CARNWATH LJ.

INTRODUCTION

[1] The defendant, Camelot, operates the National Lottery under licence from the National Lottery Commission (NLC). The claimant, Inter Lotto, operates lotteries in public houses, under the name, 'HOTSPOT'. The present proceedings concern a particular feature of the lottery organised by Inter Lotto, which enables a player to ask for draw numbers to be selected randomly, and the similar name of a lottery game run by Camelot.

[2] Inter Lotto uses the name 'HOTPICK'. According to its case, the name 'HOTPICK' was chosen in July 2001. In August 2001 it began promoting HOTPICK in conjunction with its registered trade mark 'HOTSPOT', through a sales force targeting public houses in the United Kingdom. Until the middle of September 2001, use of the name HOTPICK was oral, but at that time it was used in printing tickets. It claims that by 17 October 2001 (one of the critical dates for the present proceedings) a total of almost 7,000 pubs had been visited, of which 424 were signed up with Inter Lotto. However, it was not until 28 November 2001 that there was actual operation of its HOTSPOT game, with the 'HOTPICK' feature.

[3] Turning to Camelot's case, it says that it chose the name 'HOTPICKS' for its game in August 2001. On 17 October 2001 it caused the NLC to apply to register the name as a trade mark for lottery services. That application was accepted by the Registrar of Trade Marks and advertised for opposition on 7 August 2002, under the number 2283392. It was opposed by Inter Lotto on 7 November 2002. In the meantime, on 29 April 2002 Camelot had announced the re-naming of the National Lottery draw as 'Lotto' and had begun to advertise the launch of a new 'Lotto Hotpicks' game. The 'Lotto Hotpicks' game first became available for play by the public on 10 July 2002.

[4] In January 2003 Inter Lotto brought proceedings against Camelot for trade mark infringement and passing off. It claims that it has suffered, and is continuing to suffer, significant commercial damage as a result of the confusion between the two games. The present appeal concerns a preliminary issue ordered on 19 March 2003 by Patten J with the consent of the parties in the following terms:

> 'Is the 17th October 2001 (the date on which the National Lottery Commission applied under application 2283392 to register the designation HOTPICKS as a trade mark) the relevant date at which the claimant's reputation and goodwill for its claim in passing off falls to be assessed?'

[5] This issue requires a little elaboration to understand its significance in the context of these proceedings. We are concerned with the relationship of trade mark law and passing off law. Inter Lotto seeks to rely on the well-established principle that liability in passing off falls to be determined as at the date when the defendant goes to the market under the mark or name in question. On this basis its claim is to be judged not earlier than April 2002 when Lotto Hotpicks was first launched, and by which time, according to its case, its own HOTPICK game was well established.

[6] Camelot, however, contends that the relevant date is 17 October 2001, the date of its application for registration. It argues that, under the terms of the Trade Marks Act 1994, it was entitled to register the mark as at that date, unless Inter

Lotto was able to establish a passing off claim by virtue of its own use prior to that date; and that any use since then by Inter Lotto should be regarded as unlawful, and not therefore such as to reinforce Inter Lotto's claim in passing off.

THE RELEVANT LAW

[7] There is no material dispute as to the applicable law of passing off. A trader may not conduct his business so as to lead to the belief that his goods or services are the goods or services of another. To bring such an action the plaintiff must establish a goodwill or reputation attached to his goods or services. The relevant date for that purpose is the date of the commencement of the conduct complained of (see Cadbury Schweppes Pty Ltd v Pub Squash Co Pty Ltd [1981] 1 All ER 213 at 221, [1981] RPC 429 at 494 per Lord Scarman). Accordingly, apart from the effect of trade mark law, Inter Lotto would be entitled to rely on any goodwill built up at least by the time Camelot began to market their new game in April 2002.

[8] The debate in this case therefore turns on the interaction of this law with the provisions of the Trade Marks Act 1994. For present purposes, the relevant provisions are as follows. Section 2 provides:

> '(1) A registered trade mark is a property right obtained by the registration of the trade mark under this Act and the proprietor of a registered trade mark has the rights and remedies provided by this Act.
> (2) No proceedings lie to prevent or recover damages for the infringement of an unregistered trade mark as such; but nothing in this Act affects the law relating to passing off.''

[9] Section 3 ff deal with grounds for refusal of registration. Section 5(4) is material to this case:

> '(4) A trade mark shall not be registered if, or to the extent that, its use in the United Kingdom is liable to be prevented—(a) by virtue of any rule of law (in particular, the law of passing off) protecting an unregistered trade mark or other sign used in the course of trade, or ...
> A person thus entitled to prevent the use of a trade mark is referred to in this Act as the proprietor of an "earlier right" in relation to the trade mark.'

[10] Section 9 deals with the rights conferred by a registered trade mark. Subsection (1) provides that the proprietor of a registered trade mark has 'exclusive rights' in the trade mark which 'are infringed by its use in the United Kingdom without his consent'. By subsection (3):

> '(3) The rights of the proprietor have effect from the date of registration (which in accordance with section 40(3) is the date of filing of the application for registration):
> Provided that—(a) no infringement proceedings may be begun before the date on which the trade mark is in fact registered; and (b) no offence under section 92 (unauthorised use of trade mark, &c in relation to goods) is committed by anything done before the date of publication of the registration.'

Section 40(3), there cited, provides that the trade mark when registered is registered 'as of the date of filing of the application for registration', which date is 'deemed for the purposes of this Act to be the date of registration'. Section 92 creates a number of criminal offences of using a trade mark with a view to gain without the consent of the proprietor.

[11] Section 32 provides for applications for registration. It requires the applicant to state that the mark is being used in connection with services specified, or that he has a bona fide intention that it should be so used. The registration procedure is covered by s 37 ff. The Registrar makes an initial examination to satisfy herself that the application satisfies the requirements of the Act (s 37). It is then published, and there is an opportunity for any person within the prescribed time to give notice of opposition to the registration stating the grounds of opposition (s 38). If no opposition is given within the prescribed period, or if all opposition proceedings have been withdrawn or decided in favour of the applicant, the Registrar must register the mark, unless matters coming to her notice since she accepted the application show that it was accepted in error (s 40).

[12] As already noted, the registration takes effect as of the date of the filing of the application. The trade mark is initially registered for ten years, with the possibility of renewal (ss 42–43). However, a registration may be revoked if it has not been put to genuine use within five years (s 46(1)(a)); or if—

> 'in consequence of the use made of it by the proprietor ..., it is liable to mislead the public, particularly as to the nature, quality or geographical origin of those goods or services.' (s 46(1)(d).)

The registered mark may also be declared invalid on the ground that it was registered in breach of the requirements for registration, including the ground—'that there is an earlier right in relation to which the condition set out in section 5(4) is satisfied.' (s 47(2)(b).) The right to challenge a registered trade mark on the basis of an earlier right (as defined in s 5(4)) is lost if the owner of the earlier right has for five years knowingly acquiesced in the use of the registered mark (s 48).

DERIVATIONS

[13] In the court below, and in the skeleton arguments before us, there was lengthy discussion of the background of the various provisions, going back (in this country) to the Trade Marks Registration Act 1875, and (in the European context) to the 1980 Commission proposals which led in due course to First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks) (OJ 1989 L40 p 1) and Council Regulation (EC) 40/94 (on the Community trade mark) (OJ 1994 L11 p 1).

[14] Such historical analysis has to be approached with caution. The background of the 1994 Act was described recently in the House of Lords (see R v Johnstone [2003] UKHL 28, [2003] 3 All ER 884 per Lord Walker of Gestingthorpe):

> '[62] The law of trade marks has ancient origins which are preserved in the non-statutory law of passing off. Statutory regulation of trade marks, including a system of registration, was introduced by the Trade Marks Act 1875 and the Trade Marks Registration Act 1875. For much of the twentieth century the operative statute was the Trade Marks Act 1938. In recent times the whole of trade mark law has been re-shaped by the 1994 Act, which was enacted (as its long title states)—"to make new provision for registered trade marks, implementing Council Directive No. 89/104/EEC of 21st December 1988 to approximate the laws of the Member States relating to trade marks; to make provision in connection with Council Regulation (EC) No. 40/94 of 20th December 1993 on the Community trade mark; to give effect to the Madrid Protocol Relating to the International Registration of Marks of 27th June 1989, and to certain provisions of the Paris Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property of 20th March 1883, as revised and amended; and for connected purposes."

[63] In construing the 1994 Act your Lordships have to approach it as a new statute, the main purpose of which is to implement the directive. Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks (OJ 1989 L40 p 1) (the directive) aims at the partial approximation (but not the complete harmonisation) of the trade mark laws of the member states. The 1994 Act must be construed accordingly (see Marleasing SA v La Comercial Internacional de Alimentacion SA Case C-106/89 [1990] ECR I–4135 at 4159 (para 8)). But many of the basic concepts in the directive appear to be the same as, or closely similar to, those which have informed the previous domestic law. That is natural enough, since the basic purpose of a trade mark is the same in any national economic system.'

[15] As that summary makes clear, the 1994 Act is a hybrid. There are two main European sources: the Directive, aimed at harmonisation of the national trade marks laws, and the Regulation, introducing the new Community trade mark. However, many of the basic concepts are derived, in some cases solely, from previous domestic law. Old authorities may be of assistance, but:

'... it should not be forgotten at any point that the system is fundamentally different and frequently demands a fresh look.' (Kerly's Law of Trade Marks and Trade Names (13th edn, 2001) para 1–11.)

[16] The lack of a single historical point of reference is apparent in relation to the provisions most directly in issue in this case. Section 2(2), on which Inter Lotto principally relies has its counterpart in previous domestic legislation, but the wording has changed. Section 2 of the Trade Marks Act 1938 stated:

'2. No person shall be entitled to institute any proceeding to prevent, or to recover damages for, the infringement of an unregistered trade mark, but nothing in this Act shall be deemed to affect rights of action against any person for passing off goods as the goods of another person or the remedies in respect thereof.' (My emphasis.)

In the 1994 Act the italicised words have become 'nothing in this Act affects the law relating to passing off'. In the court below it was assumed that this was intended simply to reproduce the existing law, merely simplifying the language. I will return to this point.

[17] Mr Hobbs also referred to parallels in the European context. The preamble to the Directive includes the following:

'... the Directive does not deprive the Member States of the right to continue to protect trade marks acquired through use but takes them into account only in regard to the relationship between them and trade marks acquired by registration; ...

... this Directive does not exclude the application to trade marks of provisions of law of the Member States other than trade mark law, such as a the provisions relating to unfair competition, civil liability or consumer protection; ...'

(The second paragraph, it seems, represents the reversal, following criticism by the Economic and Social Committee, of the original 1980 proposal, which was expressed in terms designed to exclude the application of 'other rules of law of the Member States, such as the provisions relating to fair competition'.) Similarly, b the Regulation makes clear that the new Community system is without prejudice to existing domestic laws; art 106(2) provides:

'This Regulation shall, unless otherwise provided for, not affect the right to bring proceedings under the civil, administrative or criminal law of a Member State or under provisions of Community law for the purpose of c prohibiting the use of a Community trade mark to the extent that the use of a national trade mark may be prohibited under the law of that Member State or under Community law.'

[18] Turning to the grounds of objection to registration, ss 3 and 5 of the 1994 Act ('absolute' and 'relative' grounds for refusal) follow closely the format of d arts 7 and 8 of the Regulation, and conform to arts 3 and 4 of the Directive. In particular, the concept of an 'earlier right', as defined in s 5(4), reflects art 8(4) of the Regulation and art 4(4)(b) and (c) of the Directive. It has no direct parallel in the Trade Marks Act 1938, although there is some overlap with s 11 of that Act (prohibition of deceptive matter; see Kerly para 8–104 n14). By contrast, s 7, e which preserves for limited purposes the concept of 'honest concurrent user', has no basis in the Directive (see Kerly para 8–112ff).

[19] Section 9(1) of the 1994 Act, defining the rights conferred by a registered trade mark, follows art 9 of the Regulation and art 5 of the Directive. There is, however, no direct parallel in the European provisions for s 9(3) (applying s 40(3)), by which such rights, having been registered, are treated as effective f from the date of the application.

[20] This aspect of the 1994 Act is apparently derived from domestic legislation. Section 19(1) of the 1938 Act provided that a trade mark when registered 'shall be registered ... as of the date of the application for registration'. By contrast, under art 5(1) of the Directive, the rights there defined are conferred g by 'the registered trade mark'; there is no provision for retrospective effect.

[21] Article 9(3) of the Regulation goes a little further than the Directive. It provides that the rights conferred by a Community trade mark 'shall prevail against third parties from the date of publication of registration', but adds:

'Reasonable compensation may, however, be claimed in respect of matters h arising after the date of publication of a Community trade mark application, which matters would, after publication of the registration of the trade mark, be prohibited by virtue of that publication. The court seized of the case may not decide upon the merits of the case until the registration has been published.' (My emphasis.)

j Thus, under the Community system, although the mark does not 'prevail' before registration, 'reasonable compensation' can be claimed back to the date of publication of the application (not the date of the application itself, as under s 9).

[22] These examples confirm the view that the safest course is to concentrate on the terms of the 1994 Act. Under the Marleasing principle, it may be necessary to refer to the terms of the Directive to ensure conformity with the mandatory European rules for harmonisation. But reference to previous legislation in this country, or cases based on it, is likely to be of limited assistance in resolving problems created by the interaction and reconciliation of the two systems.

THE JUDGMENT BELOW

[23] There is some disagreement as to whether the judge correctly understood Camelot's case. Early in the judgment, he summarised the respective contentions as follows:

> '[5] ... Because of the exclusive rights which will exist in NLC's trade mark, all use of Inter Lotto's mark after the date of registration is to be treated as unlawful. As a result, Inter Lotto cannot rely upon any reputation or goodwill generated by such unlawful use (ie after 17 October 2001) in support of its passing off case. ...
>
> [7] ... because Inter Lotto's use of its mark after 17 October 2001 was unlawful, it was, per se, incapable of giving rise to any goodwill and reputation which a court would be prepared to protect. The date of registration of Camelot's mark therefore acts as a guillotine. Only rights accrued before then can be taken into account in support of Inter Lotto's case of passing off.
>
> [8] Inter Lotto's case is that it can rely on all the goodwill built up by its alleged use of the HOT PICK mark from 4 August 2001 until Camelot commenced using HOTPICKS in July 2002. It is not disputed that, absent the special defence which is central to this application, it is the date when the defendant started using its mark which is relevant for determining the passing off claim. ...' ([2003] EWHC 1256 (Ch) at [5]–[8], [2003] 3 All ER 191 at [5]–[8].)

[24] That summary, as I understand it, fairly encapsulates the issue before us. However, the judge understood that Camelot was also putting forward a broader case. He explained the two possible formulations in this way ([2003] 3 All ER 191 at [11]):

> 'It is possible to formulate a defence to the passing off action in two ways. First, it could be said that Inter Lotto has no enforceable goodwill and reputation. If that is the case, the claim will fail. Inter Lotto will have no rights which it can assert. The sword is taken from its hand. Second, it could be said that, even if Inter Lotto does have enforceable goodwill and reputation, Camelot cannot be restrained because it has an overriding entitlement to do the acts of which complaint is made. In such a case Camelot would have a personal shield. ...'

The judge understood that Camelot's case, as developed in argument, relied on the latter proposition:

> '[Mr Silverleaf] asserted that Camelot's ownership of the '392 mark provided it with an entitlement to use it. He said that his client had a "better" claim than Inter Lotto to the marks in suit. He said that the issue was one of priority of rights and "hierarchy". His client's right to use its registered trade mark overrode any common law rights Inter Lotto might have.'

Much of the rest of his judgment was directed to that second formulation, which he did not accept.

[25] Before us Mr Silverleaf says that the judge misunderstood his case. As he puts in his skeleton argument:

> '27 The judge appears to have started from the basis that Camelot was arguing that trade mark rights are in some way superior to and override passing off rights, even when the passing off rights were acquired prior to the registration of the registered mark: see eg paragraphs 32, 34 (especially the last two sentences), 40 and 41 of the judgment. This is no part of Camelot's case and is obviously wrong. As set out above, registered trade mark rights are only superior to passing off rights which are not established at the date of registration. Passing off rights which are established at the date of registration are earlier rights which invalidate the registration. That is what the 1994 Act provides.'

This he says 'coloured the judge's entire approach to the preliminary issue'. Accordingly, he failed to deal properly with the more limited case that Camelot was putting forward, based on the unlawfulness of any use by Inter Lotto after 17 October 2001.

[26] He accepts that the judge having dealt with the broader issue, correctly formulated the narrower issue (in the introduction to [42]) as follows:

> 'Is Inter Lotto precluded from relying on reputation and goodwill built up on the back of use of the trade mark which, in the circumstances presumed for this application, constituted infringement of the '392 mark?'

However, he says the judge wrongly dealt with that as a question of general 'unlawfulness', rather than in relation to the relative rights of the two parties.

[27] In that part of his judgment, the judge treated the case as based on the principle 'ex turpi causa non oritur actio'. He characterised (at [44]) the 'underlying principle' as being that 'the behaviour of the party has been so heinous that the court will not assist it'. He rejected its application in this case; he said (at [45]):

> 'First, whether or not a party's behaviour has been so bad as to merit exclusion from protection by the court is an issue of fact. Second, the wrongdoing has to be substantial and go to the heart of the right sued on. In my view it is unarguable that trade mark infringement without more amounts to wrongdoing of such a level of depravity as to engage the doctrine. ...'

He also accepted Mr Hobbs' contention (for Inter Lotto) that the principle could not be limited in application to the relations between the two parties to these proceedings. He rejected (at [43]) the possibility that—

> '... the claimant's goodwill and reputation would be simultaneously lawful and protectable against third parties but unlawful and not protectable against the owner of the registered trade mark.'

[28] Mr Silverleaf says that his argument was much less far-reaching than the judge thought. The scheme of the Act is that 'earlier rights' (as defined in s 5(4)) are protected against an applicant for trade mark registration, but subsequent rights are not. That is the effect, on the one hand, of the protection of earlier rights under s 5(4), and, on the other, of the retrospective effect of registration, back to the date of application. As between the parties, that means that the rights must be defined as at the date of application for registration. How this would affect third parties is not in point; nor is any general principle relating to the 'ex turpi causa' rule.

DISCUSSION

[29] The real dispute, in my view, is masked by the form of the preliminary question:

> 'Is the 17th October 2001 ... the relevant date at which the claimant's reputation and goodwill for its claim in passing off falls to be assessed?'

As formulated, this is a question relating to the law of passing off. As such, it answers itself. It is common ground that, under that law, the relevant date is the date of the commencement of the conduct complained of, which, in this case was not earlier than April 2002. The date mentioned—that of the application under the Trade Marks Act—has no direct relevance to passing off law.

[30] Camelot's case, as I understand it, does not depend on challenging that aspect of the established law of passing off. It is directed, not so much to the relevant date for the claim, as to what is to be taken into account in determining it. Infringing use after the date of the application must be ignored because it is (prospectively) unlawful.

[31] The argument has the following stages: (i) If Inter Lotto can establish its reputation and goodwill as at the date of the application, then it will be able to defeat the registration by virtue of an 'earlier right' as defined in s 5(4). Even after registration, its 'earlier right' would enable it to seek a retrospective 'declaration of invalidity' (s 47(2)(b)). Such an earlier right is only defeated if the owner acquiesces for five years in the use of the registered trade mark (s 48(1)). (ii) By contrast, if it is unable to establish an 'earlier right' as at that date, it will have no valid grounds for opposing registration. The mark once registered will have retrospective effect from the date of application, and Inter Lotto will in principle be liable in damages for any infringing use from that date. (iii) Thus, the date of the application is the critical date for establishing the relative rights of the two parties. Camelot cannot use its trade mark application to defeat any rights of Inter Lotto, acquired by virtue of use before that date. Conversely, if Inter Lotto has acquired no rights by that date, any subsequent infringing use will be unlawful as against Camelot, and cannot therefore be relied on to improve its passing off claim. To allow it to do so would undermine the exclusive rights given by s 9 to the proprietor of the trade mark registration. (iv) The fact that the unlawfulness will only be established retrospectively, following actual registration, cannot affect the principle of the matter. Furthermore, delay caused by opposition proceedings, which on this hypothesis would be unfounded, should not be allowed to improve the objector's rights. (v) This view of the scheme of the 1994 Act is reinforced by s 48. That contains specific provision for the effects of acquiescence by owners of 'earlier rights', as defined in s 5, including rights under passing off law. There is no equivalent recognition of the possibility of 'later rights'—that is, rights acquired, or improved, by use between the dates of application and actual registration.

[32] The argument as so put is much narrower than that dealt with by the judge. It is unnecessary to determine whether he correctly understood the submissions made to him at that stage. It is enough to record that Mr Silverleaf does not submit before us that a registered trade mark confers a statutory right to use the mark, which overrides other rights. He accepts, as the judge said, that the right acquired by registration is a negative right, that is, a right to prevent others infringing.

[33] Furthermore, before us Mr Silverleaf had not based his argument on the 'ex turpi causa' (or 'illegality') principle. In my view he is right not to do so. The difficulties in determining the scope of the principle are notorious (see Law Commission Consultation Paper, The Illegality Defence in Tort (Law Com no 160)). However, the starting point is criminal illegality, or (possibly) 'other reprehensible or grossly immoral conduct' (ibid para 1.14; the Law Commission could only find one case, in the 19th century, where the principle had been successfully invoked in relation to conduct which was not also criminal). As the judge observed (at [44]), there is some precedent for its application in the context of trade mark and passing off, where there has been misrepresentation amounting to 'a fraud on the public'. However, nothing of that kind is alleged here. Furthermore, the legislation has provided that, until publication of actual registration, infringing use does not involve any criminal offence (s 9(3)(b)). Given that specific indication in the statute, I do not see how it can be open to us to hold that such use is to be disregarded under some more general 'illegality' principle.

[34] The argument therefore has to be based on the effect, express or implied, of the 1994 Act. In essence, the submission must be that it is inconsistent with the scheme of that Act, and the nature of the exclusive right conferred by registration under it, that it should be overridden by use rights acquired since the date of application.

[35] If we were required or permitted to treat the 1994 Act as a comprehensive legislative scheme governing the relationship between registered trade marks and passing off, I could see much force in this submission. By defining and providing for 'earlier rights', the Act does give special recognition to rights acquired by use before the date of application. There is no equivalent recognition of the possibility of superior rights being acquired by use after that date. The natural implication might be that, in determining the extent of any potentially competing rights, such subsequent use is to be disregarded.

[36] However, I do not think that course is open to us. It is ruled out by s 2(2), which provides expressly that the Act does not affect the law of passing off. This wording, as already noted, is even clearer than the corresponding provision in the 1938 Act. If the section had referred simply to its effect on 'rights of action ... for passing off' there might have been some room for a narrower interpretation: for example, limiting it to rights of action enjoyed by the owner of the trade mark (as the judge suggested at [30]), or rights acquired by another party before the application for registration. However, the clear effect of the section in its present form, in my view, is to confirm that the law of passing off is preserved, notwithstanding any apparent conflict or overlap with the provisions of the Act.

[37] It is fair to say that this position is not wholly unqualified. There is at least one aspect of the 1994 Act which impinges directly on the law of passing off, that is the loss of rights by acquiescence (s 48). However, this is an express provision. In my view, s 2(2) leaves no room in the present context for the implication of terms, designed by purposive interpretation to resolve an apparent conflict with passing off law.

[38] This conclusion is less surprising when one has regard to the history of the two systems of law. Since the beginning of the 20th century trade mark rights have been based on registration, while passing off rights have based on use (see British Telecommunications plc v One In A Million Ltd [1998] 4 All ER 476 at 483–484, [1999] 1 WLR 903 at 910–911, where the history is summarised by Aldous LJ). There has sometimes been an uneasy relationship between the two, but it has never been doubted that they are to be considered separately (see Campomar Sociedad Ltda v Nike International Ltd (2000) 169 ALR 677, 46 IPR 481, for a recent authoritative review by the High Court of Australia). The 1994 Act might have been designed to achieve a tidier relationship, but that is contradicted by s 2(2).

[39] I acknowledge that this leaves open some questions which may arise in the future, either in this case if and when Camelot's mark is finally registered, or in other more extreme circumstances. The judge ([2003] 3 All ER 191 at [34]) suggested a notional example:

> 'A trader starts to use a trade mark "X". He uses it extensively in relation to particular goods and builds up a valuable reputation and goodwill. At the same time another trader applies to register "X" as a trade mark which he does not use in respect of the same class of goods. At the outset, each trader is ignorant of the existence of the other. After four-and-a-half years, the second trader decides to start using his registered mark. He learns of the first trader and sues for infringement. The [first] trader sues for passing off. Mr Silverleaf argues that not only does the second trader succeed on the infringement proceedings, but the first trader cannot succeed in passing off. The result is that the second trader is entitled to take all the goodwill and reputation which the first trader had built up.'

[40] Mr Silverleaf stands by that submission. He says that it is misleading to speak of the second trader 'taking' goodwill and reputation built up by the first trader. He has only done so by use which, by virtue of s 9, is an infringement of the second trader's rights, and for which he has a statutory right to claim damages.

[41] Mr Hobbs' position on the notional example is less clear. He accepts, as I understand it, that the first trader's use would in principle be an infringement of the second trader's trade mark rights, as from the date of the application, and that he could claim damages for loss caused by that use (although the measure of damages might be open to question). As to future use, he seemed to have three possible answers. The first was that the first trader would be able to secure revocation of the trade mark under s 46(1)(d), on the basis that its use would be liable to mislead. Alternatively, he submits that both traders would be entitled to injunctions to restrain each other. Finally as a last resort, he falls back on the comforting Latinism—solvitur ambulando; in other words, 'things will sort themselves out'.

[42] None of these suggestions seems wholly satisfactory, but I do not think that we can resolve this issue within the terms of the preliminary question. The consequences of retrospective effect, in the new Community-led system, may not have been fully worked out in the Act (cf Percy v Hall [1996] 4 All ER 523, [1997] QB 924 for the analogous problem of retrospective invalidity in public law). However, these potential future difficulties do not persuade me that, contrary to the clear effect of s 2(2), we can read into the 1994 Act provisions designed to reconcile the two systems for the purposes of the limited question before us.

[43] Finally, I should note Mr Silverleaf's submission that, if we were against him, there should be a reference to the Court of Justice of the European Communities to determine whether this conclusion is compatible with the registration scheme laid down by the Directive and the Regulation. I do not agree. The issue arises from the retrospective effect given by English law to a registered mark back to the date of application. In that respect, as I have already noted, English law provides greater protection for the registered right than is required by the Directive. The problems which it creates are ones of domestic law, and would not be a proper matter for a reference.

[44] For these reasons, which differ in some respects from those of the judge, I would dismiss the appeal.

KEENE LJ.

[45] I agree.

PILL LJ.

[46] I gratefully adopt Carnwath LJ's summary of the facts. Inter Lotto and Camelot each run lotteries. Inter Lotto used the name HOTPICK for a particular feature of their game, and used it first. They canvassed many public houses to promote the game in the summer of 2001. They began to operate it on 28 November 2001.

[47] Camelot did not begin to operate the game until 10 July 2002, though they had about two months earlier begun to advertise. They had, however, on 17 October 2001 applied (by the National Lottery Commission) to register the name HOTPICKS under the Trade Marks Act 1994 (the 1994 Act) as a trade mark for lottery services.

[48] The preliminary question has been framed with a view to deciding the date at which the respective rights of the parties in the name are to be determined. Mr Silverleaf QC, for Camelot, submits that a complete solution is provided by the 1994 Act and in particular by s 5(4) and s 40(3). It is submitted that the 1994 Act comprehensively provides for the resolution of any conflict which arises between competing claims to particular trade marks, whether the claims arise by virtue of competing registrations or by conflict between registrations and common law rights of action for passing off gained by a user.

[49] Section 5(4) provides:

> 'A trade mark shall not be registered if, or to the extent that, its use in the United Kingdom is liable to be prevented—(a) by virtue of any rule of law (in particular, the law of passing off) protecting an unregistered trade mark or other sign used in the course of trade, or (b) by virtue of an earlier right other than those referred to in subsections (1) to (3) or paragraph (a) above, in particular by virtue of the law of copyright, design right or registered designs.
>
> A person thus entitled to prevent the use of a trade mark is referred to in this Act as the proprietor of an "earlier right" in relation to the trade mark.'

Subsections (1)–(3) specify circumstances in which a trade mark shall not be registered if there is an earlier trade mark, an entity as defined in s 6. Section 40(3) provides:

> 'A trade mark when registered shall be registered as of the date of filing of the application for registration; and that date shall be deemed for the purposes of this Act to be the date of registration.'

[50] Section 5 makes provision for protection of earlier rights but makes the date of application for registration crucial to the resolution of competing claims, it is submitted. Rights crystallise at that date. Under s 5(4) registration should be refused if there existed at the date of application a conflicting passing off right, but a right which comes into existence after the date of application does not affect the grant of registration. Where a trader claims he has a right to sue for passing off which prevents a second trader obtaining a trade mark registration, he has to show that the right existed at the date of application for registration. If he establishes that it does, the application should be refused (or if it has already been granted, it should be declared invalid and removed from the register (s 47(2)). If, on the other hand, a trader claiming that he has a passing off right cannot show that the right existed at the date of application for registration by a second trader, the second trader is entitled to registration and to complain of the use by the first trader of the trade mark from the date of application for registration, though he cannot bring an action for infringement until the mark is registered (s 9(3)). That is so even if the first trader has between the date of application and the grant of registration (which may include the period between the date of application and the second trader's first use of the mark), built up a reputation and goodwill under the mark.

[51] The court has not been told why Inter Lotto did not apply to register HOTPICK when they began their canvass. If Mr Silverleaf's submission is correct, they are plainly in a much weaker position in that they can rely only on events before 17 October 2001 as establishing a claim to reputation and goodwill sufficient to support a claim in passing off against Camelot and not also on events up to the date on which Camelot began to use the mark.

[52] The beguiling feature of Mr Silverleaf's submission is the clear-cut solution it provides. Considerations as to use are subjected to the overriding importance of the application date. It also avoids the potential future difficulties which Carnwath LJ has considered in [41], [42], above. (On the other hand, the apparent unfairness of a mere applicant for registration (with the necessary intent) taking priority over and having a claim for damages against someone who has used the mark for several years subsequent to the date of application is avoided on Inter Lotto's interpretation.)

[53] I agree with Carnwath LJ that the presence in the 1994 Act of s 2(2), which provides in terms that 'nothing in this Act affects the law relating to passing off', is fatal to Camelot's claim on the preliminary point. Carnwath LJ has referred to the principle that liability in passing off falls to be determined as at the date when the defendant goes to the market under the mark or name in question and that principle is preserved. The European sources described by Mr Hobbs QC, for Inter Lotto, and considered by Carnwath LJ in his judgment, demonstrate that the application to trade marks of provisions of domestic law other than trade mark law, such as provisions relating to unfair competition, is not excluded by First Council Directive (EEC) 89/104 (to approximate the laws of the member states relating to trade marks) (OJ 1989 L40 p 1). The presence of s 2(2) in the 1994 Act in my judgment defeats the submission that the statute creates a scheme whereby the provisions of s 5(4), together with provisions as to the retrospective effects of registration, which are a feature of the statute, prevent any reliance upon reputation and goodwill established by Inter Lotto between the date of Camelot's application and the date at which Camelot began to use the mark.

[54] Section 5 makes detailed provision for the protection of earlier rights, including rights in passing off but it does not follow that passing off rights cannot be acquired after the date of application for registration by the competing party. In specifying circumstances in which a trade mark shall not be registered by reason of the existence of earlier rights, the section does not in my judgment have the effect of preventing later use forming the basis for a claim in passing off. The law of passing off is expressly stated in s 2(2) not to be affected by the Act and the long-recognised possibility of establishing rights by use is thereby preserved.

[55] I see some force in Mr Silverleaf's submission that s 2(2) cannot be given full effect because the Act itself, in s 48, provides a derogation from it, as explained by Carnwath LJ in [37], above. That derogation is a specific and limited one, however, relating to a time limit, and does not defeat the otherwise comprehensive effect of s 2(2). Passing off rights based on use continue to exist at least to the extent that Camelot's claim that all turns upon the date of application for registration cannot in my judgment be accepted.

[56] For those reasons, and the reasons given by Carnwath LJ, I too would dismiss this appeal.

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal refused.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

Sharratt v London Central Bus Co Ltd and other appeals (The Accident Group Test Cases) Hollins v Russell and other appeals

[2003] EWCA Civ 718

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

BROOKE, HALE AND ARDEN LJJ SITTING WITH CHIEF MASTER HURST AS ASSESSOR

18, 19, 20, 21 MARCH, 22 MAY 2003

Costs – Order for costs – Conditional fee agreement – Receiving party relying on conditional fee agreement – Receiving party put to his election whether to disclose agreement to paying party or to prove entitlement to costs by other means – Guidance to costs judges where paying party alleges agreement unenforceable because of breach of statutory provisions – Courts and Legal Services Act 1990, s 58 – Conditional Fee Agreements Regulations 2000.

Conditional fee agreements (CFAs) in relation to the provision of advocacy or litigation services were regulated, inter alia, by the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990. Section 58(1)[a] of the 1990 Act provided that only a CFA which satisfied all of the conditions applicable to it by virtue of that section was enforceable. The conditions included that prescribed information be provided. The prescribed information was specified in the Conditional Fee Agreements Regulations 2000. In costs assessments, although all relevant documents had to be filed with the court, there was no automatic disclosure to the paying party. Paragraph 40.14[b] of the Costs Practice Direction provided that the court could direct the receiving party to produce any document which in the opinion of the court was necessary to enable it to reach its decision and the court could ask the receiving party to elect whether to disclose a particular document to the paying party in order to rely on the contents of the document, or whether to decline disclosure and instead rely on other evidence. Under the CFA regime defendant liability insurers examined CFAs very closely for defects when they were produced to them and demanded to see claimants' CFAs during costs assessments proceedings, resulting in an increase in disputed assessments and protracted costs proceedings. Six appeals were consolidated in order to address, inter alia, (i) the circumstances in which a court should put a receiving party in detailed costs assessment proceedings to its election, so that it had to choose whether to disclose its CFA to the paying party, or to endeavour to prove its claim by other means; and (ii) the proper construction of the words 'satisfies all of the conditions applicable to it' in s 58(1) of the 1990 Act, and whether any costs or disbursements were recoverable from a paying party in the event of non-compliance with the Conditional Fee Agreements Regulations 2000.

Held – (1) Where there was a CFA a costs judge should normally exercise his discretion under the Costs Practice Direction and the procedure by which, where a factual issue was raised which was real and relevant and not a sham or fanciful

a Section 58, so far as material, is set out at [12], [19], [20], below

b Paragraph 40, so far as material, is set out at [55], below

dispute, a claimant was required to prove the facts on which he relied, so as to require the receiving parties (subject to their right of election preserved by para 40.14 of the Costs Practice Direction) to produce a copy of their CFAs to the paying parties in order that they might see whether the 2000 regulations had been complied with and, where a CFA provided for a success fee, whether the liability of the receiving party to pay that success fee was indeed enforceable. If the CFA contained confidential information which was not required to be disclosed for the purposes of fairly determining the receiving party's claim to costs, it might be suitably redacted before disclosure took place. Attendance notes and other correspondence should not ordinarily be disclosed, but the judge conducting the assessment might require the disclosure of material of that kind unless there was a genuine issue as to whether there the CFA was unenforceable as a result of failure to satisfy the applicable conditions (see [71], [72], [80], [81], [220], below); Pamplin v Express Newspapers Ltd [1985] 2 All ER 185, Goldman v Hesper [1988] 3 All ER 97 applied; Bailey v IBC Vehicles Ltd [1998] 3 All ER 570 distinguished.

(2) A CFA would only be unenforceable if in the circumstances of the particular case the conditions applicable to it by virtue of s 58 of the 1990 Act had not been sufficiently complied with in the light of their statutory purposes to safeguard the administration of justice and afford protection to the client. Costs judges should ask themselves whether the particular departure from a regulation or a requirement in s 58, either on its own or in conjunction with any other such departure in the particular case, had had a materially adverse effect either upon the protections afforded to the client or upon the proper administration of justice. Thus the judge conducting the assessment should first consider the position as between solicitor and client. If the court considered that as between solicitor and client the client would have just cause for complaint because some requirement introduced for his protection was not satisfied, or that the CFA otherwise offended public policy, then the CFA would be unenforceable, and the indemnity principle would operate in favour of the paying party. Even then, however, the client should be able to recover the disbursements which he or she had already financed, whether personally or through a loan, and any after-the-event insurance premium (see [53], [105], [107], [114], [115], [221]–[223], below).

Per curiam. District judges and costs judges must be astute to prevent satellite litigation about costs from being protracted by allegations about breaches of the 2000 regulations where the breaches do not matter. They should remember that the law does not care about very little things, and that they should only declare a CFA unenforceable if the breach does matter and if the client could have relied on it successfully against his solicitor (see [226], below).

Decision of Chief Master Hurst [2003] 1 All ER 353 affirmed.

Notes

For the meaning and nature of conditional fee agreements, see Supp to 44(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 188, 189.

For the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990, s 58, see 11 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2000 reissue) 1346.

For the Conditional Fee Agreements Regulations 2000, see 11 Halsbury's Statutory Instruments (2003 issue) 54.

Cases referred to in judgment

Al Fayed v Comr of Police of the Metropolis [2002] EWCA Civ 780, (2002) Times, 17 June.

Arbiter Group plc v Gill Jennings & Every (a firm) and RWS Information Inc [2000] Lloyd's Rep PN 669, CA.

Awwad v Geraghty & Co (a firm) [2000] 1 All ER 608, [2001] QB 570, [2000] 3 WLR 1041, CA.

Bailey v IBC Vehicles Ltd [1998] 3 All ER 570, CA.

Barings plc, Re (No 5), Secretary of State for Trade and Industry v Baker (No 5) [1999] 1 BCLC 433.

Burstein v Times Newspapers Ltd [2002] EWCA Civ 1739, [2003] 1 Costs LR 111.

BWE International Ltd v Jones [2003] EWCA Civ 298, [2003] All ER (D) 245 (Feb).

Callery v Gray, Russell v Pal Pak Corrugated Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 1117, [2001] 3 All ER 833, [2001] 1 WLR 2112; affd sub nom Callery v Gray (Nos 1 and 2) [2002] UKHL 28; [2002] 3 All ER 417, [2002] 1 WLR 2000.

Dickinson (t/a John Dickinson Equipment Finance) v Rushmer (t/a FJ Associates) [2002] 1 Costs LR 128.

Dimond v Lovell [2000] 2 All ER 897, [2002] 1 AC 384, [2000] 2 WLR 1121, HL.

Factortame Ltd v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (No 2) [2002] EWCA Civ 932, [2002] 4 All ER 97, sub nom R (Factortame Ltd) v Secretary of State for Transport, Local Government and the Regions (No 8) [2002] 3 WLR 1104.

General of Berne Insurance Co v Jardine Reinsurance Management Ltd [1998] 2 All ER 301, [1998] 1 WLR 1231, CA.

Goldman v Hesper [1988] 3 All ER 97, [1988] 1 WLR 1238, CA.

Gundry v Sainsbury [1910] 1 KB 645, CA.

Harold v Smith (1860) 5 H & N 381, 157 ER 1229.

Hazlett v Sefton Metropolitan BC [2000] 4 All ER 887, DC.

Hodgson v Imperial Tobacco Ltd [1998] 2 All ER 673, [1998] 1 WLR 1056, CA.

Hughes v Kingston upon Hull City Council [1999] 2 All ER 49, [1999] QB 1193, [1999] 2 WLR 1229, DC.

Law Society v Waterlow, Law Society v Skinner (1883) 8 App Cas 407, HL.

Marckx v Belgium (1979) 2 EHRR 330, [1979] ECHR 6833/74, E Ct HR.

McCreery v Massey Plastic Fabrications Ltd (21 March 2003, unreported).

Pamplin v Express Newspapers Ltd [1985] 2 All ER 185, [1985] 1 WLR 689.

R (on the application of Quintavalle) v Secretary of State for Health [2003] UKHL 13, [2003] 2 All ER 113, [2003] 2 WLR 692.

R v Crown Court at Manchester, ex p Rogers [1999] 4 All ER 35, [1999] 1 WLR 832, DC.

R v Immigration Appeal Tribunal, ex p Jeyeanthan, Ravichandran v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1999] 3 All ER 231, [2000] 1 WLR 354, CA.

Sarwar v Alam [2001] EWCA Civ 1401, [2001] 4 All ER 541, [2002] 1 WLR 125.

South Coast Shipping Co Ltd v Havant BC [2002] 3 All ER 779.

Swain v Law Society [1982] 2 All ER 827, [1983] 1 AC 598, [1982] 3 WLR 261, HL.

Thai Trading Co (a firm) v Taylor [1998] 3 All ER 65, [1998] QB 781, [1998] 2 WLR 893, CA.

Three Rivers DC v Governor and Company of the Bank of England (No 7) [2003] EWCA Civ 474, [2003] All ER (D) 59 (Apr).

Z v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 384, E Ct HR.

Cases referred to in skeleton arguments and written submissions

Adagio Properties Ltd v Ansari [1998] 2 EGLR 69, CA.

Aratra Potato Co Ltd v Taylor Joynson Garrett (a firm) [1995] 4 All ER 695.

Balabel v Air-India [1988] 2 All ER 246, [1988] Ch 317, [1988] 2 WLR 1036, CA.

Boissevain v Weil [1950] 1 All ER 728, [1950] AC 327, HL.
Bramelid and Malmström v Sweden (1982) 5 EHRR 249, E Com HR.
Brockman, Re [1909] 2 Ch 170, [1908–10] All ER Rep 364, CA.
Burdis v Livsey, Clark v Ardington Electrical Services, Dennard v Plant, Sen v Steelform Engineering Co Ltd, Lagden v O'Connor [2002] EWCA Civ 510, [2003] QB 36, [2002] 3 WLR 762.
Burman v Mount Cook Land Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 1712, [2002] 1 All ER 144, [2002] Ch 256, [2002] 2 WLR 1172.
Chassagnou v France (1999) 7 BHRC 151, ECt HR.
Customs and Excise Comrs v Vaz, Portcullis (VAT Consultancy) Ltd, intervening [1995] STC 14.
Daniels v Walker (Practice Note) [2000] 1 WLR 1382, CA.
Dixon v Bell (1816) 1 Stark 287, 105 ER 1023.
E v London Borough of Newham and the Special Educational Needs Tribunal [2002] EWHC 915 (Admin), [2002] ELR 453.
Eastwood (decd), Re, Lloyds Bank v Eastwood [1974] 3 All ER 603, [1975] Ch 112, [1974] 3 WLR 454, CA.
Edwards v Edwards (1876) 2 Ch D 291, CA.
English v Clipson (20 August 2002, unreported).
Giambrone v JMC Holidays Ltd (formerly Sunworld Holidays Ltd) [2002] EWHC 495 (QB), (2002) 2 Costs LR 294; affd [2002] EWHC 2932 (QB), [2003] 1 All ER 982.
Gliddon v Lloyd Maunder Ltd [2003] All ER (D) 225 (Feb), (2003) 153 NLJ 318.
H v UK (1983) 33 DR 247, E Com HR.
Halloran v Delaney [2002] EWCA Civ 1258, [2003] 1 All ER 775, [2003] 1 WLR 28.
Inco Europe Ltd v First Choice Distribution (a firm) [2000] 2 All ER 109, [2000] 1 WLR 586, HL.
International Transport Roth GmbH v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] EWCA Civ 158, [2002] 3 WLR 344.
James v UK (1986) 8 EHRR 123, [1986] ECHR 8793/79, ECt HR.
JS v Netherlands (1995) 20 EHRR CD 41.
Kasumu v Baba-Egbe [1956] 3 All ER 266, [1956] AC 539, [1956] 3 WLR 575, PC.
Krcmár v Czech Republic (2001) 31 EHRR 953, [2000] ECHR 35376/97, ECt HR.
Leroux v Brown (1852) 12 CB 801, 138 ER 1119.
Leslie (R) Ltd v Sheill [1914] 3 KB 607, [1914–15] All ER Rep 511, CA.
London & Clydeside Estates Ltd v Aberdeen DC [1979] 3 All ER 876, [1980] 1 WLR 182, HL.
Maddison v Alderson (1883) 8 App Cas 467, [1881–5] All ER Rep 742, HL.
Matthews v Ministry of Defence [2002] EWCA Civ 773, [2002] 3 All ER 513, [2002] 1 WLR 2621; affd [2003] UKHL 4, [2003] 1 All ER 689, [2003] 1 AC 1163, [2003] 2 WLR 435.
McMichael v UK (1995) 20 EHRR 205, [1995] ECHR 16424/90, ECt HR.
Miller-Mead v Minister of Housing and Local Government [1963] 1 All ER 459, [1963] 2 QB 196, [1963] 2 WLR 225, CA.
Orakpo v Manson Investments Ltd [1977] 3 All ER 1, [1978] AC 95, [1977] 3 WLR 229, HL.
Owen v Tate [1975] 2 All ER 129, [1976] QB 402, [1975] 3 WLR 369, CA.
P v UK (2002) 12 BHRC 615, E Ct HR.
Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart [1993] 1 All ER 42, [1993] AC 593, [1992] 3 WLR 1032, HL.
Pilbrow v Pearless De Rougemont & Co [1999] 3 All ER 355, CA.
Quinn v Leathem [1901] AC 495, [1900–3] All ER Rep 1, HL.

R (on the application of Mahmood) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] 1 WLR 840, CA.
R v Crown Court at Snaresbrook, ex p DPP [1988] 1 All ER 315, [1988] QB 532, [1987] 3 WLR 1054, DC.
R v DPP, ex p Kebilene, R v DPP, ex p Rechachi [1999] 4 All ER 801, [2000] 2 AC 326, [1999] 3 WLR 972, HL.
R v Lambert [2001] UKHL 37, [2001] 3 All ER 577, [2002] 2 AC 545, [2001] 3 WLR 206.
R v Miller (Raymond) [1983] 3 All ER 186, [1983] 1 WLR 1056.
R v Pisciotto [2002] EWCA Crim 1592, [2003] 1 Cr App R 68.
R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Daly [2001] UKHL 26, [2001] 3 All ER 433, [2001] 2 AC 532, [2001] 2 WLR 1622.
R v Sekhon, R v McFaul, R v Knights [2002] EWCA Crim 2954, [2003] 3 All ER 508, [2003] 1 WLR 1655.
Rawlinson v Ames [1925] Ch 96.
S (children: care plan), Re, Re W (children: care plan) [2002] UKHL 10, [2002] 2 All ER 192, [2002] 2 AC 291, [2002] 2 WLR 720.
S v UK (1986) 47 DR 274, E Com HR.
Shaw v Groom [1970] 1 All ER 702, [1970] 2 QB 504, [1970] 2 WLR 299, CA.
Smith (Administrator of Cosslett (Contractors) Ltd) v Bridgend County BC [2001] UKHL 58, [2002] 1 All ER 292, [2002] 1 AC 336, [2001] 3 WLR 1347.
Smith Graham v Lord Chancellor's Dept (R v Carr) [1999] 2 Cost LR 1.
Snell v Unity Finance Ltd [1963] 3 All ER 50, [1964] 2 QB 203, [1963] 3 WLR 559, CA.
Sporrong and Lönnroth v Sweden (1982) 5 EHRR 35, [1982] ECHR 7151/75, ECt HR.
St Ermins Property Co v Tingay [2002] EWHC 1673 (Ch), [2002] 40 EG 174.
Stran Greek Refineries and Stratis Andreadis v Greece (1994) 19 EHRR 293, ECt HR.
Stringer v Copley (17 May 2002, unreported), County Ct.
Taxation of Costs, Re, Re a Solicitor [1936] 1 All ER 491, [1936] 1 KB 523, CA.
Tinsley v Milligan [1993] 3 All ER 65, [1994] 1 AC 340, [1993] 3 WLR 126, HL.
Van der Mussele v Belgium (1983) 6 EHRR 163, [1983] ECHR 8919/80, ECt HR.
Vermeulen v Belgium (2001) 32 EHRR 313, ECt HR.
Vita Food Products Inc v Unus Shipping Co Ltd (in liq) [1939] 1 All ER 513, [1939] AC 277, PC.
Waterson Hicks v Eliopolous (1995) Costs LR (Core Vol) 363, CA.
Wilson v First County Trust Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 633, [2001] 3 All ER 229, [2002] QB 74, [2001] 3 WLR 42, CA.
Woods v Chaleff [2002] All ER (D) 414 (Jul), Sup Ct Costs Office.
Yaxley v Gotts [2000] 1 All ER 711, [2000] Ch 162, [1999] 3 WLR 1217, CA.
Zacher v Germany (1996) 22 EHRR CD 136, E Com HR.

Appeals

Sharratt v London Central Bus Co Ltd and other appeals (The Accident Group Test Cases)

The London Central Bus Co Ltd and other appellants in a number of costs-only proceedings known as The Accident Group Test Cases appealed with permission of Chief Master Hurst granted on 12 December 2002 from his decision on 27 November 2002 ([2003] 1 All ER 353) in proceedings between the appellants and Gerald Sharratt and the other defendants in The Accident Group Test Cases.

The Law Society was granted permission to intervene by Brooke LJ on 13 February 2003. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Hollins v Russell

The appellant, Bradley Hollins, appealed with permission of Brooke LJ granted on 17 January 2003 from the order of Judge Tetlow on 28 November 2002 in the Oldham County Court allowing the appeal of the respondent, S H Russell from the order of District Judge Simpson on 9 August 2002 in costs-only proceedings between the appellant and the respondent. The Law Society was granted permission to intervene by Brooke LJ on 17 January 2003. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Tichband v Hurdman

The appellant, Mark Edward Tichband, appealed with permission of Brooke LJ granted on 13 December 2002 from the order of Judge Holman on 24 October 2002 in the Altrincham County Court allowing the appeal of the respondent, B Hurdman from the order of Deputy District Judge Brooks on 17 July 2002 in costs-only proceedings. The Law Society was granted permission to intervene by Brooke LJ on 13 February 2003. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Dunn v Ward

The appellant, Helen Ward, appealed with permission of Brooke LJ granted on 15 December 2002 from the order of Judge Barnett in the Chester County Court on 30 October 2002 allowing the appeal of the respondent, Alison Dunn, from the order of District Judge Wallace in the Chester County Court on 10 June 2002 in costs-only proceedings. The Law Society was granted permission to intervene by Brooke LJ on 13 February 2003. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Pratt v Bull

The appellant, Daniel David Michael Bull, appealed from the order of Judge Cotterill in the Taunton County Court on allowing the appeal of the respondent, Dora May Pratt, from the order of Deputy District Judge Roach in costs-only proceedings. The Law Society was granted permission to intervene by Brooke LJ on 13 February 2003. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Worth v McKenna

The appellant, James Joseph McKenna, appealed with permission of Brooke LJ granted on 3 December 2002, from the order of Judge Marshall-Evans in the Liverpool County Court on 6 November 2002 allowing the appeal of the respondent, John Joseph Worth from the order of District Judge Wright on 24 April 2002 in costs-only proceeding. The Law Society was granted permission to intervene by Brooke LJ on 13 February 2003. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Ian Burnett QC, Deborah Taylor and Benjamin Williams (instructed by Beachcroft Wansbroughs, Carters Solicitors, Peterborough and Vizards Wyeth, Dartford) for the appellants in the TAG Test Cases appeal.

Timothy Charlton QC and Nicholas Bacon (instructed by Rowe Cohen, Manchester) for the respondents in the TAG Test Cases appeal.

Richard Drabble QC and David Holland for the Law Society as intervenor in all the appeals.

Richard Drabble QC and David Holland (instructed by Gruber Garratt) for the appellants in the Hollins appeal.

Ian McLaren QC and Andrew Hogan (instructed by DLA, Manchester) for the respondents in the Hollins appeal.

Guy Mansfield QC and Nicholas Bacon (instructed by Colemans-CTTS, Manchester) for the appellant in the Tichband appeal.

Ian McLaren QC and Andrew Hogan (instructed by DLA, Manchester) for the respondents in the Tichband appeal.

Guy Mansfield QC and Nicholas Bacon (instructed by Amelans, Manchester) for the appellant in the Ward appeal.

Ian McLaren QC and Andrew Hogan (instructed by DLA, Manchester) for the respondents in the Ward appeal.

Jonathan Dingle (instructed by the Stokes Partnership) for the appellant in the Bull appeal.

Ian McLaren QC and Andrew Hogan (instructed by DLA, Manchester) for the respondents in the Bull appeal.

Nicholas Bacon (instructed by Irvings, Liverpool) for the appellant in the McKenna appeal.

Ian McLaren QC and Andrew Hogan (instructed by DLA, Manchester) for the respondents in the McKenna appeal.

Cur adv vult

22 May 2003. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

INDEX

| Heading | | Para no |
|---|---|---|
| 1. | CONDITIONAL FEE AGREEMENTS: THE HISTORY | [1] |
| (i) | The Courts and Legal Services Act 1990 | [1] |
| (ii) | Three forces at work in the late 1990s | [9] |
| (iii) | The Access to Justice Act 1999 | [15] |
| (iv) | The indemnity principle | [22] |
| (v) | Concerns about consumer protection | [25] |
| (vi) | The Conditional Fee Agreements Regulations 2000 | [30] |
| (vii) | Two other contemporary concerns | [37] |
| 2. | THE SIX APPEALS | [41] |
| (i) | The issues they raise | [41] |
| (ii) | The concerns of the interveners | [44] |
| (iii) | The concerns of the House of Lords | [49] |
| (iv) | Matters of common ground | [50] |
| 3. | DISCLOSURE OF CFAS | [51] |
| 4. | SATISFYING THE CONDITIONS IN SECTION 58 | [88] |
| 5. | PARTICULAR ALLEGATIONS | [117] |

(i) Regulation 2(1)(d) [118]
(ii) Regulation 3(1)(b) [131]
(iii) Regulation 4(2)(c) [136]
(iv) Regulation 4(2)(e)(ii) [141]
(v) Regulation 4(5) [145]
(vi) The TAG Test Cases: who is the 'legal representative' in reg 4? [155]
6. CONCLUSIONS: THE RIGHT APPROACH [219]
7. RESULTS OF THE INDIVIDUAL APPEALS [227]

BROOKE LJ.

1. CONDITIONAL FEE AGREEMENTS: THE HISTORY

(i) The Courts and Legal Services Act 1990

[1] Until Parliament intervened by legislation in 1990 it was always considered to be contrary to public policy, and therefore unlawful, in this jurisdiction for the financial reward which a lawyer received for his services in connection with litigation to vary depending on the outcome of the litigation.

[2] In 1988 the report of the Review Body on Civil Justice (Civil Justice Review, Cm 394) pp 68–69 (paras 384–389) encouraged the Lord Chancellor to re-examine the prohibition on what it described as 'contingency fees and other incentive schemes'. In 1989 the government took this suggestion forward, first in a Green Paper, The Work and Organisation of the Legal Profession (Cm 570) and then in a White Paper, Legal Services: A Framework for the Future (Cm 740) later that year. These developments led in turn to the enactment of the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990. In s 58 of that Act Parliament decided to permit conditional fee agreements (CFAs) in relation to the provision of advocacy or litigation services in certain narrowly prescribed circumstances.

[3] This section provided the enabling machinery. It was brought into force in July 1993. Two years later CFAs became lawful for the first time. They could only lawfully be made in connection with one or other of the six types of legal proceedings mentioned in art 2(1) of the Conditional Fee Agreements Order 1995, SI 1995/1674. They also had to comply as to form with the Conditional Fee Agreements Regulations 1995, SI 1995/1675.

[4] When he sought approval of the 1995 order in the House of Lords on 12 June 1995 (564 HL Official Report (5th series) cols 1543–1547) the then Lord Chancellor said that the whole purpose of permitting conditional fees in these cases was to extend access to justice. He also wished to increase consumer choice. He had sought to balance the need for clients and solicitors to be free to reach an agreement which reflected their mutual interests according to individual circumstances with the need for a framework which provided appropriate protection for the client. His aims could not be achieved by stifling the scheme with over-regulation.

[5] Against this background the 1995 regulations were comparatively simple. In short, a lawful CFA had to be in writing and state (reg 3):

> '(a) the particular proceedings or parts of them to which it relates ... (b) the circumstances in which the legal representative's fees and expenses ... are payable; (c) what, if any, payment is due—(i) upon partial failure of the specified circumstances to occur; (ii) irrespective of the specified circumstances occurring; and (iii) upon termination of the agreement for any reason; (d) the amount payable in accordance with sub-paragraphs (b) or (c) above or the method to be used to calculate the amount payable; and in particular whether or not the amount payable is limited by reference to the amount of any damages which may be recovered on behalf of the client.'

[6] The agreement also had to state that immediately before it was entered into the legal representative had drawn the client's attention to the four matters specified in reg 4(2) of the 1995 regulations. One of these matters related to the circumstances in which the client might be liable to pay the fees and expenses of the legal representative in accordance with the agreement (see reg 4(2)(b)).

[7] In those days legal aid was available for those of limited means for a much wider range of legal proceedings than it is today. Although the 1995 order prescribed that fees might be increased (in the event of success) to a maximum of 100%, the Law Society encouraged its members to limit the amount they actually recovered by way of success fee to 25% of the damages recovered. It was not possible between July 1995 and April 2000 for a successful client to recover her solicitor's success fee from the other side. We have been advised by our assessor (see [43], below) that solicitors for the most part accepted the Law Society's recommendations.

[8] In 1998 a new Conditional Fee Agreements Order 1998, SI 1998/1860 repealed the 1995 order. This made CFAs permissible in all proceedings other than criminal proceedings and the family proceedings specified in s 58(10) of the 1990 Act. By a parallel development litigants were being encouraged to obtain legal expenses insurance to protect them from costs orders in favour of the other party if they were unsuccessful. Here, too, they were not able to recover the premium they paid for such insurance from the other party by way of costs if they were successful in the litigation.

(ii) Three forces at work in the late 1990s

[9] In the closing years of the last century three forces were at work in parallel with the civil justice reforms associated with Lord Woolf's name which led from his Access to Justice: Final Report to the Lord Chancellor on the Civil Justice System of England and Wales (July 1996) through the Civil Procedure Act 1997 to the implementation of the Civil Procedure Rules in April 1999. These three forces were characterised by a greater willingness to look critically at the old shibboleths which used to prohibit any kind of 'contingency fee agreement'; a feeling that more should be done by way of consumer protection for clients who found themselves saddled with financial commitments they did not anticipate when they entered into one of the new CFAs; and the government's desire to move with all reasonable speed towards a radical reform of the demand-led state-funded arrangements for both legal advice and legal aid in litigation.

[10] As to the first of these forces, in February 1998 this court decided the case of Thai Trading Co (a firm) v Taylor [1998] 3 All ER 65, [1998] QB 781. A solicitor had agreed with his wife in March 1993 that he would act for her in litigation on the understanding that he would only recover his profit costs if she succeeded in the action. Millett LJ, with whom Kennedy and Hutchison LJJ agreed, held that this agreement did not offend public policy. He distinguished this type of agreement from a contingency fee agreement which entitled a solicitor to a reward over and above his ordinary profit costs if he won. The latter was an arrangement which had always been condemned by English courts as tending to corrupt the administration of justice.

[11] The Solicitors' Practice Rules 1987 provided that a solicitor engaged in any contentious business might not enter into any arrangement to receive a contingency fee (being defined as a fee payable only in the event of success in the proceedings). Millett LJ, however, was of the view that the fact that a professional rule prohibited a particular practice did not of itself make the practice contrary to law. In saying this he overlooked the decision of the House of Lords in Swain v Law Society [1982] 2 All ER 827, [1983] 1 AC 598 where it was made clear that the Solicitors' Practice Rules had the force of a statute, being rules made by the Council of the Law Society with parliamentary sanction for the protection of that section of the public who might be in need of legal advice, assistance or oversight. Indeed, failure to comply may result in a complaint to the Solicitors Disciplinary Tribunal (see Solicitors Act 1974, s 31(2)).

[12] In November 1998 the Divisional Court in Hughes v Kingston upon Hull City Council [1999] 2 All ER 49, [1999] QB 1193 declined to follow the decision in the Thai Trading case for this reason. This court had not, however, pronounced on the matter when what was to become the Access to Justice Act 1999 was going through Parliament. Parliament decided to put the position beyond doubt when it provided in s 27 of the 1999 Act that a new section should be substituted for the existing s 58 of the 1990 Act, and that it should say in terms:

> '(1) A conditional fee agreement which satisfies all of the conditions applicable to it by virtue of this section shall not be unenforceable by reason only of its being a conditional fee agreement; but ... any other conditional fee agreement shall be unenforceable.'

[13] Rule 8 of the Solicitors' Practice Rules 1990, as amended, now provides:

> '(1) A solicitor who is retained or employed to prosecute or defend any action, suit or other contentious proceeding shall not enter into any arrangement to receive a contingency fee in respect of that proceeding, save one permitted under statute or by the common law.' (My emphasis.)

[14] The words we have emphasised were added in January 1999, following the decision in the Thai Trading case. The inclusion of the last five of them soon proved to be unnecessary. In November 1999 this court finally put to rest any lingering confusion. In Awwad v Geraghty & Co (a firm) [2000] 1 All ER 608 at 634–635, [2001] QB 570 at 600 per May LJ, with whom Lord Bingham of Cornhill CJ agreed, it refused to follow the Thai Trading case and made it clear that there would no longer be any common law developments in this field. Now that Parliament had modified the law which had prohibited all arrangements for receiving a contingency fee in relation to litigation services, there was no room for the court to go beyond that which Parliament had now permitted.

(iii) The Access to Justice Act 1999

[15] In the meantime the Lord Chancellor had initiated a public debate about the ways in which alternative methods of funding litigation and access to justice might be taken forward, particularly in the light of the pending withdrawal of legal aid from a wide field of litigation. During 1998 this debate was triggered off by the publication of a consultation paper in March (Access to Justice with Conditional Fees) and the publication of the responses to that consultation four months later (Conditional Fees Consultation—Summary of Responses). The debate then flowed into Parliament, and in July 1999 the 1999 Act was enacted. Part I created the arrangements for the new Legal Services Commission, and Pt II, which is of concern on these appeals, is entitled 'Other Funding of Legal Services'. a

[16] It is unnecessary for the purposes of this judgment to consider the whole of the new arrangements. This court has in any event already covered much of the ground in its judgment in Callery v Gray, Russell v Pal Pak Corrugated Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 1117 at [10]–[13], [2001] 3 All ER 833 at [10]–[13], [2001] 1 WLR 2112, and in the more detailed examination that followed this passage in that judgment. For present purposes it is sufficient to concentrate only on s 27 of the 1999 Act, which is headed 'Conditional Fee Agreements'. b

[17] The method by which Parliament chose to proceed was by repealing s 58 of the 1990 Act and substituting two new sections, ss 58 and 58A. This parliamentary device meant that these new provisions found themselves in Pt II of the 1990 Act, which takes its signature tune from its opening subsection. This provides, so far as is material: c

> '17(1) The general objective of this Part is the development of legal services in England and Wales (and in particular the development of ... litigation ... services) by making provision for new or better ways of providing such services and a wider choice of persons providing them, while maintaining the proper and efficient administration of justice.' d

[18] We have already recited the substituted s 58(1) of the 1990 Act in full (see [12], above). Section 58(2) makes it clear that for the purposes of this legislation a CFA is an agreement with a person providing advocacy or litigation services which provides for his fees and expenses, or any part of them, to be payable only in specified circumstances (see s 58(2)(a)). This covers the type of agreement in the Thai Trading case. Further, a CFA provides for a success fee if it provides for the amount of any fees to which it applies to be increased, in specified circumstances, above the amount which would be payable if it were not payable only in specified circumstances (see s 58(2)(b)). Section 58(4) and 58(5) make further provision with which we need not be at present concerned. e f

[19] Sections 58(3) and 58A(3), on the other hand, lie close to the heart of the matters we have to decide. Section 58(3) provides: g

> 'The following conditions are applicable to every conditional fee agreement—(a) it must be in writing; (b) it must not relate to proceedings which cannot be the subject of an enforceable conditional fee agreement; and (c) it must comply with such requirements (if any) as may be prescribed by the Lord Chancellor.' h

[20] Section 58A(3), for its part, provides:

> 'The requirements which the Lord Chancellor may prescribe under section 58(3)(c)—(a) include requirements for the person providing advocacy or litigation services to have provided prescribed information before the agreement is made; and (b) may be different for different descriptions of conditional fee agreements (and, in particular, may be different for those which provide for a success fee and those which do not).' j

[21] It will be seen that the general effect of these two sections, situated in a part of the statute which promotes the parliamentary purpose of making provision for new or better ways of providing litigation services, is to 'legalise' by virtue of s 58(1) any CFA which satisfies all the conditions applicable to it. If a CFA does not satisfy all these conditions it will be unenforceable.

(iv) The indemnity principle

[22] Defendant liability insurers, who have viewed with disfavour the increased financial burden imposed on them by a combination of the 'front-end loading' of the Woolf reforms and the new liability to pay after-the-event (ATE) insurance premiums and success fees to successful claimants pursuant to other provisions contained in Pt II of the 1999 Act, have seized the opportunity of challenging the enforceability of many CFAs by pointing to breaches of one or more of the 'conditions applicable to it'. They argued that, even if they only succeeded in establishing a single breach, they could escape liability to pay any of the costs (and possibly also the disbursements) that were referable to the unenforceable CFA. In other words, it is not only the solicitor's success fee which is at risk, but the cost of all the solicitor's services (or the services of counsel, if rendered under an enforceable CFA), which may on occasion run to many thousands of pounds.

[23] Liability insurers were able to take this course through the operation of the indemnity principle (for which see Harold v Smith (1860) 5 H & N 381 at 385, 157 ER 1229; Gundry v Sainsbury [1910] 1 KB 645 at 649, 653; and General of Berne Insurance Co v Jardine Reinsurance Management Ltd [1998] 2 All ER 301, [1998] 1 WLR 1231). This common law principle, by which a paying party cannot be ordered to pay a receiving party more by way of costs than the receiving party is himself liable to pay, is now enshrined in statute, so far as solicitors are concerned, by s 60(3) of the 1974 Act which provides:

> 'A client shall not be entitled to recover from any other person under an order for the payment of any costs to which a contentious business agreement relates more than the amount payable by him to his solicitor in respect of those costs under the agreement.'

[24] In 1999 Parliament showed itself well aware of the possible application of the indemnity principle in the context of the reforms it introduced in the 1999 Act, because by s 31 it provided:

> 'In section 51 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 (costs), in subsection (2) (rules regulating matters relating to costs), insert at the end "or for securing that the amount awarded to a party in respect of the costs to be paid by him to such representatives is not limited to what would have been payable by him to them if he had not been awarded costs".'

This section, however, has not yet been brought into force. (It will be noticed that these two sections state the principle in different ways, but that need not concern us for the purposes of these appeals.)

(v) Concerns about consumer protection

[25] In the autumn of 1999, therefore, the way was clear for the Lord Chancellor to prepare new regulations pursuant to the substituted s 58(3) of the 1990 Act. In the meantime there had been two significant developments in relation to matters of consumer protection (the second of the forces we mentioned in [9], above). The first was the publication by the Law Society in September 1999 of the Solicitors' Costs Information and Client Care Code (the client care code). The other was the publication of a research study by Stella Yarrow and Pamela Abrams, funded by the Nuffield Foundation, entitled Nothing to Lose? Clients' Experiences of Using Conditional Fees (1999).

[26] The effect of the client care code was to require solicitors to be much more open in the way they explained to their clients their methods of charging for their services and the potential liabilities their clients might face. 'Costs information' was to be given to the client at the outset of any matter, and also at appropriate stages thereafter, and any information given orally was to be confirmed to the client in writing as soon as possible.

[27] The Yarrow and Abrams study provided a snapshot of the experiences of 40 clients and 20 solicitors under the CFA regime that was introduced in 1995. It will be remembered that under this regime clients had to pay their solicitors' success fee out of the damages they recovered (subject to the 25% cap on such recovery which was recommended by the Law Society). This study revealed a considerable degree of ignorance among clients about the ways CFAs worked. Most of them had not been involved in litigation before, and the expression 'no win no fee' could lead to false expectations that no other costs were involved. The authors felt that the 1995 regulations did not set out in sufficient detail solicitors' obligations to inform clients. Although they were aware of the introduction of the client care code it was yet to be seen what impact this would have.

[28] It was in this climate that the Lord Chancellor issued a new consultation paper in September 1999 entitled Conditional Fees: Sharing the Risks of Litigation. Three of the questions posed in that paper were whether a solicitor should be under an obligation to explain a CFA to the client in addition to providing written information about it; whether he should be required to discuss with the client the desirability of insurance cover in a CFA; and whether he should be under an obligation to advise on the relative advantages and disadvantages of the available insurance products.

[29] In February 2000 the Lord Chancellor published the government's conclusions following this consultation (Conditional Fees: Sharing the Risks of Litigation: The Government's Conclusions Following Consultation). Although the Law Society and the senior costs judge (see para 84 of that publication) had told the government that they believed the new client care code adequately covered the need to provide additional information about CFAs, the government decided on balance to prefer the views put forward by other respondents and to strengthen that part of the new regulations which required the provision of such information. It also decided to 'draw on the example of the Solicitors Client Care Code' to require the legal representative to provide explanations of the different possibilities open to the client on the insurance front. This part of the paper (para 83) concludes:

> 'If the legal representative recommends a particular product, but also has an interest in doing so, for example because he or she will receive a commission or is a member of the insurers panel of solicitors, then this must also be disclosed to the client.'

(vi) The Conditional Fee Agreements Regulations 2000

[30] Because the government was committed to introducing its reforms to the legal aid scheme at the beginning of April 2000, it had no opportunity for consultation on the detailed drafting of the new regulations. Instead, the Conditional Fee Agreements Regulations 2000, SI 2000/692 (which we will call quite simply the CFA regulations or the new regulations in view of their importance in this case) were laid before Parliament on 10 March 2000, and came into force 22 days later. The Conditional Fee Agreements Order 2000, SI 2000/823 was made on 20 March, as was a commencement order (SI 2000/774) which brought ss 27–30 of the Access to Justice Act 1999 into force on 1 April. Mr Guy Mansfield QC, who appeared for two of the claimants and who in a different capacity was concerned on behalf of the Bar Council in these matters, told us that it was his recollection that copies of the new regulations were sent by the Lord Chancellor's Department to the Bar Council and the Law Society for the first time about a week before they were due to come into force. They differed from their predecessors in a number of significant respects.

[31] Regulation 2 of the new regulations is very similar to reg 3 of the 1995 regulations (for which see [5], above). It starts by saying that a CFA 'must specify' as opposed to 'an agreement shall state'. The first three matters that have to be specified are very similar to their predecessors. Regulation 2(1)(d) refers to—

> 'the amounts which are payable in all the circumstances and cases specified or the method to be used to calculate them and, in particular, whether the amounts are limited by reference to the damages which may be recovered on behalf of the client.'

This differs from reg 3(d) of the 1995 regulations in using the conjunction 'whether' rather than 'whether or not'.

[32] Regulation 2(2) of the new regulations provides:

> 'A conditional fee agreement to which regulation 4 applies must contain a statement that the requirements of that regulation which apply in the case of that agreement have been complied with.'

This is similar to reg 4(1) of the 1995 regulations, which required a CFA to state that various specified matters had been drawn to the client's attention immediately before the agreement was made.

[33] Regulation 3 of the new regulations contains requirements for the contents of CFAs providing for success fees. For the purposes of this judgment it is necessary only to set out the terms of reg 3(1) and (2)(a):

> '(1) A conditional fee agreement which provides for a success fee—(a) must briefly specify the reasons for setting the percentage increase at the level stated in the agreement, and (b) must specify how much of the percentage increase, if any, relates to the cost to the legal representative of the postponement of the payment of his fees and expenses.
>
> (2) If the agreement relates to court proceedings, it must provide that where the percentage increase becomes payable as a result of those proceedings, then—(a) if—(i) any fees subject to the increase are assessed, and (ii) the legal representative or the client is required by the court to disclose to the court or any other person the reasons for setting the percentage increase at the level stated in the agreement, he may do so …'

[34] Regulation 4 of the new regulations is a considerably expanded version of reg 4 of the 1995 regulations, as foreshadowed in the paper setting out the government's conclusions (Conditional Fees: Sharing the Risks of Litigation: The Government's Conclusions Following Consultation). It provides, so far as is material:

'4. Information to be given before conditional fee agreements made

(1) Before a conditional fee agreement is made the legal representative must—(a) inform the client about the following matters, and (b) if the client requires any further explanation, advice or other information about any of those matters, provide such further explanation, advice or other information about them as the client may reasonably require.

(2) Those matters are—(a) the circumstances in which the client may be liable to pay the costs of the legal representative in accordance with the agreement, (b) the circumstances in which the client may seek assessment of the fees and expenses of the legal representative and the procedure for doing so, (c) whether the legal representative considers that the client's risk of incurring liability for costs in respect of the proceedings to which the agreement relates is insured against under an existing contract of insurance, (d) whether other methods of financing those costs are available, and, if so, how they apply to the client and the proceedings in question, (e) whether the legal representative considers that any particular method or methods of financing any or all of [the costs in respect of the proceedings to which the agreement relates] is appropriate and, if he considers that a contract of insurance is appropriate or recommends a particular such contract—(i) his reasons for doing so, and (ii) whether he has an interest in doing so.

(3) Before a conditional fee agreement is made the legal representative must explain its effect to the client ...

(5) Information required to be given under paragraph (1) about the matters in paragraph 2[(c)] and the explanation required by paragraph (3) must be given both orally and in writing.'

[35] It will be noted that reg 4(2)(e)(ii) gives effect to the government's identification of the need for a legal representative to disclose any interest he may have when he recommends a particular insurance product.

[36] Both the Law Society and the Bar Council published new model forms of CFA very soon after the new regulations came into effect. The Law Society's April 2000 model CFA was replaced three months later by their July 2000 model CFA. The later model made a change to a provision in the earlier model which has come under attack in these proceedings. No doubt if the new regulations had not been introduced in such a rush the Law Society would have had more time to identify any imperfections in their original draft. Time, however, did not allow for this. It is against this background that we have to consider the merits of the defendants' contentions that any such imperfection rendered the whole CFA unenforceable with the result that the solicitor who achieved a successful result for his client without a fee would be left seriously out of pocket.

(vii) Two other contemporary concerns

[37] Before we consider the appeals there are two other contrasting contemporary concerns that we should mention. The first is that the government was also concerned at the same time with the activities of unregulated claims assessors who had no legal qualifications and who were acting for clients usually on a 'no win no fee' contingency basis. This may be linked to a perception that people are becoming too 'litigation minded', pursuing compensation for minor injuries which they would previously have shrugged off. On the other hand there was the growing perception in some quarters that traditional methods of conducting legal business were regarded quite widely as being not particularly 'client friendly', and that many people who had suffered injuries through someone else's fault were not pursuing their right to compensation for this reason.

[38] In early 2000 the Lord Chancellor published the report of a committee chaired by Mr Brian Blackwell into the first of these matters (Report of the Lord Chancellor's Committee to Investigate the Activities of Non-Legally Qualified Claims Assessors and Employment Advisers (the Blackwell Report)). The committee reported that one claims management company believed that 11·2 million accidents occurred in this country each year, and that in over two million of these the injured person blamed someone else for the accident. Only 350,000 made compensation claims, so that on this reckoning there was a potential market of 1·7 million additional claims for personal injury compensation each year. Although the committee noted certain deficiencies in the services rendered by some of these unregulated claims assessors, the majority of the committee considered that it had not unearthed sufficient public disquiet about their activities to justify a ban on their activities, particularly as such a ban could restrict consumer choice and access to justice.

[39] The views of one experienced solicitor on this developing scene are best reflected in the evidence given by Mr Stewart McCulloch in The Accident Group (TAG) Test Cases. He is head of the personal injury department in a firm of solicitors in Huyton, and has had 18 years' experience in that field of practice. He described how the higher levels of client care and service demanded in the 1990s by both legal expenses insurers and the Legal Aid Board demanded a level of investment in IT systems which could only be supported by an increase in the volume of work undertaken by the firm. The demise of legal aid and the arrival of the new ways of doing business facilitated by Pt II of the 1999 Act persuaded him that there was a pressing need to be able to process cases in large numbers without diluting quality.

[40] He was of the view that his profession would have to look at innovative ways of providing a national or regional service without losing the essential qualities previously offered to clients on the basis of a bespoke local service. His hope was that in this way access to justice would be maintained and that a higher quality service would emerge in time such as would also reduce the number of hopeless claims.

2. THE SIX APPEALS

(i) The issues they raise

[41] To an increasing degree defendant liability insurers have not been content merely to scour CFAs for defects when they have been produced to them. They have also been demanding to see the claimant's CFA during the assessment proceedings. Resistance to this demand has also led to a significant amount of litigation. We understand that whereas disputed assessments were once comparatively rare, they have now become commonplace.

[42] Because of the prevalence of these challenges, the Civil Appeals Office have brought together a number of different appeals that illustrate different elements of the trench warfare which is now being waged between claimants' solicitors and solicitors acting for liability insurers before district judges and circuit judges up and down the country. Most of them have now come to this court as second appeals because they raise important points of practice. One, an appeal from Master Hurst, the senior costs judge, has been directed to be heard by this court as a first appeal for similar reasons.

[43] It was agreed between the parties that the appeals raised three distinct issues: (i) the circumstances in which a court should put a receiving party in detailed assessment proceedings to its election, so that it must choose whether to disclose its CFA to the paying party or to endeavour to prove its claim by other means (Pratt v Bull, Worth v McKenna); (ii) the proper construction of the words 'satisfies all of the conditions applicable to it' in s 58(1) of the 1990 Act and whether any costs or disbursements are recoverable from a paying party in the event of non-compliance with the CFA regulations (all cases); (iii) whether, on particular facts, the requirements contained in one or other of regs 2, 3 and 4 of the CFA regulations were not complied with (Hollins v Russell (see reg 2), Tichband v Hurdman (see regs 2 and 3), Pratt v Bull, Dunn v Ward and the TAG Test Cases (see reg 4)). Master Hurst sat as our assessor for the first two days of the hearing, when we were concerned with issue (i) and the first four appeals mentioned under issue (iii), and we benefited from his wise advice.

(ii) The concerns of the interveners

[44] Before we come to consider and determine these six appeals, there are two other matters to which we must refer. In addition to the parties the Civil Appeals Office, on Brooke LJ's instructions, invited submissions from a few representative organisations who were known to have an interest in the outcome of these appeals. As a result we received helpful written submissions from the Association of Personal Injury Lawyers (APIL), the Motor Accident Solicitors' Society (MASS), and the Forum of Insurance Lawyers (FOIL). We also received helpful written and oral submissions from the Law Society.

[45] APIL's paper in particular described vividly the difficulties faced by claimants' solicitors up and down the country as a consequence of defendant insurers' uncompromising tactics. APIL has 5,000 members who are solicitors and barristers practising on behalf of claimants in the fields of personal injury and clinical negligence. They thought that we might be helped by knowing of the experience of their members in the daily operation of the CFA regulations, and how issues such as those now being argued were having and might yet have, in their opinion, a significant impact on citizens' access to justice.

[46] It appears that 40–60% of the CFA caseload of a significant number of members of APIL is now affected by technical challenges like these, which often evaporate as the date of detailed assessment approaches. These tactics are delaying the payment of costs. This leads inevitably to a serious effect on cashflow for those undertaking professional work of this kind, and a backlog of fee recovery work not only in members' offices but also in local courts. Their submission contained the following comments:

> 'Our members talk about the uncertainty of undertaking claimants' personal injury work when it is impossible to know whether they will ever be paid for the work they are doing ... A disproportionate amount of solicitors' time is being spent sorting out these cases ... [Our members] fear that their clients are fast losing confidence in the legal system, seeing "technical challenges" as a means of depriving them of what has been recovered for them, if indeed they understand the matter at all ... Many of our members have used the word "bewildered" to describe their clients' states of mind when told about these challenges ... Many of our members have indicated that they will not seek to recover any costs from the client in the event that the CFA is technically invalid. The loss will fall on the solicitor, who has done a competent job for his client and recovered damages for him, but will not be paid at all.'

[47] We should also point out that the delay and uncertainty will have damaging effects for those claimants who have paid, or borrowed money to pay, for disbursements on such things as medical reports and any ATE insurance premiums. One of the parties wrote to draw our attention to this particular problem.

[48] APIL fear that in the medium or longer term many of their members will simply not continue to offer legal services under CFAs. While not seeking to defend CFAs which are substantially defective, APIL urged us to adopt an approach to these appeals which would tend to uphold the enforceability of the CFAs as between solicitor and own client and to avoid bestowing windfalls on defendant insurers at the expense of claimants' solicitors in the short term and of access to justice in the longer term. We received a similar message, couched in varying terms, from the other bodies representing solicitors, and in particular from the Law Society. The Law Society's views deserve particular weight, as they represent all solicitors, acting for all kinds of party in all kinds of litigation. CFAs are now being used in many different types of case, including complex commercial litigation far removed from the simple personal injury claims in the cases before us. Whatever the approach to emerge from these cases, it must be appropriate to the wide variety of circumstances in which CFAs are now being made.

(iii) The concerns of the House of Lords

[49] On the other side of the coin, defendant insurers drew our attention to the anxieties expressed by different members of the House of Lords in Callery v Gray (Nos 1 and 2) [2002] UKHL 28, [2002] 3 All ER 417, [2002] 1 WLR 2000 in relation to the opportunities for abuse opened up by the new legislative regime. These stemmed largely from the fact that the client is unlikely to be very concerned about the details of a CFA because no liability will fall on her. If she wins, she will recover her costs, plus any additional liabilities, from the defendants. If she loses, she will be protected from paying the other side's costs by ATE insurance, which will often cover her own costs as well. If it does not, her solicitors will not charge her anything. Concerns about potential abuse are contained, for instance, in the speeches of Lord Bingham of Cornhill (at [5] and [10]) and Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead (at [12]–[16]).

(iv) Matters of common ground

[50] By the end of the four-day hearing into these six appeals, it was clear that there was common ground on two important matters. The first was that the maxim that the law does not care about very small matters must be applied when a court considers whether there has been compliance with any of the CFA regulations or what the effect of non-compliance will be. The second was that except to the extent discussed at [83]–[84], below the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) has no part to play in our consideration of these appeals. Although the applicability of art 1 of the First Protocol to the convention was much canvassed in some of the skeleton arguments, it was eventually conceded by the claimants that neither the claimants' nor their solicitors' potential right to recover costs under a questionable CFA could possibly constitute 'possessions' within the meaning of that article. The Strasbourg case of Marckx v Belgium (1979) 2 EHRR 330 at 350 (para 50), [1979] ECHR 6833/74 is clear authority for the proposition that where there are no property rights which pre-exist the interference complained of, the article is not engaged.

3. DISCLOSURE OF CFAs

[51] In Pratt v Bull and Worth v McKenna, the paying parties sought to resist liability for any of the costs ordered against them on the grounds that the CFAs under which such costs were claimed were unenforceable by virtue of s 58 of the 1990 Act, and that accordingly it would be in breach of the indemnity principle to award any costs against them in the assessment of costs. Judge Cotterill and Judge Marshall-Evans QC were both of the view that the CFA entered into by the receiving party need not be disclosed to the paying party because the solicitor to the receiving party had certified on the bill of costs presented for assessment in the usual way that the costs claimed therein did not exceed the costs which the receiving party was required to pay to the receiving party's solicitors. In addition, they both found that the paying party had not demonstrated to their satisfaction any real ground for challenging the enforceability of the CFA and accordingly that this certificate raised a presumption that the indemnity principle was not infringed. The presumption was only a rebuttable presumption, but in the circumstances there was nothing to rebut it.

[52] The starting point is s 58(1) of the 1990 Act (set out at [12], above). Section 58 has to be read with the indemnity principle in mind, which (as explained at [22] and [23], above) itself has statutory force. It follows that the paying party will not be liable to pay costs to the receiving party if the fees sought by the solicitor are sought under a CFA which is not rendered enforceable by s 58(1). This section does not provide that such an agreement shall be unenforceable only as between the paying party and his solicitor. We deal with the argument that it should be so construed at [92]–[95], below. For present purposes, it is enough to say that if that were its construction, it would cut across the well-established indemnity principle.

[53] Accordingly, we must take it to be the policy of Parliament that the paying party should be protected by the indemnity principle in relation to the CFA entered into by the receiving party. In other words, that he should be entitled to object to paying costs which he has been ordered to pay if they are made payable by a CFA which is not rendered enforceable by s 58(1).

[54] It is not as we see it the policy of the 1990 Act to allow recovery of success fees come what may, or to allow fees under a CFA to be recovered from the paying party come what may, even if that is necessary to ensure the financial viability of CFAs. Nor is it a question of the paying party being the only real policeman of CFAs, even though in practice, the receiving party is unlikely to have any incentive to take the point that the agreement between him and his solicitor is unenforceable. There is nothing to suggest that the paying party is the gatekeeper chosen by Parliament to ensure compliance with s 58(1).

[55] In order to explain our conclusions, it is necessary to describe the practice on assessment as respects the disclosure of documents to the paying party or his solicitors. Although all relevant documents must be filed with the court, there is no automatic disclosure of these documents to the paying party. However, para 40.14 of the Costs Practice Direction provides (in relation to detailed assessment) as follows:

> 'The court may direct the receiving party to produce any document which in the opinion of the court is necessary to enable it to reach its decision. These documents will in the first instance be produced to the court, but the court may ask the receiving party to elect whether to disclose the particular document to the paying party in order to rely on the contents of the document, or whether to decline disclosure and instead rely on other evidence.'

[56] Reference to the case law demonstrates the circumstances in which the court will exercise its discretion under this rule. In Goldman v Hesper [1988] 3 All ER 97, [1988] 1 WLR 1238, the Court of Appeal held that it would be rare to exercise this discretion under RSC Ord 62, r 29, which contained provisions now to be found in CPR 47.6 and that part of the Costs Practice Direction that relates to Pt 47. By lodging his documents with the court, the claimant waived his legal professional privilege to that extent. If there was a challenge in good faith to any item of costs, the taxing master could put the receiving party to his election and if the document was produced disclosure would be for the specific purpose of taxation of costs only. Accordingly, the privilege could be asserted on other occasions thereafter.

[57] This procedure was based on the judgment of Hobhouse J in Pamplin v Express Newspapers Ltd [1985] 2 All ER 185 at 190–191, [1985] 1 WLR 689 at 696–697. Hobhouse J held:

> 'The [costs judge] does not have any power to order discovery to be given; he does not have any power to override a right of privilege. But it is the duty of the [costs judge], if the respondent raises a factual issue, which is real and relevant and not a sham or fanciful dispute, to require the claimant to prove the facts on which he relies. The claimant then has to choose what evidence he will adduce and to what extent he will waive his privilege. That is a choice for the claimant alone. The [costs judge] then has to decide the issue of fact on the evidence. In considering whether he is satisfied by the evidence, the [costs judge] will no doubt take into account that the claimant may have a legitimate interest in not adducing the most obvious or complete evidence, and may prefer to rely on oral evidence rather than producing privileged legal documents.'

[58] In the later case of Hazlett v Sefton Metropolitan BC [2000] 4 All ER 887, the principle that there must be a genuine dispute raised by the paying party was reiterated by the Divisional Court (Lord Bingham of Cornhill CJ and Harrison J). Harrison J, giving the judgment of the court, said (at 893):

> 'The need for the complainant to give evidence to prove his entitlement to costs rather than relying on the presumption in his favour will not, however, arise if the defendant simply puts the complainant to proof of his entitlement to costs. If the defendant simply puts the complainant to proof of his entitlement to costs, the complainant would be justified in relying on the presumption in his favour. It would be necessary for the defendant to raise a genuine issue as to whether the complainant is liable for his solicitor's costs before the complainant should be called upon to adduce evidence to show that he is entitled to his costs.'

The court also held (at 892) that—

> 'there is normally a presumption that the complainant will be personally liable for his solicitor's costs and it should not normally be necessary for the complainant to have to adduce evidence to that effect.'

[59] Indeed, when the bill of costs is served, it is required to contain a certificate as to accuracy to the effect that the costs claimed in the bill do not exceed costs which the receiving party is required to pay to the solicitors presenting the bill. In Bailey v IBC Vehicles Ltd [1998] 3 All ER 570, the status of the certificate was elevated. In that case, the claimant succeeded in obtaining damages for personal injuries incurred in the course of his employment. The defendants agreed to pay damages together with costs to be assessed. The claimant was assisted financially by his union. When the bill was presented, the defendants objected to the hourly rate and to the claimant's solicitors' mark-up and asked for evidence that the bill was not in breach of the indemnity principle. In due course a letter was produced to the court from a union representative which stated that the union's relationship with the solicitor was on the basis that the solicitors were entitled to make a full solicitor/client charge. None the less, the district judge held that they were entitled to disclosure of the relevant material. The Court of Appeal (Butler-Sloss, Henry and Judge LJJ) were clearly very concerned about the prospect of satellite litigation in assessment proceedings. The court held that there was no breach of the indemnity principle merely because the successful litigant was a member of a trade union which provided financial support. It was accepted by the paying party that the costs judge was entitled, if he saw fit, to be provided with the information that he needed. Judge LJ held (at 572–573):

> 'The [costs] officer is exercising a judicial function, with substantial financial consequences for the parties. To perform it, he is trusted properly to consider material which would normally be protected from disclosure under the rules of legal professional privilege. If, after reflecting on the material available to him, some feature of the case alerts him to the need to make further investigation or causes him to wonder if the information with which he is being provided is full and accurate, he may seek further information. No doubt he would begin by asking for a letter or some form of written confirmation or reassurance as appropriate. If this were to prove inadequate he might then make orders for discovery or require affidavit evidence ... [I]t would theoretically be open to him to order interrogatories. However, if the stage has been reached where interrogatories might reasonably be ordered the conclusion that the receiving party had not been able to satisfy the [costs] officer about the bill, or some particular aspect of it, would seem inevitable ... [A]n emphatic warning must be added against the over enthusiastic deployment of these powers, particularly at the behest of the party against whom the order for costs has been made ... [T]he danger of "satellite litigation" is acute. As far as possible consistent with the need to arrive at a decision which does broad justice between the parties, it must be prevented or avoided, and the additional effort required of the parties kept to the absolute minimum necessary for the [costs] officer properly to perform his functions.'

[60] The court attached considerable importance to the fact that solicitors are officers of the court and that they are trusted not to mislead the court or to allow it to be misled. Accordingly, the court indicated that it would expect solicitors to disclose the existence of a limit on the fees which they could recover from their client. Judge LJ said (at 575):

> 'They would not have produced and signed a bill of costs which included a claim for "reasonable costs" which would have fallen foul of the indemnity principle ... [I]n the ordinary case in which a "client care letter" has been provided (and certainly if and when the client care letter becomes obligatory), the hourly rate claimed in the bill of costs should coincide with the terms of that letter ... [I]n view of the increasing interest taken in this issue by unsuccessful parties to litigation, coupled with the developing practice in relation to conditional fees, the extension of the "client care" letter and contentious business agreements under s 60(3) [of the Solicitors' Act 1974], in future, copies of the relevant documents (where they exist) or a short written explanation ... should normally be attached to the bill of costs. This will avoid skirmishes which add unnecessarily to the costs of litigation.'

[61] Our assessor has drawn our attention to para 40.2(i) of the Costs Practice Direction, under which (if there is a dispute as to the receiving party's liability to pay costs to her solicitor) a copy of the client care letter must be produced to the costs judge. He tells us that the client care letter is also from time to time disclosed to the paying party. The client care letter, however, is not the same as the CFA although the CFA is often an integral part of the client care letter as we shall see in the TAG Test Cases.

[62] Henry LJ (at 575–576) also highlighted the importance of the signature by the solicitor to the bill of costs:

> 'In so signing he certifies that the contents of the bill are correct. That signature is no empty formality. The bill specifies the hourly rates applied, and the care and attention uplift claimed. If an agreement between the receiving solicitor and his client ... restricted (say) the hourly rate payable by the client, that hourly rate is the most that can be claimed or recovered on [detailed assessment] ... The signature of the bill of costs under the rules is effectively the certificate by an officer of the court that the receiving party's solicitors are not seeking to recover in relation to any item more than they have agreed to charge their client ... For the avoidance of doubt, I also agree that the [costs] officer may and should seek further information where some feature of the case raises suspicions that the whole truth may not been told. And the other side of a presumption of trust afforded to the signature of an officer of the court must be that breach of that trust should be treated as a most serious disciplinary offence.'

[63] The principles established in the case law we have just described have been seized upon by the respondents both here and below. They contend in essence that, once the solicitor has certified the accuracy of the costs due to his firm, the onus switches to the paying party to show some genuine ground why that certificate may be inaccurate. Specifically this would mean that the paying party in relation to a CFA would have to show some grounds why it may be unenforceable notwithstanding s 58(1) of the 1990 Act.

[64] In our judgment, Bailey's case is distinguishable. It was directed to a very different type of challenge. The paying party was not saying that there was no liability at all to pay any costs to the receiving party. The challenge was directed to the hourly rate and mark-up being applied. The challenge to a bill of costs must surely move several ratchets up the scale once the challenge changes from a challenge to the figures produced to a challenge to the principle of paying anything at all. It is, of course, true that in respect of many items in a bill the paying party cannot be sure that they are properly incurred without sight of the underlying document. But in most cases the solicitors' certificate as to accuracy will be sufficient (see [65], below) and paying parties are frequently content to rely on the costs judge. A potential challenge to the whole of a bill by reason of its non-compliance with s 58 of the 1990 Act is of a very different order.

[65] The second reason for distinguishing Bailey's case is that the matters which are normally the subject of a certificate as to accuracy are conventional matters. They would include such matters as whether particular advice related to the proceedings, or the correctness of the charging rates. The position is very different with CFAs made under the new regulations. These introduced a level of complexity as then unknown. Moreover, many of the matters required to be covered by the new regulations are not conventional costs matters at all. This can be seen from the contents of the new regulations and the particular issues which have arisen in the appeals in Tichband v Hurdman, Hollins v Russell and Dunn v Ward.

[66] Our third reason for distinguishing Bailey's case is that the measure of detail provided by a solicitors' bill in normal circumstances is far greater than the information which the paying party will receive about the success fee under the CPR and the Costs Practice Direction. The only documents under those rules which have to be served on the paying party merely because there is a success fee are: (a) Form N251 (this confirms that particular claims are funded by a conditional fee agreement of a specified date providing for a success fee. The requirement to produce this information is duplicated by para 19.4(2) of the Costs Practice Direction); (b) the solicitors' bill showing the amount of the success fee; (c) a statement showing the amount of the costs which have been summarily assessed or agreed and the percentage increase which has been claimed in respect of those costs (see para 32.5(1)(a) of the Costs Practice Direction); (d) a statement of the reasons for the percentage increase given in accordance with reg 3(1)(a) of the CFA regulations (see para 32.5(1)(b) of the Costs Practice Direction). The receiving party may disclose the risk assessment schedule for this purpose; (e) where points of dispute are served, information about other methods of financing the costs which were available to the receiving party (see para 35.7 of the Costs Practice Direction).

[67] In addition, the paying party will have the assurance of the certificate as to accuracy attached to the bill. However, the information listed above is extremely basic. There is, for example, no requirement in the CPR or the Costs Practice Direction to specify or disclose the circumstances in which the success fee became payable. Obviously, the solicitor certifying the accuracy of the bill cannot properly certify its accuracy if a success fee has not become payable. However, the condition of the payment of a success fee may not be success in obtaining an order for the payment of damages. It may be conditional, for example, upon receipt of some of those damages. Yet details of the circumstances in which the success fee becomes payable for the purpose of s 58(2) of the 1990 Act are not required to be served on the paying party. In a summary assessment only the risk assessment schedule forming part of the CFA is required to be produced to the court (see para 14.9(3) of the Costs Practice Direction).

[68] In our judgment, the solicitors' certificate as to accuracy, important though it is, may not be sufficient where the quality and quantity of the information served on the paying party about the success fee is less than would be made available in respect of the other aspects of the bill in the case of an assessment where there is no additional liability claimed.

[69] Our fourth reason for distinguishing Bailey's case is that the question whether the CFA complies with the 1990 Act is principally a matter of law. The question whether costs are properly claimed and the amount of the charging rates and like issues raised by conventional bills are generally questions of fact likely to be within a solicitor's peculiar expertise. Matters of law are not. That factor, too, would lead to the conclusion that the certificate as to accuracy may not be sufficient in the context of CFAs.

[70] Fifthly, there are policy reasons for not extending the decision in Bailey's case to CFAs. Given the complexity of the new regulations, it is not appropriate to impose on costs judges or district judges the responsibility of acting as a filter to see that the new regulations are complied with in every respect. This would be both a complex and time-consuming task, particularly as this would require reference to other documents (for example, attendance notes). Checking whether the CFA complies with the new regulations is likely to consume considerable court resources. Moreover, there will be many cases in which the costs judge or district judge simply cannot be satisfied that the regulations were fully complied with.

[71] In all the circumstances, we have come to the conclusion that the decision in Bailey's case should not be extended beyond the facts with which it was dealing, namely that of a conventional bill, so as to obviate disclosure of the CFA as the norm. As we see it, where there is a CFA, a costs judge should normally exercise his discretion under the Costs Practice Direction and the procedure in Pamplin v Express Newspapers Ltd [1985] 2 All ER 185, [1985] 1 WLR 689 so as to require the receiving parties (subject to their right of election preserved by para 40.14 of the Costs Practice Direction and Goldman v Hesper [1988] 3 All ER 97, [1988] 1 WLR 1238) to produce a copy of their CFAs to the paying parties in order that they can see whether or not the new regulations were complied with and (where a CFA provides for a success fee) whether the liability of the receiving party to pay that success fee is indeed enforceable. We consider that this is appropriate where receiving parties may claim more than they would otherwise be entitled to in circumstances in which their whole claim may turn out to be unenforceable. Non-compliance may be sufficient to remove the paying party's liability. The court is entitled and bound to have regard to the interests of paying parties, and those to whom they pass on the costs (see in this connection the concerns of the House of Lords referred to at [49], above), as well as those of receiving parties. If these appeals are a fair measure of CFAs in general use, it is apparent that mistakes in complying with the new regulations are not uncommon. In these circumstances we consider that greater transparency is desirable. As Brandeis J, the great justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, once remarked extra-judicially, sunlight can often be the best of disinfectants.

[72] If the CFA contains confidential information which is not required to be disclosed for the purposes of fairly determining the receiving party's claim to costs, for example privileged material with respect to issues other than those which have been disposed of by the settlement of the claim, the costs judge may permit that material to be redacted before service. There may be other circumstances which lead the costs judge to conclude that in the particular case he should not exercise his discretion in the manner indicated. However, as we have stated, the receiving party should normally be put to her election to produce the CFA to the paying party or rely on other evidence.

[73] We have considered carefully the concern expressed in Bailey's case about satellite litigation. Any satellite litigation generated in any circumstances results in an application of resources for collateral purposes and thus may absorb money and court resources which could be more usefully deployed. It is neither fair to the receiving party nor to other litigants that the courts' resources should be tied up in satellite litigation. However, the concern expressed about satellite litigation in Bailey's case applies with less force in the present situation: first, there is already considerable satellite litigation about disclosure which our approach should avoid; and secondly, however, on our interpretation of s 58(1) (see [106]–[109], below) there will be far less incentive for paying parties to raise an issue of non-compliance.

[74] Our conclusions do not necessitate any amendment to paras 14.3 (summary assessment) or 40.14 (detailed assessment) of the Costs Practice Direction. In our view the combination of the indemnity principle and a significant increase in the paying party's liabilities results in there ordinarily being a sufficient ground in cases involving a CFA (whether or not the CFA contains a success fee) for the paying party to require the receiving party to be put to her election to produce the CFA or rely on other evidence.

[75] The contention of the appellants is that the respondents are in any event not entitled to claim legal professional privilege in respect of their CFAs. In the alternative, they submit that the CFA has to be disclosed because the receiving party is seeking to rely on it. They rely on a passage from the judgment of Pumfrey J in South Coast Shipping Co Ltd v Havant BC [2002] 3 All ER 779 at 793 (para 29), where the judge held, with respect to privileged material produced to the costs judge:

> 'Once the document is of sufficient importance to be taken into account in arriving at a conclusion as to recoverability, then, unless otherwise agreed, it must be shown to the paying party or the receiving party must content itself with other evidence.'

Mr McLaren QC, who appeared for the appellants in these cases, also referred us to Dickinson (t/a John Dickinson Equipment Finance) v Rushmer (t/a FJ Associates) [2002] 1 Costs LR 128, in which Rimer J took the view that a client care letter was not privileged. Mr McLaren argued that by the stage of the assessment of costs, any privilege has been exhausted.

[76] We have heard very little argument in response to the appellants' argument on privilege. In Worth v McKenna it was common ground in the court below that the CFA was privileged. Accordingly, the point cannot be taken in that appeal at this stage. In Pratt v Bull, Mr Dingle did not put it at the forefront of his argument that the CFA is privileged. He contends in general terms that the appellants seek to conduct a fishing expedition into privileged documents. It was unnecessary for him to argue the question of privilege because of his contention on the effect of the certificate as to accuracy. The Law Society contends in its skeleton argument that the CFA is subject to both advice privilege and litigation privilege but this submission was not amplified orally. Accordingly, we have not heard full argument on the question of privilege.

[77] Legal professional privilege protects confidential communications between a solicitor and his client for the purpose of obtaining and giving legal advice. There is a separate litigation privilege when litigation is contemplated, as it was in these cases at the time when the CFAs were signed. If it is clear that there is a sequence of exchange of information, the court has not adopted (per Lord Bingham of Cornhill CJ in R v Crown Court at Manchester, ex p Rogers [1999] 4 All ER 35 at 41, [1999] 1 WLR 832 at 839)—

> 'a narrow or nit-picking approach to documents and has ruled out an approach which takes a record of a communication sentence by sentence and extends the cloak of privilege to one and withholds it from another'.

However, legal professional privilege does not apply to every document generated in the course of a retainer. There must actually be a communication between the solicitor and the client. In Ex p Rogers, the police had sought disclosure from the applicant's solicitors of any record of the time at which the applicant arrived at the solicitors' premises on a particular date and like documents. The Divisional Court held that such records would not be privileged because they did not relate to legal advice or the subject matter of legal advice. The facts of the present case are not analogous to the record of appointment in that case. We have also considered the very recent decision of this court in Three Rivers DC v Governor and Company of the Bank of England (No 7) [2003] EWCA Civ 474, [2003] All ER (D) 59 (Apr), which was concerned with legal advice privilege, but there was no suggestion in that case that privilege did not attach to direct communications between a solicitor and his client.

[78] We note that in Hodgson v Imperial Tobacco Ltd [1998] 2 All ER 673, [1998] 1 WLR 1056 the issue arose in the course of litigation whether the CFA was privileged but by the time the case came to the Court of Appeal, the defendants had abandoned their application for disclosure. The Court of Appeal (Lord Woolf MR, Aldous and Chadwick LJJ) considered that it was inappropriate to express any concluded view on the question whether a CFA is at any stage of the proceedings subject to professional privilege. Lord Woolf MR, giving the judgment of the court, said ([1998] 2 All ER 673 at 682–683, [1998] 1 WLR 1056 at 1067):

> 'Before expressing a view, we would like to have before us a claim for privilege specifying the grounds upon which it is based. We would also like to hear the full argument that was not presented on this appeal in view of the approach now adopted by the defendants to their seeking to inspect the CFAs. We recognise that a distinction might exist between the position in relation to any advice given to a client about the advisability of entering into a CFA and the document itself. However, what follows from what we have said as to the effect of CFAs means that, absent exceptional circumstances which we cannot envisage, unless and until the other party to the proceedings makes an application for an order making the legal advisers personally liable for costs, the existence or the terms of a CFA are of no relevance to the issues in the proceedings. They are therefore on that ground not required to be disclosed.'

[79] This court, too, is being asked to consider the question of privilege in the absence of a claim specifying the grounds relied on. As in Hodgson's case, it is undesirable for us to express a view on privilege when the matter has not been fully argued. Indeed, as we see it, given the procedure in Pamplin v Express Newspapers Ltd [1985] 2 All ER 185, [1985] 1 WLR 689, it is not necessary for us to express a view on privilege. As we have explained above, we consider that the costs judge has ample powers which he should normally exercise to put the receiving party to her election as to whether to produce a copy of the CFA to the paying party.

[80] We conclude, therefore, that if, in costs proceedings, a party seeks to rely on the CFA, as a matter of fairness she should ordinarily be put to her election under the procedure in Pamplin's case. (This procedure applies whether or not the document is privileged. It is no answer to an exercise of the discretion to contend that the document is privileged.) This is not simply because of the fact of reliance but because of the centrality of the CFA in an assessment of costs in which a CFA is relied upon. If the party does not wish to produce the CFA, she can theoretically undertake to prove the terms of the agreement in some other way. However, we doubt whether costs judges will in general be prepared to accept merely oral evidence of the existence of such an agreement and its terms. On the other hand, the court has a discretion in putting a party to his election to allow parts of it to be redacted if, for instance, those parts contain material which there is a good case for saying should not be revealed to the other party even for the purposes of the assessment only, and which it would not be unfair to the paying party to withhold. For instance, they may relate to legal advice on matters which have not been resolved by the claims in respect of whose disposal the success fee is claimed (for example, claims in separate proceedings), or further proceedings between the same parties may be anticipated. Moreover, there may be exceptional cases in which the costs judge is prepared to say that no purpose would be served by disclosure of the CFA. However, we have been unable to think of any circumstances in which this might arise, but the possibility exists.

[81] The appellants in the present cases also seek disclosure of the attendance notes prepared by the receiving parties' solicitors showing compliance with reg 4 of the CFA regulations. We do not consider that these should ordinarily be disclosed. We consider that the costs judge should not require these to be disclosed unless there is a genuine issue as to whether there was compliance with reg 4. The measure of explanation given to the client is largely a matter of fact and we consider that it is, therefore, appropriate that the paying party should have to rebut the presumption arising from the fact that the receiving party's solicitor, an officer of the court, has signed the certificate of accuracy.

[82] Although the procedure envisages that the costs judge will put a party to her election as to the disclosure of the CFA, now that it is clear from our judgment in this case that this is to be the general practice, we hope that receiving parties will disclose the CFA without more ado. It would obviously lead to further costs and delay if receiving parties were to take an unreasonable view on this issue.

[83] Reliance was also placed on art 6 of the convention, the argument being that the paying party was effectively deprived of equality of arms or access to court by denial of access to the CFA and attendance notes. The argument will not now ordinarily arise in relation to the CFA itself. In relation to the attendance notes, the court will, unless it orders disclosure, be proceeding on the basis of a presumption to which the solicitors' certificate of accuracy gives rise. It will not be proceeding on the basis that there is no evidence of compliance with reg 4. However, the presumption is not irrebuttable. The party seeking to challenge compliance with reg 4 can raise a genuine issue about this, in which case the costs officer must consider whether in the exercise of his discretion the attendance notes should be disclosed. Once that threshold is reached, the paying party's right of access to court is fully protected (see Pamplin's case). In our judgment, under convention jurisprudence, the question what evidence the national court considers necessary to support a claim is a question for national law. The paying parties would have to show that they did not receive a fair trial under the procedures established by the national court. We are not satisfied that this would occur in the type of case with which we are at present concerned. Convention jurisprudence does not, moreover, proscribe a process which filters out fanciful claims (Z v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 384).

[84] In South Coast Shipping Co Ltd v Havant BC [2002] 3 All ER 779, Pumfrey J considered the question whether if the costs judge has been shown documents that the paying party had not been allowed to see, there is a breach of art 6 of the convention. Pumfrey J concluded that if the costs judge had seen the documents and required the receiving party to elect between giving secondary evidence of the retainer and waiving the privilege, there was no incompatibility with the convention. Pumfrey J continued (at 793–794 (para 30)):

> 'This is not intended to suggest the costs judge may potentially put the receiving party to its election in respect of every document relied on, regardless of its degree of relevance. I would expect that in the great majority of cases the paying party would be content to agree that the costs judge alone should see the privileged documents. Only where it is necessary and proportionate should the receiving party be put to his election. The redaction and production of privileged documents, or the adducing of further evidence, will lead to additional delay and increased costs.'

We agree.

[85] Since the hearing we have read the judgment of District Judge Harrison in McCreery v Massey Plastic Fabrications Ltd (21 March 2003, unreported). We note that the district judge has given permission to appeal, but as the appeal is not before us it is not appropriate for us to comment in detail on the judgment. We note, however, that the district judge has advocated changes in the practice regarding disclosure of CFAs and risk assessments which go beyond the practice we have laid down in this judgment.

[86] It was also argued on these appeals that by authorising his solicitor to seek reimbursement by the paying party, the receiving party has effectively waived privilege in the documents lodged with the court. This submission was based on Al Fayed v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis [2002] EWCA Civ 780, (2002) Times, 17 June. In this context, we see no reason to depart from the principles as respects privilege established in Goldman v Hesper [1988] 3 All ER 97, [1988] 1 WLR 1238 (see [56], above).

[87] It follows that in Worth v McKenna the order of Judge Marshall-Evans must be set aside. In Pratt v Bull para 2(a) of the order of Judge Cotterill must be set aside and paras 2 and 3 of the order of Deputy District Judge Roach restored.

4. SATISFYING THE CONDITIONS IN SECTION 58

[88] All of these cases raise (or in the disclosure cases may raise) the issue of failure to comply with any of the applicable conditions in s 58(3) and (4), including the requirements prescribed by the new regulations. This primarily involves a question of construing s 58(1) of the 1990 Act. This subsection, it will be recalled, provides:

> 'A conditional fee agreement which satisfies all of the conditions applicable to it by virtue of this section shall not be unenforceable by reason only of its > being a conditional fee agreement; but ... any other conditional fee agreement shall be unenforceable.'

The whole of s 58 was substituted (and s 58A added) by s 27(1) of the 1999 Act. Its predecessor, enacted in 1990, had simply provided in s 58(3):

> 'Subject to subsection (6), a conditional fee agreement which relates to specified proceedings shall not be unenforceable by reason only of its being a conditional fee agreement.'

The only provision specifically making a CFA unenforceable was that in sub-s (6) dealing with CFAs which contained a success fee greater than the permitted maximum for the proceedings in question.

[89] The new s 58(1) was clearly intended to leave it to Parliament to decide what further inroads might be made into the principle that contingency or conditional fee agreements are unenforceable: see Awwad v Geraghty & Co (a firm) [2000] 1 All ER 608, [2001] QB 570 (see [14], above). It also reflected Parliament's assessment of the state of public policy in this area: see Factortame Ltd v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (No 2) [2002] EWCA Civ 932 at [61], [2002] 4 All ER 97 at [61], [2002] 3 WLR 1104. The question for us is whether it was also intended to render unenforceable a CFA which did not comply in every particular with the requirements of the section and of regulations made under powers contained in the section.

[90] Mr Drabble QC, for the Law Society, took the lead in arguing this issue, with the support of counsel for all the receiving parties. He argued that the statutory regulation has two distinct aims. The first is to ensure that CFAs do not have an unacceptable tendency to corrupt public justice—that is to place the legal representative in an intolerable conflict between his own self-interest and his duty both to his client and to the court. The second is to protect the client—to ensure so far as possible that she understands what she is letting herself in for and is able to make an informed choice amongst the funding options available to her.

[91] Thus, he argued, the conditions provided for in the section itself were designed to avoid any tendency to corrupt public justice: the agreement must be in writing (see s 58(3)(a)), must relate to the right sort of proceedings for any sort of CFA (see s 58(3)(b)) or for a CFA with a success fee (see s 58(4)(a)), must state the percentage of any success fee (see s 58(4)(b)), and that percentage must not exceed the prescribed limits (see s 58(4)(c)). The requirements which have in fact been prescribed by the new regulations (for the purpose of s 58(3)(c)), on the other hand, are there to protect the client rather than the wider public interest, although Mr Drabble accepted that requirements might be prescribed which had a wider purpose.

[92] His first submission was that 'unenforceable' means only unenforceable in proceedings between solicitor and client, so that it is not open to the paying party to take the point. A great deal of the written and oral submissions to us concerned this point, and in particular the distinction between an unenforceable and an illegal contract. It faces the immediate difficulty that in Dimond v Lovell [2000] 2 All ER 897, [2002] 1 AC 384 the defendant was able to resist paying the claimant's car hire charges on the ground that the hire agreement was an unenforceable consumer credit agreement between the claimant and the hirer. It is difficult to see any difference in principle between this situation and that.

[93] In any event, as we have already said at [52], above, even if correct, this argument would be of no help to the receiving parties because of the indemnity principle. Again, a great deal of the argument before us was directed at qualifying the application of that principle in these cases. Ultimately, however, it became clear that a CFA is a contentious business agreement to which s 60(3) of the 1974 Act (see [23], above) applies. If the solicitor cannot enforce the agreement against his client, then the amounts provided for in the agreement are not payable by the client at all (as discussed at [113]–[116], below, the position as to the ATE premium and disbursements is different). In the present state of the law, therefore, they cannot be recovered from the other side.

[94] It was also argued that this construction of s 58(1) would undermine the policy on access to justice and the statutory objective contained in s 17(1) of the 1990 Act (see [17], above). However, this subsection contains not one purpose but two, increasing access to justice and maintaining a proper and efficient system of justice. These two objectives have to be balanced. It cannot be the case that Parliament was entirely unconcerned with the interests of the other party to the litigation. The replacement s 58, together with s 58A, was enacted at the same time as paying parties were made liable for both the success fee and the ATE insurance premium. These are significant additional liabilities. There are also the concerns referred to in the House of Lords in Callery v Gray (Nos 1 and 2) [2002] 3 All ER 417, [2002] 1 WLR 2000 (see [49], above). The requirement that the CFA be in writing and the statutory cap on the success fee, for example, also provide some protection for paying parties.

[95] Accordingly, we reject Mr Drabble's first submission.

[96] Mr Drabble's third submission was that the prescribed requirements should themselves be construed in a realistic way, on the basis that the maker of the delegated legislation should not be taken to have intended that it should be construed in so rigid a fashion as to render the whole CFA unenforceable, and thus the whole of the solicitor's fees irrecoverable, because of a minor breach. More precisely, this submission is that what at first sight might appear to be a breach is not a breach at all because the CFA regulations when properly construed do not require anything different.

[97] He acknowledged that this approach has its disadvantages. The main disadvantage is that it might tempt a court in costs proceedings, where the client herself makes no complaint and has suffered no detriment, to interpret the requirements in such a way as to dilute the protection given; but in other proceedings, where the client had indeed suffered detriment and wished to raise a legitimate complaint against her legal representative, the court would not wish to do this. Mr McLaren showed us that a client may still be at significant risk under a CFA, for example if she refuses a Pt 36 offer, or the costs recovered from the paying party do not meet everything in the solicitor's bill, or she has had to pay interest on a loan to fund the ATE premium, or she fails to recover the whole premium. Not all solicitors will be prepared to forgo these charges, especially in higher value cases than those with which we are concerned. The need for consumer protection, though reduced under the new scheme, is still real.

[98] An example of this difficulty might be the issue under reg 2(1)(d) of the CFA regulations raised in Tichband v Hurdman and Hollins v Russell (see [118]–[130], below): from a consumer protection perspective it is more important for a client to be told that there is no cap on the amount in costs for which they might become personally liable than that there is such a cap. The research by Yarrow and Abrams (see [25], [27], above) indicated that clients were confused between conditional fees on the United Kingdom model and contingency fees on the American model. They might well assume that the solicitor became entitled to a percentage of the damages recovered rather than an extra percentage of his normal charges. In construing that requirement, it might be said, we should not be tempted to conclude that it is unnecessary to make clear the absence of a cap simply in order to save the CFA.

[99] Another disadvantage of this approach is that it deals only with those points which have so far been raised. Experience has shown and is continuing to show that there is no end to the arguments of paying parties. It is a fair assumption that once one head of the Hydra has been slain two more will pop up in its place. Even if in due course it turns out to be unfounded, much time and effort may have been devoted to dealing with it by costs judges up and down the country to the detriment of the efficient administration of justice which was one of the objectives of the 1990 Act.

[100] Hence Mr Drabble's preferred approach was his second submission. The words 'satisfies all of the conditions applicable to it' in s 58(1) should be construed in a realistic way to reflect the purposes of the legislation. These were to increase access to legal services by making new types of funding arrangements possible, while protecting both the public interest and the interests of clients. Parliament will not have intended to render unenforceable CFAs which fulfilled the first objective without detriment to the second. Hence an agreement which satisfies all the conditions of the primary legislation and substantially if not literally conforms to the prescribed requirements should be held to satisfy the conditions applicable to it. Put another way, an agreement should not be held unenforceable for immaterial breaches of the CFA regulations.

[101] He drew an analogy with the approach to breaches of procedural rules adopted by this court in R v Immigration Appeal Tribunal, ex p Jeyeanthan, Ravichandran v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1999] 3 All ER 231 at 235, [2000] 1 WLR 354 at 358, where Lord Woolf MR commented on the conventional distinction between directory and mandatory requirements:

> 'The position is more complex than this and this approach distracts attention from the important question of what the legislator should be judged to have intended should be the consequence of the non-compliance. This has to be assessed on a consideration of the language of the legislation against the factual circumstances of the non-compliance.'

He concluded his discussion of examples ([1999] 3 All ER 231 at 236, [2000] 1 WLR 354 at 359):

> 'It must be remembered that procedural requirements are designed to further the interests of justice and any consequence which would achieve a result contrary to those interests should be treated with considerable reservation.'

[102] The point is well taken by Mr McLaren that these observations were made in the context of procedural rules which made no express provision for the consequences of breach. By contrast, s 58(1) makes express provision for the consequences of failure to satisfy the applicable conditions. Unlike, for example, the Consumer Credit Act 1974, there is no graduated response to different kinds of breach: it is all or nothing. On behalf of the paying parties both Mr McLaren and Mr Burnett QC (who appeared for the defendants in the TAG Test Cases) accepted that the principle that the law does not care about very little things applies here. But they urged us not to elaborate it by reference to concepts of materiality derived from public law.

[103] However, we are not here concerned with the interpretation of 'unenforceable'. That was the subject matter of Mr Drabble's first submission. We are concerned with the meaning of the words 'satisfies all of the conditions ...' Mr Drabble also drew a little support from some words of Lord Woolf MR in Hodgson v Imperial Tobacco Ltd [1998] 2 All ER 673 at 680, [1998] 1 WLR 1056 at 1064–1065. Lord Woolf MR was pointing out that a legal adviser acting under a CFA should be no more vulnerable to an order for costs against him personally than any other legal adviser, provided that the CFA was inside the protection provided by s 58 (in its original form):

> 'If the statutory requirements are complied with the CFA will be valid and enforceable by the legal advisers against a client. If it materially departs from the legislative requirements it will not be enforceable and will not be a CFA which is protected by [the section].' (My emphasis.)

[104] Of course, too much should not be read into an adverb used in the course of arriving at the conclusion that no pre-emptive order was required to protect the solicitor's position. But the case is an early example of the court's desire to further the parliamentary purpose by respecting rather than suspecting this innovation in funding legal services. The House of Lords has recently reminded us of the principles of purposive construction in R (on the application of Quintavalle) v Secretary of State for Health [2003] UKHL 13, [2003] 2 All ER 113, [2003] 2 WLR 692. Lord Bingham of Cornhill said (at [8]):

> 'The basic task of the court is to ascertain and give effect to the true meaning of what Parliament has said in the enactment to be construed. But that is not to say that attention should be confined and a literal interpretation given to the particular provisions which give rise to difficulty. Such an approach not only encourages immense prolixity in drafting, since the draftsman will feel obliged to provide expressly for every contingency which may possibly arise. It may also (under the banner of loyalty to the will of Parliament) lead to the frustration of that will, because undue concentration on the minutiae of the enactment may lead the court to neglect the purpose which Parliament intended to achieve when it enacted the statute. Every statute other than a pure consolidating statute is, after all, enacted to make some change, or address some problem, or remove some blemish, or effect some improvement in the national life. The court's task, within the permissible bounds of interpretation, is to give effect to Parliament's purpose. So the controversial provisions should be read in the context of the statute as a whole, and the statute as a whole should be read in the historical context of the situation which led to its enactment.'

[105] We have already considered (in [1]–[40], above) the historical context of this legislation, its declared statutory objective, the extensions to the CFA regime in April 2000, and the purposes of the regime in s 58 and the new regulations. In approaching the meaning of the words 'satisfies all of the conditions ...' we can be confident that Parliament would not have meant to render unenforceable a CFA which adequately meets the requirements which were designed to safeguard the administration of justice, protect the client, and acknowledge the legitimate interests of the other party to the litigation. The other party to the litigation has no legitimate interest in seeking to avoid his proper obligations by seizing on an apparent breach of the requirements which is immaterial in the context of the other two purposes of the statutory regulation.

[106] The question whether something is 'satisfied' inevitably raises questions of degree. What is enough to satisfy? There can be different degrees of satisfaction. A court may be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt or on the balance of probabilities but it is still satisfied. Different things can be satisfied in different ways. Hunger is satisfied by enough to eat. Greed may only be satisfied by more than enough. Sufficiency produces satisfaction. Conditions are satisfied when they have been sufficiently met. How sufficiently must depend upon the purpose of the conditions. It is not impossible to imagine conditions which would only be sufficiently met if they were observed in every minute particular: the specifications for precision machinery might be an example. But in general conditions are sufficiently met when there has been substantial compliance with, or in other words no material departure from, what is required.

[107] The key question, therefore, is whether the conditions applicable to the CFA by virtue of s 58 of the 1990 Act have been sufficiently complied with in the light of their purposes. Costs judges should accordingly ask themselves the following question: has the particular departure from a regulation pursuant to s 58(3)(c) of the 1990 Act or a requirement in s 58, either on its own or in conjunction with any other such departure in this case, had a materially adverse effect either upon the protection afforded to the client or upon the proper administration of justice? If the answer is Yes the conditions have not been satisfied. If the answer is No then the departure is immaterial and (assuming that there is no other reason to conclude otherwise) the conditions have been satisfied.

[108] We would not draw any formal distinction between the conditions contained in the section itself and those contained in the CFA regulations. The meaning of 'satisfies' must be the same in each case. However, it is more difficult to envisage questions of degree coming into the question whether the conditions in the section have been sufficiently met. Either the CFA relates to permissible proceedings or it does not. But one example might be that in s 58(4)(b) which requires that a CFA providing for a success fee 'must state the percentage by which the amount of the fees which would be payable if it were not a conditional fee agreement is to be increased'. Was that condition sufficiently met by an agreement such as that in Tichband v Hurdman, which left blank the percentage in the clause where it should have been filled in but stated it clearly in the risk assessment (see [133], below)? The answer to that question is obviously Yes.

[109] We would, however, draw from both R v Immigration Appeal Tribunal, ex p Jeyeanthan, Ravichandran v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1999] 3 All ER 231, [2000] 1 WLR 354 and Factortame Ltd v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (No 2) [2002] 4 All ER 97, [2002] 3 WLR 1104 the principle that sufficiency or materiality will depend upon the circumstances of each case. This is not to encourage paying parties to trawl through the facts of each case in order to try to discover a material breach. Quite the reverse. At the stage when the agreement has been made, acted upon, and success for the client has been achieved, it is most unlikely that any minor shortcoming which the paying party might discover in the agreement or the procedures leading up to its making will amount to a material breach of the requirements or mean that the applicable conditions have not been sufficiently met.

[110] We should, for completeness, mention one other argument which was put to us. This drew a distinction between the requirements of reg 4 of the CFA regulations, which relate to what must be done before a CFA is made, and the requirements of regs 2 and 3, which relate to the content of the CFA itself.

Section 58(1) speaks of the 'conditions applicable to it', and 'it' is the CFA. The requirements in reg 4 do not relate to the CFA at all but to what must be done beforehand. Section 58A(3)(a), which enables the Lord Chancellor to prescribe under s 58(3)(c) requirements about the information to be provided before the agreement is made, reinforces rather than undermines the argument. Without it, it is argued, a power to prescribe requirements with which the CFA must comply would not encompass this.

[111] We reject this argument for three reasons. First, s 58A(3)(a) clearly characterises such requirements as among those with which the agreement must comply for the purpose of s 58(3)(c). Secondly, the words 'applicable to it' are readily able to encompass steps taken by one of the parties before the agreement is made. Thirdly, reg 2(2) requires a CFA to state that reg 4 has been complied with, thus making compliance part of the obligations under the CFA.

[112] The argument is also unattractive on policy grounds. Pre-contract warnings are a common feature of consumer protection legislation. They are likely to be more important than the contract itself in ensuring that, so far as possible, the client understands both what she is letting herself in for and, more importantly, the alternatives available to her. To hold that s 58(1) did not apply to breaches of reg 4 would be to deprive the client of a remedy, which Parliament considered important.

[113] Before leaving the subject of compliance, we should mention two other points which were discussed during the hearing and upon which there appeared to be common ground. They are not necessary to our decision but they could be of considerable importance in practice. They relate to the recoverability of the ATE premium and any disbursements which the client has in fact paid 'up front' whether personally or by taking out a loan to do so.

[114] Section 29 of the 1999 Act provides:

> 'Where in any proceedings a costs order is made in favour of any party who has taken out an insurance policy against the risk of incurring a liability in those proceedings, the costs payable to him may, subject in the case of court proceedings to rules of court, include costs in respect of the premium of the policy.'

It will be seen, therefore, that ATE insurance premiums are recoverable as costs in any proceedings, irrespective of whether or not there is a CFA between the receiving party and her legal representatives. The client's liability to pay the insurance premium arises from the contract of insurance, not from her contract with the legal representative. It arises whether or not there is a CFA and whether or not the CFA is enforceable. The CFAs which we have seen refer to the possibility of such insurance, but do not make it a term of the contract that such insurance is taken out. It would appear, therefore, that there is no bar to the recovery of the ATE insurance premium as costs whatever may be the bar to the recovery of the lawyers' charges and success fee.

[115] Secondly, it is not uncommon for the client to put the solicitor in funds for the purpose of paying disbursements, for example the fees of medical or other experts. The funds may be provided either from the client's own pocket or financed by a loan to the client for which the client is legally responsible irrespective of the fate of the CFA. The solicitor is required to retain this money on clients' account until it is expended in accordance with the client's instructions. If the CFA fails, and the money has not been paid out, the solicitor would be required to pay it back to the client. If the money has been paid out, then this is money actually paid by the client. Mr McLaren accepted that this should be recoverable by the client as costs. The costs claim is that of the client, not of the solicitor. If the client has actually paid a debt to a third party, properly incurred in the conduct of the litigation, there seems no reason why this should not be recoverable from the paying party, in so far as it is reasonable and proportionate. (If a debt to a third party has been properly incurred, the paying party will not have to reimburse it until it has in fact been paid, but at that point it will become money actually paid by or on behalf of the client and thus recoverable from the paying party.) This is irrespective of whether the solicitor can enforce the CFA for his charges and success fee.

[116] These two propositions would go a long way to remove any detriment suffered by the lay client as a result of a CFA being found unenforceable in costs proceedings. The client can recoup her own expenditure on the proceedings from the paying party. The true interests in the cases before us, therefore, are those of the solicitors rather than the clients. That does not in any way invalidate the conclusions to which we have come.

5. PARTICULAR ALLEGATIONS

[117] We now turn to the specific allegations of breaches of regulations which have been made in five of these cases: Hollins v Russell, Tichband v Hurdman, Dunn v Ward, Pratt v Bull and the TAG Test Cases. In these cases we are concerned with elements of regs 2, 3 and 4 of the CFA regulations. The appeal in Hollins v Russell is concerned with reg 2(1)(d) alone. In Tichband v Hurdman this regulation and reg 3(1)(b) are in issue. In Pratt v Bull, Dunn v Ward and the TAG Test Cases we are concerned with aspects of reg 4.

(i) Regulation 2(1)(d)

[118] No difficulty will arise under reg 2(1)(d) for solicitors who use the Law Society's model CFA which came into use in July 2000. It contains the following clear statement: 'If you win your claim, you pay our basic charges, our disbursements and a success fee. The amount of these is not based on or limited by the damages.' (My emphasis.)

[119] In Hollins v Russell, the Law Society's April 2000 model CFA was used. This contains the following provision under the heading 'Paying Us':

> 'If you win your claim, you pay our basic charges, our disbursements and a success fee. The amount of the success fee is not based on or limited by reference to the damages.' (My emphasis.)

[120] In Tichband v Hurdman no reference at all was made to the question whether any element of the amounts payable were limited by reference to the damages recovered. In that case there was also no reference in the CFA to the matters covered by reg 3(1)(b).

[121] In the courts below, Judge Holman and Judge Tetlow held that the CFAs did not comply with the CFA regulations in the relevant respects, and that they were unenforceable for that reason.

[122] It will be remembered (see [31], above) that reg 2(1)(d) requires a CFA to specify the amounts which are payable in all the circumstances and cases specified or the method to be used to calculate them 'and, in particular, whether the amounts are limited by reference to the damages which may be recovered on behalf of the client'. This is clearly a reference to the sort of cap recommended by the Law Society under the old CFA regime, where success fees could not be recovered as part of a solicitor's costs from the other side and the suggested cap preserved for the client at least 75% of the damages she recovered.

[123] It is apparent that if the risk that a successful client may have to pay some of the costs under the new CFA regime is a real one—and we have described (see [97], above) how Mr McLaren, who appeared for the defendants in these two cases, showed us instances in which this potential risk might be a real one—the absence of a cap would be more disadvantageous to a client in those circumstances than the presence of a cap.

[124] Given the potential importance to the client of knowing that there is no limit to the amounts for which she may be held personally liable, and given the continuing concerns about consumer protection which led to the new CFA regulations, we are reluctant to place too much weight on the change from 'whether or not' in the 1995 regulations. 'Whether' is clearly capable of expecting both the answer Yes and the answer No even without the addition of the words 'or not'. It all depends upon the question being asked. If a person is asked whether he is coming to dinner, the questioner clearly expects to be given an answer, whether it is Yes or No. If a person asks whether it is raining, he clearly expects to be told either that it is or that it is not. If a client asks whether the sums she will have to pay will be limited by the amount of the damages she recovers, she clearly expects to be told if they are not.

[125] The operative requirement in reg 2(1)(d) is that the CFA must specify the matters listed in reg 2(1)(a)–(d), including 'in particular, whether the amounts are limited by reference to the damages which may be recovered on behalf of the client'. The ordinary meaning of 'specify' is to state explicitly (see, for example BWE International Ltd v Jones [2003] EWCA Civ 298 at [27], [2003] All ER (D) 245 (Feb) at [27]). In both Hollins v Russell (see [119], above) and Tichman v Hurdman (see [120], above), there was a departure from reg 2(1)(d) and we now turn to consider whether, applying the test formulated above, s 58(1) rendered the CFAs in those cases unenforceable.

[126] To fulfil precisely the requirements of the CFA regulations, the CFA in Hollins v Russell should have said in terms that basic charges and disbursements (as well as the success fee) were not limited by reference to the damages which might be recovered on behalf of the client. However, the extract from the CFA in this case (quoted at [119], above) continues: 'You are entitled to seek recovery of part or all of our disbursements, basic charges ... from your opponent. Please see [Law Society conditions 4 and 6].' Law Society Condition 4, accompanying the CFA, says: 'If you win: You are then liable to pay all our basic charges, our disbursements and our success fee ...' Law Society Condition 4 then explains that these items can be recovered from the client's opponent, unless they are disallowed by the court. It states that in that event 'you pay the difference'. The same is stated to be the position if the opponent is publicly funded and basic charges and disbursements cannot be recovered for that reason.

[127] The CFA has to be read as a whole and when it is so read its meaning is that basic charges and disbursements are payable in full and are not limited by reference to damages. This is expressly stated in relation to the success fee and it would clearly have been preferable if it had been so stated in relation to basic charges and disbursements as well, in the part of the agreement set out at [119], above.

[128] We thus resolve the question of construction in the receiving party's favour but that is not in itself enough because, as we have said at [107], above, the court must ask: has the particular departure from reg 2(1)(d), either on its own or in conjunction with any other departure in this case, had a materially adverse effect either upon the protection provided for the client by the requirement in question or the interests of the administration of justice? If the court can be satisfied that the answer to this question is No, the requirements of s 58(1) of the 1990 Act, read in conjunction with s 58(3)(c), are met. In the present case, we consider that the effect of the CFA read as a whole is sufficiently clear and that the failure to specify the position did not affect the protection given to the client or the administration of justice to any material degree. The result would have been different if the CFA was less clear as to its effect, that is if it would not have been reasonably comprehensible to a lay person. Accordingly, we allow the appeal in Hollins v Russell and set aside the order made by Judge Tetlow.

[129] Although the agreement in Tichband v Hurdman does not state in so many words whether the amounts payable under the CFA are limited by reference to the damages which may be recovered on behalf of the claimant, cl 30 of the CFA makes it clear that the amount of the solicitors' base costs is calculated by applying an hourly rate to the number of hours spent. This method of calculating the base costs is obviously not one which is dictated by the amount of the damages recovered, and there is no suggestion in the agreement that the costs are limited by reference to the damages. The agreement is in plain language and perfectly clear about this.

[130] We have accordingly concluded that in the context of this particular agreement, too, the position was spelt out with sufficient clarity that the client can have been in no doubt about it. The test we have formulated above is met and accordingly the requirements of s 58(1) are satisfied.

(ii) Regulation 3(1)(b)

[131] In Tichband v Hurdman the motorist's insurers also relied on a point under reg 3(1)(b). Under this regulation the CFA was required to specify how much of the percentage increase (by way of success fee), if any, related to the cost to the legal representative of the postponement of the payment of his fees and expenses. This has to be specified because under the costs rules this part of a success fee cannot be recovered from the paying party (see CPR 44.3B(1)(a)).

[132] The point the defendants' insurers sought to take (and on which they succeeded before Judge Holman) is as unattractive as it is unmeritorious. Clauses 32 and 33 of this CFA are headed 'Success Fee' and read:

> '32. The reasons we have set the success fee at the level stated are explained on the Risk Assessment form attached to this agreement. We will not seek to recover from you any of the success fee which we are unable to recover from your opponent.
>
> 33. None of the success fee is attributable to the postponement in paying our fees.'

[133] The amount of the percentage uplift on the solicitor's basic charges was omitted from the first page of the CFA. The risk assessment form, however, makes it clear that there is to be a total success fee of 45%, made up of one component of 15% and six components of 5% each. One of the latter represents the cost of postponing payment of the solicitor's costs until the end of the case.

[134] Mr McLaren was compelled to admit that as between solicitor and client no court would dream of allowing the solicitor to recover this 5% from his client when he was necessarily unable to recover it from the paying party due to the operation of r 44.3B(1)(a). The language of cl 32 makes this clear. The reality therefore is that, despite what is said in the risk assessment calculation, none of the recoverable success fee is attributable to the postponement in payment of the solicitor's fees. Taken together, cll 32 and 33 prevail over the risk assessment schedule, and thus on its true construction the CFA in this case complies with the new regulations.

[135] For these reasons we also allow the claimant's appeal in Tichband v Hurdman. The order of Judge Holman must therefore be set aside.

(iii) Regulation 4(2)(c)

[136] In Pratt v Bull, Dunn v Ward and the TAG Test Cases reg 4 is in the spotlight. Under reg 4(2)(c) a client must be informed 'whether the legal representative considers that the client's risk of incurring liability for costs in respect of proceedings to which the agreement relates is insured against under an existing contract of insurance'.

[137] In Pratt v Bull, the 80-year-old claimant was severely injured when she was struck by the defendant's car when using a pedestrian crossing. Initial instructions were given by relatives while she was in intensive care. The following month, when she had recovered enough to give instructions, a solicitor visited her in hospital and a standard CFA was made. When her solicitors sought to recover their costs, the defendant's solicitors demanded to be provided, not only with the CFA, but also with attendance notes and documents to show that she had been given all the oral and written information required by reg 4. They expressed concern that other methods of funding might not have been properly explored. They seized upon one reply given to their questions as indicating that the possibility of legal expenses insurance under her home insurance policy had not been fully explored. The claimant's solicitor's response was that other funding possibilities had indeed been discussed:

> 'Evidently our client did not think she had cover ... Of course there was consideration of the point but to a reasonable degree where this lady was still lying in her hospital bed recovering from the horrific injuries inflicted by your insured.'

[138] For the reasons given earlier (see [81]–[86], above) we do not consider that documents such as these should ordinarily be disclosed, nor should the costs judge require this unless there is a genuine compliance issue. In our view, this is a classic case in which there was no good reason to think that the conditions applicable to this CFA had not been sufficiently satisfied. There are limits to what can reasonably be expected of the interchange between solicitor and client in circumstances such as these. It would be ridiculous to expect a solicitor dealing with a seriously ill old woman in hospital to delay making a CFA while her home insurance policy was found and checked. It is sufficient to satisfy s 58 that he had discussed it with her and formed a view on the funding options.

[139] It must be remembered that recovery of the insurance premium is provided for under s 29 of the 1999 Act (see [114], above) and is an entirely separate matter from the enforceability of the CFA. If the premium is unreasonable or if, in all the circumstances, it was not reasonable to enter into the policy, the matter can be raised on assessment in the usual way.

[140] For these reasons we do not consider that the defendant's solicitors in Pratt v Bull were entitled to disclosure of the documents they were seeking for the reasons they gave. We have dealt with the quite different issue relating to the routine disclosure of the CFA itself in the third section of this judgment.

(iv) Regulation 4(2)(e)(ii)

[141] In Dunn v Ward the CFA ended in these terms, so far as is material:

> 'Other points
> Immediately before you signed this agreement, we verbally explained to you the effect of this agreement and in particular the following: (e)(i) In all the circumstances, on the information currently available to us, we believe that a contract of insurance with Temple Legal Protect Ltd is appropriate. Detailed reasons for this are set out in Schedule 2. (ii) In any event, we believe it is desirable for you to insure your opponent's charges and disbursements in case you lose. (iii) The premium payable for this insurance is payable by you, although in certain circumstances it may be recoverable from your opponent.'

[142] District Judge Wallace considered that the word 'whether' in reg 4(2)(e)(ii) meant 'whether or not'. Even if a solicitor had no interest in recommending a particular insurance contract he must expressly state this to the client. For this reason he held that this regulation was not complied with.

[143] Judge Barnett allowed the claimant's appeal against this decision. He said that the purpose of this regulation was to ensure that the client knew if the legal representative had an interest in a particular product he recommended. It would be of no consequence to the client if there was no such interest. Parliament must have introduced this requirement in order to ensure that clients were protected, and part of that protection involved them having the information they needed in order to make properly informed decisions. Clients did not need to know facts for this purpose which were wholly irrelevant to the decision to be made. The raison d'être of the CFA regime was to increase and facilitate access to justice, and it could not be right to declare a CFA unenforceable merely because it did not mention some fact which was wholly immaterial.

[144] In our judgment Judge Barnett was correct. In this context there is no reason to construe 'whether' as meaning anything other than 'if'. The language of the regulation set out in [34], above mirrored the language of the government's February 2000 paper (Conditional Fees: Sharing the Risks of Litigation: The Government's Conclusions Following Consultation, see [29], above). The mischief which this regulation was introduced to remedy was the risk that the client's legal representative might induce the client to enter into insurance arrangements in which he had an interest. If he had no interest, then there was no identified mischief. In our judgment Mr McLaren was embarking on a quite hopeless quest when he sought to establish reasons why it might have been desirable for the legal representative to say in terms that he had no relevant interest when he recommended the insurance contract in question. The answer is that these regulations do not require him to.

(v) Regulation 4(5)

[145] The defendants' insurers in Dunn v Ward also sought to establish a breach of reg 4(5), which requires the legal representative to explain the effect of the CFA in writing to the client before she enters into it, in addition to the oral explanation of its effect required by reg 4(3).

[146] The evidence on this issue is slightly surprising, although typical of the muddles that may occur in the course of a busy litigation solicitor's practice. Miss Dunn had a cast-iron claim for damages for the injuries she suffered when the bus in which she was travelling was involved in a road traffic accident. She contacted her solicitors on 23 May 2001, and in a 48-minute interview she elected to enter into a CFA and received a full oral explanation of the effects of a CFA (so as to satisfy reg 4(3)). It is not clear whether she met her solicitor for this interview, or whether the explanation was given to her on the telephone.

[147] It appears that on the same day her solicitors posted her two documents. The first was their standard introductory client care letter, written as if she were a privately paying client. They confirmed that they had taken out an ATE insurance policy on her behalf with Temple Legal Protection Ltd (a matter on which she had instructed them to proceed during her interview that day) but they made no mention of a CFA. At the end of their letter they said: 'Unless otherwise agreed, these terms of business apply to any future instructions you give us.'

[148] The other document they sent her was the CFA. This was in two parts, although they were stapled together. The first was headed 'Conditional Fee Agreement', and is based on the Law Society's July 2000 model CFA. The second is headed 'Law Society Conditions' and is identical to the conditions which follow at the end of that model CFA.

[149] We were told that this composite document won a 'plain English' award for the clarity of its wording. It is in clear, legible print. It starts:

> 'The agreement is a binding legal agreement between you and your solicitors. Before you sign, please read everything carefully. An explanation of words like "our disbursements", "basic costs", "win" and "lose" is in Condition 3 of the Law Society Conditions which you should also read carefully.'

[150] Signposted as she was to the Law Society conditions, Miss Dunn would have been able to read the effect of the CFA expressed in clear terms. If she had then turned back to the part of the CFA which refers to the Law Society conditions she would have read: 'You should read the conditions carefully and ask us about anything you find unclear.'

[151] She then signed the agreement. She also signed a statement which read: 'I confirm that my solicitor [has] verbally explained to me the other points set out in paragraphs (a) to (e) above.' This list contains the matters listed in reg 4 which the solicitor's attendance note shows that he explained to Miss Dunn on 23 May.

[152] Judge Barnett refused to find that this clear explanation of the effect of the CFA, albeit contained in a document attached to the CFA and forming part of it, contravened the requirements of reg 4(5). He said that there was no reason in principle why an agreement should not be or contain an explanation of its own terms and effect, and that there was nothing in the 1990 Act or the CFA regulations which unambiguously excluded this possibility, or required its exclusion by necessary implication. Having reached that conclusion, he expressed the view that although this arrangement did not breach the regulation, it would be better to have a free-standing document containing the required explanation.

[153] All these cases turn on their own facts. The regulatory intention is that the client should not be left in the confusion portrayed by the Yarrow and Abrams research study. If these documents had been in small print and as far removed from winning a prize for plain English as many documents of their type, then it is obvious that reg 4(5) would have been breached. On the facts of the present case, however, we asked Mr McLaren to describe what sort of additional document his clients required to see as explaining the effect of the CFA more clearly than the Law Society conditions did. We did not receive a very clear answer. No doubt if the solicitors had essayed a short letter summarising part of the effect of the CFA more briefly, Mr McLaren's clients would have complained that this abbreviated explanation did not explain its full effect, and that the regulation had been breached for that reason instead.

[154] We therefore agree with the approach adopted by Judge Barnett and also with his preference for a free-standing explanatory letter, which may of course cross-refer to any part of the Law Society conditions which sets out the effect of the CFA with clarity. For these reasons we dismiss the appeal in Dunn v Ward.

(vi) The TAG Test Cases: who is the 'legal representative' in reg 4?

[155] In the TAG Test Cases the factual position was very much more complex, although the defendant's appeal eventually fell to be determined on a comparatively straightforward point of law. This is another reg 4 case, and the point of law in issue was whether the reg 4 information was given to the claimants by someone who qualified as 'the legal representative' for the purposes of that regulation.

[156] By reg 1(3) the term 'legal representative' is defined to mean 'the person providing the advocacy or litigation services to which the conditional fee agreement relates'.

[157] The TAG arrangements are fully described in Master Hurst's masterly judgment. This is now reported under the name of Sharratt v London Central Bus Co Ltd, The Accident Group Test Cases [2003] 1 All ER 353. He was concerned with preliminary issues in 19 test cases, all of them small personal injury claims which were settled without the need for legal proceedings for sums varying between £1,000 and £3,500. The claims for costs varied between £3,400 and £4,900. A number of different insurance companies represented the defendants in these cases. Before Master Hurst, Mr Burnett and Mr Williams were instructed by one group of insurers, and Miss Taylor by the other. On the appeal to this court all three counsel appeared for the defendants in all nine cases.

[158] For the purposes of this judgment the facts can be summarised much more briefly than was necessary for the purposes of Master Hurst's judgment. In November 1999 The Accident Advice Bureau Ltd launched an insurance-backed CFA in anticipation of the coming into force of the 1999 Act and the abolition of legal aid for personal injury claims. At that time ATE insurance premiums and the percentage uplift on CFAs with success fees were not recoverable.

[159] On 1 April 2000 Pt II of the 1999 Act came into force, as did the 2000 order and the CFA regulations. The Accident Advice Bureau Ltd became The Accident Group Ltd (TAG). The TAG scheme grew rapidly. In a report on personal injury litigation in 2001 TAG was described as the market leader with a market share of 15%. Master Hurst was told that cases were being accepted at the rate of 15,000 per month. Users of the scheme were required to use the services of TAG agents and a specified medical agency, and to take out an ATE insurance policy with TAG's nominated insurers.

[160] When liability insurers took the point that each CFA was unenforceable for a number of different reasons and each ATE premium irrecoverable, a number of test cases were selected in order to test the viability of the insurers' arguments. In particular they were contending that the information given by the TAG representative to a potential client did not comply with reg 4 of the CFA regulations because, among other things, that representative is not a 'legal representative' within the meaning of that regulation. Master Hurst was told that there were about 211,000 cases in which this point had arisen, and that if the court were to find that the regulation had not been complied with this would result in a 'windfall' of £1bn or more to the liability insurers. It was also said that it would have a devastating effect on the 700 or more firms of solicitors that are TAG panel members.

[161] The defendants were sceptical about the accuracy of these figures. TAG had not provided data showing how many cases led to successful claims, or how many dropped out of the scheme. The figure of £1bn was calculated in a broad brush way, included the insurance premiums, and made no allowance for reductions on detailed assessment. They also questioned the assumptions that the average costs in the simplest cases would be about £4,000, that all cases would be successful, and that every case was indistinguishable from the test cases on other grounds. However all this may be, there is no doubt that the viability of a very well-used scheme is under challenge in these test cases.

[162] To put the matter quite simply, the 700 panel solicitors whom TAG uses play a carefully defined role in a highly organised structure. They are each bound by the conditions of the agreement they make with TAG, and TAG's operations manual, the terms of which each solicitor is bound to observe, and which is updated from time to time, sets out the framework within which TAG's clients' claims are processed. The solicitors have to use a standardised client care letter and a standardised CFA (with no success fee). What they lose by acting without fee in losing cases and without the consolation of a success fee in the cases which they win is made up, they hope, by the volume of potentially successful cases they hope to receive from TAG every month.

[163] TAG obtain their clients through their presence in shopping centres, through cold calling, or through telephone inquiries in response to advertisements. The client signs some initial documentation, which includes a TAG service agreement and declaration form, and TAG then sends an agent employed by an associated company to complete a questionnaire at the client's home. This will contain sufficient detail to enable solicitors to assess whether the claim has a better than 50% chance of success. A firm called Rowe Cohen vets the viability of all TAG's claims against this criterion and the additional criterion that the damages are likely to exceed £1,500. If the cases pass these two tests, the papers are then sent to a panel solicitor for the first time.

[164] At this stage the panel solicitor's responsibilities are fairly limited. He must consider the papers and apply the same tests. If the tests are not passed, he will reject the case and send the papers back to TAG. If the tests are passed, he will send the client a letter of introduction, and will enclose with that letter a standard client care letter, duly completed, a standard CFA, and a copy of the completed questionnaire.

[165] In the introductory letter he tells the client that a TAG representative will contact her by telephone very soon to arrange an appointment to call and see her on his behalf to ensure that the client understands the nature of their agreement. He has already explained in this short letter that it is a statutory requirement that the client must be provided with certain advice before she signs any documentation. The letter ends with the assurance that if the client has any queries and would like to speak to the solicitor personally, she should not hesitate to contact him on a given telephone number. Mr Charlton QC told us, on instructions, that Mr McCulloch recalled only eight cases in which a client had called him out of the 3,500 cases he had handled for TAG.

[166] It is at this point that the procedure becomes controversial. The reg 4 information is not given to the client by the solicitor or by a member of his directly employed staff, or even by somebody whom he engages as an independent contractor for this purpose. It is given by a representative of TAG. This representative will visit the client at his home by appointment. On his visit he will explain the CFA and complete what is called the 'fact find' and oral explanation sheet. A copy of this three-page sheet is contained in the operations manual. It begins with a statement to the effect that the panel solicitor has authorised TAG to obtain certain information from a claimant in relation to the claimant's funding options following an accident on [the relevant date] 'and to orally advise the claimant as detailed below in connection with the Panel Solicitor's CFA'. There follow five questions, designed to elicit information relating to the possible existence of alternative funding arrangements, and then ten fairly full paragraphs of text which set out, among other things, the information required by reg 4. These end with the following: 'We understand that you do not require any further explanation, advice or other information about these matters.'

[167] At the end of the sheet the TAG representative will certify that he has given this information to the claimant and that he orally gave advice on behalf of the panel solicitor in relation to his CFA and the legal expenses insurance policy 'as detailed above'. The claimant for his part will sign beneath a statement by which she confirms:

> 'That the above information was provided by me to the TAG representative and that I received the oral explanation in relation to the appointed representative's CFA and the legal expenses insurance policy as detailed above. I am aware that the TAG representative is obtaining the above information and providing me with the above explanation on behalf of the appointed representative.'

[168] During this visit the TAG representative will also confirm the contents of the questionnaire and obtain the claimant's signature on a statement of truth, the CFA and the solicitor's client care letter; and on a completed credit agreement which will enable him to obtain a loan to fund the cost of the policy premium and the solicitor's disbursements.

[169] These completed documents are then sent back to TAG. On receipt of them TAG will issue a certificate of insurance to the claimant under its delegated authority from the insurers, and send the CFA, client care letter and fact find and oral explanation sheet, all now signed by the client, to the panel solicitor, together with a copy of the certificate of insurance. On receipt of these documents the panel solicitor will then sign the CFA and client care letter and start to act for his client in the usual way. The only reason why this agreement, which lacks a success fee, is caught by the CFA regulations is that the panel solicitor is acting on what is colloquially called a 'no win no fee' basis, and is thus caught by the definition of a CFA in s 58(2)(a) (see [18], above).

[170] There were, in retrospect, certain unsatisfactory features about the arrangements for the trial conducted by Master Hurst at the end of October last year. A judgment adverse to TAG by a district judge in early August 2002 had put the continued viability of the TAG scheme in question, and the parties wished to obtain an authoritative ruling from the senior costs judge as soon as possible. On 20 September 2002 Master Hurst made an order directing the trial of two preliminary issues within the test cases (Sharratt v London Central Bus Co Ltd, The Accident Group Test Cases [2003] 1 All ER 353 at 356):

> '(i) Whether under the Accident Group Scheme the reg 4 information is given by a "legal representative" within the meaning of regs 1 and 4 of the Conditional Fee Agreements Regulations 2000. (ii) If the answer is in the negative, what are the consequences of that for the claimants' claims for costs.'

[171] He directed that the trial of these issues should take place on 29 and 30 October. In view of the time pressures the parties were not obliged to exchange statements of case on these issues, and disclosure of documents was also dispensed with. The claimants provided two witness statements and certain other voluntary information about the operation of the TAG scheme (so far as it related to these issues). The defendants for their part filed no evidence, and their case on the preliminary issues only became apparent when they served their skeleton arguments shortly before the hearing.

[172] In those skeleton arguments they made two main points. (1) The reg 4 information could only be given by the individual solicitor who was TAG's 'appointed representative' within the panel solicitor's practice, and he had no authority to delegate this responsibility to anybody. (2) If this was wrong, then he could delegate this responsibility to someone else within his practice who was qualified to conduct litigation services within the meaning of s 28 of the 1990 Act: in other words, to another qualified solicitor, or to a Fellow of the Institute of Legal Executives.

[173] In their skeleton arguments, and more particularly in their oral arguments at the hearing, a second fall-back argument started to emerge, whereby the original solicitor might delegate the responsibility to somebody whom he judged to have appropriate skill and discretion, but this description did not embrace the TAG representatives on account of their lack of training and other perceived inadequacies. Nor did the solicitor have any choice about this. He was obliged to delegate to representatives chosen and trained by TAG. In early October the defendants' solicitors had elicited from TAG's solicitors the information that TAG possessed no documentation relating to the training of their representatives received in connection with their reg 4 duties. Some reference was made in this context to role-play. Mr Charlton understandably objected that the defendants' case was now straying well beyond the simple issues on which his clients had prepared their evidence, and that any dispute about the quality of the TAG representatives' reg 4 performance should await the trial of the second round of issues in the test cases which was due to commence on 24 March 2003.

[174] It is clear that Master Hurst adopted Mr Charlton's submissions on this point in the court below. Although Mr Burnett attempted to open up this ground of challenge again in his skeleton arguments on the appeal, he eventually accepted that it was inappropriate to do so. He had by now abandoned his clients' primary contention before Master Hurst. The basis on which he contested the appeal was that his fall-back contention before the master was correct, alternatively that under no circumstances, given his obligations under the Solicitors' Practice Rules and his code of professional conduct, could these reg 4 duties be delegated by a solicitor to an organisation like TAG or to one of TAG's representatives, however well those duties were performed.

[175] Mr Charlton, for his part, attempted to revive an argument which Master Hurst had rejected quite summarily. Parliament has preserved, by s 27(2)(e) of the 1990 Act, the common law right long enjoyed by unqualified staff working for the litigation department of a solicitor's firm to exercise rights of audience in chambers in the High Court and the county court. Mr Charlton argued that a TAG representative might qualify by this route as a person to whom the panel solicitor might appropriately delegate the reg 4 responsibility.

[176] The trouble with this argument is that the retention of this common law practice is limited to the conferring of a right of audience to someone who (see s 27(2)(e)(i))—

> 'is employed (whether wholly or in part), or is otherwise engaged, to assist in the conduct of litigation and is doing so under instructions given (either generally or in relation to the proceedings) by a qualified litigator ...'

There has never been any question of a TAG representative performing advocacy services of this type. It was never indeed contemplated that he would exercise any such services in relation to any proceedings on behalf of the TAG client (for the statutory definition of 'advocacy services' see s 119 of the 1990 Act).

[177] We return, then to the main points of challenge, on which Master Hurst favoured the claimants' arguments. A solicitor has always been able to delegate part of his functions in appropriate cases. The ground rules were set out by the House of Lords in Law Society v Waterlow, Law Society v Skinner (1883) 8 App Cas 407. In that case an issue arose as to whether Waterlows, the law stationers, had fallen foul of a provision of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act 1870 which made it an offence to impersonate a solicitor. The House of Lords decided that they had not. Lord Selborne LC said (at 412): '[Waterlows] have simply executed instructions to do ministerial acts in order to save the real solicitor from the trouble and expense of doing them.'

[178] And Lord Blackburn said (at 415):

> 'A solicitor taking out probate is not bound to do everything in his own person. There are some things which he cannot delegate, he is to give his personal responsibility and obligation to his client to use his own skill and his own judgment in some things which are to be done, and he ought not to delegate them at all. There are some matters as to which though he may delegate them and need not do them in person but may employ a clerk, yet he would be required to see that that clerk had competent knowledge.'

[179] After concluding that Waterlows could be used as a messenger to lodge or retrieve documents in the Probate Registry, he went on to comment (at 416–417) on the tasks which might not be acceptably delegated:

> '[I]t was contended that it might be that a great deal more was done,—that ... this messenger of Messrs. Waterlow was to argue it and to advise upon it, and to discuss it, and to do various things which certainly I think [the solicitor] would not be doing quite his duty to his clients if he delegated to another person to do for him, and as to which certainly, if Messrs. Waterlow did them (I think it is probable that they were too wise), if they incurred all the responsibility of advising on matters of law and things of that sort, they would be doing a very foolish and rash thing. If they did all this it would be a plausible argument to say that in doing things like that, furnishing intelligence and legal advice and so on, which [the solicitor] ought not to have delegated to them to do, they were acting as solicitors [and were thereby committing the offence alleged].'

[180] In Arbiter Group plc v Gill Jennings & Every (a firm) and RWS Information Inc [2000] Lloyd's Rep PN 669 at 672 (para 20) this court was concerned with the alleged negligence of a firm of American patent searchers who had been instructed by a firm of English patent agents. Swinton Thomas LJ said:

> 'A professional man in appropriate circumstances is entitled to delegate tasks. Whether he is entitled to delegate a particular task will depend upon the nature of the task. He is entitled to delegate some tasks to others but is not entitled to delegate others. It all depends on the nature of the task involved. If he does delegate he must delegate to a suitably qualified and experienced person.'

[181] These principles are now reflected in the modern arrangements governing solicitors' conduct. The modern prohibition on unqualified persons acting as solicitors is to be found in s 20 of the Solicitors' Act 1974. Rule 13 of the Solicitors' Practice Rules now provides, so far as is material:

> '(1) The principals in a practice must ensure that their practice is supervised and managed so as to provide for: (a) compliance with principal solicitors' duties at law and in conduct to exercise proper supervision over their admitted and unadmitted staff ...'

[182] Note (b) to this rule relates to 'supervision' and 'management'. It contains the following guidance:

> '(i) "Supervision" refers to the professional overseeing of staff and the professional overseeing of clients' matters ... (iii) Operationally, supervision and management may be delegated within an established framework for reporting and accountability. However, the responsibility under paragraph (1)(a) of the rule ... remains with the principals.'

[183] The Guide to the Professional Conduct of Solicitors (8th edn, 1999) (the guide) contains (in para 3.07) the rubric: 'A solicitor is responsible for exercising proper supervision over both admitted and unadmitted staff.' This is followed by a note which reads:

> '1. The duty to supervise staff covers not only employees but also independent contractors engaged to carry out work on behalf of the firm, e.g. consultants, locums, solicitors' clerks.'

[184] Further guidance on modern practice is evident in Annex 21G to the guide, which is concerned with solicitors' supervision responsibilities over the conduct of unadmitted staff who exercise rights of audience on behalf of their firms under s 27(2)(e) of the 1990 Act. After reciting the effect of para 3.07 of the guide, and of Note 1 that follows it, Annex 21G continues:

> 'Accordingly, as a matter of professional conduct, when instructing an unadmitted person (whether an employee or an independent contractor) to appear in chambers in the High Court or the county court, a solicitor should:
> • be satisfied that the person is responsible and competent to carry out the instructions;

- give the person sufficiently full and clear instructions to enable him or her to carry out those instructions properly;
- afford appropriate supervision.'

[185] We had the benefit of receiving a written submission from the Law Society on this aspect of the TAG appeal. The Law Society drew our attention, as did the parties, to the matters we have set out at [177]–[184], above. Its short written submission also contained the following observations:

'It is the Law Society's view that it is open to solicitors to delegate a wide range of tasks to unqualified persons, whether those persons are employees or independent contractors. This is provided, of course, that the person to whom the task is delegated is competent and responsible and provided that the performance of the individual is adequately supervised. It is the Law Society's view that the decision as to whether an individual is competent must be made by the solicitor concerned based on the nature of the task to be delegated and the qualities of the delegate. Further, the level of supervision required would be for the practitioner to decide in these circumstances. It is also the Law Society's view that the individual's competence must be assessed in the context of the work which that individual is expected to do. Using employees or independent contractors who may be competent to handle only a very limited range of tasks, provided they are competent to handle the tasks which they are asked to undertake, gives rise to no objection at law or breach of the solicitors' conduct rules. If there were any justified complaint about the adequacy of work carried out by an unadmitted person, then under the rules of professional conduct, the Law Society would expect (assuming the person concerned continued to undertake the work) that the supervision arrangements would be amended. The Law Society accepts that, in the context of these appeals, these propositions may be trite and uncontested. Nevertheless the Law Society would wish the court to have them at the forefront of its considerations whatever the outcome of these appeals. The Law Society would be concerned if, by any part of its judgment, the court were to restrict a solicitor's ability to delegate tasks. Provided the rules of professional conduct are complied with, this ability to delegate is essential to the efficient and profitable running of virtually every solicitor's practice. It is also essential to ensuring that the cost to the public of legal services is not unnecessarily increased.'

[186] As we have observed, following Master Hurst's summary rejection of their contention that a solicitor had no authority to delegate his reg 4 responsibilities at all, even to a more experienced solicitor in the same firm, the defendants had jettisoned this argument by the time their notice of appeal was settled. Mr Burnett, however, argued vigorously that the solicitor might only delegate this responsibility to another qualified solicitor (however inexperienced) or to a Fellow of the Institute of Legal Executives who was himself qualified to perform litigation services pursuant to s 28 of the 1990 Act. A legal executive of vast experience of litigation practice would not do, Mr Burnett said, unless he had qualified as a Fellow of the Institute.

[187] There was a paradox at the heart of his clients' submissions. We have seen (at [17], above) how Pt II of the 1990 Act has the purpose of fostering new or better ways of providing litigation services. An outside observer might have expected liability insurers to approve of practices which tend to drive down the cost of these services (for which they have to pay, when they are used by successful claimants) as opposed to insisting that every regulatory duty, however routine, must be performed by expensive professional people. However, such was their enthusiasm for the potential windfalls that might be achieved by their adherence to the indemnity principle whenever it might work to their financial advantage that they happily turned a blind eye to this paradox.

[188] In developing his argument that a solicitor might only delegate his reg 4 responsibilities to another person who was himself qualified to conduct litigation services, Mr Burnett invited us to consider the statutory framework of the new legislative scheme along the following lines. He said that the current approach of the law to CFAs was informed by two concerns, one ancient, one modern. The former was the rule against champerty, and the latter was the need to protect consumers of limited sophistication. In general, the first was the concern of the common law, whilst the latter was the emphasis supplied by statute. The CFA regulations themselves were principally directed at the need to protect consumers, as was observed in Callery v Gray, Russell v Pal Pak Corrugated Ltd [2001] 3 All ER 833 at [26], [2001] 1 WLR 2112. They also operated to protect unsuccessful litigants who had to pay the costs of their opponents on CFAs.

[189] He said that the need to protect consumers entering CFAs was pressing. Many clients who considered bringing an action for the recovery of damages for personal injury had had no prior contact with the legal system, and were wholly unaware of the different types of funding for litigation, the risks of litigation, or the range of and comparison between available insurance products and funding schemes. Most were likely to be one-off users of personal injury or employment claims services. They would therefore have no previous experience against which to compare the service provided. Many were unaware of the differences in quality and skill between solicitors and other unqualified persons appearing to offer the same service, a point made in the Blackwell Report (see [38], above).

[190] In this context CFAs were complex documents, which many lay people have difficulty understanding, and the current CFA regulations significantly enlarged on the degree of consumer protection afforded by their predecessor, partly as a result of the findings in the Yarrow and Abrams study (see [25] and [27], above) as to the level of consumer misconception. There was also a temptation for CFAs to be marketed in excessively simplistic terms—classically 'no win no fee'—which could and did give rise to a misleadingly understated description of the potentially onerous obligations to which consumers were subscribing.

[191] Mr Burnett submitted that Parliament's anxiety to protect consumers entering CFAs was amply demonstrated by the serious sanction which it imposed for non-compliance with the regulations, namely the unenforceability of the agreement. The regulations specifically required that the reg 4 information, advice and explanation must be given before a client entered into a CFA which could potentially involve her in incurring liability for costs, and at a point where it was anticipated she would need and require advice on the CFA and any financing or funding options available to her: see Sarwar v Alam [2001] EWCA Civ 1401, [2001] 4 All ER 541, [2002] 1 WLR 125.

[192] He added that the fair administration of justice also required the protections afforded to consumers by the regulations to be balanced by a measure of protection for paying parties in this type of litigation.

[193] He pointed out that as access to justice has been liberalised through the statutory relaxation of the law against champerty and the enlargement of rights of audience, great concerns have been expressed about the proliferation of unqualified 'claims assessors' involving themselves in litigation: see the Blackwell Report. This court stated in Factortame Ltd v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (No 2) [2002] 4 All ER 97 at [56] and [59], [2002] 3 WLR 1104:

> 'In its context it is natural to read s 58 as applying to the provision of advocacy and litigation services by those authorised in accordance with the earlier sections to exercise rights of audience or conduct litigation. There is nothing in the section which suggests that it is intended to apply to the provision of services ancillary to the conduct of litigation by the many different categories of person who have, in the past, been accustomed to assist with the conduct of litigation ... [T]he legislative intent was that the provisions of s 58 of the 1990 Act were intended to apply only to those who could be described as "litigators", that is advocates and those conducting the litigation.'

[194] Mr Burnett submitted that the integrity and independence of the solicitors' profession was seen as the principal safeguard (not least by the authors of the Blackwell Report) against such practices and the risk of abuse noted by members of the House of Lords in Callery v Gray (Nos 1 and 2) [2002] 3 All ER 417, [2002] 1 WLR 2000. It was a bulwark against the public evil of champerty because it holds a higher duty to the court than to its clients, and against the private evil of misselling to consumers because of the strict rules of professional conduct and advice, including the Solicitors' Costs Information and Client Care Code 1999 (which reg 4 closely reflects).

[195] In our judgment Mr Burnett protests too much. We must stress that we are only concerned on this issue with the question whether as a matter of principle a solicitor may delegate his reg 4 responsibilities to a wider class of people than those embraced by Mr Burnett's primary argument on the appeal. If it is possible to delegate more widely, then the solicitor will remain professionally responsible for the performance of the person who actually performs the duties. Each situation must be considered on its own facts. Parliament wishes to foster new ways of rendering litigation services, and provided that the performance of the reg 4 duties is appropriately delegated, and the duties are properly performed under appropriate supervision, we cannot see that Parliament's intentions are being thwarted if the solicitor delegates more widely than is allowed for in Mr Burnett's primary argument before us. We would not wish to be prescriptive about the form which that supervision should take, provided that an appropriate system has been set up.

[196] We have found it useful in this context to compare the position of a solicitor in relation to delegation with that of a company director. In that context there is a helpful passage in the judgment of Jonathan Parker J in Re Barings plc (No 5), Secretary of State for Trade and Industry v Baker (No 5) [1999] 1 BCLC 433 at 489 where he says:

> '(i) Directors have, both collectively and individually, a continuing duty to acquire and maintain a sufficient knowledge and understanding of the company's business to enable them properly to discharge their duties as directors. (ii) Whilst directors are entitled (subject to the articles of association of the company) to delegate particular functions to those below them in the management chain, and to trust their competence and integrity a to a reasonable extent, the exercise of the power of delegation does not absolve a director from the duty to supervise the discharge of the delegated functions. (iii) No rule of universal application can be formulated as to the duty referred to in (ii) above. The extent of the duty, and the question whether it has been discharged, must depend of the facts of each particular case, including the director's role in the management of the company.'

b [197] This passage is valuable in that it clearly distinguishes the governing principle set out in (ii) from the question of fact which will need to be answered under (iii) in any particular case.

[198] When we tested the validity of Mr Burnett's submissions we examined the nature of the services which were being performed for the solicitor in the c present case. We did not in this context concern ourselves with the matters set out in reg 4(e) because a particular feature of the TAG scheme is that the client has already agreed with TAG that she will purchase TAG's preferred insurance scheme before the solicitor appears on the scene, even if TAG does not actually procure the insurers to issue cover until after the credit agreement has been d signed. This is the effect of the declaration signed by the claimant when she enters the TAG scheme. In it she agrees to pay the premium for the insurance policy on the basis that TAG will not seek to enforce this liability in the event that evidence of insurance is not issued on the sole grounds of liability and quantum. What this all means in practice will have to be worked out at a later hearing, but at the level of generality with which we are concerned to determine the e preliminary issues before us on this appeal, we consider it to be better to concentrate on the aspects of the reg 4 duties which do not relate to advice about the policy.

[199] These duties oblige the panel solicitor to ensure that his client receives proper oral explanation of the following matters: (a) the circumstances in which f he may be liable to pay the panel solicitor's costs in accordance with the CFA; (b) the circumstances in which he may seek assessment of the fees and expenses of the panel solicitor, and the procedure for doing so; (c) whether he considers that the client's risk of incurring liability for costs in respect of the proceedings to which the CFA relates is insured against under an existing contract of insurance; (d) whether other methods of financing those costs are available and, if so, how g they apply to the client and the proceedings in question. The client must also receive an explanation of the effect of the CFA both orally and in writing.

[200] We can see no reason why these duties cannot be performed by someone on the solicitor's behalf who does not happen to be a qualified solicitor or a Fellow of the Institute of Legal Executives. The relevant advice is very h clearly set out in the oral explanation sheet, and the fact find part of that sheet, discussed with the client in her own home (where she can readily look for documents relating to her household insurance or her trade union membership), will enable the client to deal with the matters raised in (c) and (d), above. The first four questions, which relate to other possible methods of funding the j litigation, are simple questions followed by 'Y/N'. The client will circle Y or N as appropriate, and these answers will reach the panel solicitor in due course.

[201] Mr Burnett argued eloquently that the procedure adopted by TAG's representatives on behalf of the panel solicitor did not admit of the kind of dialogue to be expected when a qualified solicitor discusses matters of this kind with a client. Although TAG bridled at his suggestion that their representatives read the oral explanation 'parrot-fashion'—and whether they did or not is a matter for the later hearing—Mr Burnett was on stronger ground when he observed that reg 4(1) contains not only a duty to inform but also a duty to provide such further explanation, advice or other information about the matters listed in the regulation as the client may reasonably require. In this context he reminded us that Master Hurst had shared his client's surprise at the final item of the oral explanation sheet in which (as quoted at [166], above) it is said that the client does not require any further explanation, advice or other information about these matters. We, too, find it difficult to reconcile this with the solicitor's introductory letter which invites the client to telephone if she has any queries.

[202] Mr Charlton, however, told Master Hurst on instructions that in practice the TAG representative will deal with any matters which the client may raise, and we share the master's view that the explanation of what happens in practice is best left for the later hearing.

[203] In our judgment, the issues raised by Mr Burnett should not drive us to the conclusion that the person who actually gives the reg 4 advice must inevitably be someone who is himself qualified to conduct litigation services. Parliament has not made this requirement, and in the context of the liberalising effect of Pt II of the 1990 Act it would be wrong for us to do so.

[204] The question then arises, if a wider degree of delegation is legally possible, can a solicitor lawfully delegate his responsibility to an organisation like TAG, and can TAG sub-delegate it to one of their representatives?

[205] The way in which Mr Burnett advanced his fall-back argument was to the effect that if a solicitor could delegate his reg 4 duties more widely, he could only do so in favour of someone with appropriate skill or discretion, and that this description could not embrace TAG or its representatives. In this context he relied on certain passages in Bowstead & Reynolds on Agency (17th edn, 2001) pp 40, 137:

> '2-017 An agent may be appointed for the purpose of executing a deed, or doing any other act on behalf of the principal, which the principal might himself execute, make or do; except for the purpose of executing a right, privilege or power conferred, or of performing a duty imposed, on the principal personally, the exercise or performance of which requires discretion or special personal skill, or for the purpose of doing an act which the principal is required, by or pursuant to any statute or other relevant provision, to do in person.
>
> Comment
>
> 2-018 The authorities cited for the proposition contained in this Article indicate that it is a general rule of common law which will apply unless displaced ...
>
> When agent may delegate authority
>
> 5-001 (1) An agent may not delegate his authority in whole or in part except with the express or implied authority of the principal ... (3) The above principles are inapplicable where the act done or to be done is purely ministerial and does not involve confidence or discretion.'

[206] Because the TAG staff who perform the reg 4 duties do not have the professional obligations upon which Mr Burnett laid such emphasis, he said that a vital filter was stripped out of the TAG scheme. Being employees of TAG (or associated enterprises) they could not be expected to give impartial advice (as must solicitors—see the Solicitors' Introduction and Referral Code 1990). Their task (in all probability supported by a remuneration package which has large commission and other incentive elements) was to maximise their own TAG revenue—a business-driven model with different values from those to be expected of an officer of the court.

[207] Mr Burnett argued that the use of TAG representatives in this way, in place of solicitors and legal executives or people directly employed by a solicitor's firm, is to undermine the protective statutory regime. He said that it raised a serious issue of public policy, given the scale on which TAG itself says its scheme operates: the statutory requirements were being side-stepped at a rate of 15,000 cases per month.

[208] Master Hurst's approach to this final question was to start with the proposition that a 'legal representative' might be an individual or a firm or even a prescribed membership organisation (see reg 4(4), and s 30 of the 1999 Act). His reasons are set out in Sharratt v London Central Bus Co Ltd, The Accident Group Test Cases [2003] 1 All ER 353 at [54]–[60] and we need not repeat them here. He then concluded (at [75]) that delegation within a solicitor's firm must be permissible. If the task is delegated to someone incompetent within the firm, the firm will suffer the consequences when it is found that the requirements of the CFA regulations have not been complied with.

[209] He showed that he understood clearly the criticisms made by the defendant insurers. Paragraphs [76]–[77] and [82]–[83] of his judgment show how well he understood them. Since he had found that the legal representative might be an individual, a firm or a recognised body, it followed that there could be delegation within the firm or recognised body. He concluded, however, that given his finding that there could be delegation within the firm or recognised body, it followed that there could be delegation to a duly authorised agent.

[210] Although questions might arise as to whether the agent was competent to carry out the required task, or indeed whether the task had actually been carried out with the necessary competence, these were questions of quality which were not within the scope of his present judgment. It was the legal representative who would bear the consequences if his appointed agent did not carry out the task correctly, as would be the case in relation to internal delegation to an incompetent member of staff. 'Incompetence by the delegate does not invalidate the delegation' (at [84]).

[211] At the end of this part of his judgment, he said (at [88]):

> 'Can it be, [Mr Burnett] asked, that Parliament intended, when it enacted that CFAs which failed to comply with delegated legislation would be unenforceable, and when it had approved delegated legislation imposing mandatory requirements to give information and provide such explanation, advice or information as the client may require, that a TAG representative or someone similar would give the information required by reg 4 by using the wording set out in the fact find and oral explanation sheet? The answer to that question is that there is nothing in the general law of delegation and agency or in the 2000 regulations which prevents delegation of the reg 4 task to a properly appointed agent. The essential question is one of quality, ie was there sufficient explanation given by or on behalf of the legal representative? If the answer to that question is Yes: was that information given by a duly appointed agent? If the answer to the essential question is No, it is immaterial who gave the explanation.'

[212] Like Master Hurst we can only answer this question on this preliminary issue at a high level of generality. As we have observed, solicitors are now free to delegate some of their functions, where it is appropriate to do so, to unadmitted staff and to independent contractors, provided that they comply with their responsibilities for supervision which appear in the Solicitors' Practice Rules and the Guide to the Professional Conduct of Solicitors. If they use independent contractors, they may use individuals, or they may use a reputable firm or company which will itself furnish staff who will perform the necessary functions. We were told that this often occurs when solicitors use inquiry agents to visit witnesses and prepare witness statements for them in the course of litigation.

[213] These practices have their convenient aspects, so far as client care is concerned. In the TAG cases there was evidence that solicitors and their staff usually work conventional office hours. The client, particularly if she is at work, prefers to deal with matters like the processing of a small accident claim at home in the evenings, and this is where the TAG scheme comes into its own. Although in the conventional way in which solicitors' business is conducted, the solicitor will have a personal interview with the client in his office (for which he will charge out at the appropriate hourly rate) Mr McCulloch described the practical difficulties he encountered when determining how to implement the new regulations.

[214] He said that when they were first introduced he held the view that in order to ensure that the client was fully informed of the nature of the agreement and had the ability to ask questions, there had to be some kind of personal conversational contact. Whilst it might have been possible to provide this advice by telephone he had concluded that it was virtually impossible to do this effectively without delaying progress. Clients were frequently not available during his normal office hours, and his practice, in common with many others, could not afford to provide a night-time or weekend service. It was simply beyond their resources.

[215] We have concluded that on this appeal Master Hurst directed himself correctly on the relevant law. So far as his application of the law to the facts is concerned, we can only interfere with this decision of a judge who has immense practical experience of the market in which solicitors now operate, and a keen understanding (which is apparent from his judgment) of the need to maintain appropriate professional standards, if we are of the opinion that his decision was wrong (CPR 52.11(3)(a)). We are quite unable to do so. Master Hurst showed that he understood the subject matter of these preliminary issues and their legislative background. He directed himself correctly on the law. He appreciated the strength of the opposing arguments, and he summarised them accurately in his judgment. And he reached a conclusion which was rationally argued and logically defensible.

[216] Whether when he descends to the detail of how the TAG scheme operates in practice during the later hearing, when the relevant issues have been defined with greater precision and when there is fuller evidence before him, both in the form of witness statements (which may be tested in cross-examination) and documents, than was available at the first trial, he finds breaches of reg 4 in one or more of the test cases will have to await the outcome of the later hearing. For the purposes of the first trial, and of this appeal, it is sufficient if we make it clear that it will be in theory permissible for a solicitors' firm to delegate the performance of its reg 4 duties to an organisation like TAG, and for TAG to sub-delegate to its representatives, provided that in so doing the solicitor is not abandoning the supervisory responsibilities required of him by Practice

Rule 13.07 and the Guide to Professional Conduct para 3.07. Whether the TAG scheme can and does provide properly for this is a matter for the fact-finding trial.

[217] Part II of the 1990 Act is concerned with the search for new or better ways for providing litigation services. A national organisation like TAG may be able to achieve economies of scale and standards of client service which simply are not available to an ordinary solicitors' firm. Quality control, however, is all important, and if a solicitor abjures his duty to maintain supervisory responsibility, through an established framework for reporting and accountability, over the TAG representatives when they visit his client's home on his behalf, it is likely that it would be found that it was not he who gave the information he was required by reg 4 to give, and that the regulation has therefore been broken.

[218] For these reasons we will dismiss this appeal.

6. CONCLUSIONS: THE RIGHT APPROACH

[219] We believe it will be helpful if we set out in one place the broad effect of this judgment.

[220] So far as matters of procedure are concerned, we consider that it should become normal practice for a CFA to be disclosed for the purpose of costs proceedings in which a success fee is claimed. If the CFA contains confidential information relating to other proceedings, it may be suitably redacted before disclosure takes place. Attendance notes and other correspondence should not ordinarily be disclosed, but the judge conducting the assessment may require the disclosure of material of this kind if a genuine issue is raised. A genuine issue is one in which there is a real chance that the CFA is unenforceable as a result of failure to satisfy the applicable conditions.

[221] When we turn to matters of law, we have explained that a CFA will only be unenforceable if in the circumstances of the particular case the conditions applicable to it by virtue of s 58 have not been sufficiently complied with in the light of their statutory purposes (see [105]–[110], above). Costs judges should ask themselves the following question: has the particular departure from a regulation or requirement in s 58, either on its own or in conjunction with any other such departure in this case, had a materially adverse effect either upon the protection afforded to the client or upon the proper administration of justice?

[222] Thus the judge conducting the assessment should first consider the position as between solicitor and client. If the judge had done so in Tichband v Hurdman, for instance, he would immediately have seen that the client could not possibly have avoided his liability under the CFA by relying on the discrepancy between cl 33 and the risk assessment (see [131]–[134], above). If the court considers that as between solicitor and client the client would have just cause for complaint because some requirement introduced for his protection was not satisfied, or that the CFA otherwise offends public policy (for example, through a breach of s 58(3)(b), a provision with which we are not concerned on these appeals), then the CFA will be unenforceable, and the indemnity principle will operate in favour of the paying party.

[223] Even then, however, the client should be able to recover the disbursements which she has already financed, whether personally or through a loan, and any ATE premium (see [113]–[116], above).

[224] The court should be watchful when it considers allegations that there have been breaches of the CFA regulations. The parliamentary purpose is to enhance access to justice, not to impede it, and to create better ways of delivering litigation services, not worse ones. These purposes will be thwarted if those who render good service to their clients under CFAs are at risk of going unremunerated at the culmination of the bitter trench warfare which has been such an unhappy feature of the recent litigation scene.

[225] In Burstein v Times Newspapers Ltd [2002] EWCA Civ 1739 at [29], [2003] 1 Costs LR 111 at [29] Latham LJ ended the judgment of the court with these words:

> 'The deputy costs judge is to be commended for ensuring that the detailed assessment did not become an excuse for further expensive litigation at the behest of a disappointed but persistent litigant. Satellite litigation about costs has become a growth industry, and one that is a blot on the civil justice system. Costs judges should be astute to prevent such proceedings from being protracted by allegations that are without substance.'

[226] In future district judges and costs judges must be equally astute to prevent satellite litigation about costs from being protracted by allegations about breaches of the CFA regulations where the breaches do not matter. They should remember that the law does not care about very little things, and that they should only declare a CFA unenforceable if the breach does matter and if the client could have relied on it successfully against his solicitor.

7. RESULTS OF THE INDIVIDUAL APPEALS

[227] We allow the defendants' appeals in the two disclosure cases, Worth v McKenna and Pratt v Bull. We allow the claimants' appeals in Hollins v Russell and Tichband v Hurdman. We dismiss the defendant's appeal in Dunn v Ward. We also dismiss the defendants' appeal in the TAG Test Cases.

[228] We consider that in Worth v McKenna the fair order to make is that if the receiving party so requests within five days of the order on this appeal the detailed assessment be reheard by the district judge in accordance with the principles set out in this judgment. In Pratt v Bull we remit the matter to the district judge to set a new timetable for the future conduct of the assessment proceedings. In Hollins v Russell the order of Judge Tetlow is set aside and the order of District Judge Simpson restored. In Tichband v Hurdman we remit the matter to a district judge to conduct a detailed assessment in accordance with the principles set out in this judgment.

TAG Test Cases and Ward appeals dismissed. Hollins, Tichband, Bull and McKenna appeals allowed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

Deutsche Morgan Grenfell Group plc v Inland Revenue Commissioners and another

[2003] EWHC 1866 (Ch)

CHANCERY DIVISION

PARK J

12, 13, 14, 15 MAY, 18 JULY 2003

Mistake – Mistake of law – Money paid under mistake of law – Restitution – Limitation of action – Claimant company United Kingdom subsidiary of German parent – Claimant unable to utilise group income election to avoid paying advance corporation tax on dividends paid to parent as election only available if both subsidiary and parent resident in United Kingdom – European Court of Justice finding that such treatment contrary to Community law – Claimant commencing action for restitution – Whether action time-barred – Whether payments of advance corporation tax made under mistake of law – Whether English law recognising claim in restitution to recover taxes paid under mistake of law – Limitation Act 1980, s 32(1)(c).

The claimant company was the United Kingdom subsidiary of a German company. Advance corporation tax was payable on the dividends it paid to its German parent because, at the relevant time, s 247(1)[a] of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 provided that a group income election, which enabled dividends to be paid without the paying subsidiary having to pay advance corporation tax to the Revenue, could only be made if the subsidiary and its parent were both resident in the United Kingdom. In July 1995, the claimant became aware that s 247 was being challenged by another company and that the basis of the challenge was that the provision was unlawful because it contravened the EC Treaty. By a judgment given on 8 March 2001, the Court of Justice of the European Communities held that the denial of the right of election to holding companies established in member states other than the United Kingdom and their United Kingdom subsidiaries was contrary to Community law. The court further held that, in respect of payments of advance corporation tax which had already been made, Community law conferred a right of compensation or restitution. The claimant had later been able to set off the advance corporation tax it had paid against its liability to mainstream corporation tax, but the effect of having had to pay the advance corporation tax was that it had suffered a disadvantage of timing. On 13 October 2000, the claimant commenced an action against the Revenue seeking compensation or restitution in respect of that timing disadvantage. The Revenue considered that the claim was time-barred under ss 2 or 5 of the Limitation Act 1980 in respect of three payments of advance corporation tax made in October 1993, February 1995 and January 1996 as they had been paid more than six years before the action was commenced. The claimant submitted that its action in respect of those three payments of advance corporation tax was not time-barred because it had made the payments under a mistake of law, it did not discover the mistake until the decision of the European Court of Justice was given on 8 March 2001 and that the limitation period in respect of its action for compensation or restitution accordingly began to run from the date of that discovery, pursuant to s 32(1)(c)[b] of the 1980 Act which provided that where an action was for relief from the consequences of a mistake, the limitation period did not begin to run until the claimant had discovered his mistake or could with reasonable diligence have discovered it. The Revenue contended that a cause of action for the restitution of tax payments made under a mistake of law did not exist.

a Section 247, so far as material, is set out at [2], below

Held – (1) English law recognised a claim in restitution to recover money paid under a mistake of law. It made no difference that the money was mistakenly paid in taxes (see [15], [17], [18], below); Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Lincoln City Council [1998] 4 All ER 513 applied, dicta of Lord Goff of Chieveley at 537–538 considered.

(2) At the times of the first two advance corporation tax payments, the claimant did not know that it was entitled to make a group income election despite the express provision in s 247 that it was not. If it had known the true state of the law, the elections would have been made, and the dividends would have been paid under them as group income, not attracting liability on the claimant's part to pay advance corporation tax. Therefore, the advance corporation tax which the claimant in fact paid was paid under a mistake of law: if the mistake had not existed the advance corporation tax would not have been paid. It could not be said that the claimant had discovered that the first two payments had been made under a mistake of law when, in July 1995, it had found out about the challenge to the United Kingdom provision relating to group income elections, nor that it had known that the third payment in January 1996 was made under a mistake of law. Accordingly, the claimant did not discover the mistake until the decision of the European Court of Justice was given on 8 March 2001 and a limitation defence under the 1980 Act therefore did not apply. The limitation period only started to run against the claimant on the release of the Court of Justice's decision, by which time it had already commenced its claim for relief. The claim accordingly succeeded (see [25], [26], [29]–[32], [42] below).

Notes

For postponement of limitation period for relief from consequences of mistake, see 28 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn, reissue) para 1129.

Advance corporation tax was abolished by s 31 of the Finance Act 1998 with effect from 6 April 1999.

For the Limitation Act 1980, s 32(1)(c), see 24 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (1998 reissue) 733.

Cases referred to in judgment

Eagerpath Ltd v Edwards (Inspector of Taxes) [2001] STC 26, CA.

Hazell v Hammersmith and Fulham London BC [1991] 1 All ER 545, [1992] 2 AC 1, [1991] 2 WLR 372, HL.

Hoechst UK Ltd v IRC [2003] EWHC 1002 (Ch), [2003] All ER (D) 198 (Apr).

Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Lincoln City Council [1998] 4 All ER 513, [1999] 2 AC 349, [1998] 3 WLR 1095, HL.

b Section 32, so far as material, is set out at [8], below

Metallgesellschaft Ltd v IRC, Hoechst AG v IRC Joined cases C-397/98 and C-410/98 [2001] All ER (EC) 496, [2001] Ch 620, ECJ.
Pirelli Cable Holding NV v IRC [2003] EWHC 32 (Ch), [2003] STC 250.
Willis Faber Enthoven (Pty) Ltd v Receiver of Revenue (1992) (4) SA 202, SA SC.
Woolwich Building Society v IRC (No 2) [1992] 3 All ER 737, [1993] AC 70, [1992] 3 WLR 366, HL.

Cases referred to in skeleton arguments

Air Canada v British Columbia (1989) 59 DLR (4th) 161, Can SC.
Alliance and Leicester plc v Pellys [1999] All ER (D) 765 (Jul).
Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato v SpA San Giorgio Case 199/82 [1983] ECR 3595, ECJ.
Barclays Bank Ltd v W J Simms Son & Cooke (Southern) Ltd [1979] 3 All ER 522, [1980] QB 677, [1980] 2 WLR 218.
Biggs v Somerset CC [1996] 2 All ER 734, CA.
Cooke v Gill (1873) LR 8 CP 107.
EC Commission v France Case C-270/83 [1986] ECR 273, ECJ.
Factortame Ltd v Secretary of State for Transport (No 2) Case C-213/89 [1991] 1 All ER 70, [1991] 1 AC 603, [1990] 3 WLR 818, [1990] ECR I-2433, ECJ and HL.
First Roodhill Leasing Ltd v Gillingham Operating Co Ltd [2001] All ER (D) 65 (Jul).
Francovich v Italy Joined cases C-6/90 and C-9/90 [1991] ECR I-5357, ECJ.
Haahr Petroleum Ltd v Abenra Havn Case C-90/94 [1997] ECR I-4085, ECJ.
Letang v Cooper [1964] 2 All ER 929, [1965] 1 QB 232, [1964] 3 WLR 573, CA.
Lipkin Gorman (a firm) v Karpnale Ltd [1992] 4 All ER 512, [1991] 2 AC 548, [1991] 3 WLR 10, HL.
Marks and Spencer plc v Customs and Excise Comrs Case C-62/00 [2002] STC 1036, [2003] QB 866, [2003] 2 WLR 665, ECJ.
Nurdin & Peacock plc v D B Ramsden & Co Ltd [1999] 1 WLR 1249, [1999] 1 All ER 941.
Palmisani v Instituto Nazionale della Previdenza Social (INPS) Case C-261/95 [1997] ECR I-4025, ECJ.
Paragon Finance plc v D B Thakerar & Co (a firm) [1999] 1 All ER 400, CA.
Phillips-Higgins v Harper [1954] 1 All ER 116, [1954] 1 QB 411, [1954] 2 WLR 117; affd [1954] 2 All ER 51, [1954] 2 WLR 782, CA.
President of India v La Pintada Cia Navegacion SA [1984] 2 All ER 773, [1985] AC 104, [1984] 3 WLR 10, HL.
R v Secretary of State for Transport, ex p Factortame Ltd (No 7) [2001] 1 WLR 942.
Savings and Investment Bank Ltd v Fincken [2001] EWCA Civ 1639, [2001] All ER (D) 70 (Nov), CA.
Shields v E Coomes (Holdings) Ltd [1979] 1 All ER 456, [1978] 1 WLR 1408, CA.
Welsh Development Agency v Redpath Dorman Long Ltd [1994] 4 All ER 10, [1994] 1 WLR 1409, CA.
Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington London BC [1994] 4 All ER 890, [1994] 1 WLR 938, CA; rvsd [1996] AC 669, [1996] 2 All ER 961, [1996] 2 WLR 802, HL.

Claim

Deutsche Morgan Grenfell Group plc (DMG) claimed compensation or restitution from the defendants, the Inland Revenue and the Attorney General, in respect of payments of advance corporation tax on the ground that those payments were made pursuant to a provision of United Kingdom law which, in March 2001, had been declared to be contrary to Community law by the Court of Justice of the European Communities. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Laurence Rabinowitz QC and Francis Fitzpatrick (instructed by Slaughter & May) for DMG.

Ian Glick QC and Bruce Carr (instructed by the Solicitor of Inland Revenue) for the Revenue.

Cur adv vult

18 July. The following judgment was delivered.

PARK J.

[1] ABBREVIATIONS, DRAMATIS PERSONAE, GLOSSARY, ETC

| | |
|---|---|
| ACT | Advance corporation tax. |
| CJEC | The Court of Justice of the European Communities. |
| DBAG | Deutsche Bank AG, a German company and the parent company, direct or indirect, of DBI and DMG. |
| DBI | DB Investments (GB) Ltd. |
| DMG | Deutsche Morgan Grenfell Group plc, the claimant company. |
| ICTA | The Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 in its form before amendments which took effect in 1999. |
| Kleinwort Benson | The House of Lords decision in Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Lincoln City Council [1998] 4 All ER 513, [1999] 2 AC 349. |
| Metallgesellschaft/Hoechst | The combined cases in the CJEC of Metallgesellschaft Ltd v IRC, Hoechst AG v IRC Joined cases C-397/98 and C-410/98 [2001] All ER (EC) 496, [2001] Ch 620. The judgment of the CJEC was delivered on 8 March 2001. |
| MCT | Mainstream corporation tax, as to which see [6], below. |
| Pirelli case, the | Pirelli Cable Holding NV v IRC [2003] EWHC 32 (Ch), [2003] STC 250. |

OVERVIEW

[2] At the times relevant for this case United Kingdom tax law provided that, where subsidiary companies paid dividends to their parents, 'group income' elections could be made which enabled the dividends to be paid without the paying subsidiary having to pay ACT to the United Kingdom Revenue. Until the decision of the CJEC in Metallgesellschaft/Hoechst such elections could be made only between United Kingdom resident companies: s 247(1) of ICTA included the words 'both being bodies corporate resident in the United Kingdom'. However, in Metallgesellschaft/Hoechst the CJEC held that it was contrary to art 52 of the EC Treaty (now art 43 EC) for United Kingdom law to deny the right to make group income elections where the parent company was resident in a member state other than the United Kingdom. The CJEC also held that, as respects payments of ACT which had already been made in the past, Community law conferred a right of compensation or restitution which the aggrieved companies were entitled to pursue in the United Kingdom courts.

[3] Many United Kingdom subsidiaries of member state parents, including DMG, a subsidiary of a German parent, commenced actions seeking compensation or restitution accordingly. The actions are now all organised within a group litigation order (as to which see CPR 19.11–19.15), and a series of test cases is being heard to determine various questions of principle to which they, or some of them, give rise. The first such case was the Pirelli case, which concerned an issue which arose where the parent company was resident in a member state which had a particular kind of double taxation agreement with the United Kingdom. The second such case is this one, in which the test claimant is DMG.

[4] The special feature of this case, and of others within the group litigation order for which this is the test case, is that questions of limitation of actions arise: some of the payments of ACT which DMG made to the United Kingdom Revenue were made more than six years before DMG commenced its action claiming compensation or restitution. The Revenue say that DMG's claims in respect of those ACT payments are barred by the normal six years' time limit laid down by s 2 of the Limitation Act 1980. DMG argues that it can circumvent this effect of the 1980 Act by a combination of two principles of law: first, that English law recognises an action for restitution of money paid under a mistake of law (see the decision of the House of Lords in the Kleinwort Benson case); second, that under s 32(1)(c) of the 1980 Act, the limitation period where an action is brought for relief from the consequences of a mistake begins to run only when the claimant discovered the mistake or could with reasonable diligence have discovered it.

DMG has pleaded its case in ways which include a claim for restitution on the ground that it made the payments of ACT under a mistake of law. It says that it did not discover the mistake until the decision of the CJEC in Metallgesellschaft/Hoechst. That decision was given on 8 March 2001, by which date DMG had already commenced its action. Alternatively, DMG says that the earliest time at which it could be said to have discovered its mistake was when the Advocate General delivered his opinion in Metallgesellschaft/Hoechst. That was on 12 September 2000, well within six years before DMG commenced its action. DMG argues that therefore it is not time-barred from recovering the relief which it claims, notwithstanding that the ACT payments (or some of them) were made more than six years before the action was commenced.

[5] It seems to me that three principal questions arise. (i) Does a claim for restitution of a payment made under a mistake of law apply in the case of a payment of tax to a Revenue authority? In my view the answer is, Yes. (ii) Did DMG make the relevant payments of ACT under a mistake of law so as to be entitled to claim restitution in accordance with the principles laid down by the House of Lords in Kleinwort Benson? In my view the answer is again, Yes. (iii) Under s 32(1)(c) of the 1980 Act, when did the limitation period begin to run? Did it begin to run only at the time of the CJEC's decision in Metallgesellschaft/Hoechst (or possibly at the time of the Advocate General's opinion)? Or did it begin to run at the earlier time in mid-1995 when DMG first learned that the Hoechst group of companies was arguing that the rule that only United Kingdom resident companies could make group income elections was contrary to Community law? In my opinion the period began to run only at the time of the CJEC's decision. It follows that DMG's claims succeed.

THE RELEVANT UNITED KINGDOM TAX LAW

[6] At the times with which this case is concerned the general rule of United Kingdom tax law was that, if a company resident in the United Kingdom paid a dividend, it had to pay ACT to the Revenue (see ICTA, s 14). The rate of ACT varied over the years. At the times with which the present case is concerned it was normally 25% of the dividend. In the usual case the amount so paid could be set off against the company's normal liability to pay corporation tax on its profits, sometimes referred to as mainstream corporation tax or (as in this judgment) MCT. Where the ACT was so set off the payment of it did not cause the company to suffer an absolute loss of the money, because the set-off reduced on a pound for pound basis a later payment of MCT which the company would otherwise have had to make anyway. However, it did have the effect that the company had to pay some of its corporation tax bill early, so the ACT meant that the company suffered a timing disadvantage and the United Kingdom Revenue received a corresponding timing advantage. (There could be cases where a subsidiary had paid ACT and could not set it off against MCT. In such cases the ACT payment did represent an absolute loss of the money and not just a timing disadvantage. However, in the case of DMG all the relevant ACT payments were eventually set off against MCT, so that the disadvantage for which DMG seeks relief is a timing disadvantage only.)

[7] There was an exception to the rule that a company which paid a dividend had to pay ACT. If it was a subsidiary of a United Kingdom holding company the two companies could jointly make a group income election under s 247 of ICTA. The effect was that the subsidiary did not have to pay the ACT after all. It did still have to pay its full MCT when the due date came round, but the group income election removed the timing disadvantage. However, if the dividend-paying company was a subsidiary of a non-United Kingdom holding company the two companies could not make a group income election, so the subsidiary had to pay ACT and suffer the timing disadvantage, in circumstances where a subsidiary of a United Kingdom holding company, if it and its parent had made a group income election, did not. That was the feature of United Kingdom law which, in Metallgesellschaft/Hoechst, the CJEC held to have been contrary to EC law and also to entitle the companies which had suffered from it to claim compensation or restitution. Where, as in this case and as in the cases of the Metallgesellschaft and the Hoechst groups, the ACT had been set off against MCT, the compensation or restitution would be an amount calculated by reference to interest over the period from the payment of the ACT until it was set off against MCT.

THE LIMITATION ACT 1980

[8] Sections 2 and 5 of this Act provide that an action founded on tort (see s 2) or on simple contract (see s 5) may not be brought after the expiration of six years from the date when the cause of action accrued. The parties agree that a claim for compensation or restitution of the nature which the CJEC said in Metallgesellschaft/Hoechst should be available would almost certainly be a claim in tort or contract and subject to a six years' time limit. An important issue is: when does the six years' period start to run. The parties also agree that, if ss 2 or 5 applies and the period runs only from the date when the cause of action accrued, some of DMG's causes of action accrued more than six years before it brought its action and would therefore be time-barred. However s 32 opens the possibility that, if one of the detailed circumstances described in the section exists, the limitation period, though it is still six years, may commence to run at a date later than the date when the cause of action accrued. So far as relevant the section provides as follows:

> 'Postponement of limitation period in case of fraud, concealment or mistake
>
> (1) ... where in the case of any action for which a period of limitation is prescribed by this Act, either—(a) ... or (b) ... or (c) the action is for relief from the consequences of a mistake; the period of limitation shall not begin to run until the plaintiff has discovered the ... mistake ... or could with reasonable diligence have discovered it.'

THE FACTS

[9] At the times when the ACT payments relevant to this case were made the group structure was a little more complicated than a parent company with a 100% direct subsidiary, but nothing turns on the extra complications. The German holding company was DBAG. It was not the simple 100% owner of DMG. Instead it owned 14% of the shares in DMG directly. It owned all of the shares in DBI, an interposed United Kingdom holding company, and DBI owned the other 86% of the shares in DMG. I mention for completeness that in November 1997 the structure was simplified and DBI, the 100% direct subsidiary of DBAG, became the 100% (as opposed to merely the 86%) direct owner of DMG. However, the dividends and the associated ACT payments which are relevant to this case were paid before November 1997, so it is the earlier structure which is in point.

[10] According to the terms of ICTA, s 247, group income elections could not have been made between DMG and DBAG or between DBI and DBAG, because DBAG was not a company resident in the United Kingdom. A group income election could have been made between DMG and DBI (because both companies were resident in the United Kingdom), but no such election was made. The reason was that, although an election would have enabled dividends to flow from DMG to DBI without ACT, onward dividends from DBI to DBAG would have had to be paid subject to a liability on the part of DBI to pay ACT: or at least that was how the matter appeared on the terms of the domestic United Kingdom legislation. In the circumstances DMG paid

ACT by reference to all its dividends—the 86% of them paid to DBI as well as the 14% of them paid to DBAG—and DBI did not pay ACT when it paid onward dividends to DBAG. DBI did not have to pay ACT on those onward dividends because of the rules about franked investment income in ICTA, ss 238 and 241.

[11] DMG has pleaded in this case, and the Revenue admit, that, if s 247 had permitted group income elections to be made between a United Kingdom subsidiary and a parent company in another member state, elections would have been made between DMG and DBI, between DMG and DBAG, and between DBI and DBAG. The corollary is that, because s 247 appeared clearly not to permit group income elections to which a parent company in another member state was a party, the companies did not attempt to make group income elections. There is no doubt that, if they had attempted to make them, the Revenue would have rejected the elections and pointed to the clear terms of the United Kingdom statute in justification of the rejection.

[12] Over the years several dividends flowed through from DMG to DBAG, either directly as to 14% of them or through DBI as to 86% of them. In the case of all of them DMG paid ACT. As respects some of the ACT payments no issue arises in the present case (because no limitation arguments arise), but as respects three dividends and associated ACT payments there are limitation issues in dispute which I must decide. Before I give the dates of the dividends and ACT payments it is useful to record that DMG issued its claim form, commencing the present action, on 13 October 2000, served its particulars of claim on 9 February 2001, and amended the particulars so as to give specific details of the ACT payments which this case is about on other dates. One amendment, giving particulars of an ACT payment made in 1993, was made on 16 August 2001. Another amendment, giving particulars of two ACT payments made in 1995 and 1996 was made on a date which must be taken to have been 19 August 2002. The periods which ran for six years up to those dates began on 14 October 1994, 10 February 1995, 17 August 1995, and 20 August 1996.

[13] The three ACT payments which are relevant for this judgment were made on 14 October 1993, 15 February 1995, and 14 January 1996. At a later point I shall go into more detail on these matters, but it will be apparent from the dates which I have just given that a limitation issue certainly arises as respects the ACT paid on 14 October 1993, and at least might arise also as respects the ACT paid on 15 February 1995 and on 14 January 1996. If the s 2 limitation period (as opposed to the s 32 limitation period) started to run on the date of payment of the ACT, six years from the payment of the ACT on 14 October 1993 had expired before DMG had even issued its claim form. The position is more complicated as regards the two subsequent payments of ACT (on 15 February 1995 and 14 January 1996), because it gets involved with questions of whether what mattered was the service of the particulars of claim or rather the making of the amendments to the particulars of claim. I will explain about that in a later section of this judgment.

DOES ENGLISH LAW RECOGNISE A CLAIM IN RESTITUTION TO RECOVER TAXES PAID UNDER A MISTAKE OF LAW?

[14] This question subdivides into two questions. The first is whether English law recognises a claim in restitution to recover money paid under a mistake of law. If the answer to the first question is, Yes, the second question arises: does it make any difference if the money paid was paid to a Revenue authority in discharge of what was, or at least was thought to be, a liability for taxes?

[15] The answer to the first question is now clear, as a result of the decision of the House of Lords in Kleinwort Benson. English law does recognise a claim in restitution to recover money paid under a mistake of law. The Kleinwort Benson case is so celebrated that it would be excessive for me to describe it in any detail. It is sufficient to say that a bank (Kleinwort Benson) had made payments to a local authority (Lincoln in the particular case dealt with by their Lordships) under swap agreements which the bank thought, in common with virtually everybody who had a view on the point at the time, were legally enforceable. An intervening decision of the House of Lords (Hazell v Hammersmith and Fulham London BC [1991] 1 All ER 545, [1992] 2 AC 1) showed that the bank and virtually everybody else were mistaken about the law: the swap agreements were not legally enforceable after all. Kleinwort Benson sued to recover the payments which it had made. It had limitation problems, but it sought to overcome them by relying on a right to recover payments made under a mistake of law and also by relying on s 32 of the 1980 Act.

[16] The majority in the House of Lords (Lord Goff of Chieveley, Lord Hoffmann and Lord Hope of Craighead) held that Kleinwort Benson was entitled to succeed. Under English law money paid under a mistake of law was recoverable; earlier cases to the contrary were overruled. And s 32(1)(c) did operate to postpone the start of the six years' limitation period until the time when the mistake of law was discovered or discoverable with reasonable diligence. The majority also took the view that Kleinwort Benson had indeed made the payments to Lincoln under a mistake. That was one respect in which the minority differed. Lord Browne-Wilkinson and Lord Lloyd of Berwick considered that, because the bank had made the payments in accordance with what it and everyone else had believed to be the law at the time, it had not made them under a mistake. The contrary view of the majority on that issue is summarised in the following passage from the speech of Lord Goff ([1998] 4 All ER 513 at 536, [1999] 2 AC 349 at 379):

> 'To me, it is plain that the money was indeed paid over under a mistake, the mistake being a mistake of law. The payer believed, when he paid the money, that he was bound in law to pay it. He is now told that, on the law as held to be applicable at the date of the payment, he was not bound to pay it. Plainly, therefore, he paid the money under a mistake of law, and accordingly, subject to any applicable defences, he is entitled to recover it.'

That passage does conclude with a suggestion that there might be applicable defences, but Lord Goff went on to consider whether there indeed were any, and concluded that there were not, at least so far as the instant case was concerned. He did think it possible that there ought to be some defences, but he did not consider that the House of Lords could introduce them as a matter of case law.

[17] I will consider later how the foregoing aspects of the House of Lords' decision in Kleinwort Benson apply to the facts of the present case. For the moment I wish to address the second question which I identified in [14], above: does it make any difference if the money was paid to a Revenue authority in discharge of what was, or at least was thought to be, a liability for taxes? In principle it is hard to see why that should make any difference, but the question must be considered with some care because of three paragraphs in Lord Goff's speech ([1998] 4 All ER 513 at 537–538, [1999] 2 AC 349 [1999] 2 AC 349 at 381–382 in a speech which extends in [1998] 4 All ER 513 from 523–544 and in [1999] 2 AC 349 from 365 to 389). I believe that I ought to quote them in full:

> 'At this point it is, in my opinion, appropriate to draw a distinction between, on the one hand, payments of taxes and other similar charges and, on the other hand, payments made under ordinary private transactions. The former category of cases was considered by your Lordships' House in Woolwich Building Society v IRC (No 2) [1992] 3 All ER 737, [1993] AC 70, in which it was held that at common law taxes exacted ultra vires were recoverable as of right, without the need to invoke a mistake of law by the payer. Moreover reference was made, in the course of the hearing, to the various statutory provisions (usefully summarised in the Law Commission's Consultation Paper (Law Com no 120) at pp 74–84) which regulate the repayment of overpaid tax. For present purposes it is of interest that, in the case of some taxes (including income and corporation tax), no relief is given "in respect of an error or mistake as to the basis on which the liability ... ought to have been computed where the return was in fact made on the basis of or in accordance with the practice generally prevailing at the time when the return was made": see the proviso to s 33(2) of the Taxes Management Act 1970.
>
> Two observations may be made about the present situation. (I of course have it in mind that this is the subject of proposals for legislative reform contained in the Law Commission's Report Restitution: mistakes of law and ultra vires public authority receipts and payments (Law Com no 227) (1994), but your Lordships are concerned with the law as it stands at present.) The first observation is that, in our law of restitution, we now find two separate and distinct regimes in respect of the repayment of money paid under a mistake of law. These are (1) cases concerned with repayment of taxes and other similar charges which, when exacted ultra vires, are recoverable as of right at common law on the principle in the Woolwich case, and otherwise are the subject of statutory regimes regulating recovery; and (2) other cases, which may broadly be described as concerned with repayment of money paid under private transactions, and which are governed by the common law. The second observation is that, in cases concerned with overpaid taxes, a case can be made in favour of a principle that payments made in accordance with a prevailing practice, or indeed under a settled understanding of the law, should be irrecoverable. If such a situation should arise with regard to overpayment of tax, it is possible that a large number of taxpayers may be affected; there is an element of public interest which may militate against repayment of tax paid in such circumstances; and, since ex hypothesi all citizens will have been treated alike, exclusion of recovery on public policy grounds may be more readily justifiable.

> In the present case, however, we are concerned with payments made under private law transactions. It so happens that a significant number of payments were in fact made under interest rate swap agreements with local authorities before it was appreciated that they were void; but the number is by no means as great as might conceivably occur in the case of taxes overpaid in accordance with a prevailing practice, or under a settled understanding of the law. Moreover the element of public interest is lacking. In cases such as these I find it difficult to understand why the payer should not be entitled to recover the money paid by him under a mistake of law, even if everybody concerned thought at the time that interest rate swap agreements with local authorities were valid.'

[18] Is Lord Goff saying in those paragraphs that the cause of action for restitution of money paid under a mistake of law, the existence of which he, Lord Hoffmann and Lord Hope are affirming, does not apply to money mistakenly paid in taxes? In my judgment the answer is that he is not. In support of my view I make the following points. (i) There is certainly no principle that, for public policy reasons or for other reasons, there can never be restitutionary claims for recovery of taxes wrongly paid. See Woolwich Building Society v IRC (No 2) [1992] 3 All ER 737, [1993] AC 70, recognising the existence of a restitutionary claim in respect of tax paid under protest in response to what turned out to have been an unlawful statutory demand. (ii) If Lord Goff intended to say that, although money paid under a mistake of law was generally recoverable, money paid in taxes under a mistake of tax law was not, he would not have said it at the point in his speech where the three paragraphs which I have quoted appear. The general structure of the speech was to begin with an analysis of whether a cause of action for restitution of payments made under a mistake of law existed at all, and then, having concluded that it did, to go on to consider whether there were any defences to such a cause of action which might apply in particular cases. If His Lordship wished to say that a cause of action for payments of taxes made under a mistake of law did not exist he would surely have dealt with the point in the first part of his speech. However, the paragraphs which I have quoted appear in the second part of the speech, and in particular in a section where Lord Goff is considering whether the House of Lords should introduce a 'settled law defence' along the lines of a proposal which had been made by the Law Commission. The Commission had considered that legislation would be necessary to create a settled law defence, and in a draft Bill had included a provision expressed as follows (Law Com no 227 p 196 (cl 3(1))):

> 'An act done in accordance with a settled view of the law shall not be regarded as founding a mistake claim by reason only that a subsequent decision of a court or tribunal departs from that view.'

(iii) In the context I do not believe that Lord Goff was saying that there could never be a restitutionary claim for tax paid by mistake. Rather he was observing that, although there could be such a claim, the courts might at some future time have to consider whether there was also a settled law defence. In the Kleinwort Benson case itself he went on to decide that (at common law, and leaving out of account possible future legislative changes) there was no such defence where the mistaken payments had been made under private law. He did not wish to be understood as deciding the same thing where the payments were tax payments. However, he was not deciding that there was a settled law defence in the case of tax payments. He was leaving the matter open. (iv) In the present case the submission put to me by Mr Glick QC on behalf of the Revenue was that a cause of action for the restitution of tax payments made under a mistake of law did not exist at all. He expressly said that, if I considered that the cause of action did exist, he did not invite me to decide at High Court level that a settled law defence might be available. He reserved the right to advance such an argument in a higher court, and I gave permission for an amendment to the Revenue's defence which would lay the basis for such an argument if the Revenue wish to advance it hereafter. (v) In the earlier part of Lord Goff's speech, where he discussed whether there should be a cause of action in restitution for money paid under a mistake of law, he reviewed a number of authorities in other jurisdictions which had held that such a cause of action did exist. Among them was the South African case of Willis Faber Enthoven (Pty) Ltd v Receiver of Revenue (1992) (4) SA 202. That was a tax case in which a restitutionary claim for the recovery of tax paid under a mistake of law succeeded. The impression which I glean from the speech is that Lord Goff approved of the Willis Faber decision and saw no objection to a similar result forming part of United Kingdom law. (vi) In none of the other speeches in the House of Lords, either of the majority or of the minority, is there any suggestion that there could be a difference between payments of tax made under a mistake of law and payments of different kinds made under a mistake of law.

[19] There is one last point to make on this aspect of the case. I ought to mention the judgment of Brooke LJ in Eagerpath Ltd v Edwards (Inspector of Taxes) [2001] STC 26. The case was about a technical issue of tax appeal machinery involving an 'error or mistake claim' under s 33 of the Taxes Management Act 1970. However, there are some observations of Brooke LJ which assume that a result of the Kleinwort Benson decision in the House of Lords is that a taxpayer who has paid too much tax because of a mistake of law has a cause of action at common law entitling him to recover the overpayment. However, the observations were clearly obiter. I am informed that the issue of whether the Kleinwort Benson decision extended to tax payments had not been raised in argument. I think it is unlikely that Brooke LJ considered the three paragraphs from Lord Goff's speech which I have quoted. In the circumstances I do not attach much weight to his observations, but they are at least a tentative opinion of a Court of Appeal judge that tax payments made by mistake can be recovered.

DID DMG MAKE ITS PAYMENTS OF ACT UNDER A MISTAKE OF LAW?

[20] In my opinion the answer is, Yes. However, the question is not entirely straightforward. In my view it is more complicated than the equivalent question which arose in the Kleinwort Benson case, and it requires careful analysis. In that case Lord Goff said, in a passage which I have already quoted (see [16], above):

> 'The payer believed, when he paid the money, that he was bound in law to pay it. He is now told that, on the law as held to be applicable at the date of the payment, he was not bound to pay it.'

In this case it cannot be put as simply as that. There are two different reasons why that is so.

[21] The first reason is this. The relevant United Kingdom tax provisions did not take the simple form of providing that, if a subsidiary paid a dividend to another company which was in the same group, it did not have to pay ACT. They provided: (1) that if the companies were in a group relationship, they could make a group income election; (2) that if there was a group income election in force at the time of payment of a dividend, ACT was not payable (unless the companies specifically gave notice to the contrary as regards a particular dividend); (3) that a group income election did not take effect for three months or, if earlier, until the inspector notified the companies that he accepted it; and (4) that an election would be of no effect if, in those three months, the inspector notified the companies concerned that he was not satisfied that it was validly made. See generally ICTA, ss 247(2), (3), 248(2). On the last point, if the inspector gave notice that he was not satisfied that an election was validly made the companies could appeal, but unless and until the appeal was determined in the companies' favour, there was no group income election in force. It followed that as a matter of law ACT was properly payable in respect of dividends paid in the meantime, and even a successful appeal against the refusal of a group income election would not change that position. The dividends paid while the appeal was pending continued to give rise to ACT liabilities, and the success of the appeal would only be relevant to future dividends paid after the appeal decision. See as to this observations of the CJEC in para 104 of its judgment in Metallgesellschaft/Hoechst.

[22] The point which emerges from the foregoing is that, on a close analysis, the mistake of law which DMG made was not that it paid ACT which was not payable: the ACT was as a matter of law payable when DMG paid it, and the decision of the CJEC in Metallgesellschaft/Hoechst does not mean that it was not payable. Rather the mistake of law which DMG made was that it did not realise that it and DBI could have made group income elections with DBAG, which would have had the effect of preventing the ACT from being payable.

[23] The second reason why this case is not exactly the same as one covered by the passage from Lord Goff's speech in Kleinwort Benson is this. His Lordship describes a situation where: 'The payer believed, when he paid the money, that he was bound in law to pay it.' In the present case it is not as clear cut as that, at least as regards the last of the three ACT payments to which the case relates. The special feature which affects this case is that Hoechst commenced its action against the Revenue in April 1995, and DMG, through its Head of Taxation Mr Thomason, knew about it at the latest by early July 1995. I will consider the implications of this in subsequent paragraphs, but I record now that Mr Glick on behalf of the Revenue seeks to make much of it. In the simplest form his argument is that, if DMG paid ACT at a time when it knew that the United Kingdom statute law was being challenged as contrary to Community law, it cannot say that it paid the ACT under a mistake. The argument is more complicated as regards the first and second ACT payments, both of which were paid before Hoechst commenced its challenge. However, it will be recalled that under s 32(1) of the 1980 Act the limitation period begins to run when the claimant discovers his mistake (or could with reasonable diligence have discovered it). Mr Glick argues that, even if DMG was suffering from a mistake when it made the first two ACT payments, it discovered its mistake by July 1995 when its Head of Taxation learned of the argument which Hoechst was putting forward.

[24] In my view, however, DMG did pay the ACT, including the third amount of ACT paid on 14 January 1996, under a mistake of law. I do not accept Mr Glick's submissions about the effect of DMG's knowing of Hoechst's argument from mid-1995 onwards. In this respect I do not think that my reasoning precisely follows the arguments of counsel. To some extent the arguments explored the question of what degree of doubt there had to be about a proposition before the person concerned can be said to be suffering from a mistake or not. As my reasons, explained in the ensuing paragraphs, will show, I do not see the issue in quite that way.

[25] At the times of the first and second dividends and of the two ACT payments to which they gave rise DMG knew nothing about the argument that, by virtue of EC law, it and DBI were entitled to make group income elections with DBAG despite the express provision in ICTA, s 247 that they were not. Because of the CJEC decision in Metallgesellschaft/Hoechst DMG knows now that the true state of the law then was that the companies were entitled to make group income elections; the Revenue knows that now as well; indeed we all do. But we did not know that then. If the true state of the law had been known at the time the companies would have made elections and DMG's dividends would have been paid under them as group income, not attracting a liability on DMG's part to pay ACT. At this stage in the analysis it must be assumed that, if the true state of the law had been understood, both DMG and the Revenue would have understood it. In other words we know now that DMG, DBI and DBAG were mistaken in thinking that DMG and DBI could not make group income elections with DBAG; if they had not been mistaken in that respect they would have made elections; if they had made elections all of the DMG dividends which in fact attracted ACT would not have attracted ACT. Therefore the ACT which DMG in fact paid was paid under a mistake of law: if the mistake had not existed the ACT would not have been paid. It is, however, important to appreciate that the mistake was not directly a mistake about whether there was a liability to pay ACT. It was directly a mistake about whether group income elections could be made. The liabilities to pay ACT arose as secondary consequences of that primary mistake.

[26] I move on now to consider whether it makes any difference that by July 1995 DMG knew that Hoechst was challenging the provision in s 247 that, for a group income election to be possible, both companies had to be resident in the United Kingdom, and that the basis of the challenge was that the provision was unlawful because it contravened articles of the EC Treaty. I will deal first with the third ACT payment of just under £3·5m, which was paid by DMG on 14 January 1996. The payment related to two dividends, both paid on 17 July 1995: one paid direct to DBAG on its 14% shareholding, and the other paid to DBI on its 86% shareholding. The evidence shows that the DBAG group, including DMG, knew about the Hoechst argument before 17 July 1995, but made no attempt to get group income elections in place. So in the context of the third ACT payment the question is whether, given that DMG knew about the argument, DMG can still say that it paid the ACT under a mistake. In relation to the first and second payments the detailed facts are different: the ACT payments were made in October 1993 and February 1995 in respect of dividends paid in July 1993 and July 1994: at none of those times did DMG know about the Hoechst argument. For those ACT payments the question is: if DMG made the payments under a mistake of law (which in my opinion it did), did it discover the mistake in 1995 when it discovered about Hoechst's argument?

[27] Before I move on I wish to record the evidence which Mr Thomason (the Head of Taxation at DMG) gave about his state of mind when he learned of the Hoechst argument. In his witness statement he said this:

> 'At all times prior to the determination of the European Court in the Hoechst case, I believed that the United Kingdom statute denying the ability to make a group income election was the law and I was bound to act in accordance with this law ... It did not occur to me that I could ignore the law as it stood for the simple reason that the law is the law. Just because another taxpayer challenged the law that did not mean that I could or should ignore it.'

Mr Thomason was cross-examined, but I do not believe that the foregoing passage was challenged or affected by his answers on other points. He added the general point (obvious but plainly relevant) that it was not clear in 1995 what would be the outcome of the Hoechst case (or, as it turned out, of the Metallgesellschaft/Hoechst conjoined cases). He also said that there were more arguments being advanced by Hoechst in 1995 than the one which eventually succeeded in the CJEC. For example, relief was being claimed by Hoechst AG, the German parent company, as well as by the United Kingdom subsidiary which had paid the dividends and the associated ACT. In addition arguments were being advanced in reliance, not on the EC Treaty, but on the non-discrimination article in the double taxation agreement between the United Kingdom and Germany.

[28] I now proceed with my own analysis of the position. It is obvious that, when DMG learned of the argument which Hoechst was advancing, it had come to know something—to discover something—which it had not known before. That is true, but DMG did not come to know, or to discover, that it and DBI could make group income elections with DBAG after all. All that it discovered was that another company was arguing that it could make a group income election with its German parent company in comparable circumstances, and that the Revenue were disputing the argument. I examine the position as matters actually stood before DMG paid the dividend which it was planning to pay and did pay in July 1995. If at that time DMG and DBI had submitted group income elections with DBAG, it is in my opinion certain that the inspector would have rejected the elections within the three-month period which was available to him under s 248(2). Short of DMG abandoning the intention to pay dividends altogether (which I assume would have been unacceptable to the group as a whole) DMG would have had to pay the ACT. Further, such ACT would have been correctly paid even if DMG had appealed against the rejection of the elections and a later decision (like the actual decision in Metallgesellschaft/Hoechst) showed that the inspector ought to have accepted them. (See as to this [21] and [22], above.)

[29] Concentrating for the moment on the first and second ACT payments (the payments associated with the dividends which DMG paid in July 1993 and July 1994), I repeat that the mistake which DMG made at those times was that it did not realise that it and DBI could have made valid group income elections with DBAG. In 1995, when DMG learned of the case which Hoechst had begun against the United Kingdom Revenue, it did not discover that it (DMG) and DBI could have made group income elections with DBAG after all. All that it discovered was that there was a possible argument that they could have done that. So it did discover something, but not something which made any difference to the matters which are critical in this case. Suppose that back in 1993, when DMG was planning to pay the first of the dividends, it had already known what it actually discovered in 1995: that there was an argument that group income elections could be made with parent companies in member states other than the United Kingdom, but that the Revenue did not agree with the argument. Would DMG, DBI and DBAG have submitted group income elections then? I do not think that they would. Still less do I think that, if they had submitted elections then, DMG would not have been liable to pay ACT when it paid the dividends. I have no doubt that the Revenue would have rejected the elections, and that DMG would have been liable to pay the ACT and would have paid it.

[30] Accordingly, my conclusions in relation to the first two ACT payments are: (1) that DMG did pay them under a mistake of law; (2) that, unless a limitation defence applies, DMG is entitled to claim restitution on the basis of a mistake of law; (3) that DMG did not discover its mistake in 1995 when it learned about the argument which Hoechst was advancing; (4) that therefore the limitation period applicable to DMG's mistake of law claim did not begin to run in or about July 1995; and (5) that no limitation defence applies. In my opinion DMG did not discover its mistake until the decision of the CJEC in Metallgesellschaft/Hoechst was released on 8 March 2001. DMG had already commenced its action claiming relief before then: it did so shortly after the Advocate General's opinion was delivered. That opinion was in favour of the claimants, and thus it foreshadowed the later decision of the CJEC itself. It might be arguable that DMG discovered its mistake at the time of the Advocate General's decision. I would not take that view myself: it was not inevitable that the CJEC would take the same view as the Advocate General. But the point does not matter, because, even if the limitation period started to run at the time of the Advocate General's opinion, DMG commenced its action only a month and a day later (12 September 2000 and 13 October 2000).

[31] As regards the third ACT payment—the one made on 14 January 1996—DMG knew about the Hoechst argument when it paid the ACT, and it had also known about the argument when it and DBI made no attempt to make group income elections before it paid the dividends on 17 July 1995. Notwithstanding that, I accept that DMG paid the ACT under a mistake of law, and is in principle entitled to restitution for the timing disadvantage which it thereby suffered. The limitation period would only start to run against DMG on the release of the CJEC decision, by which time it had already commenced its claim for relief.

[32] The result is that in my judgment DMG's claims succeed and that none of them is statute-barred. I will, however, briefly indicate what I believe the position would have been if I am wrong and if, once DMG knew of the Hoechst argument in 1995, it was no longer suffering from a relevant mistake.

WHAT IF (CONTRARY TO MY VIEW) DMG WAS NO LONGER MISTAKEN ONCE IT

LEARNED OF THE ARGUMENT BEING ADVANCED BY THE HOECHST GROUP?

[33] I will deal first with the first two ACT payments, which were made before DMG knew about the Hoechst argument. On the hypothesis which I am now assuming, DMG was under a mistake when it made the payments but discovered its mistake on a date between April 1995 (when the Hoechst action was commenced) and mid-July 1995 (by which time there is no doubt that DMG knew about the Hoechst case). So the limitation period started to run on a date in that period. I do not know exactly which date, but for illustration purposes in the discussion which follows I will assume that it was 1 July 1995. For DMG's claim for restitution to escape being statute-barred it would have had to have been commenced before 1 July 2001. DMG's claim form was issued on 13 October 2000, and the particulars of claim were served on 9 February 2001. On the face of it both were within time, whether the relevant date is taken to be that of the claim form or that of the particulars of claim.

[34] However, there is a complication which arises from the detailed contents of DMG's pleadings. The question is whether the claim form and the particulars of claim as they were originally expressed always claimed relief in respect of the ACT payments made in October 1993 and February 1995, or whether claims in respect of those particular ACT payments were new claims added by amendments made on 16 August 2001 (as respects the October 1993 ACT payment) and on 19 August 2002 (as respects the February 1995 ACT payment). If they were new claims added to the particulars of claim by the amendments, and if (contrary to my view) the limitation period had started running on or about 1 July 1995, the claims would be time-barred by the 1980 Act. In my opinion, however, the original particulars of claim, on their proper interpretation, already claimed relief in respect of the ACT payments made in October 1993 and in February 1995.

[35] This is a fine point on the small print wording of the particulars of claim, and I will not go into it at length. The critical point is that the particulars claimed relief in respect of all payments of ACT made by reference to 'the dividends'. 'The dividends' was a defined term: it meant the dividends which DMG had paid from time to time to DBI and DBAG, thus (as it seems to me) covering all dividends, including those which had led to the payments of ACT in October 1993 and February 1995 (the first and second payments which are in issue in this case). The original particulars of claim did say that the payments of ACT 'include but are not limited to' certain payments set out in a schedule. The payments so set out did not include the payments made in October 1993 and February 1995: those payments were only added to the schedule by the amendments made more than six years after 1 July 1995. However, in my view the original particulars of claim claimed relief in respect of all payments of ACT which had been made by DMG in respect of all dividends paid by it to DBI and DBAG. The claim was not limited to the payments specified in the schedule.

[36] In this respect the original particulars of claim were different from those which I considered in the recent case of Hoechst UK Ltd v IRC [2003] EWHC 1002 (Ch), [2003] All ER (D) 198 (Apr). The particulars of claim in that case (as I interpreted them) only claimed relief in respect of the specific ACT payments which were identified in a schedule, so that when the schedule was amended to add further payments the amendment had the effect of adding new claims in respect of additional causes of action. In the present case, in contrast, I consider that the amendments did not add new claims, but rather gave further details of claims which had already been made within the causes of action which had already been pleaded. Therefore, even if, contrary to my view, the six years limitation period started to run in July 1995 as respects the first two payments of ACT which are in issue, I still consider that DMG's claims for relief in respect of those two payments were brought within the period and are not statute-barred.

[37] I turn to the third ACT payment, the one of about £3·5m which was made on 14 January 1996. The result is the same as respects that payment, but the precise route by which the result is reached is different. When the payment was made, and also at the earlier time when the dividend which gave rise to it was paid (on 17 July 1995), DMG already knew about the argument which Hoechst was advancing. In my view, for the reasons which I have explained earlier, that did not change the position that DMG paid the ACT under a mistake of law. However, Mr Glick has submitted that it did, and that DMG did not pay the January 1996 ACT under a mistake. Let me suppose that he is right. Three specific consequences would follow. (1) DMG's claim for restitution, in so far as it rests on the Kleinwort Benson principle that money paid under a mistake of law is recoverable, would fail. (2) However, DMG would have a good claim for compensation or restitution based on the different ground that it had paid the money pursuant to an unlawful taxation measure (as in Woolwich Building Society v IRC (No 2) [1992] 3 All ER 737, [1993] AC 70). (3) The limitation period for that cause of action began to run immediately on payment of the ACT, on 14 January 1996. Therefore DMG would need to commence its action before 14 January 2002.

[38] As I have already recorded the claim form was issued on 13 October 2000 and the particulars of claim were served on 9 February 2001, both comfortably within the six years period. Therefore DMG's claim in respect of the last of the three ACT payments would have been in time anyway, as long as the claim as pleaded in the original particulars did claim relief in respect of that ACT payment. In my judgment it did, for the same reasons as those which I explained in [35], above. The particulars claimed relief in respect of all ACT payments made by DMG, not only in respect of those associated with the dividends which were scheduled to the pleading. When the schedule was amended, effectively on 19 August 2002 and thus too late to be within the six years' limitation period which ended on 13 January 2002, the amendment did not plead a new cause of action, but rather gave further factual details of a cause or causes of action which had already been pleaded in the original particulars served on 9 February 2001. Therefore, even if DMG, by reason of knowing about Hoechst's argument, did not make its January 1996 ACT payment under a mistake, it still brought its claim for relief in respect of that payment within the time permitted by the 1980 Act.

[39] There is one other detailed matter to be mentioned in connection with limitation. In my judgment in Hoechst UK Ltd v IRC [2003] All ER (D) 198 (Apr) I suggested the possibility that, in claims like those of Hoechst and of DMG in this case, the limitation period may not have expired all at once on the sixth anniversary of the date when a payment of ACT was made, but progressively over the period from that sixth anniversary date until the later sixth anniversary of the date when the ACT was set off against MCT. The theory behind the suggestion is that the relief is calculated on the basis of notional interest over that period, and thus may be regarded as accruing from day to day. It seems to me to be at least arguable that the limitation period would also run from day to day and would expire from day to day six years later.

[40] In the oral argument in this case I drew attention to the possible argument. Counsel had not considered it in preparation for the hearing, so it was agreed that they would not address it in their oral arguments, but might supply me with written submissions on it after the hearing. They did that. Mr Rabinowitz QC and Mr Fitzpatrick on behalf of DMG supported the argument. Mr Glick QC and Mr Carr on behalf of the Revenue said that it was wrong. In the event the question does not arise on the view which I take of this case, so, while I am grateful to counsel for their careful written submissions upon it, I hope that they will forgive me if I do not express a view on it. It is better to leave the point to be decided in a future case where it does matter.

CONCLUSION

[41] In the result I conclude that DMG's claims, in so far as they are formulated as claims for restitution in respect of money paid under a mistake of law, succeed in principle, and that they are not time-barred by the 1980 Act. I wish only to add that this is not a result which I reach with much enthusiasm. When Parliament first enacted the predecessor of s 32(1)(c) of the 1980 Act (postponing the running of the limitation period in claims based on mistake until the mistake is discovered), it did not have in mind claims for recovery of money based on a mistake of law, particularly a mistake which was shared by almost everyone else at the time. This was one consideration which influenced the dissenting minority in Kleinwort Benson. Lord Browne-Wilkinson said (1998] 4 All ER 513 at 523, [1999] 2 AC 349 at 364):

> 'On every occasion in which a higher court changed the law by judicial decision, all those who had made payments on the basis that the old law was correct (however long ago such payments were made) would have six years in which to bring a claim to recover money paid under a mistake of law.'

The three Law Lords in the majority clearly felt that the limitation consequences of their decision would be unacceptable in the long term and would have to be changed. Thus Lord Goff said (1998] 4 All ER 513 at 544, [1999] 2 AC 349 at 389):

> 'I recognise that the effect of s 32(1)(c) is that the cause of action in a case such as the present may be extended for an indefinite period of time. ... [T]he recognition of the right at common law to recover money on the ground that it was paid under a mistake of law may call for legislative reform to provide for some time limit to the right of recovery in such cases. The Law Commission may think it desirable, as a result of the decision in the present case, to give consideration to this question indeed they may think it wise to do so as a matter of some urgency.'

The Law Commission considered the matter in its major report on Limitation of Actions (9 July 2001) (Law Com no 270) pp 22 (para 2.49), 32 (para 2.90), 119–120 (paras 4.76–4.79). However, no legislation consequent upon that report has yet been enacted.

[42] In the circumstances I believe that I am bound by the decision of the majority in the House of Lords in Kleinwort Benson to hold that a cause of action for recovery of money paid under a mistake of law does exist, and that where such an action is commenced s 32(1)(c) of the 1980 Act applies with the effect that the limitation period does not begin to run until the mistake is discovered. For the detailed reasons which I have given in this judgment, I consider that DMG did make the three payments of ACT under a mistake of law; that DMG is therefore entitled to restitution; that it makes no difference that the payments were tax payments; and that DMG's claims for restitution are not time-barred by the 1980 Act. For those reasons I will give judgment in favour of DMG. a b

Order accordingly.

Celia Fox Barrister.

Amendment to the Consolidated Criminal Practice Direction (Appeals against sentence—the provision of notice to the prosecution)

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION
LORD WOOLF CJ
10 OCTOBER 2003

Practice – Criminal proceedings – Consolidation of existing practice directions, practice statements and practice notes – Amendment – Appeals against sentence – Provision of notice to the prosecution.

LORD WOOLF CJ gave the following direction.

This practice direction amends the consolidated criminal practice direction handed down by Lord Woolf CJ on 8 July ([2002] 3 All ER 904).

An additional section, set out below, is added to Pt II of the consolidated practice direction.

A new approach is to be taken to the numbering of the consolidated practice direction to enable this additional section, and future amendments, to be incorporated without altering the number of later sections. In future, sections will be identified by reference to the part of the consolidated practice direction in which they fall and the number of the section. The new section is added as section II.1 with the rest of the sections in Pt II remaining as section II.13, II.14 etc.

A revised table of contents for the consolidated criminal practice direction is attached as Appendix A.

II.1 APPEALS AGAINST SENTENCE—THE PROVISION OF NOTICE TO THE PROSECUTION

II.1.1 The Registrar of Criminal Appeals will notify the relevant prosecution authority in the event that: (a) leave to appeal against sentence is granted by the single judge; or (b) the single judge or the Registrar refers an application for leave to appeal against sentence to the full court for determination; or (c) the Registrar becomes aware that counsel for the applicant will be appearing at a renewed application for leave to appeal against sentence.

II.1.2 The prosecution will have seven days from the grant of leave by the single judge or the referral by the Registrar to notify the Registrar if they wish to be represented at the hearing OR to request sight of the grounds of appeal and/or any comments made by the single judge when granting leave or referring the case to the full court. Upon such a request, the prosecution will have a further seven days from receipt to notify the Registrar if they wish to be represented at the hearing.

II.1.3 Occasionally, for example, where the single judge fixes a hearing date at short notice, the Registrar may have to foreshorten the period specified in II.1.2, above.

II.1.4 In relation to (c) in para II.1.1, the prosecution will have 72 hours or, if the case is listed, 48 hours, to notify the Registrar that they wish to be represented at the hearing. Should the prosecution require sight of the grounds of appeal and the single judge's comments, such a request should be made as expeditiously as possible.

II.1.5 If the prosecution wishes to be represented at any hearing, the notification should include details of counsel instructed, a time estimate and an indication whether a skeleton argument will be lodged no later than 14 days before the hearing (or such shorter period as may be necessary). If a skeleton argument is to be lodged, it must be served on the court and the applicant/appellant.

II.1.6 An application by the prosecution to remove a case from the list for counsel's convenience, or to allow further preparation time, will rarely be granted.

II.1.7 There may be occasions when the Court of Appeal Criminal Division will grant leave to appeal to an unrepresented applicant and proceed forthwith with the appeal in the absence of the appellant and counsel. In those circumstances there will be no opportunity to notify the prosecution.

II.1.8 As a court of review, the Court of Appeal Criminal Division would expect the prosecution to have raised any specific matters of relevance with the sentencing judge in the first instance.

II.1.9 When the prosecution attend a hearing as a result of this practice direction, the prosecution should not volunteer assistance in relation to any unrepresented applicant.

II.1.10 This direction will come into force as from 10 November 2003.

II.1.11 The prosecution are already invited to appear and respond, as a matter of course, in appeals against confiscation orders and where the court is considering issuing sentencing guidelines. This practice will continue without change.

II.1.12 This practice direction replaces the existing protocol whereby the prosecution were responsible for lodging a letter of interest with the Registrar of Criminal Appeals via the Crown Court.

Sanchia Pereira Barrister.

APPENDIX A

CONSOLIDATED CRIMINAL PRACTICE DIRECTION—REVISED TABLE OF CONTENTS

| | |
|---|---|
| Part I | Directions of general application |
| I.1 | Court dress |
| I.2 | Unofficial tape recording of proceedings |
| I.3 | Restrictions on reporting proceedings |
| I.4 | Availability of judgments given in the Court of Appeal and the High Court |
| I.5 | Wards of court |
| I.6 | Spent convictions |
| I.7 | Explanations for the imposition of custodial sentences |
| I.8 | Words to be used when passing sentence |
| I.9 | Substitution of suspended sentences for immediate custodial sentences |
| I.10 | References to the Court of Justice of the European Communities |
| I.11 | Devolution issues |
| I.12 | Preparation of judgments: neutral citation |

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| a | Part II | Further directions applying in the Court Of Appeal, Criminal Division |
| | II.1 | Appeals against sentence—the provision of notice to the prosecution |
| | II.13 | Mode of addressing the court |
| | II.14 | Notices of appeal and of applications for leave to appeal |
| b | II.15 | Grounds of appeal |
| | II.16 | Loss of time |
| | II.17 | Skeleton arguments |
| | II.18 | Criminal appeal office summaries |
| | II.19 | Citation of judgments in court |
| | II.20 | Citation of Hansard |
| c | Part III | Further directions applying in the Crown Court and magistrates' courts |
| | III.21 | Classification of Crown Court business and allocation to Crown Court centres |
| | III.22 | Applications for evidence to be given in Welsh |
| d | III.23 | Use of the Welsh language in courts in Wales |
| | III.24 | Evidence by written statement |
| | III.25 | Bail during trial |
| | III.26 | Facts to be stated on pleas of guilty |
| | III.27 | Antecedents |
| | III.28 | Personal statements of victims |
| e | III.29 | Support for witnesses giving evidence by live television link |
| | Part IV | Further directions applying in the Crown Court |
| | IV.30 | Modes of address and titles of judges |
| | IV.31 | Transfer of cases from one circuit to another |
| | IV.32 | Transfer of proceedings between locations of the Crown Court |
| f | IV.33 | Allocation of business within the Crown Court |
| | IV.34 | Settling the indictment |
| | IV.35 | Voluntary bills of indictment |
| | IV.36 | Abuse of process stay applications |
| | IV.37 | Citation of Hansard |
| | IV.38 | Applications for representation orders |
| g | IV.39 | Trial of children and young persons |
| | IV.40 | Video recorded evidence-in-chief |
| | IV.41 | Plea and directions hearing |
| | IV.42 | Juries |
| | IV.43 | Evidence of tape recorded interviews |
| h | IV.44 | Defendant's right to give or not to give evidence |
| | IV.45 | Discussions about sentence |
| | IV.46 | Majority verdicts |
| | IV.47 | Imposition of discretionary life sentences |
| | IV.48 | Life Sentences for juveniles convicted of murder |
| j | IV.49 | Life sentences |
| | IV.50 | Bail pending appeal |
| | Part V | Further directions applying in the magistrates' courts |
| | V.51 | Mode of trial |
| | V.52 | Committal for sentence and appeals to Crown Court |
| | V.53 | Bail before committal for trial |
| | V.54 | Contempt in the face of the magistrates' court |

V.55 Clerk retiring with justices
V.56 Failure to surrender

a

Inland Revenue Commissioners v Laird Group plc

[2003] UKHL 54

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD, LORD HOFFMANN, LORD MILLETT, LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY AND LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE

23 JULY, 16 OCTOBER 2003

Income tax – Tax advantage – Transaction in securities – Distribution of profits of company – Abnormal amount by way of dividend – Whether payment of dividend transaction in securities – Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, ss 703(1), 709(2).

In June 1990 the appellant company acquired the entire issued share capital of S Ltd. Six months later the company declared and paid a dividend of £3·484m to its shareholders (the L plc dividend). Shortly afterwards S Ltd paid an interim dividend of £3m to the company (the S Ltd dividend). Because no group election was in force when the S Ltd dividend was paid, advance corporation tax amounting to £1m was payable in respect of the S Ltd dividend. S Ltd accounted to the Revenue for the advance corporation tax and set it against its mainstream corporation tax for the current and past years, thereby obtaining repayment of £1m of mainstream corporation tax. The dividend paid by S Ltd was received by the company as franked investment income and the advance corporation tax paid on the S Ltd dividend was set off against the advance corporation tax payable on the L plc dividend with the result that the company paid £1m less by way of advance corporation tax in respect of the L plc dividend than it would have done if it had not received the S Ltd dividend. In 1993 the Revenue issued a notice under s 703[a] of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 cancelling the tax advantage obtained by the company on the ground that it had been obtained in consequence of 'transactions in securities', which as defined in s 709(2)[b] included transactions relating to securities, namely, the payments of the S Ltd and L plc dividends. Following service of the s 703 notice, the company was assessed to advance corporation tax in the sum of £1m. The Special Commissioners dismissed the company's appeal against the notice. The company subsequently gave notice to the Special Commissioners requiring the appeal to be reheard by the tribunal constituted under s 706 of the 1988 Act. The tribunal allowed the company's appeal and discharged the assessment. They considered that there was no binding authority to the effect that the declaration and payment of a a Section 703, so far as material, provides: '(1) Where—(a) in any such circumstances as are mentioned in section 704, and (b) in consequence of a transaction in securities or of the combined effect of two or more such transactions, a person is in a position to obtain, or has obtained, a tax advantage, then unless he shows that the transaction or transactions were carried out either for bona fide commercial reasons or in the ordinary course of making or managing investments, and that none of them had as their main object, or one of their main objects, to enable tax advantages to be obtained, this section shall apply to him in respect of that transaction or those transactions. (2) For the purposes of this Chapter a tax advantage obtained or obtainable by a person shall be deemed to be obtained or obtainable by him in consequence of a transaction in securities or of the combined effect of two or more such transactions, if it is obtained or obtainable in consequence of the combined effect of the transaction or transactions and the liquidation of a company.'

b Section 709, so far as material, is set out at [17], below

dividend constituted a transaction in securities and that the expression 'transactions in securities' was aimed at the creation or transfer of securities or at the variation or extinguishment of rights attaching to securities, such that a substantially new security was created, and not to the mere giving effect to existing rights such as the giving effect to dividend rights following the declaration of a dividend. The Revenue appealed by way of case stated to the High Court which upheld the tribunal's decision and dismissed the Revenue's appeal. The Court of Appeal allowed the Revenue's further appeal and reinstated the assessment. The company appealed to the House of Lords. The issue for determination was whether the payment of the S Ltd dividend was a transaction relating to securities within the meaning of s 703(1) and 709(2) of the 1988 Act.

Held – The payment of a dividend which was the distribution of part of the undistributed profits of a company to its shareholders was not a transaction relating to securities because neither the shares themselves nor the rights attached to them were affected by a payment which merely gave effect to the shareholders' rights. Although shareholders had no right to any dividend until, if final, it was declared, or if interim, it was paid, the shareholders owned the company and they entrusted the management of its undertaking to the directors. To enable the directors to carry out their functions, shareholders gave them a discretion to decide how much of the company's funds should be retained to pay creditors and carry on the business and how much could safely be returned to shareholders by way of dividend. By declaring a dividend, the directors effectively released funds due to the shareholders from their power to retain them in the business. The distribution of the undistributed profits of a company to the shareholders entitled thereto therefore merely gave effect to the rights attached to the shares. The claimant's appeal would therefore be allowed (see [1], [2], [37], [38], [41], [42], [44]–[46], below); IRC v Joiner [1975] 3 All ER 1050, Greenberg v IRC, Tunnicliffe v IRC [1971] 3 All ER 136 and IRC v Parker [1966] 1 All ER 399 considered.

Notes

For transactions in securities, see 23(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 1569, n 2.

For the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, ss 703(1), 709(2), see 44 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 1067, 1076.

Cases referred to in opinions

Borland's Trustee v Steel Bros & Co Ltd [1901] 1 Ch 279.

Greenberg v IRC, Tunnicliffe v IRC [1971] 3 All ER 136, [1972] AC 109, [1971] 3 WLR 386, HL.

IRC v Crossman, IRC v Mann [1936] 1 All ER 762, [1937] AC 26, HL.

IRC v Joiner [1975] 3 All ER 1050, [1975] 1 WLR 1701, HL; affg on different grounds [1975] 1 All ER 755, [1975] 1 WLR 273, CA; affg [1973] 2 All ER 379, [1973] 1 WLR 690.

IRC v Parker [1966] 1 All ER 399, [1966] AC 141, [1966] 2 WLR 486, HL.

Sheppard and anor (Trustees of the Woodlands Trust) v IRC (No 2) [1993] STC 240.

Short v Treasury Comrs [1947] 2 All ER 298, [1948] 1 KB 116, CA; affd [1948] 2 All ER 509, [1948] AC 534, HL.

Cases referred to in list of authorities

Farrell v Alexander [1976] 2 All ER 721, [1977] AC 59, [1976] 3 WLR 145, HL.

Maunsell v Olins [1975] 1 All ER 16, [1975] AC 373, [1974] 3 WLR 835, HL.

Pepper (Inspector of Taxes) v Hart [1993] 1 All ER 42, [1993] AC 593, [1992] 3 WLR 1032, HL.

R v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, ex p Spath Holme Ltd [2001] 1 All ER 195, [2001] 2 AC 349, [2001] 2 WLR 15, HL.

Robinson v Secretary of State for Northern Ireland [2002] UKHL 32, [2002] NI 390.

Appeal

Laird Group plc (Laird) appealed with permission of the Court of Appeal (Sir Andrew Morritt V-C, Mummery and Longmore LJJ) from their decision on 30 April 2002 ([2002] EWCA Civ 576, [2002] STC 722) allowing the Revenue's appeal from a decision of Lightman J on 28 February 2001 ([2001] STC 689) dismissing its appeal from a decision of the tribunal constituted under s 706 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 (Chairman: Stephen Oliver QC) on 24 January 2000 ([2000] STC (SCD) 75) allowing Laird's appeal from a decision of the Special Commissioners (Mr THK Everett and Mr PW de Voil) on 8 February 1999 ([1999] STC (SCD) 86) affirming the validity of a notice issued by the Revenue under s 703 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 and an assessment to tax on Laird in the sum of £1m. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Millett.

Andrew Thornhill QC and James Henderson (instructed by Ashurst Morris Crisp) for Laird.

Michael Furness QC and David Ewart (instructed by the Solicitor of Inland Revenue) for the Crown.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

16 October. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD.

[1] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Millett. For the reasons he gives, with which I agree, I would allow this appeal and make the order he proposes.

LORD HOFFMANN.

[2] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Millett. For the reasons he has given, I too would allow this appeal.

LORD MILLETT.

[3] My Lords, the question for decision in this appeal is whether the payment of a dividend in respect of shares is 'a transaction in securities' or 'a transaction relating to securities' within the meaning of s 703 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988. The tribunal established under s 706 of the 1988 Act (the tribunal) ([2000] STC (SCD) 75) and Lightman J ([2001] STC 689) held that it is not. The Special Commissioners ([1999] STC (SCD) 86) and the Court of Appeal ([2002] EWCA Civ 576, [2002] STC 722) held that it is.

THE FACTS

[4] The facts are remarkably simple for a case concerned with tax avoidance. In June 1990 the taxpayer, the Laird Group plc (Laird), acquired the entire share capital of Stanton Rubber and Plastics Ltd (Stanton). Six months later Laird declared and paid a dividend of £3,848,000 to its shareholders (the Laird dividend). Shortly afterwards Stanton paid an interim dividend of £3,000,000 to Laird (the Stanton dividend).

THE TAX CONSEQUENCES

[5] Companies pay mainstream corporation tax on their profits. In turn their shareholders are generally liable to income tax under Sch F on dividends and other distributions which they receive in respect of their shares. At all material times the United Kingdom operated a partial imputation system under which shareholders could use part of the corporation tax for which the company was liable to offset their own liability to income tax on dividends and other distributions which they received from the company. In order to ensure that the credit taken by the shareholders represented tax which the company had actually paid, a company resident in the United Kingdom and paying a dividend to its shareholders was required to pay advance corporation tax in respect of the dividend. The company could set off the amount of advance corporation tax which it paid against its liability to mainstream corporation tax on its profits in the current year or past years. It could also carry any unused balance of advance corporation tax forward and set it off against its liability to mainstream corporation tax in future years.

[6] This system penalised companies such as Laird which paid substantial dividends to their shareholders but which earned most of their profits overseas through subsidiaries resident and taxable abroad. They had to pay advance corporation tax in respect of the dividends but were liable to relatively little mainstream corporation tax on their overseas profits because these would already have borne tax abroad. This gave rise to unusable advance corporation tax which fell to be written off against profits.

[7] Stanton had accumulated substantial profits on which mainstream corporation tax had been paid. On its acquisition by Laird, Laird and Stanton became members of the same group of companies. Stanton could have elected to pay dividends to Laird under a group election. Had it done so, it would not have been required to account to the Revenue for advance corporation tax in respect of the Stanton dividend. Laird, on the other hand, would have had to pay advance corporation tax on the Laird dividend, but would have insufficient mainstream corporation tax against which the payment could be set off.

[8] Stanton therefore did not make a group election. Instead it paid advance corporation tax of £1m on the Stanton dividend and set this sum off against mainstream corporation tax on its profits for the current and past years. Payment of the Stanton dividend thus gave rise to a reduction or repayment of £1m of Stanton's mainstream corporation tax. Laird, for its part, received the Stanton dividend as franked investment income, that is to say a dividend on which advance corporation tax had been paid, and this could be set against Laird's liability to pay advance corporation tax on the Laird dividend. As a result Laird paid £1m less by way of advance corporation tax in respect of the Laird dividend than it would have done if it had not received the Stanton dividend.

THE PROCEEDINGS

[9] In 1993 the Board of Inland Revenue issued a notice under s 703(3) of the 1988 Act to counteract the tax advantage which Laird had obtained by arranging to receive payment of the Stanton dividend. Section 703 enables the Board to take action to counteract a tax advantage which has been obtained in prescribed circumstances in consequence of a transaction in securities or of the combined effect of two or more such transactions. The taxpayer can repel the Board's attack by showing that the transaction or transactions in question were carried out for bona fide commercial reasons or in the ordinary course of making or managing investments and that none of them had as their main object or one of their main objects the obtaining of a tax advantage.

[10] The Board alleged that the payments of the Stanton and Laird dividends were transactions in securities which were not carried out for bona fide commercial reasons or in the course of making or managing investments and had as one of their main objects the obtaining of a tax advantage within the meaning of s 703(1) of the 1988 Act. Following service of the s 703 notice Laird was assessed to advance corporation tax in a sum of £1m.

[11] The Special Commissioners dismissed Laird's appeal against the s 703 notice and upheld the assessment. They held that each of the dividends was a transaction in securities. Laird asked for the case to be reheard by the tribunal, which held that the declaration and payment of a dividend do not constitute transactions in securities within the meaning of s 703 of the 1988 Act and discharged the assessment. The Revenue appealed by way of case stated to the High Court, where Lightman J upheld the tribunal's decision and dismissed the Revenue's appeal. The Court of Appeal allowed the Revenue's further appeal and reinstated the assessment. Laird now appeals to your Lordships' House.

THE LEGISLATION

[12] The narrow issue arising on the appeal is whether the Stanton dividend (which was the dividend which gave rise to the tax advantage which Laird obtained) was 'a transaction in securities' within the meaning of s 703 of the 1988 Act. This section forms part of a group of sections (ss 703–710) which were first enacted by s 28 of the Finance Act 1960. These provisions have been amended from time to time in a number of respects which, with one exception, are not material, and were consolidated by the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970 and again by the 1988 Act. The critical definition of 'transaction in securities' which is now to be found in s 709(2) of the 1988 Act, however, has not changed over the years. For ease of exposition, I shall refer to the predecessor sections by reference to their counterparts in the 1988 Act.

[13] It is not necessary to set out the lengthy and complicated statutory provisions at length. They can be found in the reports of the decisions below. Shortly stated, they enable the Revenue to counteract a tax advantage where (i) there is a transaction in securities (or two or more such transactions); (ii) the transaction or transactions have occurred in one or more of the five sets of circumstances mentioned in s 704; and (iii) in consequence of the transaction or the combined effect of two or more such transactions the taxpayer has obtained or is in a position to obtain a tax advantage.

[14] These are three separate and independent requirements. The Revenue do not suggest that it is sufficient that the taxpayer has obtained a tax advantage in one of the circumstances described in s 704; he must also be shown to have obtained the tax advantage in question in consequence of one or more transactions in securities. This appears plainly from the structure of the section, from the fact that it is a defence for the taxpayer to show that the transaction or transactions were entered into for bona fide commercial reasons even if the circumstances described in s 704 are present, and from the way in which the courts have stated the issues: see, for example, IRC v Joiner [1975] 3 All ER 1050 at 1054–1055, [1975] 1 WLR 1701 at 1705 per Lord Wilberforce.

[15] It is common ground that conditions (ii) and (iii) above, are satisfied. The circumstances described in para A of s 704 occurred because 'in connection with the distribution of profits of a company' (Stanton) 'the person in question' (Laird) received an abnormal amount by way of dividend and the amount so received was taken into account for the purpose of the application of franked investment income in calculating Laird's liability to pay advance corporation tax.

[16] It is also common ground (i) that the Stanton dividend was of an abnormal amount; (ii) that Laird gained a tax advantage in consequence of the receipt of the Stanton dividend in that the receipt reduced or discharged its liability to pay advance corporation tax; and (iii) that the payment of the Stanton dividend had as one of its main objects the obtaining of a tax advantage. The remaining requirement, on which issue is joined, is whether the payment of the Stanton dividend constituted a transaction in securities. Laird concedes that the acquisition of the share capital of Stanton was such a transaction. But the tribunal found that it was carried out for bona fide commercial reasons and did not have as its main object, or one of its main objects, the obtaining of a tax advantage; and this finding has not been challenged by the Revenue.

[17] The expression 'transaction in securities' is defined in s 709(2) of the 1988 Act as follows:

> '"transaction in securities" includes transactions, of whatever description, relating to securities, and in particular—(i) the purchase, sale or exchange of securities; (ii) the issuing or securing the issue of, or applying or subscribing for, new securities; (iii) the altering, or securing the alteration of, the rights attached to securities ...'

The question is whether the payment of a dividend is 'a transaction relating to' the shares in respect of which it is paid.

[18] I need set out only one further provision which has a bearing on the present issue, viz s 703(2) of the 1988 Act. This was first introduced by the Finance Act 1962 and is in the following terms:

> 'For the purposes of this Chapter a tax advantage obtained or obtainable by a person shall be deemed to be obtained or obtainable by him in consequence of a transaction in securities or of the combined effect of two or more such transactions, if it is obtained or obtainable in consequence of the combined effect of the transaction or transactions and the liquidation of a company.'

This assumes that, whatever else 'a transaction in securities' may mean, it does not include the liquidation of a company, for if it did the subsection would be pointless: see Joiner's case [1975] 3 All ER 1050 at 1057, [1975] 1 WLR 1701 at 1708 per Viscount Dilhorne and [1975] 3 All ER 1050 at 1060, [1975] 1 WLR 1701 at 1712 per Lord Diplock. Section 703(2) is directed at the perceived lacuna which would otherwise arise where the tax advantage was obtained, not in consequence of two or more transactions in securities, but in consequence of a transaction in securities and a liquidation and would not have been obtained but for the liquidation.

THE AUTHORITIES

[19] The relevant statutory provisions have been considered by your Lordships' House on three occasions: in IRC v Parker [1966] 1 All ER 399, [1966] AC 141; Greenberg v IRC, Tunnicliffe v IRC [1971] 3 All ER 136, [1972] AC 109; and Joiner's case [1975] 3 All ER 1050, [1975] 1 WLR 1701. In none of them did the present question fall for decision.

[20] In Parker's case a company capitalised a sum standing to the credit of its profit and loss account and applied it in issuing redeemable debentures to its members in proportion to the amounts paid up on their shares. The company subsequently redeemed the debentures at par. The difficulty arose because the debentures were issued in 1953, long before the enactment of the Finance Act 1960, while notice of redemption was not given until 1961. The Finance Act was not retrospective. The question was whether the redemption and cancellation of the debentures by themselves constituted transactions in securities. The House unanimously held that they did.

[21] In Greenberg's case a company created a new class of preferred shares which it issued credited as fully paid to its two shareholders. They sold the shares to a purchaser on terms that the price was to be paid by instalments. Under arrangements made between the parties the company paid dividends on the shares which were paid into the purchaser's bank account. Corresponding sums were then paid out of the bank account to the shareholders in payment of the purchase price for the shares. By this means the shareholders converted dividends, which would have been taxable in their hands, into instalments of the purchase price for their shares, which were not. The problem was again one of timing. The arrangements were made before the enactment of the Finance Act 1960, but the payments were made after it. The Revenue did not contend that the declaration and payment of a dividend by itself was a transaction in securities. Its contentions were more modest. It did not focus its attention on the dividends. It claimed that the payment of the instalments of the purchase price, or the completion of the sale by such payment, was such a transaction. All members of the Committee accepted the Revenue's contention that the contract of sale, which was clearly a transaction in securities, was not carried out until the instalments of the purchase price were paid. Four members of the Committee (Lord Reid, Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest, Lord Guest and Lord Simon of Glaisdale) also agreed that the payments of the instalments of the purchase price were themselves transactions in securities in consequence of which a tax advantage had been obtained. Lord Simon thought that the payments of the dividends were the transactions in securities in consequence of which the tax advantage was obtained. Lord Reid agreed with him but did not rest his conclusion on this ground. Lord Guest was equivocal on this point; while Lord Wilberforce expressly reserved his position.

[22] In Joiner's case the taxpayers entered into a shareholders' agreement which varied the rights attached to their shares in important respects before putting the company into liquidation. The variations were all necessary steps in order to achieve the taxpayers' objective, which was to receive the undistributed profits of the company as surplus assets in the liquidation (and therefore free of surtax) while keeping the business itself in existence. The Court of Appeal ([1975] 1 All ER 755, [1975] 1 WLR 273) held that the liquidation by itself was a transaction in securities. Before your Lordships' House, however, the Revenue did not contend that a straightforward liquidation without any variation of the rights attached to the shares was a transaction in securities, and the House did not hold that it did. All members of the Committee rested their decision on the ground given by Goulding J at first instance ([1973] 2 All ER 379, [1973] 1 WLR 690), that the variation of rights constituted a transaction in securities and that accordingly the tax advantage was obtained in consequence of the combined effect of a transaction in securities and the liquidation of a company.

[23] Both Parker's case and Greenberg's case contain dicta on the question whether the payment of a dividend is a transaction in securities. Opinion was divided in Greenberg's case on the question whether Parker's case compelled the conclusion that a dividend is a transaction in securities. Lord Simon thought that it did ([1971] 3 All ER 136 at 161, [1972] AC 109 at 151) while Lord Wilberforce went out of his way to say that it did not (see [1971] 3 All ER 136 at 157, [1972] AC 109 at 146). Greenberg's case itself has often been assumed to be authority for the proposition that it is: see, for example, Sheppard and anor (Trustees of the Woodlands Trust) v IRC (No 2) [1993] STC 240 at 255. I respectfully prefer Lord Wilberforce's conclusion. As I have already observed, the point did not arise for decision in any of the cases. Moreover, the dicta in Parker's case and Greenberg's case must be treated with caution, for both cases were decided on the Finance Act 1960 as it stood before the introduction of what has become s 703(2).

[24] But the three cases in your Lordships' House contain many valuable and authoritative insights which help to tease out the statutory definition of 'transaction in securities' in s 709(2). Lord Reid's speech in Greenberg's case makes it clear that the expression may include a unilateral transaction, such as the redemption or cancellation of a debenture or payment of a dividend. In Parker's case [1966] 1 All ER 399 at 406, [1966] AC 141 at 164–165, Lord Hodson said of the words 'transactions, of whatever description, relating to securities' that 'there could hardly be a wider net connecting transactions and securities'.

[25] In Joiner's case [1975] 3 All ER 1050 at 1055, [1975] 1 WLR 1701 at 1705–1706, Lord Wilberforce summarised the effect of the earlier decisions in two propositions. First:

> 'On the enactment of the original s 28 of the Finance Act 1960 it was possible to contend, and it was contended, that this section (and its associated sections) was directed against a particular type of tax avoidance known generally under such descriptions as dividend-stripping, asset-stripping and bond-washing, and that the sections and particular expressions used in them, amongst others "transactions in securities", should be interpreted in the light of this supposed purpose. But this line of argument became unmaintainable after the decisions of this House in Inland Revenue Comrs v Parker and Greenberg v Inland Revenue Comrs.'

Despite this the taxpayer was at some pains to resurrect the argument before us. With all due respect, that horse has been dead for nearly 30 years.

[26] Secondly:

> '... we must continue to give "transaction in securities" and "transactions relating to securities" the widest meaning: we can neither confine these expressions to the instances given in [s 709(2)], nor can we deduce from that enumeration any limitation on their scope.'

'TRANSACTIONS IN SECURITIES'

[27] My Lords, with all respect to those who have argued otherwise in the past, I do not think that there is any room for doubt that, as a matter of ordinary language, the creation, issue, sale, purchase, exchange, redemption and extinguishment of shares or debentures are all 'transaction[s] in securities'. In each case the securities themselves are the subject matter of the transaction. But there is also no doubt that the connection between the transaction and the securities may be looser than this. The transaction need not be a 'transaction in securities'; it may be a 'transaction ... relating to securities'. One example of such a transaction appears in s 709(2)(iii): 'the altering, or securing the alteration of, the rights attached to securities'. It is not possible to use this example to deduce the nature of the necessary relationship between the transaction and the securities; but some relationship there must be.

'TRANSACTION ... RELATING TO SECURITIES'

[28] I think that there are two indications of the kind of relationship that Parliament had in mind. One is the width of the word 'securities'. The other is in s 703(2), which shows that Parliament did not regard the liquidation of a company in itself as a transaction relating to its shares.

[29] The word 'securities' includes not only stocks and shares of every description, including preference shares, but also debentures and unsecured loan notes. It would not be a normal use of language to describe the payment of a fixed dividend in respect of preference shares as a transaction relating to securities; and I would at least pause before attaching such a description to the payment of interest on a debt merely because it was secured by a debenture or unsecured loan note. Neither the debt nor the rights attached to it, which include the right to receive interest payable in respect of it, is affected by the payment in any way. The debt merely provides the measure of the amount to be received by way of interest. The same applies to fixed dividends payable in respect of preference shares.

[30] Before the introduction of s 703(2), therefore, the question whether the payment of a dividend on ordinary shares was a transaction relating to securities was a question of some nicety which was never finally resolved. But that section and the assumption which it makes that the liquidation of a company is not such a transaction cast further light on the kind of relationship between the transaction and the security which Parliament had in mind.

[31] It can hardly be said that the liquidation of a company does not affect its shares or the rights of the shareholders at all. Any transfer of shares made after the commencement of the winding up is void unless made to or with the sanction of the liquidator (see s 88 of the Insolvency Act 1986). The company's property is realised and applied in satisfaction of the companies' liabilities and subject thereto is distributable among the shareholders according to their rights and interests in the company (see s 107 of the 1986 Act). After the creditors have been paid in full and the amounts credited as paid up on the share capital have been repaid, the balance in the liquidator's hands represents the undistributed profits of the company. If there is nothing due in respect of any preference shares, these belong to the ordinary shareholders and are distributable to them in proportion to the amounts credited as paid up on their shares. The company is then dissolved.

[32] It is not difficult to see why the effect of the liquidation in making the shares non-transferable should not be regarded as a transaction relating to the shares. It is because it is only the right to transfer legal title to the shares which is affected; shareholders remain free to deal with the beneficial interest in their shares. The purpose of making the legal title to the shares non-transferable is merely to freeze the company's register of members at the date of the winding-up so that the liquidator can safely deal with the shareholders whose names appear on the register at that date. Taxation is normally concerned with beneficial interests.

[33] It is also tolerably clear why the dissolution of the company at the end of the process is not regarded as a transaction in securities. The shares themselves are not extinguished by payment of the amounts due to the shareholders (which may and often does take place by instalments), though since they merely represent a proportionate share of the company they necessarily cease to exist when the company itself does. But the shareholders remain contributories, and if for example further assets are discovered they may petition to have the company restored to the register so that they may share in the proceeds.

[34] Accordingly the critical questions are: (i) why is the payment of the undistributed profits of the company to the shareholders in the course of a liquidation not a transaction relating to their shares? and (ii) what if any is the difference between the payment of the undistributed profits to the shareholders in the course of a liquidation and their distribution to shareholders by way of dividend while the company is a going concern? In both cases the payment to each shareholder is made in respect of his shares.

[35] The juridical nature of a share is not easy to describe. It is not a share in the company's undertaking, for the company owns its property beneficially and not in trust for its members: '[s]hareholders are not, in the eye of the law, part owners of the undertaking' (see Short v Treasury Comrs [1947] 2 All ER 298 at 301, [1948] 1 KB 116 at 122 (Court of Appeal)). It is classified as a chose in action, but this merely tells us that it is a species of intangible personal property. It is customary to describe it as 'a bundle of rights and liabilities', and this is probably the nearest that one can get to its character, provided that it is appreciated that it is more than a bundle of contractual rights. The most widely quoted definition of a share is that of Farwell J in Borland's Trustee v Steel Bros & Co Ltd [1901] 1 Ch 279 at 288 which was approved by your Lordships' House in IRC v Crossman, IRC v Mann [1936] 1 All ER 762, [1937] AC 26. It was usefully and in my respectful opinion accurately summarised by Lord Russell of Killowen in his speech (dissenting on the facts) in that case ([1936] 1 All ER 762 at 787, [1937] AC 26 at 66):

> 'It is the interest of a person in the company, that interest being composed of rights and obligations which are defined by the Companies Act and by the memorandum and articles of association of the company.'

These rights, however, are not purely personal rights. They confer proprietary rights in the company though not in its property. The company is at one and the same time a juridical person with rights and duties of its own, and a res owned by its shareholders: see Gower's Principles of Modern Company Law (6th edn, 1997) p 301.

[36] The rights of the shareholders in a company are set out in its articles of association. In the case of ordinary shareholders they are normally those described by Lord Wilberforce in IRC v Joiner [1975] 3 All ER 1050 at 1056, [1975] 1 WLR 1701 at 1706–1707: 'rights to receive dividends, if declared, rights to vote, rights in a liquidation to receive a share of surplus assets after discharge of liabilities.'

[37] Once realised the assets of a company in liquidation are a distributable fund in the hands of the liquidator, who no longer needs funds with which to carry on its undertaking. After the creditors have been paid and the amounts credited as paid up on the shares have been repaid, the balance is distributable to the ordinary shareholders because it belongs to them, subject only to the liquidator's discretion to retain sufficient funds in his hands to enable him to complete the winding up. The distribution of the undistributed profits of a company in liquidation to its shareholders is not a transaction relating to securities because neither the shares themselves nor the rights attached to them are affected by a payment which merely gives effect to the shareholders' rights; they receive only what is already theirs. Distributions are made to shareholders in respect of the shares, but the shares of the individual shareholder are nothing more than the measure of the proportion of the total which is due to him.

[38] In my opinion the position is not materially different if part of the undistributed profits is paid to the shareholders by way of dividend while the company is a going concern. The Court of Appeal ([2002] STC 722) seized on the fact that until a dividend, if final, is declared or, if interim, is paid, the shareholders have no right to it. Accordingly, the Court of Appeal concluded, the declaration and payment do not merely give effect to pre-existing rights.

[39] This proposition merits further examination. If correct, it has the advantage of distinguishing the payment of ordinary dividends from the payment of interest on a debenture or loan note, and the disadvantage of leaving the payment of a preference dividend to depend upon the particular wording of the articles of association in question.

[40] The right to receive a dividend does not arise until the conditions laid down in the company's articles of association are satisfied. Any requirement that a dividend must be declared by the directors before the shareholders are entitled to receive it must be found in the company's articles of association: there is nothing in the Companies Acts save an obligation not to pay dividends out of capital. Constraints on the shareholders' rights to receive dividends contained in the articles are self-imposed.

[41] In the early days articles of association commonly left the declaration of dividends to the company in general meeting, that is to say to the shareholders themselves. Gradually, however, it became the general practice to require the dividend to be declared by the directors. The change was a response to the increasing separation of ownership and management. The shareholders own the company, but they entrust the management of its undertaking to the directors. To enable the directors to carry out their functions, shareholders give them a discretion to decide how much of the company's funds should be retained to pay creditors and carry on the business and how much can safely be returned to shareholders by way of dividend. By declaring a dividend, the directors effectively release funds due to the shareholders from their power to retain them in the business.

[42] Whether the company is in liquidation or continuing to carry on business as a going concern, therefore, the distribution of the undistributed profits of a company to the shareholders entitled thereto merely gives effect to the rights attached to the shares. The funds are released, in the one case from the liquidator's discretion to retain them for the purpose of the winding up, and in the other from the directors' discretion to retain them for the purposes of the undertaking. Given that the former is not 'a transaction relating to securities', neither in my opinion is the latter. The relationship between the payment and the shares in respect of which it is paid is the same in both cases. a [43] I have reached this conclusion without reference to Hansard; but I am comforted by the fact that it is supported by the explanation given to Parliament by the Attorney General, Sir Reginald Manningham-Buller QC (later Viscount Dilhorne), when introducing what was to become s 28 of the Finance Act 1960 (see 624 HC Official Report (5th series) col 511). This makes it unnecessary to b consider whether it would have been proper to resort to Hansard had the meaning of the expression 'transaction ... relating to securities' been incapable of resolution without doing so.

CONCLUSION

[44] I would allow the appeal with costs here and below, set aside the decision c of the Court of Appeal and the Board's notice under s 703, and discharge the assessment.

LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY.

[45] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Millett. For the reasons he gives in his speech I d would allow this appeal.

LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE.

[46] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Millett. For the reasons he gives in his speech I e would allow this appeal.

Appeal allowed.

Celia Fox Barrister.

R v Gill and another

[2003] EWCA Crim 2256

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

CLARKE LJ, ASTILL J AND JUDGE PETER BEAUMONT QC (THE COMMON SERJEANT)

15, 31 JULY 2003

Evidence – Admissibility – 'Hansard' interview – Revenue suspecting that appellants failing to disclose details of assets – Revenue putting questions to appellants at 'Hansard' interview – Appellants answering untruthfully – Whether appellants' answers admissible at subsequent trial for cheating the public revenue – Whether caution should have been given before interview – Whether admission of answers evidence having such an adverse effect on fairness of proceedings that court ought not to admit it – Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, ss 67(9), 78, Code of Practice C, para 10.1.

The appellants ran a business together in partnership. The Revenue considered that the appellants had failed to disclose the existence of various bank and building society accounts in the United Kingdom and abroad thus concealing the extent of their financial assets and evading payment of tax that would otherwise have been payable. When investigating cases of tax fraud it was the Revenue's practice, as set out in a statement given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to Parliament in October 1990, to accept a money settlement instead of instituting criminal proceedings in respect of the fraud and, in deciding whether to accept such a settlement, to be influenced by the fact that the taxpayer being investigated had made a full confession and had co-operated with the Revenue. However, the Revenue reserved the right to institute criminal proceedings even if the taxpayer had confessed and had given full facilities for investigation of the facts. (The interview where this practice was explained to the person being investigated was known as a 'Hansard' interview.) In March 1995, officers from the Revenue's Special Compliance Office (SCO), which was charged with investigating serious fraud, carried out a Hansard interview with the appellants. The appellants were subsequently charged with cheating the public revenue. At the appellants' trial in March 2002, the Revenue sought to rely on answers given by the appellants at their Hansard interview as evidence of their untruthful dishonesty. The appellants submitted that Code C of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (PACE), as the SCO officers were persons 'charged with the duty of investigating offences or charging offenders' applied to the interview and that para 10.1[a] of that code, which provided, inter alia, that a person whom there were grounds to suspect of an offence must be cautioned before any questions about it were put to him for the purpose of obtaining evidence which might be given to a court in a prosecution, had not been complied with. Accordingly, they claimed, their answers should be excluded by the trial judge under s 78[b] of PACE

a Paragraph 10.1, so far as material, is set out at [31], below

b Section 78, so far as material, provides '(1) In any proceedings the court may refuse to allow evidence on which the prosecution proposes to rely to be given if it appears to the court that, having regard to all the circumstances, including the circumstances in which the evidence was obtained, the admission of the evidence would have such an adverse effect on the fairness of the proceedings that the court ought not to admit it.'

on the ground that the admission of the evidence would have such an adverse effect on the fairness of the proceedings that the court ought not to admit it. The trial judge dismissed that submission holding that, having regard to the history and practice of Hansard interviews, they were part of a civil procedure to collect tax and not part of a criminal investigation. The appellants were convicted. They appealed to the Court of Appeal contending, inter alia, that under s 67(9)[c] of PACE, persons charged with the duty of investigating offences or charging offenders were to follow the relevant Code of Practice.

Held – (1) The SCO officers were charged with investigating serious fraud. Since serious fraud inevitably involved the commission of an offence or offences, it followed that the officers were charged with the duty of investigating offences when they conducted the Hansard interview. Further, since the Revenue expressly reserved the right to prosecute for fraud, one of the purposes of asking the questions must have been the obtaining of evidence which might be given to a court in a prosecution, even if the Revenue's main aim was to arrive at a monetary settlement. For those reasons, Code C applied to the Hansard interview and the appellants should, accordingly, have been cautioned and the interview recorded on tape (see [37]–[40], below).

(2) The admission of the statements made in the Hansard interview did not have such an adverse effect on the fairness of the proceedings that the court ought not to have admitted it. The breach of Code C was significant, but it was not caused by any bad faith and could not fairly be regarded as involving a flagrant disregard of the code's provisions. The principal purpose of the caution under para 10.1 was to ensure that interviewees did not make admissions unless they wished to do so and were aware of the consequences. It was not to prevent them from telling lies. That was not to say that lies told by a person at an interview to which Code C applied would always be admissible where there was a breach of the code. Each case depended on its own facts. However, in the instant case, there was no unfairness in admitting the statements as lies, provided that they were otherwise admissible and an appropriate direction had been given (as it had by the trial judge). Accordingly, the appeal would be dismissed (see [44], [46], [48], [57], below); R v Allen (No 2) [2001] 4 All ER 768 considered.

Notes

For cheating the public revenue and for cautions, see 11(1) Halsburys's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 578 and Supp to 11(1) Halsbury's Laws, para 734, respectively.

For the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, s 67(9), see 12 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (1997 reissue) 874.

For the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, s 78, see 17 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (1999 reissue) 236.

Cases referred to in judgment

Allen v UK App No 76574/01 (10 September 2002, unreported), ECt HR.

Han v Customs and Excise Comrs [2001] EWCA Civ 1040, [2001] 4 All ER 687, [2001] 1 WLR 2253.

Henderson v Henderson [1965] 1 All ER 179, [1967] P 77, [1965] 2 WLR 218.

Ibrahim v R [1914] AC 599, [1914–14] All ER Rep 874, PC.

R v Absolam (1989) 88 Cr App Rep 332, CA.

c Section 67, so far as material, is set out at [29], below

R v Allen [1995] Crim LR 643, CA.
R v Allen (No 2) [2001] UKHL 45, [2001] 4 All ER 768, [2002] 1 AC 509, [2001] 3 WLR 843.
R v Barker [1941] 3 All ER 33, [1941] 2 KB 381, CCA.
R v Delaney (1989) 88 Cr App Rep 338, CA.
R v Graham [1994] Crim LR 212, CA.
R v Grannell (1989) 90 Cr App R 149, CA.
R v Lucas [1981] 2 All ER 1008, [1981] QB 720, [1981] 3 WLR 120, CA.
R v Okafor [1994] 3 All ER 741, CA.
R v Quinn [1995] 1 Cr App R 480, CA.
Saunders v UK (1997) 2 BHRC 358, ECt HR.

Appeals against conviction

The appellants, Sewa Singh Gill and Paramjit Singh Gill appealed, with permission granted by Sachs J on 5 September 2002, against their convictions in the Crown Court at Snaresbrook on 15 March 2002 on six and three counts, respectively, of cheating the public revenue, after a trial before Judge Bing and a jury. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Philip Sapsford QC (instructed by Stringer Saul) for the appellants.
Anthony Abell and Valerie Charbit (instructed by the Solicitor of Inland Revenue) for the Crown.

Cur adv vult

31 July 2003. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

CLARKE LJ.

INTRODUCTION

[1] This is the judgment of the court. The appellants are brothers. Sewa Singh is now aged 52 and Paramjit Singh is now 40. On 15 March 2002 in the Crown Court at Snaresbrook before Judge Bing and a jury, after a lengthy trial, Sewa Gill was convicted of six counts of cheating the Inland Revenue (the Revenue), namely counts 2, 3, 4, 6, 8 and 10, and Paramjit Gill was convicted of three counts of cheating the Revenue, namely counts 7, 9 and 11. Sewa Gill was acquitted of counts 1 and 5 and found not guilty by direction of count 12 and Paramjit Gill was acquitted of count 13. All those counts also alleged cheating the Revenue. On 15 May 2002, Sewa Gill was sentenced to three years' imprisonment on each count concurrent and Paramjit Gill was sentenced to 20 months' imprisonment on each count concurrent.

[2] The appellants appeal against conviction pursuant to leave granted by the single judge, Sachs J, who granted leave on one ground only. They renew their applications for leave to appeal on the remaining three grounds. Paramjit Gill's application for leave to appeal against sentence was refused by Sachs J and has not been renewed.

[3] The ground upon which leave was granted relates to the use made at the trial of answers given by the appellants at an interview which took place on 8 March 1995. It was a type of interview which is sometimes known as a 'Hansard interview'. The other three grounds in respect of which leave to appeal is sought allege misdirection by the judge in respect of the law of domicile and the legal concept of cheat and a failure by the judge to give clear directions as to the issues which the jury had to decide in relation to each count on the indictment. Mr Sapsford QC made detailed oral submissions in relation to the Hansard interview and domicile but otherwise relied upon the written materials before the court. Before considering each of the grounds relied upon we summarise the underlying facts and issues at the trial.

THE UNDERLYING FACTS AND ISSUES

[4] This is taken from the Criminal Appeal Office summary. The appellants were brothers and ran a business in partnership, sharing the profits equally. The business dealt in clothing manufacture and investment in property for rent. Its profits for the years 1983–1993 were said to have been between £13,648 and £61,229. However, the prosecution case was that in tax returns and other documents submitted to the Revenue during the period 1984–1995 the appellants failed to disclose the existence of various bank and building society accounts in the United Kingdom and bank accounts in Switzerland and Jersey, thus concealing the extent of their financial assets and evading payment of the tax that would have been payable. The prosecution case may be shortly summarised in this way.

[5] The Gills were a close family and some of the accounts in which assets were held were in the names of both one or other of the appellants and another family member. The lengths to which they went to conceal these accounts, for example in creating false documentation, and the lies they told both when interviewed and at the trial of their former solicitor Ivor Gerber (at which they gave evidence for the Crown) showed an intent to defraud.

[6] The prosecution maintained that the money in the case was generated in the United Kingdom by the appellants' commercial activities and so was taxable here, wherever they were domiciled and whether or not it was kept offshore. It did not accept that any of the money came from India. In particular, it did not accept that it could realistically have been generated by the farm about which a good deal of evidence was given. However it was not accepted that the appellants retained Indian domicile. They lived and worked in the United Kingdom and never claimed that they were not domiciled in the United Kingdom in their dealings with the Revenue in connection with this case. The purpose of doing so would have been in order to establish a claim that they were not liable for tax payable here on that basis.

[7] The defence accepted that the bank and building society accounts in question had not been disclosed but denied any intent to defraud. The appellants were not domiciled in the United Kingdom but retained their domicile of origin, which was India. They always had a clear and settled intention to return to India, where they had been born. Not being domiciled in the United Kingdom, they were under no obligation to disclose the offshore accounts, the money in which came from India (especially from their mother's farm in the Punjab). They were able to provide good explanations for the failure to disclose the accounts in this country. They produced financial records and accounts which they said showed that the business was not capable of generating the sort of money attributed to it and a schedule of rental income which showed that it had all been declared. They admitted lying, but only in order to protect their elderly mother from investigation by the Indian authorities, a consideration which lasted until her death in 2001.

[8] The appellants' family were Sikhs from the Punjab. Their grandparents lived in the United Kingdom and their parents came here when Sewa Gill was quite young. Their father, Naranjan Singh Gill, then returned to India and acquired a farm in the Punjab, while their mother, Surjit Kaur Gill, brought up the appellants and their sister Balbir. Balbir worked as a dental assistant, then in 1976 married a Mr Ghuman and went to Canada, but returned to England following her divorce. Naranjan Gill came back to England in 1981 but the farm remained in the family. In the early 1980s Sewa Gill, who had previously worked as a diesel fitter, set up in business as a clothing manufacturer. He originally did so under the name of Smaks of London, although the name was changed to Club Tropicana in 1986. He banked at the National Westminster Bank in Barking. Paramjit Gill (also referred to as Bob) was not involved in setting up the business but joined it as Sewa Gill's partner at an early stage. He dealt with the bookkeeping and the receipt of money.

[9] The Revenue first made inquiries as a result of tax returns submitted by Sewa Gill at the end of 1984 because they showed an unexplained injection of capital into the business. Further investigations followed tax returns submitted in March 1994. The accounts specified in the indictment were: accounts in the joint names of the two appellants at the Woolwich Building Society, the Bank of Ireland in Ilford, the Royal Bank of Scotland AG in Zurich, Handelsbank (a subsidiary of the NatWest) in Zurich and the Bank of Ireland in Jersey; an account at the Royal Bank of Scotland AG in Zurich in the name of Firola, a Luxembourg registered company (the documentation for which was signed by the appellants); an account at the Bank of Ireland in Jersey in the joint names of Sewa Gill and his mother; and two National Savings Bank accounts, one in the joint names of Paramjit Gill and his sister, and one in his sole name.

[10] Counts 2, 6 and 7 concerned tax returns submitted in 1984 and 1994, on which interest earned from certain bank and building society accounts was not declared. Counts 3, 4, 10 and 11 concerned statements of assets and liabilities delivered to the inspector of taxes in 1985 and 1995, on which details of certain bank and building society accounts were not disclosed. Counts 8 and 9 concerned statements of bank and building society accounts delivered to the inspector of taxes in 1995, on which details of certain bank and building society accounts were not disclosed.

[11] The loss to the Revenue (according to evidence in the related confiscation proceedings) was stated to be £511,177·35 in the case of Sewa Gill and £23,457·21 in the case of Paramjit Gill. We understand that confiscation orders made in those proceedings are the subject of applications for leave to appeal but they are not relevant to the issues in this appeal. With that introduction we turn to consider the points raised in the appeal.

HANSARD INTERVIEW

[12] So far as we are aware, a Hansard interview is unique to investigations carried out by the Revenue. As already stated, a Hansard interview took place on 8 March 1995. Present were both the appellants and three representatives of the Revenue, namely Mr Cole, Mr Fellows and Mr Cooper, all of whom worked for the Special Compliance Office (SCO), which is the Revenue's investigation branch charged with investigating serious fraud. Mr Cole and Mr Fellows were investigators and Mr Cooper was an accountant. Although the interview was not recorded on tape, Mr Cole made notes.

[13] The relevance of the interview in this appeal is that in the course of it the appellants made a number of statements which the prosecution (which was of course the Revenue) sought to rely upon at the trial. It is important to note that it did not rely upon what was said as evidence of truth which amounted to a confession or an admission or a statement against interest. It relied upon the statements as lies which supported the conclusion that the appellants dishonestly failed to disclose accounts which they knew would expose them to liability for United Kingdom tax. We will return to the relevance of that reliance below.

[14] The appellants submitted that what they had said in the interview ought to have been excluded (as we understand it) under s 78 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. Counsel then appearing for them submitted that Code C of the Codes of Practice issued under the 1984 Act applied and that, since it was common ground that the provisions of Code C had not been followed, the judge should exclude the evidence on the ground that the admission of the evidence would (in the words of s 78) have such an adverse effect on the fairness of the proceedings that the court ought not to admit it.

[15] That submission logically gave rise to two separate questions. The first was whether Code C applied and the second was whether, if so, the evidence upon which the prosecution sought to rely should be excluded under s 78. Although the judge did not expressly advert to Code C, he treated the question as being whether a caution should have been administered and thus may, we think, be taken as having considered the question whether Code C applied. In any event he held that, having regard to the history and practice of Hansard interviews, they were part of a civil procedure to collect tax and not part of a criminal investigation. In reaching that conclusion he considered the important decision of the House of Lords in R v Allen (No 2) [2001] UKHL 45, [2001] 4 All ER 768, [2002] 1 AC 509. Mr Sapsford, who appears for both appellants on this appeal but did not appear at the trial, submits that the judge was wrong so to hold. Mr Abell submits that the judge was correct but that, in any event, we should hold that the evidence was properly admitted because it was probative and would not have such an adverse effect on the fairness of the proceedings that it would or should have been excluded under s 78. We will consider those points in turn in the context of the Hansard interview and its history.

The Hansard interview and its history

[16] Before considering the application or otherwise of Code C, it is appropriate to refer briefly to the nature of a Hansard interview, set in its historical context. It is a somewhat curious expression. At the time of the interview in this case on 8 March 1995 the interview was conducted in accordance with the practice set out in a reply to a parliamentary question given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr John Major) on 18 October 1990 (see 177 HC Official Report (6th series) written answers col 882). In the communication subsequently prepared by the SCO the Chancellor was stated to have given 'the following answer regarding tax fraud':

> 'The practice of the Board of Inland Revenue in cases of tax fraud is as follows: 1. The Board may accept a money settlement instead of instituting criminal proceedings in respect of fraud alleged to have been committed by a taxpayer. 2. They can give no undertaking that they will accept a money settlement and refrain from instituting criminal proceedings even if the case is one in which the taxpayer had made a full confession and has given full facilities for investigation of the facts. They reserve to themselves full discretion in all cases as to the course they pursue. 3. But in considering whether to accept a money settlement or to institute criminal proceedings, a it is their practice to be influenced by the fact that the taxpayer has made a full confession and has given full facilities for investigation into his affairs and from examination of such books, papers, documents or information as the Board may consider necessary. The above statement of practice should be regarded as replacing the one given by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer on 5 October 1944.'

b [17] As we understand it, the SCO followed the ordinary practice in this case. It asked the appellants to agree to an interview and asked them a number of questions. It also asked them to answer a set of standard questions as follows:

'1. In regard to any business with which you have been concerned either c as a director, partner or sole proprietor, (a) Have any transactions, receipts or expenses been omitted from or incorrectly recorded in the books thereof? (b) Are the accounts sent to the Inland Revenue correct and complete to the best of your knowledge and belief? (c) Are all taxation returns correct and complete to the best of your knowledge and belief? 2. Are all your personal taxation returns correct and complete to the best of your knowledge and d belief? 3. Are you prepared to allow an examination of all business books, business and private bank statements and other business and private records in order that the Revenue may be satisfied that your answers to the first two questions are correct?'

[18] As can be seen from the Chancellor's statement in October 1990, it
e replaced an earlier statement made to Parliament on 5 October 1944. That statement had in turn replaced the first of the statements, which had been made on 19 July 1923. The 1990 statement was in some respects significantly different from the earlier ones. In 1923 the then Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Sir William Joynson-Hicks) said that where a taxpayer voluntarily disclosed 'the f fact of his past frauds and their full extent' the Revenue would not institute criminal proceedings but would accept a pecuniary settlement. Even in a case where the taxpayer had previously furnished 'false and fraudulent particulars', if he subsequently made a 'voluntary or quasi-voluntary disclosure', the Revenue would not refuse to accept a pecuniary settlement, although his previous fraudulent replies would be regarded as relevant to determining the amount of g the financial penalty.

[19] In 1942 the Court of Criminal Appeal decided the case of R v Barker [1941] 3 All ER 33, [1941] 2 KB 381, where the facts were shortly these. The Revenue read a statement to the above effect reflecting the 1923 statement, whereafter the appellant produced two ledgers which had been fraudulently prepared in order
h to induce the Revenue to believe that the irregularities amounted to only £7,000. This court held that the statement by the Revenue, which reflected the statement in Parliament, was partly a promise or an inducement and that it was not admissible on a charge of conspiring to cheat the Revenue by producing false statements of account. It held, as Tucker J put it ([1941] 2 KB 381 at 385), that—

j 'those documents stand on precisely the same footing as an oral or written confession which is brought into existence as the result of such a promise, inducement or threat.' (See also [1941] 3 All ER 33 at 37.)

[20] The government of the day soon took steps to change the law as so stated and on 5 May 1942 the then Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Sir Kingsley Wood) told the House of Commons that, in the light of the decision in R v Barker, the 1923 statement was withdrawn. The reason he gave was that, whereas cases had occurred in which taxpayers, having promised full disclosure, deliberately withheld essential information, and until then criminal proceedings had been taken against the taxpayer, the decision in R v Barker made it practically impossible to institute proceedings where a taxpayer, purporting to act on the basis of the 1923 statement, deliberately held back information and only made partial disclosure.

[21] The statement of practice in 1942 was in some respects similar to the 1923 statement but included a statement to the effect that, if any taxpayer furnished information in relation to any fraud, he must clearly understand that such information would be available, if necessary, to deal with the situation in which a taxpayer undertook to make a full disclosure but deliberately held back information with the intention of deceiving the Revenue as to his true liability. The statement added that it was for that reason that a new section was to be added to the Finance Bill.

[22] That section, originally enacted as s 34 of the Finance Act 1942, subsequently became s 105 of the Taxes and Management Act 1970, which Lord Hutton said in R v Allen (No 2) [2001] 4 All ER 768 at [32], [2002] 1 AC 509 (with which the other members of the House of Lords agreed) reversed the effect of the decision in R v Barker. Section 105, as amended by various provisions of the Finance Act 1989, provides:

> '(1) Statements made or documents produced by or on behalf of a person shall not be inadmissible in any such proceedings as are mentioned in subsection (2) below by reason only that it has been drawn to his attention that—(a) pecuniary settlements may be accepted instead of a penalty being determined, or proceedings being instituted, in relation to any tax, (b) though no undertaking can be given as to whether or not the Board will accept such a settlement in the case of any particular person, it is the practice of the Board to be influenced by the fact that a person has made a full confession of any fraudulent conduct to which he had been a party and has given full facilities for investigation, and that he was or may have been induced thereby to make the statements or produce the documents.
>
> (2) The proceedings mentioned in subsection (1) above are—(a) any criminal proceedings against the person in question for any form of fraudulent conduct in connection with or in relation to tax, and (b) any proceedings against him for the recovery of any tax due from him, and (c) any proceedings for a penalty or on appeal against the determination of a penalty.'

[23] In R v Allen (No 2), count 11 of the indictment, which alleged cheating the Revenue, asserted that, in a schedule of assets provided by the appellant to the Revenue during the course of a Hansard investigation and pursuant to a notice issued under s 20(1) of the 1970 Act, he omitted to list his beneficial interest in shares issued by offshore companies. In the House of Lords it was argued on behalf of the appellant that the schedule was inadmissible. Reliance was placed upon the privilege against self-incrimination and in that connection upon art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998), upon ss 7(1)(b) and 22(4) of the 1998 Act and upon Saunders v UK (1997) 2 BHRC 358. Reliance was also placed upon the decision in R v Barker [1941] 3 All ER 33 at 37, [1941] 2 KB 381 at 385 in support of the submission that the statements in the schedule stood (as it was put by Tucker J) on precisely the same footing as an oral or written confession which is brought into existence as the result of such a promise, inducement or threat.

[24] The House of Lords held that it was not necessary to consider the alleged breach of art 6 because the 1998 Act did not have retrospective effect. However, the House of Lords considered and rejected the above submissions. It did so by reference to the principle that, when the courts have excluded a confession because it was involuntary having been obtained by an inducement, they have done so on the ground that it was unsafe to rely on the confession as being true. See the speech of Lord Hutton in R v Allen (No 2) [2001] 4 All ER 768 at [34], where he quoted a well-known statement to that effect by Lord Sumner in Ibrahim v R [1914] AC 599 at 610–611, [1914–14] All ER Rep 874 at 878.

[25] The essential reasons for the decision on this point in R v Allen (No 2) can be seen from Lord Hutton's speech (at [35]):

> 'However, in R v Barker and in this case the respective accused did not give information contained in the documents and the schedule, respectively, which the Crown claimed was true, both accused gave false information and were prosecuted for giving that false information. To the extent that there was an inducement contained in the Hansard statement, the inducement was to give true and accurate information to the Revenue, but the accused in both cases did not respond to that inducement and instead of giving true and accurate information gave false information. Therefore, in my opinion, the appellant's argument in this case that he was induced by the hope of non-institution of criminal proceedings held out by the Revenue to provide the schedule and that its provision was, therefore, involuntary is invalid. If, in response to the Hansard statement, the appellant had given true and accurate information which disclosed that he had earlier cheated the Revenue and had then been prosecuted for that earlier dishonesty, he would have had a strong argument that the criminal proceedings were unfair and an even stronger argument that the Crown should not rely on evidence of his admission, but that is the reverse of what actually occurred.'

It can be seen from that paragraph that the House of Lords rejected the suggestion that a response to a s 20 notice in the context of the Hansard procedure under the 1990 statement is inadmissible as being akin to a confession which is brought into existence as the result of a promise, inducement or threat. Importantly, however, a distinction was drawn between that situation and one where the appellant had given true information that he had cheated the Revenue and then been prosecuted. In that event Lord Hutton thought that he would have a strong argument that the Crown should not be permitted to rely upon the evidence of his admission. It is not perhaps absolutely clear whether that was under ss 76 or 78 of the 1984 Act or, indeed, at common law.

[26] On 10 September 2002, which was of course after the trial in the instant case, the European Court of Human Rights rejected an application in the case of Allen v UK App No 76574/01 (10 September 2002, unreported) as being inadmissible. Both the self-incrimination point and the inducement point were advanced on behalf of the applicant. The court's reasons included the following:

> 'The court notes that in this case the applicant does not complain that the information about his assets which he gave the Inland Revenue was used against him in the sense that it incriminated him in the commission of an offence due to acts or omissions in which he had been involved prior to that moment. His situation may therefore be distinguished from that of the applicant in Saunders v UK ((1997) 2 BHRC 358) ... The applicant was charged with and convicted of the offence of making a false declaration of his assets to the Inland Revenue. In other words, he lied, or perjured himself through giving inaccurate information about his assets. This was not an example of forced self-incrimination about an offence which he had previously committed; it was the offence itself. It may be that the applicant lied in order to prevent the Inland Revenue uncovering conduct which might possibly be criminal and lead to a prosecution. However, the privilege against self-incrimination cannot be interpreted as giving a general immunity to actions motivated by the desire to evade investigation by the revenue authorities.'

[27] The court then noted that there was a distinction between the penalty of £300 for refusing to make a declaration of assets and the penalty of up to two years' imprisonment for refusing to answer questions in Saunders' case and added:

'Nor does the court consider that any improper inducement was brought to bear through the use of the so-called "Hansard Warning" which informed the applicant of the practice of the Inland Revenue of taking into account the co-operation of the taxpayer in deciding whether to bring any prosecution for fraud. There is no indication that the applicant was misled as to the effect of the warning, accepting that it could not be interpreted as any kind of guarantee of freedom from prosecution. Consequently, the court does not find that the facts of this case disclose any infringement of the right to silence or privilege against self-incrimination or that there has been any unfairness contrary to art 6(1) of the convention.'

[28] It should be noted that in R v Allen (No 2) the House was not considering whether evidence should be excluded under s 78 of the 1984 Act. Nor was there any consideration of the question whether Code C applied or whether the Revenue should have administered a caution before asking any questions or submitting a questionnaire. We return to that possible distinction below.

The 1984 Act and Code C

[29] Section 66(1)(b) of the 1984 Act provides for the issue of codes of practice in connection with 'the detention, treatment, questioning and identification of persons by police officers'. The relevant code in this regard is Code C. Section 67(9) provides:

'Persons other than police officers who are charged with the duty of investigating offences or charging offenders shall in the discharge of that duty have regard to any relevant provision of such a code.'

[30] In R v Okafor [1994] 3 All ER 741 it was held that Code C applied to customs officers as it does to police officers. Here it is correctly conceded that in appropriate circumstances the code applies to SCO officers, but Mr Abell submits that the code did not apply to the officers who attended the Hansard interview of 8 March 1995 because the time when it would apply had not yet arrived.

[31] He submits that Mr Cole and Mr Fellows were not yet 'charged with the duty of investigating offences or charging offenders' within the meaning of s 67(9) of the 1984 Act. He also relies upon the express terms of the edition of Code C which was in force at the time of the interview. In particular he relies upon para C: 10.1, which was in these terms:

> 'A person whom there are grounds to suspect of an offence must be cautioned before any questions about it (or further questions if it is his answers to previous questions that provide grounds for suspicion) are put to him for the purpose of obtaining evidence which may be given to a court in a prosecution. He therefore need not be cautioned if questions are put for other purposes, for example, to establish his identity or his ownership of any vehicle or the need to search him in the exercise of powers of stop and search.'

Mr Abell submits that the officers were not putting questions at the Hansard interview 'for the purpose of obtaining evidence which may be given to a court in a prosecution'.

[32] We note in passing that in the edition of Code C which came into effect on 10 April 1995, which was just over a month after the interview in this case, para 10.1 had been amended to read as follows:

> 'A person whom there are grounds to suspect of an offence must be cautioned before any questions about it (or further questions if it is his answers to previous questions which provide the grounds for suspicion) are put to him regarding his involvement or suspected involvement in that offence if his answers or his silence (ie failure or refusal to answer a question or to answer satisfactorily) may be given in evidence to a court in a prosecution. He therefore need not be cautioned if questions are put for other purposes, for example, solely to establish his identity or his ownership of any vehicle or to obtain information in accordance with any relevant statutory requirement (see paragraph 10.5C) or in furtherance of the proper and effective conduct of a search, (for example to determine the need to search in the exercise of powers of stop and search or to seek co-operation while carrying out a search) or to seek verification of a written record in accordance with paragraph 11.13.'

We accept Mr Abell's submission that the question in this case must be judged by reference to the earlier edition of the code.

[33] Mr Abell concedes that the appellants were suspected of serious fraud before the interview and that it was because of that fact that the interview took place. It is plain from the available material that that concession is correctly made. However, he submits that the appellants were properly informed as to the nature of a Hansard interview and that Code C did not apply. In accordance with what we understand was normal practice, the appellants were sent a leaflet explaining the role of the SCO. They were also recommended to consider having professional representation at the meeting. The appellants considered having their accountant present but decided not to.

[34] Although we have not seen the leaflet IR120 which was sent to the appellants, we have seen the equivalent leaflets which are in use now. Code of Practice 8 (COP 8) relates to SCO investigations where serious fraud is not suspected, whereas COP 9 relates to SCO investigations in respect of 'cases of serious fraud'. COP 9 includes the following:

> 'Introduction: This Code of practice tells you how the Special Compliance Office will carry out investigations into cases where serious fraud is suspected and the investigation is not being conducted with a view to criminal prosecution. Most taxpayers pay what is due and others make genuine mistakes. If we suspect someone is deliberately trying to pay less tax, we will conduct a thorough investigation. We want taxpayers to pay the right amount of tax. This Code of Practice covers cases where we suspect serious fraud and gives you the opportunity to fully disclose any irregularities in your tax affairs. It tells you how we carry out investigations and promises that we will treat you fairly and courteously in accordance with the law and "Our Service Commitment to you" (see inside of back cover). The Board of Inland Revenue has complete discretion to pursue prosecutions in the circumstances it considers appropriate. Where serious tax fraud has been committed the Board may however accept a money settlement instead of pursuing a criminal prosecution. If at any time the Board decides that a criminal investigation is appropriate, this Code of Practice will cease to apply. We will then conduct the investigation under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 the Criminal Procedure & Investigations Act 1996, and their respective Codes of practice. In Scotland and Northern Ireland we will conduct any criminal investigation under the law applicable in those parts of the United Kingdom ...

General

"We will investigate any situation where we suspect serious tax fraud. This includes the tax affairs of individuals, partnerships and companies. We set high standards for the way we work. This code describes how we give you an opportunity to tell us what, if anything, is wrong with your tax affairs and how you can disclose any irregularities." '

[35] It can be seen from COP 9 that it is now made clear to the taxpayer suspected of fraud that the Revenue is not at that time carrying out a criminal investigation but reserves the right to do so in the future. Although we have not seen the document sent to the appellants, we understand that it drew a similar distinction. Mr Abell submits that such a document underlines his submission that those carrying out a Hansard interview are not 'charged with a duty of investigating offences or charging offenders' within the meaning of s 67(9) of the 1984 Act and that the questions were not put 'for the purpose of obtaining evidence' within the meaning of para 10.1 of Code C in the form then in force.

[36] The judge accepted that submission. He held that the Hansard interview was part of a civil process designed to gather in money and not a criminal investigation. As we read his ruling, he formed the view that, if Parliament had taken the view that a caution was required it would have so provided when it enacted s 105 of the 1970 Act. In short the judge took the view that the Hansard interview was part of a separate well-understood form of proceeding outside the scope of Code C.

[37] While we fully understand the importance of the Revenue being able to recover the tax owed to it and the value of the Hansard procedure in that regard, we are unable to accept the Revenue's submission. The statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer made in Parliament on 18 October 1990 makes it quite clear that, while in cases of tax fraud the Revenue will be influenced by a full confession in deciding whether to accept a money settlement (including presumably an appropriate penalty), it gives no undertaking to do so or to refrain from instituting criminal proceedings. Tax fraud involves the commission of a criminal offence or offences, so that it is in our view evident that the role of the SCO investigating tax fraud involves the investigation of a criminal offence.

[38] Although we recognise that a caution had not been administered in the past at a Hansard interview because such an interview has not been regarded by the Revenue as subject to Code C, in our judgment, that is to give too narrow an interpretation of the expression 'charged with the duty of investigating offences' in s 67(9) of the 1984 Act. The officers of the SCO were charged with investigating serious fraud and, since serious fraud inevitably involves the commission of an offence or offences, it seem to us to follow that they were charged with the duty of investigating offences.

[39] The purpose of Code C is to ensure that interviewees are informed of their rights, one of which is not to answer to questions, and to inform them of the use which might be made of their answers in criminal proceedings. It is clear from the parliamentary statement that the SCO had the possibility of criminal proceedings in mind in respect of the fraud about which they were asking questions and we can see no reason why the Revenue should not have cautioned taxpayers suspected of fraud before asking them questions in these circumstances. We cannot see why a caution should reduce the chances of a taxpayer making a full confession, which was the purpose of the process. However that may be, since the Revenue expressly reserved the right to prosecute for fraud, it appears to us that one of the purposes of asking the questions must have been the 'obtaining of evidence which may be given to a court in a prosecution', even if the Revenue's main aim was to arrive at a monetary settlement.

[40] For these reasons we have reached a different conclusion from the judge and hold that Code C applied to the Hansard interview conducted on 8 March 1995 and that the appellants should have been cautioned and a tape recording made of the interview. The question then arises whether the evidence of what the appellants said at the interview should have been excluded under s 78 of the 1984 Act on the ground that its admission would have such an adverse effect on the fairness of the proceedings that the court ought not to admit it. We turn to that question.

Section 78 of the 1984 Act

[41] It does not follow from the conclusion that Code C applied and that no caution was administered or tape recording made in breach of para 10.1 that evidence of everything said by the appellants at the meeting must be excluded. The principles are stated in this way in Archbold's Criminal Pleading, Evidence and Practice (2003 edn) p 1344 (para 15-15), by reference to R v Absolam (1989) 88 Cr App Rep 332 and R v Delaney (1989) 88 Cr App Rep 338:

> 'They are as follows: (a) a breach of a code does not lead automatically to exclusion (Delaney); (b) where there is a breach, the judge has a discretion to exclude the evidence (Absolam/Delaney); (c) the breach must be significant and substantial, and the more so, the more likely the judge is to exclude the evidence (Absolam); (d) bad faith/flagrant disregard of the codes' provisions will make exclusion more likely (Delaney); (e) the test to be applied is the section 78 test (R. v. Grannell ((1989) 90 Cr App R 149), CA); (f) in applying the test, the judge should have regard to the rationale of the provisions of the code ... and the extent to which the breach is likely to defeat the rationale (Delaney); (g) if there is a breach but the judge admits the evidence, he should give reasons for so doing: R. v. Allen [1995] Crim. L.R. 643, CA, (an identification case); (h) if the evidence is allowed in despite the breach, the judge should explain the significance of the breach to the jury, as it may go to the weight they attach to the evidence (see R. v. Graham [1994] Crim. L.R. 212, CA and R. v. Quinn ([1995] 1 Cr App R 480) ...'

[42] The opinion stated by Lord Hutton in R v Allen (No 2) [2001] 4 All ER 768 at [35], [2002] 1 AC 509 suggests that reliance upon the truth of a statement made at an interview may well not be admissible. It appears that he took that view notwithstanding s 105 of the 1970 Act. It may well be that one of the reasons for such a conclusion would be a breach of para 10.1 of Code C. However, that question does not arise here because the Revenue did not seek to introduce statements by the appellants as true. It sought to introduce the statements as lies told by the appellants, in that they denied that there were any irregularities in their tax affairs and denied the existence of certain offshore accounts the existence of which the Revenue said could be proved at trial. It was submitted that the lies were relevant to the dishonest state of mind adopted by the appellants.

[43] It was not, as we understand it, submitted on behalf of the appellants that, if the evidence was not excluded under s 78, the Revenue was not entitled to rely upon it in that way. The judge subsequently summed up the statements made at the Hansard interview, and indeed on other occasions, by giving an appropriate Lucas direction (see R v Lucas [1981] 2 All ER 1008, [1981] QB 720) and no complaint is made about the nature of that direction.

[44] We have reached the conclusion that the admission of the evidence would not have had such an adverse effect on the fairness of the proceedings that the court ought not to have admitted it. There was a breach of Code C which we would characterise as significant but it was certainly not caused by any bad faith and could not fairly be regarded as involving a flagrant disregard of the code's provisions. The Revenue took the view that the code did not apply because a criminal investigation was not under way. It did not institute such an investigation until about 30 November 1995. It regarded the Hansard interview as essentially a civil procedure and, it may be noted, the judge agreed. We have formed a different view but we do not regard the Revenue's contrary opinion as in any way irrational.

[45] Section 105 of the 1970 Act contemplates that statements made at Hansard interviews may be admissible in evidence. Although s 105 does not in our judgment prevent reliance upon failure to comply with Code C because a statement ruled inadmissible under s 78 of the 1984 Act would not be inadmissible 'by reason only' (our emphasis) of the two matters referred to in paras (a) and (b) of s 105(1) of the 1970 Act quoted above, it is we think relevant to the exercise of the discretion under s 78 that Parliament expected such statements to be admissible in some circumstances.

[46] The rationale of para 10.1 of Code C is that already stated, namely to ensure that interviewees are informed of their rights, one of which is not to answer questions, and to inform them of the use which might be made of their answers in criminal proceedings. However, it seems to us that the principal purpose of such a procedure is to ensure, so far as possible, that interviewees do not make admissions unless they wish to do so and are aware of the consequences. We do not think that the principal purpose of the code is to prevent interviewees from telling lies. That is not to say that lies told by a person at an interview to which Code C applies will always be admissible where there is a breach of the code.

Each case depends upon its own facts but, here, we can see no unfairness in admitting the statements as lies, provided that they were otherwise admissible and an appropriate direction was given, as was the case here.

[47] The appellants were fully informed as to the purpose of the interview and warned that even if they made a full confession the Revenue reserved the right to take criminal proceedings against them. Such proceedings would plainly not potentially be limited to proceedings for a penalty, so that it is not necessary for us to consider whether such proceedings would involve the determination of a criminal charge, although it seems likely that they would (see eg Han v Customs and Excise Comrs [2001] EWCA Civ 1040, [2001] 4 All ER 687, [2001] 1 WLR 2253). The appellants were thus aware that criminal proceedings were in prospect. They were advised on several occasions to have professional representation at the interview but chose not to do so.

[48] They must have known that they were not obliged to answer the questions. On the Revenue case, the same can be said here as was said by Lord Hutton in R v Allen (No 2) [2001] 4 All ER 768 at [35]:

> 'To the extent that there was an inducement contained in the Hansard statement, the inducement was to give true and accurate information to the Revenue, but the accused in both cases did not respond to that inducement and instead of giving true and accurate information gave false information.'

We do not think that it is arguable that, if a caution had been administered, the appellants would have done anything different from what they did. They had time to consider their position. We accept Mr Abell's submission that responses to questions at the Hansard interview could have been delayed. Instead, each of the appellants answered the standard questions set out in para 17 above, No, Yes, Yes, Yes and Yes. Thus each said that no transactions, receipts or expenses had been omitted from the books and that all accounts and tax returns sent to the Revenue were correct and complete to the best of his knowledge and belief. The Revenue's case at the trial was that those answers were dishonest and untrue. We do not think that there was anything unfair about allowing the Revenue to rely upon those lies if it was otherwise appropriate.

[49] As indicated above, Mr Cole made notes of what was said at the meeting. Although there was no tape recording, so far as we are aware it is not suggested that the notes were in any material respect inaccurate. After recording the answers to the questions, Mr Cole's note includes the following:

> 'Cole said that given the fact that there was no professional representation at the meeting and the importance attached to the Gills' response to the questions, he would await their written response within seven days. Fellows said that their verbal responses effectively denied that there were any irregularities under the Hansard policy. Cole explained that if that was the written response submitted in due course, then the Revenue would investigate the matter in order to satisfy itself that there were no irregularities. Cole added that if it subsequently was established that the responses to the Hansard questionnaire were incorrect, then serious consequences could ensue. Both Gills confirmed that they understood the position but would need to discuss their responses with their professional advisers as soon as possible.'

At the end of the interview, after the appellants had answered a number of specific questions, Mr Fellows said that he knew that the truth had not been told at the meeting and that, if no disclosure was made, the Revenue would commence its own investigation and look for the evidence to prosecute. a [50] After the interview the appellants were sent Mr Cole's notes so that they could check the accuracy and sign them but they did not reply to several letters asking them to do so.

[51] Mr Sapsford submits that it was unfair to admit what was said for two further reasons. The first was that the Revenue did not inform the appellants of b all the information in their possession before the interview began. He relies both on information available at the trial and on information which has been disclosed for the purposes of this appeal. It is correct that the documents show that the Revenue did not disclose the detailed nature of its suspicions before the interview but, in our judgment, it was not bound to do so and there was nothing unfair in its not doing so. A defendant in a criminal trial is of course entitled to know what c case he has to meet so that he has an opportunity to meet it but it does not follow that an investigator is bound to reveal all the facts known to him at each stage, provided that he does not mislead the interviewee in any material way. We are not persuaded that the Revenue misled the appellants at the interview and we can see no reason why the Revenue should not have asked the questions it in fact d asked without disclosing more than they in fact did. There is in any event no arguable case that the appellants told the alleged lies as a result of any such non-disclosure.

[52] We also observe in this regard that the failure to disclose the documents now disclosed before the trial does not, in our judgment, affect the safety of the convictions. Finally, there was a suggestion in the course of argument that there e was no equality of arms between the Revenue and the appellants. We reject that submission. The Hansard interviews were fairly conducted, as were the later interviews referred to below, and the appellants had full and entirely adequate representation both at the trial and in this court.

[53] The second reason was that, when the appellants were later interviewed f under caution at Chingford police station between 22 April and 28 October 1997, they should not have been asked questions about the answers given by them in the Hansard interview. We do not accept that submission. During an interview under caution, depending upon the circumstances of the particular case, it is permissible to ask questions regarding previous oral statements made by the g suspect, whether at an earlier interview under caution or otherwise. We can see nothing unfair about such questions being asked on the facts of this case.

[54] In short, we have reached the conclusion that the admission of the statements made in the interview did not have such an adverse effect on the fairness of the proceedings that the court ought not to have admitted it. Indeed, h we do not think that it had any adverse effect on the fairness of the proceedings. The appellants chose to tell lies, if that is what they were; the appellants had every opportunity at the trial to explain why they had answered as they did; the jury were correctly directed as to the correct approach; and we have reached the conclusion that there was nothing unsafe about the convictions in this regard.

[55] We would add three points. The first is that, since the judge did not j consider this question separately, he did not of course give reasons for a decision but we have now given the reasons why the evidence was properly admitted. The second is that for the same reason the judge did not explain the significance of the breach of the code to the jury. The reason given in point (h) in the extract from Archbold quoted above is that it may go to the weight to be attached to the evidence. That is apparent in an identification case, but less clear here. It is difficult to see how such a direction could have helped the jury in deciding whether lies were told or the significance of them (if any). We do not think that the absence of such a direction even arguably makes these convictions unsafe.

[56] The third point is that it seems to us that the conclusion we have reached is consistent with the approach, not only of the House of Lords in R v Allen (No 2) [2001] 4 All ER 768, [2002] 1 AC 509, but also of the European Court of Human Rights in the passages from the same case quoted above (see Allen v UK App No 76574/01 (10 September 2002, unreported)).

[57] For these reasons the only ground upon which leave to appeal was granted by the single judge fails.

DOMICILE

[58] This is the only point contained in the grounds considered by the single judge in respect of which leave was not granted that Mr Sapsford advanced by way of oral argument. He submits that the judge misdirected the jury on the issue of domicile. He submits that it was for the Revenue to prove that each appellant was domiciled in the United Kingdom and that the judge failed correctly to direct the jury in this regard.

[59] Mr Sapsford correctly submits that domicile is different from nationality or residence. As we see it, the general position may be summarised in this way. Every person has a domicile of origin which he retains unless and until he acquires a domicile of choice. Mr Sapsford draws our attention to a passage in the judgment of Simon P in Henderson v Henderson [1965] 1 All ER 179 at 181, [1967] P 77 at 80, which includes the following:

> 'First, clear evidence is required to establish a change of domicil. In particular, to displace the domicile of origin in favour of the domicil of choice, the standard of proof goes beyond a mere balance of probabilities. Where residence, however long, is neutral or colourless or indeterminate in character, it will not give rise to an inference that the domicil of origin has been abandoned. Secondly, on the other hand, a mere "floating intention" (to adopt the language in STORY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS (8th Edn.) p. 50) to return to the country of origin at some future period is not sufficient for the retention of the domicil of origin if the propositus has settled in some other territory subject to a distinctive system of law with the intention of remaining there for an indefinite time.'

[60] It is common ground on the facts that the domicile of origin of both appellants was Indian. Although Paramjit Singh Gill was born in England, Sewa Singh Gill was born in India and both their parents were domiciled in India. There was scope for debate as to whether they had acquired a domicile of choice in the United Kingdom. However, it is important to appreciate how the question of domicile came to be relevant at the trial.

[61] As already indicated, the prosecution case was that over the years the appellants had each systematically failed to declare accounts held at various financial institutions, both in the United Kingdom and offshore. The motive behind that conduct was said to be to evade paying tax due on income generated by their business Club Tropicana. It was the prosecution case that the moneys held in those accounts were the undeclared profits of the business and thus liable to tax.

[62] One of the appellants' defences was that moneys held offshore in accounts in the name of one or both of the appellants, or held jointly with family members, were not theirs but the profits of the Indian farm owned by their mother which never came into the United Kingdom. The accounts were funded by the 'Hawala' system, which was a means by which moneys were brought out of India in such a way as to circumvent the Indian exchange control regulations.

[63] The Revenue challenged that case on three bases: first, that the farm profits could not account for all the moneys held offshore; secondly, that the appellants were in any event heavily involved in running the farm; and thirdly, that the 'Hawala' system involved moneys being brought to the appellants' home in the United Kingdom before being banked offshore.

[64] On any of those bases, the domicile of the appellants would be irrelevant. The defence first raised the issue of domicile on 9 January 2002 when the report of Alan Polling was served on the appellants' behalf. Mr Polling is or was a solicitor employed by a firm of chartered accountants as a tax consultant. The Revenue subsequently called three witnesses as to domicile and the defence called Mr Polling. It is not entirely clear to us on what basis this evidence was admissible, but it was called by both sides, so far as we are aware, without objection.

[65] It is stated in the Revenue's skeleton argument on this issue that the witnesses were in broad agreement and there was no suggestion at the hearing of the appeal that that was not the case. The agreed position may be summarised in this way. (i) The only significance of an individual who is resident being treated as not being domiciled here is that he is not liable to United Kingdom tax on overseas income unless that income is brought onshore. A non-domiciled resident in the United Kingdom is liable to United Kingdom tax on income earned here and on income earned offshore but brought here, even if it is subsequently sent back offshore. (ii) By s 65(4) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, as it applied in the relevant years, an individual wishing to avail himself of treatment as not being domiciled here must '[satisfy] the Board that he is not domiciled in the United Kingdom'. He does so 'on a claim to the Board'. Such a claim should be made within six years of the year to which the claim relates, unless the Revenue, in assessing the individual, is itself looking further back. (iii) A competent accountant would have advised both appellants that the Revenue would be likely to accept a claim by them to be treated as not being domiciled in the United Kingdom. The key question was whether the appellants intended to remain permanently in the United Kingdom.

[66] We note in regard to that last point that in the course of the appeal Mr Sapsford showed us a letter dated 14 July 2003 from the Revenue's Centre for Non-Residents, Residence, Advice and Liabilities, to the appellants' solicitors stating that on the basis of the information given to them they were prepared to treat the appellants as not domiciled in the United Kingdom for the tax year ended April 2003. That seems consistent with point (iii), above.

[67] The Revenue's submissions may be summarised as follows. (i) Each of the appellants accepted in cross-examination that they made no claim to be treated as non-domiciled in the United Kingdom, either during the relevant years or subsequently, despite being represented by accountants. (ii) Each of the appellants also accepted in cross-examination that at no time during either the Hansard interviews or the interviews under caution did they contend that, as non-domiciled residents, they would not be liable to pay tax on moneys generated offshore which remained offshore. (iii) The jury could properly infer that the reason the appellants did not claim to be domiciled outside the United Kingdom was that so to assert would not achieve any legitimate tax advantage because the moneys were not offshore funds at all but were the undeclared profits of the Club Tropicana or because it was not their intention to return to India in due course. (iv) Each of the appellants accepted in cross-examination that what they said was 'Hawala' system money did arrive at their address in the form of cash or cheques before being sent back offshore. (v) The jury were entitled to conclude that, even if some of the moneys came from India, since the moneys arrived onshore and the appellants were involved in the farm and the money movement, they were in any event liable to United Kingdom tax. (vi) It follows that the domicile defence depended upon the jury's finding of the facts. It could only bite if the jury were to conclude that the moneys held offshore had been generated offshore and never came onshore. (vii) The judge dealt adequately with the domicile issue in the summing up.

[68] We have considered the materials to which we were referred and are satisfied that each of submissions (i)–(vi) is correct and that the judge adequately explained the position to the jury. It seems to us that in these circumstances it is very unlikely indeed that the jury ever came to consider the question whether the appellants were in fact domiciled in the United Kingdom or in India at the relevant time. After all, they themselves said in evidence that 'Hawala' money came into the United Kingdom before being sent offshore. It is only in respect of any moneys which were earned offshore and remained offshore that the question of actual domicile was relevant. Otherwise the issue centred round the state of mind of the appellants for the reasons set out in the Revenue's submissions.

[69] To the extent that the issue of actual domicile was live, the judge directed the jury in accordance with the evidence of Mr Polling, who was called on behalf of the defence, and whose evidence (as indicated above) was not in this respect in issue between the parties. In the course of his summing up on this issue the judge said:

> 'Domicile. It is an unusual word. I must say something about it, members of the jury, but the issue is quite simple and, in the end, it will depend on what view you take of the evidence. But, as explained to you by the expert Mr Polling, everybody has a domicile and the defendants had the domicile of their birth because they were the sons of Naranjan and therefore they have an Indian domicile, but then of course were resident in this country. What Mr Polling told you is that in the light of the information that he was given, to the effect that both Sewa and Bob, who are fluent Punjabi speakers, have an intention to return to India on a permanent basis, if that is true, then the consequences are, and the prosecution and defence both agree this, and it was in truth the intention of each defendant to return to live in India permanently, then they are non-domiciled for the purposes of United Kingdom tax. So you do not have to decide whether Mr Polling's conclusions are correct or incorrect. They are in law correct. The issue is whether it is actually true that the defendants have and always have had a clear and settled intention to return permanently to India. In the course of Mr Abell's cross-examination of the defendants, neither defendant was expressly and actually challenged about their evidence that they intended permanently to return to India; but the Crown say, you may think, members of the jury, as a matter of reality, they did not and neither of them did in truth have a clear intention of returning to India to live there permanently (1) because they never claimed to be non-domiciled in their dealings with the Revenue in this case, nor was it ever raised in the detailed questions from

Mr Tulloch in 1997. The defence say that you should be persuaded on the evidence that despite the fact that the defendants never made a formal claim to be treated as non-domicile, they were in reality claiming to be non-domicile as long ago as 1984 when there was a letter written by Mr Mounteer to Sewa Gill on the subject and I will remind you of that letter in the course of my review of their evidence.'

[70] The judge then explained the relevance of the domicile question as we have done above. Later in his summing up he referred expressly to the letter written by Mr Mounteer and to the detailed evidence of the appellants, both in chief and in cross-examination. In that part of his summing up he correctly identified the various questions which the jury had to consider as to the appellants' state of mind at different stages of the case.

[71] We do not think that the judge's explanation of the legal position, based as it was on the statement of principle set out in Mr Polling's evidence and accepted by both sides at the trial, was incorrect. In the light of the principle set out, for example, by Simon P in Henderson v Henderson [1965] 1 All ER 179, [1967] P 77 (quoted above), it was a sufficient statement of the relevant question for the purposes of this case to ask whether each defendant intended to return to live in India permanently. If it had not been, counsel for the defence would no doubt have pointed it out to the judge. It was then for the jury to decide what evidence to accept and what to reject.

[72] The judge gave the jury a standard and adequate direction as to the burden of proof and we detect no error in this respect, either as to domicile or, indeed, as to any other aspect of the case. We certainly do not think that the convictions are arguably unsafe by reason of any defect in the summing up under this head. It follows that we take the view that the single judge was right to refuse leave to appeal on this ground and we refuse this renewed application.

CHEATING THE REVENUE

[73] In this ground it is alleged that the judge misdirected the jury in respect of the legal concept of cheat. The judge said this in the course of his summing up:

'The offence of cheating the public revenue does not necessarily require a false representation by words or conduct. The meaning of cheat in this indictment, members of the jury, can include any form of fraudulent conduct which has the result of diverting money from the Revenue and depriving the Revenue of money to which it is entitled. It has of course to be fraudulent conduct; that is to say, deliberate conduct by the defendant whose case you are considering ... to prejudice or to take the risk of prejudicing the Revenue's right to the tax in question, knowing that he has no right to do so ... The Crown do not have to prove that tax was actually evaded, providing that there was deliberate conduct with intent to defraud [and] that there was a risk of tax being evaded.'

[74] The single judge took the view that it was not arguable that the judge misdirected the jury in this regard. We agree.

DIRECTIONS ON THE ISSUES

[75] The final proposed ground of appeal is that the judge failed to give the jury clear directions as to the issues they had to decide on each count on the indictment. Again, the single judge considered this ground, which involves looking at each count, and concluded that it was not arguable. We agree. The judge considered each count in some detail and, in our judgment, the jury can have been in no doubt as to what they had to decide in each case. The appellants' submission in this regard, if correct, would involve unnecessary and undesirable over-analysis of the facts.

CONCLUSION

[76] For the reasons we have given we dismiss the appeal on the ground in respect of which leave was given, namely that relating to the Hansard interview. We refuse the renewed application on the other grounds, including the suggested ground based on non-disclosure. In our judgment these convictions were safe. We would add that, in our view, Mr Sapsford was right to concentrate in his oral submissions on the Hansard and domicile issues.

Appeal dismissed.

Stephen Leake Barrister.

Miah v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions

[2003] EWCA Civ 1111

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
WARD, MANCE LJJ AND NELSON J
19 MAY, 25 JULY 2003

Social security – Income support – Jobseeker's allowance – Entitlement – Capital disregards – Dwelling occupied as the home – Claimant's large family living in two houses – Whether both houses one dwelling occupied as the home – Jobseeker's Allowance Regulations 1996, Sch 8, para 1.

The claimant was a married man with eleven children, eight of whom were dependent on him. He owned two three-bedroomed houses in which he and his family lived which were on the same street but separated by two other properties. He claimed income-based jobseeker's allowance, entitlement to which was subject to a requirement that a claimant's capital did not exceed the prescribed amount. The effect of reg 108(2)[a] of and para 1[b] of Sch 8 to the Jobseeker's Allowance Regulations 1996 was that 'the dwelling occupied as the home' was to be disregarded in the calculation of a claimant's capital. When his entitlement to benefit was determined the claimant's first house was disregarded but his second was not, with the result that his capital exceeded the prescribed amount. His claim was therefore disallowed. The claimant appealed to a Social Security Appeal Tribunal on the basis that both houses were occupied as one dwelling. The tribunal dismissed his appeal and he appealed to a social security commissioner. The commissioner held that it was possible that living arrangements in two houses might form only one dwelling but that there was sufficient uncertainty about the facts as to require the matter to be remitted for rehearing before a differently-constituted tribunal. The Secretary of State appealed.

Held – For the purposes of para 1 of Sch 8 to the 1996 regulations 'the dwelling occupied as the home' could be spread over two physically separate buildings, so that there was still only one home, the whole value of which was to be disregarded under reg 108(2). Paragraph 1 of Sch 8 used the word 'dwelling', rather than, for example, 'dwelling house' or 'residential accommodation'. The impression given by the expansion of the word 'dwelling' into a phrase, 'dwelling occupied as the home', was that the legislature had intended to convey the function to be served by the concept of a dwelling rather than to connote its bricks and mortar. That function was a place serving as home for a claimant and that place was not necessarily confined to a single building. A test for determining where home was, was to ask whether a claimant's arrangements were such that one house was, in effect, used as an annex of the other, or to put it another way, whether it was a single home on a split site. Applying that test a decision-maker could with common sense determine what a claimant was using a Regulation 108, so far as material, is set out at [7], below

b Paragraph 1, so far as material, is set out at [8], below

as his home. It was the place where he lived, where he ate, slept, bathed, relaxed, which he enjoyed with his family. The commissioner's decision had therefore been correct, and accordingly, the appeal would be dismissed (see [26], [27], [32], [35], [37], [48], [60], [61], below).

Notes

For the calculation of capital, see 44(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 274.

Cases referred to in judgments

Hinchy v Secretary or State for Work and Pensions [2003] EWCA Civ 138, [2003] 2 All ER 289, [2003] 1 WLR 2018.
Social Security Decision CIS 81/91, Tribunal of Comrs.
Social Security Decision CIS 427/91, Tribunal of Comrs.
Social Security Decision R(SB) 10/89, Tribunal of Comrs.

Appeal

The Secretary of State for Works and Pensions appealed with permission of Social Security Commissioner EAL Bano from his decision on 23 May 2002 remitting the claim of Mohammed Miah for income-based jobseeker's allowance, which had been dismissed by a Social Security Appeal Tribunal, to a differently-constituted tribunal for rehearing. The facts are set out in the judgment of Ward LJ.

James Maurici (instructed by the Office of the Solicitor, Department of Work and Pensions) for the Secretary of State.
Daniel Kolinsky (instructed by McGrath & Co) for Mr Miah.

Cur adv vult

25 July 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

WARD LJ.

THE ISSUE

[1] This is the question which arises in this appeal: is there one dwelling or two dwellings occupied as the home where a claimant for jobseeker's allowance normally occupies as his home two houses separated from each other by other houses in the street, each house being overcrowded if the claimant and his large family were removed from both houses into only one of them? On 23 May 2002 the Social Security Commissioner, Mr EAL Bano, so construed the Jobseeker's Allowance Regulations 1996, SI 1996/207 as to lead him to the conclusion that there could be only one dwelling in those circumstances (Social Security Decision CJSA 4620 2000) but he gave the Secretary of State permission to appeal to us.

THE FACTS

[2] Mr Mohammed Miah is a married man. He is the father of 12 children, the baby having been born after the time which is the material time for the purpose of this appeal. At that time, February 2000, his eldest son was 22 years old, working in Leicester and mainly living away from home. He had twin daughters aged 20 at university in Birmingham. But there were eight others still dependent upon him. He seems to have been a hard-working man who was employed by the Somali bank for 22 years until he was made redundant on 30 June 1999. After his entitlement to contribution-based jobseeker's allowance had expired, he lived on his redundancy moneys and when they had been depleted, he claimed income-based jobseeker's allowance. He would not be entitled to this allowance if his capital were to exceed the prescribed amount set by the 1996 regulations at £8,000. In calculating his capital only one dwelling occupied as the home may be disregarded. Mr Miah and his family occupy two properties. His original home was 11A Haseley Road, Handsworth but as his family grew, the need for further accommodation became pressing. Hence when a nearby house at 19 Haseley Road became available in 1992, he purchased it. Two other houses in the street separate these two properties from each other. Each of these properties is a three-bedroomed house. His eldest son returned to number 19 at weekends and although the twins tended to eat out, they usually slept there. The nature and extent of its other use by Mr Miah and his family was in dispute. If Mr and Mrs Miah and all their dependent children were to occupy only one of those houses, that property would be overcrowded within the meaning of ss 325 and 326 of the Housing Act 1985 and Mr Miah would commit an offence which could lead to his having to pay a fine not exceeding level 2 and a further fine for every day subsequent to the date on which he was convicted on which the offence continued.

[3] On 22 March 2000 it was decided that the value of his second house could not be disregarded in determining his entitlement to a jobseeker's allowance. Since the value of that house exceeded the capital limit, the claim for benefit was disallowed. He appealed on 3 April 2000 on the ground that one house was not big enough to house all his children. On reconsideration of the refusal decision on 7 April 2000, the reconsidering officer concluded that the house occupied by the claimant and his dependent children was not overcrowded and he was not minded to change his decision. On 5 May 2000 the claimant's representative submitted further argument that there was statutory overcrowding, a fact now conceded by the Secretary of State. On appeal the appeal tribunal concluded that only one dwelling could be disregarded and so dismissed the appeal. Mr Miah then appealed to the social security commissioner and on 23 May 2002 Mr Commissioner Bano gave Mr Miah his first taste of success.

[4] Mr Commissioner Bano took the view that there was sufficient uncertainty about the facts of the case as to require it to be remitted for rehearing before a differently constituted tribunal. He held (Social Security Decision CJSA 4620 2000 at para 14) that the new tribunal should—

> 'consider in particular whether the claimant's arrangements were such that one house was, in effect, used as an annex of the other, or to put it another way, whether this was a single home on a split site. Occasional use of the second house by the claimant or his dependent children will not assist him, because the tribunal must be satisfied that the second house was "normally" occupied by the claimant as his home.'

[5] There is confusion about what happened next. There is some dispute as to whether or not the Secretary of State gave adequate notice of his intention to appeal against Mr Commissioner Bano's decision. Whatever may have gone wrong, the fact is that the tribunal heard the matter remitted to them on 26 July 2002, the very day Mr Commissioner Bano granted his permission to appeal to this court. The Secretary of State was not present nor represented at the oral rehearing. Mr Miah gave evidence which was accepted. The tribunal was satisfied that 19 Haseley Road was not used solely by the claimant's non-dependent children and that the claimant himself did not use it only occasionally. The conclusion was:

> 'I find that both 11A and 19 Haseley Road were the dwelling normally occupied as the home, and save for being in two different buildings, these houses together were as much part of a single home as are the upstairs and downstairs of any house. 19 Haseley Road was primarily for sleeping and bathing, 11A Haseley Road was for day-to-day family living.'

The Secretary of State's application for leave to appeal against that decision stands adjourned by Mr Commissioner Bano until after the Court of Appeal has decided this appeal.

THE LEGISLATIVE FRAMEWORK FOR JOBSEEKERS

[6] Section 13(1) of the Jobseekers Act 1995 provides:

> 'No person shall be entitled to an income-based jobseeker's allowance if his capital, or a prescribed part of it, exceeds the prescribed amount.' Section 12(4) provides: 'Circumstances may be prescribed in which ... (b) capital or income which a person does possess is to be disregarded ...'

[7] The contemplated regulations are now contained in the 1996 regulations. Regulation 107 sets the capital limit at £8,000. Regulation 108(2) provides: 'There shall be disregarded from the calculation of a claimant's capital under paragraph (1) any capital, where applicable, specified in Schedule 8.' 'Claimant' had been defined in s 35 of the 1995 Act to mean 'a person who claims a jobseeker's allowance'.

[8] Paragraph 1 of Sch 8 to the 1996 regulations, dealing with capital to be disregarded, excludes:

> 'The dwelling occupied as the home but, notwithstanding regulation 88, (calculation of income and capital of members of claimant's family and of a polygamous marriage), only one dwelling shall be disregarded under this paragraph.'

Regulation 88 of the 1996 regulations provides that the income and capital of a claimant's partner which by virtue of s 13(2) of the 1995 Act is to be treated as the income and capital of the claimant, is to be calculated as provided for in that part of the regulations, which part includes reg 108, and, except where the context otherwise requires, 'claimant' is to be construed as if it were a reference to his partner. There is a similar provision for members of a polygamous marriage. The important definition is 'dwelling occupied as the home' which is defined in reg 1(3) of the 1996 regulations to mean—

> 'the dwelling together with any garage, garden and outbuildings, normally occupied by the claimant as his home including any premises not so occupied which it is impracticable or unreasonable to sell separately, in particular, in Scotland, any croft land on which the dwelling is situated ...'

[9] A claimant for income-based jobseeker's allowance may also be entitled to housing costs if eligible under Sch 2 to the 1996 regulations. Paragraph 1(1) of Sch 2 provides that the housing costs applicable to a claimant are those costs—

'(a) which he or, where he is a member of a family, he or any member of that family is, in accordance with paragraph 2, liable to meet in respect of the dwelling occupied as the home which he or any other member of his family is treated as occupying ...'

The phrase 'dwelling occupied as the home', is, as I have pointed out, defined in reg 1 of the 1996 regulations and so bears the same meaning for the purposes of Sch 2 as it does for the purposes of Sch 8. Schedule 2 goes further. It contains deeming provisions in para 3 which include:

'(1) Subject to the following provisions of this paragraph, a person shall be treated as occupying as his home the dwelling normally occupied as his home by himself or, if he is a member of a family, by himself and his family and he shall not be treated as occupying any other dwelling as his home.

(2) In determining whether a dwelling is the dwelling normally occupied as the claimant's home for the purposes of sub-paragraph (1) regard shall be had to any other dwelling occupied by the claimant or by him and his family whether or not that other dwelling is in Great Britain ...

(6) Where a person is liable to make payments in respect of two (but not more than two) dwellings, he shall be treated as occupying both dwellings as his home only—(a) where he has left and remains absent from the former dwelling occupied as the home through fear of violence in that dwelling or by a former member of his family and it is reasonable that housing costs should be met in respect of both his former dwelling and his present dwelling occupied as the home; or (b) in the case of a couple or a member of a polygamous marriage where a partner is a full-time student or is on a training course and it is unavoidable that he or they should occupy two separate dwellings and reasonable that housing costs should be met in respect of both dwellings; or (c) in the case where a person has moved into a new dwelling occupied as the home, except where sub-paragraph (5) applies, for a period not exceeding four benefit weeks if his liability to make payments in respect of two dwellings is unavoidable.'

OTHER ALLIED STATUTORY PROVISIONS

[10] Paragraph 3 of Sch 2 to the 1996 regulations seems to mirror and replicate closely the provision for the amount payable by way of income support in respect of housing costs (see regs 17(e) and 18(f) of and para 4 of Sch 3 to the Income Support (General) Regulations 1987, SI 1987/1967 (the 1987 income support regulations)). There are other more relevant similarities. 'Dwelling occupied as the home' is defined in reg 2(1) of the 1987 income support regulations in virtually the same terms as reg 1(3) of the 1996 regulations. Paragraph 1 of Sch 10 to the 1987 income support regulations is in almost identical terms to para 1 of Sch 8 to the 1996 regulations. There is, however, one difference between the two statutory schemes. The enabling legislation under which the 1987 income support regulations were made (see s 84(1) of the Social Security Act 1986 now contained in s 137(1) of the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992) contains a definition of 'dwelling' in these terms:

'... any residential accommodation, whether or not consisting of the whole or part of a building and whether or not comprising separate and self-contained premises ...'

This definition does not find a place in the 1995 Act.

[11] The Supplementary Benefit (Resources) Regulations 1981, SI 1981/1527 also provided for the claimant's home to be disregarded but here the language is different. Regulation 2(1) defines 'home' to mean—

> 'the accommodation, with any garage, garden and outbuildings, normally occupied by the assessment unit and any other members of the same household as their home and it includes also any premises not so occupied which it would be impracticable or unreasonable to expect to be sold separately, in particular the croft land where, in Scotland, the home is a croft ...'

The 'assessment unit' means 'the claimant, and any partner and dependant of the claimant'.

[12] Finally, from yet another set of welfare benefits, there is reg 5 of the Housing Benefit (General) Regulations 1987, SI 1987/1971 (the 1987 housing benefit regulations) which makes provision for the circumstances in which a person is or is not to be treated as occupying a dwelling as his home. Regulation 5(1) provides:

> 'Subject to the following provisions of this regulation, a person shall be treated as occupying as his home the dwelling normally occupied as his home—(a) by himself or, if he is a member of a family, by himself and his family ... and shall not be treated as occupying any other dwelling as his home.'

[13] Regulation 5(5) provides:

> 'Where a person is liable to make payments in respect of two (but not more than two) dwellings, he shall be treated as occupying both dwellings as his home only—(a) where he has left and remains absent from the former dwelling occupied as his home through fear of violence in that dwelling ... (b) in the case of a married or unmarried couple or a member of a polygamous marriage, where he or one partner is a student ... it is unavoidable that the partners should occupy two separate dwellings ...(c) in the case where, because of the number of persons referred to in paragraph (1), they have been housed by a housing authority in two separate dwellings ...'

THE COMMISSIONER'S DECISION UNDER APPEAL

[14] Mr Commissioner Bano had to consider two other decisions made by his colleagues considering other regulations. One was Social Security Decision R(SB) 10/89 made by Mrs Commissioner RFM Heggs under the 1981 regulations and the other was a starred decision 17/93, Social Security Decision CIS 81/91, made by Mr Commissioner RA Sanders with respect to the 1987 income support regulations. In the former case it was held that a distinction exists between a claimant who owns two houses, each of which can accommodate all members of his assessment unit and which are used at different times for different purposes, and cases where each house is inappropriate for the size of the assessment unit. In that case it was held that the claimant's assessment unit 'normally occupied' the two houses in question. In the latter case, which Mr Commissioner Sanders did not find to be completely straightforward, he held that the language of the 1981 regulations was significantly wider than the 1987 income support regulations he had to consider. He held (Social Security Decision CIS 81/91 at para 6): a

> 'And the question is whether a claimant who, as in this case, has some of the family in one house and the rest in the other is entitled to the disregard only in respect of one "dwelling" and, if so in respect of which one. Now one might wonder why that question would ever be asked, having regard to the last few words of para 1, until that is one looks at the definition of "dwelling" in s 84(1) of the 1986 Act ...' b

He concluded that definition did not justify the conclusion that the dwelling could be spread over separate buildings.

[15] Mr Commissioner Bano decided (Social Security Decision CJSA 4620 2000): c

> '9. I have come to the conclusion that the claimant's representative is correct in submitting that, for the purposes of income support and income-based jobseeker's allowance, a dwelling can consist of more than one building. The commissioner in Social Security Decision CIS 81/91 considered that the words "only one dwelling shall be disregarded" d precluded the disregard of more than one building from the calculation of capital, but I take the view that para 1 of Sch 8 to the 1996 regulations is not concerned with the physical composition of a dwelling. Regulation 88 of the 1996 regulations, to which para 1 refers, provides for cases where the capital of members of a claimant's family or of other members of a polygamous e marriage is to be treated as the claimant's own capital, and in such cases the concluding words of para 1 operate to prevent the disregard of the dwelling of such a family member, in addition to the claimant's own dwelling. If the claimant has more than one unit of accommodation, which he occupies as separate dwellings, only one such dwelling can be disregarded, but I find nothing in para 1 of Sch 8 to prevent more than one building or other unit of f accommodation from forming a single dwelling.
>
> 10. As the commissioner pointed out in Social Security Decision CIS 81/91, the definition of "home" in reg 1 of the 1981 regulations was wider than the definition of "dwelling occupied as the home" in reg 1 of the 1996 regulations, but I do not agree that that difference leads to the g conclusion that only one unit of accommodation can be disregarded under the 1987 income support and 1996 regulations. The approach taken by the commissioner in Social Security Decision R(SB) 10/89, under reg 2(1) of the 1981 regulations, was to consider whether both houses concerned were normally occupied by the members of the assessment unit, and then to consider the factors necessary to decide whether the assessment unit h occupied the accommodation in question as "the home". Under para 1 of Sch 8 to the 1996 regulations, the question to be considered is whether the dwelling in question is occupied by the claimant and, if so, whether it is occupied by the claimant as his home. Although the test has changed, I see no reason why para 1 of Sch 8 cannot be applied to more than one unit of j accommodation, in accordance with the approach taken under the earlier legislation in Social Security Decision R(SB) 10/89.
>
> 11. I have considered whether the definition of "dwelling occupied as the home" in reg 1 of the 1996 regulations can be applied only to a single building, but I have concluded that that is not the case. As the claimant's representative has pointed out, the definition of "dwelling occupied as the home" uses the term "dwelling", rather than "dwelling-house" (a term well understood in the law of landlord and tenant), and I see no reason why the definition in reg 1 cannot be applied to a single dwelling which consists of more than one dwelling-house. Although the definition of "dwelling" in s 137(1) of the 1992 Act, which is the same as the definition in s 84(1) of the 1986 Act has not been included in the 1995 Act, the definition of "dwelling occupied as the home" is the same in the 1987 income support and 1996 regulations, and I see no reason why the meaning should not be the same in both regulations. I agree with the commissioner in Social Security Decision CIS 81/91 in saying that the purpose of the words "any residential accommodation, whether or not consisting of the whole or part of a building and whether or not comprising separate of self-contained premises", now in s 137(1) of the 1992 Act, was probably to bring within the scope of the definition premises which would have been outside Rent Act protection. The intention of the provision therefore seems to me to be essentially inclusionary, and I see no reason to construe it as excluding a dwelling consisting of residential accommodation in more than one building.

12. I have therefore been persuaded by the claimant's representative that a "dwelling occupied as the home" may comprise more than one building, but it seems to me that the number of cases in which more than one unit of accommodation can qualify for capital disregard under the income support and jobseeker's allowance provisions may be few.'

[16] He concluded that there was too much uncertainty about the evidence to enable him to decide on the facts and he directed that the matter be remitted for rehearing before a differently constituted tribunal.

[17] Mr Commissioner Bano rejected the claimant's further submission that the second house fell within reg 1 of the 1996 regulations because it was land which it was unreasonable or impracticable to sell having regard to the claimant's need to house his growing children there. He was of the view that those words in the definition referred to the difficulty in selling land because of its physical relationship to the dwelling.

THE ARGUMENTS PRESENTED TO US

[18] I am grateful to counsel for their thorough skeleton arguments and persuasive submissions. At the risk of doing them injustice I will summarise their respective cases. Mr James Maurici for the Secretary of State advanced four reasons for reversing Mr Commissioner Bano's decision. (i) To suggest that two units of accommodation or dwelling houses can constitute 'one dwelling' flies in the face of the words of the 1996 regulations and robs para 1 of Sch 8 of any meaning. (ii) The commissioner should not have relied on Social Security Decision R(SB) 10/89 because the regulations there were significantly different: he should have followed Social Security Decision CIS 81/91 where the regulations were wholly similar. (iii) In this field, where a person is to be treated as occupying two dwellings as his home, then the regulations make express provision for this, eg in respect of housing costs, and under the 1987 housing benefit regulations. (iv) Because the 1996 regulations are so similar to the 1987 income support regulations, Parliament in approving the 1996 regulations must be presumed to have endorsed the correctness of Social Security Decision CIS 81/91 (see Hinchy v Secretary or State for Work and Pensions [2003] EWCA Civ 138, [2003] 2 All ER 289, [2003] 1 WLR 2018).

[19] Mr Daniel Kolinsky submitted on Mr Miah's behalf: (i) Mr Commissioner Bano was right for the reasons he gave. (ii) The test adopted, which is one of 'functional coherence' is rigorous enough to give the necessary flexibility without opening the floodgates. (iii) A common sense approach is necessary to avoid the anomaly of having a claimant who occupies a single home on a split site having only part of that home disregarded whereas everyone else's home can be wholly disregarded. (iv) Building upon that anomaly, it would offend the need to provide for positive assistance in a non-discriminatory way contrary to art 14 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). (v) By his respondent's notice he sought to argue, if necessary, that the ambit of what counts as 'impracticable or unreasonable to sell' (see reg 1 of the 1996 regulations) should not be confined only to the physical location of the property.

CONCLUSIONS

[20] As the commissioners have pointed out, there is a sad lack of coherence in the drafting of this wide range of social welfare legislation. One might have hoped for some uniformity in the definition of the essential building blocks, like a claimant's home, which affect the allowing or disallowing of a social security-type benefit. Because of the non-application of the definition of 'dwelling' contained in s 84(1) of the 1986 Act and s 137(1) of the 1992 Act, not even the 1981 and 1996 regulations are wholly and exactly comparable.

[21] Given these differences, be they large or small, I find it impossible to derive from another set of provisions any support for any convincing argument, one way or the other, as to the meaning of the regulations we have to construe. I can only look for clues as to the true meaning of 'dwelling occupied as the home' from within the 1996 regulations themselves.

[22] The first clue is within para 1 of Sch 8 itself in the words 'notwithstanding regulation 88'. Under reg 88 the capital and income of the claimant's partner or polygamous 'wife', which by virtue of s 13(2) of the 1995 Act are to be treated as his, are to be aggregated with his. Without the qualification 'notwithstanding regulation 88', it seems likely or highly arguable that any separate home of the partner/'wife' would also be disregarded. Certainly one can be sure at least that the legislature had in mind the possibility that there would be two dwellings competing for being or both claiming to be disregarded.

[23] The provisions of Sch 2 to the 1996 regulations confirm that the legislature was alive to the possibility of there being two dwellings available for consideration. Paragraph 3(6) of Sch 2 shows that the draftsman had in mind the possibility that a person was liable to make payments in respect of two dwellings and treated him to be occupying both dwellings as his home in the circumstances prescribed, viz, in cases of domestic violence, university residence, and moving house.

[24] I find it difficult, however, to draw any satisfactory conclusion from these fact-specific examples in para 3 of Sch 2 or from the cases of the partner/polygamous 'wife' in reg 88. None of this seems to me to throw light on the crucial question whether separate buildings can constitute a single dwelling occupied as the claimant's home. As Mr Kolinsky submits, simply to conclude that two separate buildings cannot be a single dwelling begs the question.

[25] Given that the draftsman had the possibility of two dwellings in mind, what did he intend to include in or exclude from the meaning of 'dwelling'.

[26] If one approaches construction of the words literally, one notes that the word 'dwelling' has been chosen, not, for example, 'dwelling-house' nor 'residential accommodation'. 'Dwelling' is defined by the Oxford English Dictionary as 'place of residence; a dwelling-place, habitation, house'. 'Dwelling-place' is 'A place of abode', whereas 'Dwelling-house' is 'A house occupied as a place of residence, as distinguished from a house of business, warehouse, office, etc.' Because the single word is expanded into a phrase 'dwelling occupied as the home' I am given the impression that the legislature intended to convey the function to be served by the concept of a dwelling rather than to connote its constituent elements, the bricks and mortar of the dwelling. The function is a place serving as home for the claimant. That place is not necessarily confined to a single building. For me this emphasis is reinforced by the inclusion within 'dwelling' of 'any garage, garden and outbuildings normally occupied by the claimant as his home including any premises not so occupied ...' (see reg 1 of the 1996 regulations). A barn converted for residential accommodation is part of the dwelling constituted by the farmhouse and that converted barn. I appreciate that not too much can be derived from that analogy because they both lie within the same curtilage, but it gives the flavour.

[27] A test for determining where home is can conveniently be expressed in the way Mr Commissioner Bano directed the tribunal to approach the question (Social Security Decision CJSA 4620 2000 at para 14), viz, by asking whether—

> 'the claimant's arrangements were such that one house was, in effect, used as an annex of the other, or to put it another way, whether this was a single home on a split site. Occasional use of the second house by the claimant or his dependent children will not assist him, because the tribunal must be satisfied that the second house was "normally" occupied by the claimant as his home.'

[28] If one needs to look further, one should look to see where common sense, fairness and justice take one. Taking the latter consideration first, the facts of this case provide a proper background for the question. Here is a man who organised his domestic life at a time when he was in good and apparently stable employment. He bought the property two doors away to house his growing family. Then he fell upon hard times. If in 1992 he had sold number 11A and bought a single five/six-bedroom property, that property would have to be disregarded. It surely cannot be fair that he should suffer when the purpose of having two properties is exactly the same as having only one.

[29] Simple justice seems to me to dictate that a man in the applicant's position should not be discriminated against adversely to the owner of a single but large property for his family.

[30] Common sense dictates that the court can construe the words in a way which does not make them unworkable or impractical. Assume, as the tribunal subsequently found, the claimant truly does use both houses as his home, how is a decision-maker to determine which of the two is to be disregarded? Can the claimant elect? Is it the property of greater or of lesser value? Is it the first he acquired or the last? Has some (but goodness knows what) attempt have to be made to ascertain which is the more significant home? Those questions seem to me impossible of answer and militate against the Secretary of State's submissions. One cannot have a scheme which is incapable of easy, sensible and certain application.

[31] On the other hand, the claimant's construction does allow common sense to prevail. In requiring both properties to be occupied as the home at the same point in time, it is perfectly easy to distinguish those two properties seen as a unit from the second home which a hypothetical claimant may have in the country as a weekend retreat. Allowing only one of those homes to be disregarded is entirely just and fair as between the public purse and the claimant for this benefit.

[32] If one applies this functional test as opposed to a structural test, a decision-maker can with common sense determine what the claimant is using as his home. It is the place where he lives, where he eats, sleeps, bathes, relaxes, enjoys with his family. Such a test avoids the absurdities that two semi-detached houses would not be a single dwelling, however used, so long as they remain detached. Not even going out of the back door of one, through the communal garden and in the back door of the other could make it one dwelling. But knock a hole through the party wall and then there is structural integration and presumably two dwellings have been converted into one. The subtleties of such distinctions produce an absurdity that has to be avoided by a more realistic interpretation.

[33] I would test this by applying a purposive construction. The purpose of these provisions is surely to provide benefits for those in need. A liberal, as opposed to a strict, construction demands that they be construed in favour of a claimant to relieve hardship rather than in favour of the Secretary of State to protect the public purse out of which the benefits are to be paid. If the Secretary of State who laid the regulations before Parliament could not do so in a way which made his position clear, then the regulations are to be construed against him.

[34] I am not impressed with Mr Maurici's argument that Parliament must have intended first that the 1996 regulations should have the same meaning as the 1987 income support regulations, and, secondly, that Social Security Decision CIS 81/91 has received Parliamentary approval. My rejection of that submission owes as much to the absence of an equivalent to s 84(1) of the 1986 Act in the 1995 Act, and hence to a small difference between the two provisions, as to complete cynicism about the adequacy of parliamentary scrutiny of subordinate legislation of this kind.

[35] I do not find it necessary to consider the unfairness and discriminatory effect of the regulations as a discrete human rights point. I am satisfied that domestic principles of construction lead to the conclusion that Mr Commissioner Bano was correct.

[36] It is, therefore, unnecessary to consider the respondent's notice and decide whether or not the claimant's alternative argument is well founded. I say nothing about that question at all.

[37] It follows that, in my judgment, this appeal should be dismissed.

MANCE LJ.

[38] This is the Secretary of State's appeal by permission of the Social Security Commissioner, Mr Commissioner Bano, who by decision dated 23 May 2002 determined that a 'dwelling occupied as a home' could in appropriate circumstances consist of two separate (non-adjoining) houses—in this case numbers 11A and 19 Haseley Road, Handsworth—so that, under Sch 8, para 1 of the Jobseeker's Allowance Regulations 1996, SI 1996/207 the value of both houses would fall to be disallowed in calculating the capital of the respondent, Mr Miah, for the purposes of a claim to income-based jobseeker's allowance.

[39] Mr Commissioner Bano remitted the matter to a new tribunal to determine whether on the facts the two houses did in all the circumstances constitute one 'dwelling occupied as the home' by Mr Miah. The Birmingham Unified Appeal Tribunal held on 26 July 2002 that they did. The Secretary of State does not challenge that conclusion, if it was permissible in law, and it is not for us therefore to express any view on its correctness in any other respect. I mention that the tribunal reached its conclusion in the light of what it found were the following unusual facts: neither house is large enough for the whole of Mr Miah's family; and he himself sleeps for four or five nights a week at number 19 and for the remaining nights at number 11A, where he and the whole family spend their leisure time and eat their meals.

[40] The Jobseekers Act 1995 provides:

> 12. 'Income and capital: general.—(1) In relation to a claim for a jobseeker's allowance, the income and capital of a person shall be calculated or estimated in such manner as may be prescribed ...
>
> (4) Circumstances may be prescribed in which—(a) a person is treated as possessing capital or income which he does not possess; (b) capital or income which a person does possess is to be disregarded; (c) income is to be treated as capital; (d) capital is to be treated as income.
>
> 13. Income and capital: income-based jobseeker's allowance.—(1) No person shall be entitled to an income-based jobseeker's allowance if his capital, or a prescribed part of it, exceeds the prescribed amount.
>
> (2) Where a person claiming an income-based jobseeker's allowance is a member of a family, the income and capital of any member of that family shall, except in prescribed circumstances, be treated as the income and capital of the claimant.'

[41] The 1996 regulations provide:

> 'Capital limit
>
> 107. For the purposes of section 13(1) and (2A) (no entitlement to an income-based jobseeker's allowance if capital exceeds a prescribed amount)—(a) except where paragraph (aa) or (b) applies, the prescribed amount is £8,000 ...
>
> Calculation of capital
>
> 108.—(1) Subject to paragraph (2), the capital of a claimant to be taken into account shall be the whole of his capital calculated in accordance with this Part and any income treated as capital under regulation 110.
>
> (2) There shall be disregarded from the calculation of a claimant's capital under paragraph (1) any capital, where applicable, specified in Schedule 8.'

[42] Regulation 88 of the 1996 regulations supplements s 13(2) of the 1995 Act:

> 'Calculation of income and capital of members of claimant's family and of a polygamous marriage
>
> 88.—(1) Subject to paragraphs (2) and paragraph (3) and regulations 88ZA (calculation of income and capital of a joint-claim couple) and 106 (modifications in respect of children and young persons), the income and capital of a claimant's partner and the income of a child or young person which by virtue of section 13(2) is to be treated as the income and capital of the claimant, shall be calculated in accordance with the following provisions of this Part in like manner as for the claimant; and any reference to the "claimant" shall, except where the context otherwise requires, be construed, for the purposes of this Part, as if it were a reference to his partner or that child or young person.'

[43] Schedule 8 to the 1996 regulations provides:

'SCHEDULE 8
CAPITAL TO BE DISREGARDED
1. The dwelling occupied as the home but, notwithstanding regulation 88, (calculation of income and capital of members of claimant's family and of a polygamous marriage), only one dwelling shall be disregarded under this paragraph.'

[44] Regulation 1 of the 1996 regulations contains the following definition:

'"dwelling occupied as the home" means the dwelling together with any garage, garden and outbuildings, normally occupied by the claimant as his home including any premises not so occupied which it is impracticable or unreasonable to sell separately, in particular, in Scotland, any croft land on which the dwelling is situated ...'

[45] The Secretary of State submits that the language of Sch 8 read with the definition in reg 1 of the 1996 regulations excludes any possibility in law of two separate houses constituting a single 'dwelling occupied as the home'. He points out that under reg 1 the unit of assessment is the claimant alone, and submits that the provision in Sch 8, para 1 that 'only one dwelling shall be disregarded under this paragraph' is directly aimed at the present type of situation.

[46] The qualification that 'only one dwelling shall be disregarded under this paragraph' is however introduced with the bracketed direction that it applies 'notwithstanding regulation 88'. That regulation deals with the manner in which the income and capital of a claimant's partner or of a child or young person is to be calculated (for the purpose of treating it as the claimant's under s 13(2) of the 1995 Act). It stipulates that the calculation shall be in accordance with certain further provisions 'in like manner as for the claimant' (see reg 88(1) of the 1996 regulations), and reinforces this with a direction that any reference to 'the claimant' in such provisions shall be construed 'as if it were a reference to his [the claimant's] partner or that child or young person'. Apart from the qualification in Sch 8, para 1 to the 1996 regulations, it would therefore have been well arguable that a separate 'dwelling occupied as the home' by the claimant's partner or a relevant child or young person fell to be disregarded. The most obvious purpose of the qualification was to avoid this. Although the qualification in Sch 8, para 1 says simply that 'only one dwelling shall be disregarded' (rather than that 'only one dwelling occupied as the [or a] home shall be disregarded'), the reference to reg 88 makes it clear that it must at all events embrace situations where two dwellings are each occupied as a (separate) home, eg in one case by the claimant and in the other by a partner.

[47] Another obvious effect of the qualification is that a claimant cannot maintain that he has two dwellings each of which is occupied as a separate home and each of which should be disregarded. A weekend retreat or country cottage could not on this basis be disregarded. But that is not the situation with which Mr Commissioner Bano was concerned. He was asked to determine whether, under Sch 8, para 1 to the 1996 regulations, and bearing in mind the definition in reg 1, 'the dwelling occupied as the home' may be spread over two physically separate buildings, so that there is still only one home, the whole value of which may be disregarded.

[48] I have come to the conclusion, not without some doubt, that this is possible. A person may acquire two neighbouring houses or flats, but may not or may not be able to incorporate them into one physical building. He may nonetheless, although no doubt relatively rarely, occupy them to all intents and purposes as if they constituted a single enclosed unit. This is particularly likely, if, as here, neither house by itself caters for all his family's needs.

[49] I do not consider that the fact that both Sch 8, para 1 and reg 1 speak in the singular throughout leads to a different conclusion. Whether one is speaking of the 'dwelling occupied as the home' or simply of the 'dwelling', the issue is whether the word can embrace exceptional situations where it can fairly be said that a person's 'dwelling' or his 'dwelling occupied as the home' spreads over more than one physical building.

[50] Regulations 83(f) and 84(1)(g) of the 1996 regulations provide for the inclusion in the weekly amount payable to a claimant of—

> 'any amounts determined in accordance with Schedule 2 (housing costs) which may be applicable to him in respect of mortgage interest payments or such other housing costs as are prescribed in that Schedule'.

Schedule 2, para 1(1) provides:

> 'Subject to the following provisions of this Schedule, the housing costs applicable to a claimant are those costs—(a) which he or, where he is a member of a family, he or any member of a family is, in accordance with paragraph 2, liable to meet in respect of the dwelling occupied as the home which he or any other member of the family is treated as occupying ...'

Schedule 2, paras 2 and 3 provide:

> 'Circumstances in which a person is liable to meet housing costs
>
> 2.—(1) A person is liable to meet housing costs where—(a) the liability falls upon him or his partner or, where that person is a member of a joint-claim couple, the other member of that couple, but not where the liability is to a member of the same household as the person on whom the liability falls; (b) because the person liable to meet the housing costs is not meeting them, the claimant has to meet those costs in order to continue to live in the dwelling occupied as the home and it is reasonable in all the circumstances to treat the claimant as liable to meet those costs; (c) he in practice shares the housing costs with other members of the household none of whom are close relatives either of the claimant or his partner, or, where that person is a member of a joint-claim couple, the other member of that couple, and (i) one or more of those members is liable to meet those costs, and (ii) it is reasonable in the circumstances to treat him as sharing responsibility.
>
> (2) Where any one or more, but not all, members of the claimant's family are affected by a trade dispute, the housing costs shall be treated as wholly the responsibility of those members of the family not so affected.
>
> Circumstances in which a person is to be treated as occupying a dwelling as his home

3.—(1) Subject to the following provisions of this paragraph, a person shall be treated as occupying as his home the dwelling normally occupied as his home by himself or, if he is a member of a family, by himself and his family and he shall not be treated as occupying any other dwelling as his home.

(2) In determining whether a dwelling is the dwelling normally occupied as the claimant's home for the purposes of sub-paragraph (1) regard shall be had to any other dwelling occupied by the claimant or by him and his family whether or not that other dwelling is in Great Britain ...

(6) Where a person is liable to make payments in respect of two (but not more than two) dwellings, he shall be treated as occupying both dwellings as his home only—(a) where he has left and remains absent from the former dwelling occupied as the home through fear of violence in that dwelling or by a former member of his family and it is reasonable that housing costs should be met in respect of both his former dwelling and his present dwelling occupied as the home; or (b) in the case of a couple or a member of a polygamous marriage where a partner is a full-time student or is on a training course and it is unavoidable that he or they should occupy two separate dwellings and reasonable that housing costs should be met in respect of both dwellings; or (c) in the case where a person has moved into a new dwelling occupied as the home, except where sub-paragraph (5) applies, for a period not exceeding four benefit weeks if his liability to make payments in respect of two dwellings is unavoidable.

(7) Where—(a) a person has moved into a dwelling and was liable to make payments in respect of that dwelling before moving in; and (b) he had claimed a jobseeker's allowance before moving in and either that claim has not yet been determined or it has been determined but an amount has not been included under this Schedule and if the claim has been refused a further claim has been made within four weeks of the date on which the claimant moved into the new dwelling occupied as the home; and (c) the delay in moving into the dwelling in respect of which there was liability to make payments before moving in was reasonable and—(i) that delay was necessary in order to adapt the dwelling to meet the disablement needs of the claimant or any member of his family; or (ii) the move was delayed pending the outcome of an application under Part VIII of the Benefits Act for a social fund payment to meet a need arising out of the move or in connection with setting up the home in the dwelling and either a member of the claimant's family is aged five or under or the claimant's applicable amount includes a premium under paragraph 10, 11, 12, 13, 15 or 16 of Schedule 1; or (iii) the person became liable to make payments in respect of the dwelling while he was a patient or was in residential accommodation, he shall be treated as occupying the dwelling as his home for any period not exceeding four weeks immediately prior to the date on which he moved into the dwelling and in respect of which he was liable to make payments.'

[51] These careful provisions of Sch 2, dealing with situations in which housing costs can be claimed, show the legislator's concern to regulate situations in which a claimant might claim to occupy, either alone or with his family, more than one house, including a second house abroad (see para 3(2)). Recognising that they may only assist indirectly in the construction of Sch 8, para 1, they confirm that such situations were at the forefront of the legislator's mind, and that the concluding words of Sch 8, para 1 may therefore have been directed simply to them, and not to situations where it could properly be said that a claimant had one home only, but spread over two buildings.

[52] More broadly, it was submitted on behalf of Mr Miah that, on the Secretary of State's case, there would be an odd difference in what was disregarded, between a claimant whose home was (for whatever reason) spread over two physical buildings and a claimant who had managed to find a house suitable for himself and his whole family. That argument has less force than might at first sight appear, since the issue under Sch 8, para 1 and reg 1 is whether the dwelling is occupied as the claimant's home, and a claimant who had two houses, in one of which he lived and in the other of which other of his family members lived, would probably not be able to claim that both houses were normally occupied 'by the claimant' as his home as required under reg 1.

[53] What can, however, be said is that a construction that leads to consistent disregard of the value of the claimant's home is preferable in principle to a construction that leads to its disregard, so long as it consists of a single physical building, but which only disregards part (which part being uncertain) if it spreads over two physical buildings. This point appears to me to have force, whether or not such a distinction would be consistent with arts 8 and 14 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) (as it may not be, although I need express no view on that).

[54] Both parties sought assistance from a review of the provisions of other primary or subordinate legislation in the social security field, and from various social security commissioners' decisions under that legislation. There may be limited value in comparisons with different statutory provisions. But the position can be summarised as appears in the following paragraphs ([55]–[59], below).

[55] The Supplementary Benefit (Resources) Regulations 1981, SI 1981/1527 made under the Supplementary Benefits Act 1976 contained in reg 2 the following definition of the word 'home':

> '"home" means the accommodation, with any garage, garden and outbuildings, normally occupied by the assessment unit and any other members of the same household as their home and it includes also any premises not so occupied which it would be impracticable or unreasonable to expect to be sold separately, in particular the croft land where, in Scotland, the home is a croft.'

Regulation 2 defines 'assessment unit' as meaning 'the claimant, and any partner and dependant of the claimant'. By reg 6 of the 1981 regulations:

> 'In calculating a claimant's capital resources the following shall be disregarded—(a) the value of—(i) the home, (ii) any premises which have been acquired and not yet occupied by the assessment unit but which it is intended will be the home within 6 months of the date of acquisition or such longer period as is reasonable in the circumstances ... except in relation to any part of the premises which, having regard to all the circumstances, it would be practicable or reasonable to regard as a property which could be realised separately ...'

[56] By Social Security Decision R(SB) 10/89 dated 30 January 1989 Mrs Commissioner RFM Heggs considered, in this context, the position of a claimant with two houses, neither big enough to house his whole family, one of which he used for sleeping only, since it had no working kitchen and in the other of which he and his family ate. Mrs Commissioner Heggs concluded that, on these facts, the former house was, in effect, an annex to the latter, and that both constituted the 'home' within the definition in the 1981 regulations.

[57] Regulation 2 of and Sch 3 to the Income Support (General) Regulations 1987, SI 1987/1967 (the 1987 income support regulations) contain the same definition of 'dwelling occupied as the home' and similar provisions regarding housing costs as reg 1 of and Sch 2 to the 1996 regulations. Schedule 10, para 1 to these 1987 income support regulations is in similar form to Sch 8, para 1 to the 1996 regulations. In the context of the 1987 income support regulations, the legislature did go on to provide an additional definition of the word 'dwelling'. The definition, contained in the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992, s 137 (the Contributions and Benefits Act 1992), reads:

> '"dwelling" means any residential accommodation, whether or not consisting of the whole or part of a building and whether or not comprising separate and self-contained premises ...'

No such definition is found in the jobseekers legislation. (There is a similar definition in the Social Security Administration Act 1992, under which benefit is defined to include a jobseeker's allowance; however counsel did not suggest that this Act was relevant to the present issue concerning Mr Miah's substantive entitlement to jobseeker's allowance.)

[58] The meaning of the phrase 'dwelling occupied as the home' was considered by Mr Commissioner J Mitchell in Social Security Decision CIS 427/91 dated 21 September 1992 and by Mr Commissioner R A Sanders in Social Security Decision CIS 81/91 dated 22 March 1993. The former decision concerned the extent to which land could be regarded as a garden or as premises which it was impracticable or unreasonable to sell separately. It is the latter decision that is more relevant. The presently relevant question was the extent to which the value of a second property in which some members of the claimant's family had been housed (but which had in fact been sold shortly after the date of claim) could be disregarded in calculating the claimant's capital at that date. Mr Commissioner Sanders pointed out the difference in wording between the jobseekers legislation (focusing on the position of the claimant and his home) and the 1981 regulations (which focused on the use by the whole 'assessment unit' of accommodation as 'their home'). On that basis he distinguished Social Security Decision R(SB) 10/89 (see [56], above). He also considered that the definition of 'dwelling' in s 84(1) of the Social Security Act 1986, which was the same as that re-enacted in s 137 of the Contributions and Benefits Act 1992 was not aimed at the present issue, but rather at avoiding the complex question thrown up by Rent Act authorities, whether a unit was sufficiently self-contained to attract protection. Looking at Sch 10, para 1 to the 1987 income support regulations, Mr Commissioner Sanders evidently found little difficulty in concluding that the second building was not occupied by the claimant as his home at the date of claim and did not fall to be disregarded for the purposes of assessing the amount of his capital.

[59] The most that the Secretary of State can derive from this decision is that Mr Commissioner Sanders was evidently surprised at the suggestion that two buildings could both be disregarded under provisions paralleling those of reg 1 and Sch 8, para 1 of the 1987 regulations. However, cases of the present nature are fact-intensive, and the present case is on that basis clearly different from any with which Mr Commissioner Sanders was concerned. The question in the present case is whether a single claimant can ever have a home which spreads across two physical buildings, so as to constitute for the purposes of reg 1 of and Sch 8, para 1 to the 1987 regulations a single 'dwelling occupied as the home' (as the tribunal has held would be the case, if this is possible in law). Social Security Decision CIS 427/91 does not either cover or in its reasoning exclude that possibility.

[60] It follows from [55]–[59], above that there is nothing in other primary or subordinate legislation in the social security field, or in previous social security commissioners' decisions under that legislation, to alter my initial view that the concluding words of Sch 8, para 1 to the 1996 regulations were probably directed to situations in which a claimant might claim to occupy, either alone or with his family, more than one house, including a second house abroad, rather than to situations where it could properly be said that a claimant had one home only, but spread over two physical buildings. That is the conclusion that I reach. While I have reached it independently, I note that it is also evidently the view of the editors of Social Security Legislation 2002, vol II, pp 205–207 (para 2.26), where they comment favourably on Mr Commissioner Bano's decision. I therefore consider that the appeal should be dismissed.

NELSON J

[61] I agree with both judgments for the reasons given by Ward and Mance LJJ.

Appeal dismissed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

Lucas v Barking, Havering and Redbridge Hospitals NHS Trust

[2003] EWCA Civ 1102

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

WALLER, MANTELL AND LAWS LJJ

9, JUNE, 23 JULY 2003

Evidence – Expert evidence – Experts' reports – Rule of procedure requiring expert's report to state all material 'instructions' – Rule precluding court from ordering, in relation to those instructions, disclosure of specific documents in absence of reasonable grounds to consider statement to be inaccurate or incomplete – Whether 'instructions' including material supplied by instructing party to expert as basis on which he had been asked to advise – CPR 31.14(1), 35.10(3), (4).

The claimant brought proceedings for personal injury against the defendant. With his particulars of claim he produced, as required by the CPR, two experts' reports relating to his injuries. Those reports both referred to a witness statement of the claimant, provided to the experts. One report also referred to a previous expert's report. The defendant sought an order for inspection of those documents, relying on CPR 31.14(2)[a] which permitted a party to apply for an order for inspection of any document mentioned in an expert's report that had not already been disclosed in the proceedings. That provision was subject to CPR 35.10[b]. Paragraph (3) of the latter required an expert's report to state the substance of all material 'instructions', whether written or oral, on the basis of which the report was written. Paragraph (4) provided that the instructions referred to in para (3) were not privileged against disclosure, but the court would not, in relation to those instructions, order disclosure of any specific document unless it was satisfied that there were reasonable grounds to consider the statement of instructions given under para (3) to be inaccurate or incomplete. The claimant resisted the defendant's application on the basis that the documents requested were part of the instructions provided to the experts, and therefore fell within r 35.10(4). The master, however, granted the application. On the claimant's appeal, the Court of Appeal was required to determine whether the word 'instructions' in r 35.10 should be construed narrowly, so as to apply only to what the expert had been told to do, or more widely, so as to include material supplied to the expert as the basis on which he had been asked to advise.

Held – Material supplied by the instructing party to the expert as the basis on which he had been asked to advise should be considered as part of the 'instructions' and thus subject to CPR 35.10(4). The intention of that provision was to encourage the setting out fully of material instructions and indeed facts. Since a party was compelled so to do, it was thought right that some protection should be given where an expert complied with that requirement. Rule 35.10(4) was therefore designed primarily to give protection to a party who would

a Rule 31.14 is set out at [1], below

b Rule 35.10, so far as material, is set out at [1], below otherwise have waived privilege by being compelled to set out matters in an expert's report. It was also designed so far as possible to prevent lengthy arguments as to whether there had been a waiver of privilege either prior to the trial or indeed at trial leading to an entitlement to further disclosure. In the instant case, the documents sought by the defendant had been part of the instructions given to the experts by the claimant. There was currently no basis for suggesting that the material instructions in either report were in any way inaccurate. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [28], [31]–[34], [37], [39]–[41], below).

Taylor v Bolton Health Authority [2000] CLY 96 disapproved.

Notes

For inspection of documents referred to in expert's report, see 37 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 553, 996.

Cases referred to in judgments

Bennett v Compass Group UK and Ireland Ltd [2002] EWCA Civ 642, [2002] ICR 1177.

Bourns Inc v Raychem Corp [1999] 3 All ER 154, CA.

Clough v Tameside and Glossop Health Authority [1998] 2 All ER 971, [1998] 1 WLR 1478.

Marubeni Corp v Alafouzos [1986] CA Transcript 996.

Morris v Bank of India (15 November 2001, unreported).

Nea Karteria Maritime Co Ltd v Atlantic and Great Lakes Steamship Corp (No 2) [1981] Com LR 138.

Taylor v Bolton Health Authority [2000] CLY 96.

Appeal

The claimant, David Lucas, appealed with permission of Master Ungley from his decision on 23 October 2002 granting an application by the defendants, Barking, Havering and Redbridge Hospitals NHS Trust, for an order for inspection of certain documents referred to in two experts' reports which had been sent to the defendant with Mr Lucas' particulars of claim. The facts are set out in the judgment of Waller LJ.

Joel Donovan (instructed by Gadsby Wicks, Chelsmsford) for Mr Lucas.

David Westcott QC (instructed by Kennedys) for the defendant.

Cur adv vult

23 July 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

WALLER LJ.

[1] This appeal raises a point of some significance in relation to the proper construction and interaction of CPR 31.14(1) and (2) and CPR 35.10(3) and (4). Those provisions read:

> '31.14(1) A party may inspect a document mentioned in—(a) a statement of case; (b) a witness statement; (c) a witness summary; or (d) an affidavit [(e) revoked].

(2) Subject to rule 35.10(4), a party may apply for an order for inspection of any document mentioned in an expert's report which has not already been disclosed in the proceedings ...

35.10 ... (3) The expert's report must state the substance of all material instructions, whether written or oral, on the basis of which the report was written.

(4) The instructions referred to in paragraph (3) shall not be privileged against disclosure but the court will not, in relation to those instructions—(a) order disclosure of any specific document; or (b) permit any questioning in court, other than by the party who instructed the expert, unless it is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to consider the statement of instructions given under paragraph (3) to be inaccurate or incomplete.'

[2] Mr Lucas is making a claim for personal injury suffered as he alleges as a result of negligence by the defendant. With his particulars of claim he produced as required by the CPR two experts' reports relating to his injuries. Those reports both referred to a witness statement of Mr Lucas provided to the experts. One report also referred to a previous report of an expert. The defendant in reliance on r 31.14(2) sought an order for inspection of those documents. The claimant unsurprisingly was reluctant to disclose a witness statement or an expert's report other than by exchange at the due time. The application was resisted on the basis that the documents requested were part of the instructions provided to the experts, and fell within the exception identified in r 31.14(2), ie r 35.10(4). The defendants did not suggest before the master that if the statement and/or the report were instructions within r 35.10(4) there was any basis on which the court should conclude that an order for inspection should be made on the grounds that r 35.10(3) had not been complied with.

[3] The defendant was successful in obtaining an order for inspection under r 31.14(2) from Master Ungley. We have a note of his decision which is in the following terms:

'My decision is not affected by the decision of Hart J in Morris v Bank of India (15 November 2001, unreported) and reported on rather different facts, because this application is made on almost identical facts to those in Taylor v Bolton Health Authority [2000] CLY 96. Following the decision of Morland J and the overriding objective I shall direct that the report of Mr Durdy and the claimant's witness statement be disclosed.'

[4] Thus the master felt bound by the decision of Morland J but he granted permission to appeal. The matter has come directly to us.

[5] In fact Morland J's decision was concerned with r 31.14 at a time when it was in slightly different terms. At that stage there was no r 31.14(2). Rule 31.14(1) included a sub-para (e). The effect of r 31.14(1)(e) added 'expert's report' to the list of documents in which documents might be referred to and in relation to which the rules gave a right of inspection albeit even at that time 'subject to rule 35.10(4)'. The distinction between the former provision and the current provision seems to be that formerly prima facie there was a right to inspect the documents referred to in experts' reports as in the other specified documents, whereas now in relation to experts' reports an application must be made to obtain inspection. However the word 'instructions' must have the same meaning whether the court was considering the old form of provision or the new provision since r 35.10(4) has in no way been amended.

[6] The reasoning of Morland J was to the following effect. He appreciated the obligation of the expert under r 35.10(3) to set out 'the substance of all material instructions'. He referred further to the relevant practice direction CPR PD 35, para 2.2(3) requiring the report to—

> 'contain a statement setting out the substance of all facts and instructions given to the expert which are material to the opinions expressed in the report or upon which those opinions are based'.

Morland J then said:

> 'In my judgment, instructions are what an expert is told to do. What answers he is asked to give to specific questions. This is illustrated, in my judgment, by the first paragraph of Dr Wazou's report dated 18 August 1997, in which he says: "I have been instructed to examine Donna Taylor and provide a report on her development from birth, her present neurological and general health state, prognosis for the future and estimation of life expectancy." In my judgment, those in very short form are the instructions given by the claimant through her solicitors to Dr Wazou. Dr Wazou then goes on to say: "Donna was seen in the presence of her parents. I had available to me at the time of preparing this report documentary medical evidence supplied to me by instructing solicitors", and then he sets out those reports, including medical reports by Professor Malcolm Levine dated May 1997. In my judgment, the material upon which an expert is asked to comply with his instructions to answer questions, give a prognosis etc are not part of the instructions, but the basic material upon which the expert is asked to reach his conclusions in accordance with his instructions, and therefore, in my judgment, the material, the basic material supplied to the expert is not part of the instructions. I bear in mind that the philosophy of the CPR is cards on the table. I have in mind that of course the court and cases should not be encumbered by a prolixity of documents, in particular if they are not necessary.'

[7] No claim to privilege appears to have been argued and Morland J ordered disclosure.

[8] The above narrow construction preferred by Morland J is to be contrasted with a rather different view of Hart J in the case to which the master referred. It is necessary to set out some detail of the problem before Hart J in order to place the approach of the judge in context. The case was a banking case and one in which it had been agreed to exchange expert evidence prior to the evidence of witnesses of fact. In the expert's report of a Mr Wragg reference was made to his understanding of the position, an understanding which he can only have obtained from information supplied either by his solicitors or by his clients. The complaint on the application before Hart J was that the expert had not complied with the provisions of r 35.10 including the provisions of r 35.10(3) or the practice direction previously quoted. Mr Wragg's report did not contain any reference to having been provided with a statement but contained information that he must have obtained either from the statement or from the solicitors. There was further before the judge an affidavit of a Mr Dubash explaining how Mr Wragg had been instructed including a statement that certain factual information had been supplied to Mr Wragg; that statements would have been referred to if they had been exchanged prior to the expert's report; and an assertion that Mr Wragg was asked not to rely on privileged material in preparing his report. The judge then said:

> 'As it appears to me, the expert's report is, as it stands, defective in that it does not contain a statement of "the substance of all material instructions, whether written or oral, on the basis of which the report was written". I am quoting from r 35.10(3). Taking Mr Dubash's statement at face value, it would appear that the report would have so complied had it said that it was based on, inter alia, in addition to the matters that are referred to in the report, the matters confirmed to him by Mr Dubash as being factual information on which to base the report, and had then stated what the substance of that factual information was. That would have to have been done either by reference to a document if the confirmation had in fact been contained in a document, or by a summary of the oral communication if it had been by an oral communication. The fact of the matter is that there is no statement in the expert's report of the statement required by sub-r (3). It appears to me that this is a case where I can be satisfied that the statement of instructions purportedly given in the report is inaccurate or incomplete within r 35.10(4). It is therefore open to the court to order disclosure of the instructions which were given to Mr Wragg for the purposes of his report. The application is resisted on the part of the defendants in so far as it is an attempt by the claimants to obtain disclosure of draft witness statements which may or may not at some stage or another have been supplied to Mr Wragg. However, they say that in so far as all that is sought is an identification of all those matters in the report which are the subject of oral or written confirmation to Mr Wragg by Penningtons for the purposes of his report, they are perfectly prepared to do the exercise, although they submit that it is an empty ritual. They submit that to order the production of draft witness statements would be wrong because those documents are, in their nature, at this stage privileged documents. It seems to me that, as between the two views, the question depends on exactly what happened. If Mr Wragg was in fact instructed by providing him with the draft witness statements but was asked to simply expunge references to those witness statements in his draft report but to use the information contained in them in his report, then the draft witness statements so supplied to him for that purpose would have lost their character as being privileged from disclosure because they would form part of the instructions referred to in r 35.10(3). If, on the other hand, Mr Wragg when instructed to produce his report was instructed to put out of his mind anything he had learned from seeing earlier confidential material which may have included draft witness statements, but simply to invite Penningtons to supply him with certain assumptions of fact to make for the purposes of his draft report, then only those assumptions of fact would, as it seems to me, be matters which fell within his instructions for the purposes of r 35.10(3) and (4). But the evidence of Mr Dubash leaves me unclear as to exactly what procedure was followed, and in the light of that lack of clarity and the patent defect in the report as it stands, it seems to me that the claimant is entitled to the order which it seeks in this respect.

a What the fruit of that order will be will depend very much on exactly how Mr Wragg was instructed for the purposes of this report.'

[9] The basic issue on this appeal is whether the approach of Morland J who preferred a narrow construction of 'instructions' is to be preferred to that of Hart J who would have applied a rather wider construction to that word.

b [10] One other authority to which we were referred was Bennett v Compass Group UK and Ireland Ltd [2002] EWCA Civ 642, [2002] ICR 1177. That decision was in fact concerned with the form of order made in the particular case. The order would have allowed the defendant to approach the hospital direct for the purpose of obtaining medical records. But in the reasoning of Clarke LJ with which Chadwick LJ agreed the question of jurisdiction was considered and c Clarke LJ said:

'[12] The order relates to "[general practitioner's] and hospital records". As indicated earlier, Mr McBride referred to entries in both sets of records in his report dated 12 July 2000 annexed to the particulars of claim. The report appears to me to be an expert report within the meaning of d CPR r 31.14(e), which provides: "A party may inspect a document mentioned in ... (e) subject to rule 35.10(4), an expert's report. (Rule 35.10(4) makes provision in relation to instructions referred to in an expert's report.)"

[13] Rule 35.10(4) is thus not relevant here. It follows that the e defendants were entitled to inspect documents referred to in Mr McBride's report, namely the claimant's general practitioner and hospital records.'

[11] It will be seen that the Court of Appeal was concerned with the former provision to which Morland J was directing his attention. The question whether medical records supplied to an expert would form part of the f instructions was clearly not fully argued. Nothing in that decision seems to me to bind this court as to the proper approach to the word 'instructions'.

[12] The appeal is concerned with the interaction of the provisions of the CPR as already quoted. It raises in my view a quite fundamental question as to what effect the new CPR were intended to have on the issue of privilege. A quotation from each of the experts' reports in this case will put a little more g flesh on the bones so far as this particular case is concerned, and will help to demonstrate the problems that need consideration in relation to the way the above provisions are intended to work.

[13] Mr Paul Durdey's report of 16 April 2002 begins:

h 'This report into current condition and prognosis was compiled on request of Gadsby Wicks, solicitors, in a letter of 15 March 2002. The report is compiled on the basis of the following documentation supplied by the instructing solicitors: (1) copy of statement of Mr Lucas dated 10 March 2002; (2) copy of Mr Lucas' general practitioner records; (3) copy of medical records from Oldchurch Hospital (Havering Hospitals NHS Trust); (4) copy j of medical records from Homerton Hospital, London; (5) interview and examination of Mr David Lucas at Litfield House, Medical Centre, Bristol, on 9 April 2002. (Mr Lucas came unaccompanied).'

It then refers to Mr Durdey's qualifications. The body of the report contains a chronology of events over two pages, a description of the 'current situation' clearly obtained from the interview on 9 April 2002 over two-and-a-half pages; and a prognosis of five paragraphs.

[14] Dr Fiona Mason's report dated 8 May 2002, commences with an introduction dealing first with her qualifications and then with 'instructions' and 'sources of information' both of which sections I should quote:

> '1.2 Instructions
>
> 1.2.1 This report is prepared for the court at the request of Fran Pollard of Gadsby Wicks, solicitors, 91/99 New London Road, Chelmsford, Essex CM2 0PP. My instructions were received in a letter dated 22 April 2002. I understand from that letter that Mr Lucas is considering a clinical negligence claim following treatment he received at Oldchurch Hospital. In my letter of instruction his solicitor noted: "As a result of the treatment by Oldchurch Hospital, Mr Lucas has suffered considerable psychological distress and in order to value his claim, I need a report from a psychiatrist ... I would be most grateful if, following the appointment with Mr Lucas on 30 April, you would let me have a report setting out: (1) The extent to which you feel that he has suffered a psychiatric and emotional injury as a result of the treatment he has received from Oldchurch Hospital. (2) His present psychiatric condition and his prognosis. (3) The extent to which you feel that psychiatric treatment, if any, may help him in future together with details of the cost ..."
>
> 1.3 Sources of information
>
> 1.3.1 In preparing this report I interviewed Mr Lucas for two and a half hours on 30 April 2002 at St Andrew's Hospital, Northampton.
>
> 1.3.2 In addition I examined the following documentation supplied to me: (1) correspondence from solicitors; (2) Mr David Lucas' statement; (3) copy of the general practitioner's records; (4) copy of the Oldchurch Hospital records; (5) copy of the Homerton Hospital records; (6) copy of Mr Paul Durdey's liability/causation report dated 16 April 2002 and condition/prognosis report also dated 16 April 2002.'

[15] The report then continues 'with background information', 'events leading to the current claim', 'subsequent aftermath' all asserted to come from 'Mr Lucas' documentation provided and where specified his medical records', although clearly the information also came from the interview since a number of paragraphs commence with the words 'Mr Lucas told me ...'

[16] My initial comments on the above reports would be these. So far as Mr Durdey's report is concerned, he has not set out the instructions actually obtained from the solicitors but they may not have been material to his report. There is simply a reference to a letter from the solicitors. The report sets out a factual medical history which must have come either from the statement Mr Lucas supplied, or from the solicitor's letter, or possibly from Mr Lucas in interview or conceivably from all those. These facts clearly were material to his report. Thereafter Mr Durdey set out what the present position is by reference to what Mr Lucas had told him in interviews.

[17] Dr Mason does refer to the contents of her instruction letter and presumably to the material part of it. She then summarises a great deal of information she has obtained from a statement and some material which she has obtained from an oral interview. This information she obviously considered material to the report she was being asked to give.

[18] Before turning to the provisions of the CPR with which this appeal is concerned it is worth exploring whether under the law as it stood previously the defendant would have been entitled to disclosure of Mr Lucas' statement and the report of Mr Durdey.

[19] The position would have been that the statement and the report would prima facie have been privileged. The defendant however would have contended that the contents of the statement and the report were to be 'deployed' at the trial in the expert's report as part of the evidence to be given in the case. There might have been an argument as to whether the production of the evidence to the defendant prior to any deployment at any actual hearing constituted a waiver of privilege or whether the decision of Bracewell J in Clough v Tameside and Glossop Health Authority [1998] 2 All ER 971, [1998] 1 WLR 1478 accurately represented the obligation to disclose material in an expert's report. The likelihood is that Bracewell J's approach would have been followed. It would probably have been held that because the contents of Mr Lucas' statement were being deployed in the expert evidence, privilege had been waived in those contents and therefore for the statement as a whole. Certainly deployment of the contents of the statement in the expert's report in court would have produced a waiver of privilege in relation to the whole statement. There is a convenient summary of the principle and the effect of former cases in Matthews and Malek Disclosure (2nd edn, 2000) pp 305–306 (para 10.17) where they say:

> 'The general rule is that: "Where a person is deploying in court material which would otherwise be privileged, the opposite party and the court must have the opportunity of satisfying themselves that what the party has chosen to release from privilege represents the whole of the material relevant to the issue in question. To allow an individual item to be plucked out of context would be to risk injustice through its real weight or meaning being misunderstood." [Nea Karteria Maritime Co Ltd v Atlantic and Great Lakes Steamship Corp (No 2) [1981] Com LR 138 at 139 per Mustill J.] The key word here is "deploying". A mere reference to a privileged document in an affidavit does not of itself amount to a waiver of privilege, and this is so even if the document referred to is being relied on for some purpose, for reliance in itself is said not to be the test. Instead, the test is whether the contents of the document are being relied on, rather than its effect. The problem is acute in cases where the maker of an affidavit or witness statement has to give details of the source of his information and belief, in order to comply with the rules of admissibility of such affidavit or witness statement. Provided that the maker does not quote the contents, or summarise them, but simply refers to the document's effect, there is apparently no waiver of privilege. This benevolent view has not been extended to the case where the maker refers to the document in order to comply with the party's need to give full and frank disclosure, e.g. on a without notice (ex parte) application.'

[20] That summary referred to authorities such as Nea Karteria Maritime Co Ltd v Atlantic and Great Lakes Steamship Corp (No 2) [1981] Com LR 138 at 139 per Mustill J and Marubeni Corp v Alafouzos [1986] CA Transcript 996. It might also have referred to the case to which we were referred Bourns Inc v Raychem Corp [1999] 3 All ER 154 particularly at 166–167 where Aldous LJ having disapproved certain statements as to the law of Bracewell J in Clough v Tameside and Glossop Health Authority [1998] 2 All ER 971, [1998] 1 WLR 1478 summarised the position:

> 'The principles of law are clear. Service of a witness statement, whether it be a statement of an expert or a witness of fact, waives privilege in that statement. As stated in the Marubeni Corp case mere reference to a document does not waive privilege of that document: there must at least be reference to the contents and reliance.'

[21] So far as the report of Mr Durdey is concerned, referred to only in Dr Mason's report, although there are short references to parts of the contents the argument about deployment would have been less clear.

[22] So considerable dispute would have arisen as to whether parts of the statement and the report were being deployed, and as to whether that waived privilege at that stage, or whether only deployment at the trial would have produced the result that the statement had been produced that result.

[23] What then was intended to be the position under the new CPR? Under r 31.14(2) the defendant 'may apply' subject to r 35.10(4) for inspection of documents mentioned in an expert's report. As already indicated this is to be contrasted with the right to inspect documents in witness statements, witness summaries, affidavits or statements of case. It is also to be contrasted with the former r 31.14(1)(e).

[24] Where there is a right to inspect without application, and without the right being subject to r 35.10(4), it is not absolutely clear whether a party is still entitled to refuse inspection on the grounds of privilege. There is a suggestion in Hollander and Adam Documentary Evidence (7th edn) pp 203–204 (para 13.14) that r 31.14(1) provides an absolute right to inspection. The suggestion is that CPR 31.21 then acts as a sanction disallowing the party who has refused inspection from using the document referred to. I have my doubts as to whether that is right. It seems to me unlikely that the CPR would have intended to abolish privilege at a stroke under r 31.14(1) without expressly saying so. In relation to 'instructions' in experts' reports r 35.10(4) expressly refers to there being no privilege and if privilege was to be lost I would expect express reference to that result. There is no indication that there was an intention to revoke privilege in all other cases. In addition if privilege has been waived by deployment of the contents of a privileged statement, it is not a satisfactory sanction that a party should simply be precluded from relying on the document of which it has not allowed inspection. If a party has in fact waived privilege, the other party should be entitled to use the documents then disclosable for its own purposes.

[25] It was part of Mr Westcott QC's submissions that it was open to the claimant in the instant case to raise privilege as an answer to an application under r 35.14(2), but his submission was that deployment was such in this case that the claim would obviously have failed. Mr Donovan's submission was to the contrary. His submission was that unless relief were obtained by virtue of r 35.10(4) the claimant would be bound to produce the document for inspection. However the question whether there was an absolute right to inspection under r 35.14(1)(a)–(d) was not fully argued out before us. It is possible that on a proper construction of r 31.15 there is a right to refuse inspection on the grounds of privilege even if documents are referred to in a statement of case, a witness statement, a witness summary or an affidavit.

Rule 31.15 appears in broad terms to refer to a party's right to inspect without any right to refuse so to do but in parenthesis at the end of the rule it says: '(Rules 31.3. and 31.14 deal with the right of a party to inspect a document)'. By bringing in CPR 31.3 at that stage it is possible that the draftsmen contemplated that a party may be able to refuse disclosure on the grounds that it has 'a right' to do so under r 31.3(1)(b) allowing for the matter then to be argued out as to whether reference to the document or deployment of its contents has waived privilege.

[26] As I have said the matter has not been fully argued out before us and the question whether r 31.14(1)(a)–(d) gives an absolute right to inspection is not in my view critical to the proper approach to r 31.14(2). Even if those sub-paragraphs did give an absolute right, the position in relation to experts' reports is separately dealt with. There is furthermore a good reason why those documents should be separately dealt with.

[27] Under r 35.10(3) there is a compulsion on experts to set out their material instructions. It is completely up to a party whether in a statement of case, affidavit or witness statement he refers to a document which might otherwise be privileged. Rule 35.10(3) compels disclosure of what would otherwise be privileged material, and indeed compels that material to be referred to in such a way that under the common law there would be held to be waiver of all other privileged material relevant to showing there was no 'cherry picking' at least where that material was deployed at a hearing.

[28] The intention behind r 35.10(4) seems to me to be to encourage the setting out fully of 'material' instructions and indeed facts. Because a party is compelled so to do, it was thought right that some protection should be given where an expert complies with that requirement. Support for that being the object of r 35.10(4) is gained from a comparison between Lord Woolf's Interim Report on Access to Justice (June 1995) as compared to his Access to Justice: Final Report to the Lord Chancellor on the Civil Justice System of England and Wales (July 1996) a summary of which appears in the notes to the White Book (Civil Procedure April 2003 edn)) vol I, pp 841–842 (para 35.10.5).

[29] Where does that lead in relation to the construction of the word 'instructions'? Mr Westcott submits that a narrow construction should be placed on that word. He says that the CPR cannot have been intended to go backwards. He submits therefore that the correct approach is to construe the word 'instructions' narrowly as Morland J did. The effect of his argument would be (1) that some limitation will be placed on the circumstances on which the instruction letter to the solicitors will have to be disclosed; (2) that if a statement is actually referred to as a document an application to inspect will succeed (although on Mr Westcott's submission a claim for privilege might be made—something which Morland J or those before Morland J did not seem to consider was available); (3) that the effect of deploying the contents of the claimant's statement would be to waive privilege in the same in any event and that Bracewell J's approach in Clough's case should be adopted so that the statement should be ordered to be produced at this stage.

[30] Mr Donovan suggests that r 35.10(4) is intended to reach a reasonable compromise so far as material supplied to experts is concerned. The CPR require a full setting out of the facts; that would have waived privilege; the loss of privilege is confirmed by r 35.10(4) but the court will not make an order for disclosure unless 'it is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to consider the statement of instructions given under paragraph (3) to be inaccurate or incomplete'. That he submits supports a wide construction of the word 'instructions' to include the information being supplied by the claimant and all the material which a solicitor places in front of the expert in order to gain advice.

[31] In my view Mr Donovan's submissions are to be preferred. It seems to me that r 35.10(4) is designed primarily to give protection to a party who would otherwise have waived privilege by being compelled to set out matters in an expert's report. It is also designed so far as possible to prevent lengthy arguments as to whether there has been a waiver of privilege either prior to the trial or indeed at trial leading to an entitlement to further disclosure.

[32] In this case there is no difficulty in relation to the statement of Mr Lucas. That statement was supplied to the expert as part of the instructions to the expert. Substantial parts had been set out as 'material instructions' pursuant to r 35.10(3). The very purpose as it seems to me of r 35.10(4) is to prevent compliance with r 35.10(3) rendering such a statement disclosable unless there are grounds for believing that the statement of instructions given in the expert's report is 'inaccurate or incomplete'.

[33] So far as Mr Durdey's previous report is concerned I see no reason why a similar approach should not render that document part of the instructions given to Dr Mason. That report was clearly given to her for a purpose and the purpose must have been to instruct her about what it was that the expert had been saying about Mr Lucas' condition. It is no abuse of language thus as it seems to me to describe the provision of that report as part of the instructions to Dr Mason.

[34] It follows that I disagree with the decision of Morland J in Taylor v Bolton Health Authority [2000] CLY 96 and would hold that that should no longer be considered authoritative in this area. Material supplied by the instructing party to the expert as the basis on which the expert is being asked to advise should in my view be considered as part of the instructions and thus subject to r 35.10(4).

[35] There is however in this court an alternative string to the defendant's bow. They say that it must follow that the experts in this case have not stated 'the substance of all material instructions ...' Thus they say there has been a failure to comply with r 35.10(3) and an order for disclosure of the statement and the report should be made under r 35.10(4).

[36] This submission as it seems to me misunderstands the relationship between r 35.10(3) and (4). The obligation under r 35.10(3) is to disclose the substance of all material instructions. The protection under r 35.10(4) relates to 'any specific document' and 'questioning in court' unless the statement of instructions given under para (3) is inaccurate or incomplete. There is no requirement to set out all the information contained in the statement or all the material that has been supplied to an expert. The only obligation on the expert is to set out 'material instructions' (my emphasis). But the protection applies to any particular document and any particular question over any area, and has to do so because disclosure of part of privileged material by implication when deployed may waive other privileged material.

[37] There is no basis at this stage that I can see for suggesting that the 'material instructions' are in any way inaccurate in either report.

[38] It may be that at the trial a different picture will appear. For example a statement may be served by Mr Lucas that tells a very different story from that which appears in the experts' reports. It could be that the expert's report of Mr Durdey referred to in Dr Mason's report is not produced and some different picture appears from a different expert's report. This is all speculation and it will only be at a trial or conceivably when there has been a further exchange of experts' reports and witness statements that there will or could be any foundation for such an argument.

[39] In those circumstances I would allow the appeal and refuse the order for disclosure of Mr Lucas' statement and Mr Durdey's report.

MANTELL LJ.

[40] I agree.

LAWS LJ.

[41] I gratefully adopt the account of the facts and circumstances giving rise to this appeal set out in the judgment of Waller LJ, which I have had the advantage of reading in draft. I agree that the appeal should be allowed for the reasons given by him. I add a few short observations because of the importance of the point of practice which the case raises, and we are distinctly holding that the approach taken by Morland J in Taylor v Bolton Health Authority [2000] CLY 96 should not be followed.

[42] As it seems to me the key to the case, and to the sense to be attributed to the term 'instructions' in CPR 35.10(3) and (4), is the imperative of transparency, a general theme of the CPR but here specifically applied to the deployment of experts' reports. Thus the aim of r 35.10(3) and (4) is broadly to ensure that the factual basis on which the expert has prepared his report is patent. That approach demands a wide reading of the term 'instructions', and would be frustrated by the approach taken by Morland J in Taylor's case ('instructions are what an expert is told to do').

[43] There is a plain impact on the scope of legal professional privilege, and thus a degree of protection against the loss of privilege is given by the restrictions on disclosure provided for by r 35.10(4). I think it a premise of the arrangements constituted by r 35.10(3) and (4) that in the ordinary way the expert is to be trusted to comply with r 35.10(3): the effect of the r 35.10(4) restrictions is that the party on the other side may not as a matter of course call for disclosure of documents constituting the expert's instructions as a check to see that r 35.10(3) has been fulfilled. There must be some concrete fact giving rise to 'reasonable grounds' within the closing words of r 35.10(4). It is unsurprising that the expert is thus to be trusted; it is of a piece with his overriding duty to help the court (r 35.3). Overall, r 35.10(4) in my view strikes an important balance between on the one hand the protection of the party whose privilege is lost, and on the other the vindication of r 35.10(3) where there is a real question mark as to its fulfilment.

[44] Although (as Waller LJ has pointed out at [25], above) the matter has not been argued fully before us, and thus no doubt it would be wrong to express a concluded view, for my part I would have very great difficulty in accepting that CPR 35.14(1)(a)–(d) confers an absolute right to inspect, thus abrogating privilege otherwise inherent in any document there referred to. Such a construction would require very clear words. The sub-paragraphs are not generally concerned with documents which would attract privilege, and so have ample scope to operate without the assumption of any incursion into the law of privilege. It is inconceivable that they abrogate the impact of public interest immunity, which presumably they would if they created absolute rights. And it would be quixotic if documents whose privilege is expressly withdrawn (see r 35.10(4)) were subject only to limited rights of disclosure but those (see r 35.14(1)) whose privilege is only impliedly withdrawn were liable to be inspected without restriction.

Appeal allowed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

Clark v Cutland and others

[2003] EWCA Civ 810

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
SCHIEMANN, POTTER AND ARDEN LJJ
16 MAY, 18 JUNE 2003

Companies – Director – Duty – Fiduciary duty – Breach of fiduciary duty – Company owing debt to trustees of pension fund – Director making unauthorised transfers of company assets to trustees of pension fund – Whether assets traceable by company in hands of trustees – Whether value of assets transferred to be set off against debt.

The petitioner and the first respondent (the respondent) were equal shareholders and the only directors of a company. Without authority, the respondent took remuneration from the company which included payments totalling £145,000 (the payments) taken from the company's assets and paid into his pension fund. The petitioner commenced a derivative action on behalf of the company against the trustees of the pension fund to recover moneys which had been misapplied and he also brought unfair prejudice proceedings against the respondent under the Companies Act 1985. The derivative action was later consolidated with the unfair prejudice proceedings. The judge found in favour of the petitioner and an order was made for the acquisition of the respondent's shares. Judgment was given against the respondent in favour of the company in the sum of £1,150,753. The judge also found that the company was indebted to the pension fund in the sum of £100,000. The petitioner appealed against the judge's refusal to order that that debt should be set off against the payments. The petitioner accepted that a personal remedy for breach of trust would not be available as against the pension fund trustees as they had received the payments without notice of the respondent's want of authority to make them. He submitted that the payments were voidable as they had been made in breach of duty by the respondent and the trustees now had notice of the company's claim so that while title to the payments had passed to the trustees it could be revested in the company or, alternatively, that the trustees held the payments on constructive trust, since they had been made in breach of fiduciary duty, and that the payments or their traceable proceeds could be recovered. The proprietary remedy sought was that the assets of the pension fund be charged to secure the sum of £145,000, that that sum be set off against the £100,000 owed by the company to the pension fund trustees, and that the balance be paid. The respondent contended inter alia that the payments having been made without authority, the transaction was therefore void, with the consequence that title had passed despite the invalidity of the transaction, and that the petitioner could not succeed in asserting that the trustees held the payments on constructive trust since he had conceded that the company had no personal remedy available against the trustees.

Held – If the payments to the pension fund trustees had merely been made by the respondent in breach of his duty to the company, and had he not also made them without the authority of the company, the payments would have been voidable. However, when an agent carried out a transaction without authority the consequence was that the transaction was without legal effect. Under the company articles the directors were not entitled to any remuneration unless it had been authorised by the company in general meeting. In the instant case there had been no such authorisation. It followed that the payments to the pension fund trustees were without legal effect and not merely voidable. For the purpose of considering liability on the basis of constructive trust it did not matter that the payments were void rather than voidable. What mattered was that the respondent acted in breach of his fiduciary duty to the company and that the pension fund trustees had received notice of the company's claim. In the context of the company's claim for a proprietary remedy the concession that the company had no personal remedy against the trustees amounted only to an acceptance by the company that the trustees had received the contributions as innocent volunteers. Accordingly, the company was entitled to trace the payments that the respondent had made without authority into the pension fund assets. The proprietary remedy sought of a charge over the pension fund assets was an appropriate one and it was open to the court to impose a charge on the benefit of the loan to the company so that set off could occur and declare that the balance was charged on the cash reserves of the pension fund. The appeal would accordingly be allowed (see [23], [26]–[28], [30], [31], [34], [36], [37], below).

Notes

For powers and duties of directors generally and directors as trustees of the company's property, see 7(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (1996 reissue) paras 582, 591.

Cases referred to in judgments

Agip (Africa) Ltd v Jackson [1992] 4 All ER 385, [1990] Ch 265, [1989] 3 WLR 1367; affd [1992] 4 All ER 451, [1991] Ch 547, [1991] 3 WLR 116, CA.

Allan v Rea Bros Trustees Ltd [2002] EWCA Civ 85, (2002) 4 ITELR 627.

Anderson v Hogg 2002 SC 190, Ct of Sess (IH).

Chase Manhattan Bank NA v Israel-British Bank (London) Ltd [1979] 3 All ER 1025, [1981] Ch 105, [1980] 2 WLR 202.

Diplock's Estate, Re, Diplock v Wintle [1948] 2 All ER 318, [1948] Ch 465, CA; affd sub nom Ministry of Health v Simpson [1950] 2 All ER 1137, [1951] AC 251, HL.

Duomatic Ltd, Re [1969] 1 All ER 161, [1969] 2 Ch 365, [1969] 2 WLR 114.

Foskett v McKeown [2000] 3 All ER 97, [2001] 1 AC 102, [2000] 2 WLR 1299, HL.

Guinness plc v Saunders [1990] 1 All ER 652, [1990] 2 AC 663, [1990] 2 WLR 324, HL.

Hailey Group Ltd, Re [1993] BCLC 459.

Henderson v Henderson (1843) 3 Hare 100, 67 ER 313, [1843–60] All ER Rep 378, V-C.

Kaye v Croydon Tramways Co [1898] 1 Ch 358, CA.

Lowe v Fahey [1996] 1 BCLC 262.

Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington London BC [1996] 2 All ER 961, [1996] AC 669, [1996] 2 WLR 802, HL.

Cases also cited or referred to in skeleton arguments

Bank of Credit and Commerce International (overseas) Ltd (in liq) v Akindele [2000] 4 All ER 221, [2001] Ch 437, [2000] 3 WLR 1423, CA.

Banque Belge pour l'Etranger v Hambrouck [1921] 1 KB 321, CA.

Birch v Blagrave (1755) Amb 264, 27 ER 176, LC.

Childers v Childers (1857) 1 De G & J 482, 44 ER 810, DC.

Hallett's Estate, Re, Knatchbull v Hallett (1879) 13 Ch D 696, [1874–80] All ER Rep 793, CA.
Jones (FC) & Sons (a firm) (Trustee of the property of) v Jones [1997] Ch 159, CA.
Lipkin Gorman (a firm) v Karpnale Ltd [1992] 4 All ER 512, [1991] 2 AC 548, [1991] 3 WLR 10, HL.
Little Olympian Each Ways Ltd, Re [1994] 2 BCLC 420.
Muller, Re, Cassin v Mutual Cash Order Co Ltd [1953] NZLR 879, NZ SC.
Polly Peck International plc (in admin), Re (No 2) [1998] 3 All ER 812, CA.
Vinogradoff, Re, Allen v Jackson [1935] WN 68.

Appeal

The petitioner, George Clark, a shareholder in Tulgrove Ltd (the company), appealed with permission of Arden LJ granted on 2 December 2002 from the order of Judge Norris QC in Birmingham District Registry of the Chancery Division on 12 July 2002 granting relief in unfair prejudice proceedings under s 459 of the Companies Act 1985 in respect of the conduct of his fellow shareholder in the company, Roger John Charles Cutland, the respondent, in the management of the affairs of the company but refusing to order that a debt of the company to the trustees of the company's directors pension scheme be set off against payments out of the company's assets which the respondent had, without authority paid or caused to be paid to the pension scheme trustees. The facts are set out in the judgment of Arden LJ.

David Stockill (instructed by FBC Solicitors, Wolverhampton) for Mr Clark.
Thomas Seymour (instructed through the Bar Pro Bono Unit) for Mr Cutland.
The company was not represented.
The trustees did not appear.

Cur adv vult

18 June 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

ARDEN LJ (giving the first judgment at the invitation of Schiemann LJ).

[1] This is an appeal against the order of Judge Norris QC sitting in the High Court of Justice, Chancery Division, Birmingham District Registry, on 12 July 2002. In the proceedings the appellant, Mr Clark, has claimed relief under s 459 of the Companies Act 1985 in respect of unfairly prejudicial conduct by his fellow shareholder, Mr Cutland, in the management of the affairs of Tulgrove Ltd (the company). Mr Clark succeeded in showing unfair prejudice and an order was made for the acquisition of Mr Cutland's shares.

[2] So far as material, Mr Clark and Mr Cutland were equal shareholders in the company. At all material times, they were also the only directors of the company. The judge found that, without Mr Clark's knowledge, Mr Cutland had misappropriated from the company sums totalling £517,734. The exact method of his misappropriation is not material for present purposes. When the misappropriation came to light, Mr Clark commenced a derivative action on behalf of the company against the trustees to recover the moneys which had been misapplied. Later he commenced unfair prejudice proceedings under s 459 of the 1985 Act. The derivative action was in due course consolidated with the unfair prejudice proceedings but it was in the latter proceedings that relief was ultimately granted.

[3] The judge also found that Mr Cutland had taken from the company, without authority, remuneration in the form of salary, pension contributions and other benefits in the further sum of £432,432. This sum included contributions of £45,000 and £50,000 made in 1998 and 1999 out of the company's assets and a further contribution of £50,000 made in 2000, which Mr Cutland paid personally but then recouped out of the company's funds. These payments were made to Mr Cutland's pension fund and were included in the judgment given against Mr Cutland in favour of the company in the sum of £1,150,753.

[4] The judge also found that the company was indebted to the pension fund in the sum of £100,000. The circumstances in which this debt arose are not relevant for the purposes of this appeal. This appeal is only against the judge's refusal to order that that debt should be set against the contributions totalling £145,000 which Mr Cutland paid or caused to be paid on his behalf to the fund.

[5] The judge rejected a defence to Mr Cutland's unauthorised drawings based on the alleged unanimous consent of both shareholders. The drawings were included in a balance sheet item for directors' remuneration in the annual accounts for the relevant years, and if Mr Clark had analysed the global figures, he would have appreciated that Mr Cutland was drawing remuneration which he had not approved. The judge held:

> '... to say that, because Mr Clark did not carry out that calculation he is bound by his "approval", would be to substitute a test of non–objection to the test of positive approval which Re Duomatic Ltd [1969] 1 All ER 161, [1969] 2 Ch 365 lays down and I decline to do so. This is all the more the case where, not only was the attention of the shareholders not drawn to the remuneration being paid to Mr Cutland, but their attention was specifically diverted away by the clear statement that he was not making any drawings. I am satisfied that taking money in pension contributions whilst not disclosing that he was doing so, and indeed asserting that he was not doing so, amounts to "unfair prejudice" as well as being unlawful. It may well be that if Mr Clark had been asked, he would have approved some level of remuneration related to his own. However, that does not stop the fact that the money was taken without his being asked as "unfair prejudice".'

[6] It is common ground that the trustees of the pension fund made loans to the company and that at the date of the trial the company was indebted to the trustees in the sum of £100,000. The only beneficiaries of the pension fund are Mr Cutland and his wife and dependants. The trustees of the pension fund are Mr Cutland and the third respondent. Neither the company nor the third respondent has played any part in these proceedings. Neither appeared before the judge or on this appeal. They have, however, been duly served.

[7] The judge also found that there was unfair prejudice in that Mr Cutland obtained an allotment of shares intended for a new director. We are not concerned with that allegation. The judge directed that these shares should be acquired by the company. The judge ordered a purchase by Mr Clark of Mr Cutland's remaining shares on terms which are not material. The judge rejected a number of other allegations of unfair prejudice but we are not concerned with them and accordingly it is unnecessary for me to set them out.

[8] The judge acceded to the submission that there was a wide jurisdiction under s 461 to give relief against third parties which could have been granted in a derivative action. The judge cited inter alia Re Hailey Group Ltd [1993] BCLC 459 and Lowe v Fahey [1996] 1 BCLC 262 and concluded that it was appropriate for him to treat the petition as if it were a derivative action, particularly as there was a derivative action in the background with which the petition had been consolidated. The same view of the law was taken by the Inner House of the Court of Session in Anderson v Hogg 2002 SC 190.

PRELIMINARY ISSUE

[9] A preliminary point arises as to whether the appeal in this case can proceed at all. Mr Thomas Seymour, for Mr Cutland, contends that the remedy now sought on appeal was not pleaded below. Only very brief reference was made to it by the appellant in his opening and closing submissions at trial. What is sought on appeal is an order setting the amounts which Mr Cutland paid into the pension fund from the company's assets without authority against the loan owed by the company to the trustees of the pension fund. This order is at variance with Mr Clark's case in that in his petition Mr Clark accepted that he would have been content if Mr Cutland had drawn about the same remuneration as he did. In fact, Mr Cutland had only drawn about £128,000 in all more than Mr Clark.

[10] Mr Seymour makes a number of further submissions. First, the order now sought is not set out in the petition; Mr Clark could not rely on the fact that the prayer in the petitions sought unspecified 'further or other relief'. To allow unpleaded points to be raised on an appeal would be to turn the appeal into a fresh hearing when it should in general be no more than a review of the judge's order (CPR 52.11). Second, Mr Seymour submits that the judge refused the relief now sought on appeal specifically on the grounds that no such relief had been sought. Third, Mr Seymour submits that an unpleaded point should not have been taken against Mr Cutland who was representing himself. Mr Cave did not appear. The trustees were effectively third parties. Fourth, Mr Seymour submits that an action has been started by the trustees for repayment of the sums due to the trustees, in which it is open to the company to plead as a defence that it is entitled to a proprietary remedy against the pension fund by reason of the matters found in this action. He concedes, however, that if the company takes that course, it might be open to the trustees to rely on abuse of process (see Henderson v Henderson (1843) 3 Hare 100, [1843–60] All ER Rep 378). Likewise, if the appeal were dismissed and the company were to start a new action seeking to recover assets from the pension fund, the trustees might be entitled to have the proceedings dismissed as an abuse of process.

[11] Mr David Stockill, for Mr Clark, submits that the relief now sought was in fact sought in the court below. He refers to his written submissions which he submitted on 8 July 2002 before making his closing speech. The written submissions state in material part as follows:

> '3.10 The company has, it is submitted, a straightforward case for recovery of the unauthorised pension contributions in the sum of £145,000. Clearly these funds remain in the pension scheme.
>
> 3.11 They should be used to offset the loan liability …'

[12] Mr Stockill submits that, although arguments were addressed to the judge on set-off, the judge did not deal with the point in his judgment. According to the transcript of the discussion after judgment, Mr Stockill pointed out to the judge that his judgment did not deal with the question of a proprietary remedy against the pension fund trustees and the judge replied that, as the moneys were paid without authority, and the trustees had no notice of the lack of authority, the company could not retain title to the moneys and accordingly no proprietary remedy lay against the pension fund trustees. Mr Stockill applied for permission to appeal against this ruling. The judge's reasons for refusing permission to appeal were that that relief had not been claimed in the petition and that there was no real prospect of success on appeal.

[13] Mr Stockill submits that s 461 of the 1985 Act is wide enough to encompass relief of this nature, and the petition sought 'further other relief'. Moreover, if the judge was concerned that the third respondent was not before the court, he could have been given a right to apply to discharge the order within a specific period after service of the order.

[14] In my judgment it is quite clear from the written submissions and transcript of proceedings quoted above that the question of the entitlement of the company to a tracing remedy was before the judge and that he did deal with it. The case had complications and the question of the appropriate remedy is one which naturally fell to be developed after judgment because it depended on the judge's findings of fact. For my own part, I have no doubt that it can properly be raised in this court. It raises a question of law on which Mr Cutland now has the benefit of an experienced Chancery junior. Accordingly, he is at no disadvantage even if he was taken by surprise below. All the relevant facts have been found. The only alternative would be for this court to order an inquiry, or for a separate set of proceedings to take place in which the company would seek to resist liability for the loan on the basis that it should be set against the sums which were paid into the pension fund. I do not see that any purpose would be served by those separate proceedings and indeed Mr Seymour has very properly intimated that, if the question of set-off was raised in separate proceedings, it would be open to the pension fund trustees to raise a question of an abuse of process and have the proceedings dismissed. Further proceedings would lead to a duplication of costs and entail delay. They could also prejudice the company's claim to a proprietary remedy. Accordingly, I would dismiss the preliminary point. I now turn to deal with the detailed submissions on the substantive questions raised by this appeal.

THE APPELLANT'S SUBMISSIONS

[15] Mr Stockill accepts that a personal remedy for breach of trust would not be available as against the pension fund trustees because they received the contributions made by the company without notice of Mr Cutland's want of authority to make them. However, he submits that where money subject to one express trust is paid improperly and without valuable consideration to the trustees of another trust, that money or its traceable proceeds still belongs in equity to the first trust and its trustees have a proprietary claim to recover them. He cites Allan v Rea Bros Trustees Ltd [2002] EWCA Civ 85, (2002) 4 ITELR 627 and Foskett v McKeown [2000] 3 All ER 97, [2001] 1 AC 102 as authority for this proposition.

[16] Mr Stockill submits that in order to establish an equitable proprietary remedy, he must establish a fiduciary relationship and traceable trust property. In this case, the fiduciary relationship was that between Mr Cutland and the company. In misappropriating its funds he breached that duty (see, for example, at first instance Millett J in Agip (Africa) Ltd v Jackson [1992] 4 All ER 385 at 402–403, [1990] Ch 265 at 290 and in the Court of Appeal per Fox LJ (with whom Butler-Sloss and Beldam LJJ agreed) ([1992] 4 All ER 451, [1991] Ch 547).

[17] He further submits that the company can trace the contributions which Mr Cutland made to his pension fund without authority out of the company's assets into the hands of the trustees and that the company has an option whether to claim a proportionate share of the fund or a lien on its assets (see Foskett v McKeown). The remedy sought by the company is a charge, and the most appropriate assets on which to impose this charge are the benefit of the loans from the pension fund trustees to the company, and, as to any balance, the cash held by the pension fund trustees. The loan and the sums traceable by the company can then (pro tanto) be set off against each other. Amounts recovered from the pension fund trustees would be credited against Mr Cutland's judgment debt. Interest should be added to the loan and judgment debt at the appropriate rates.

[18] Mr Stockill argues that, if necessary, the funds paid to the trustees should be treated as having been routed through Mr Cutland so that the legal and beneficial interest in the moneys becomes divided.

THE RESPONDENT'S SUBMISSIONS

[19] Mr Seymour accepts that the right to trace will exist if there was an equitable interest in the moneys. However, he submits that such an equitable interest only exists if money is taken fraudulently and without any disclosure in the accounts. Here the unauthorised remuneration was disclosed in the accounts within the global item for directors' remuneration. The drawing of unauthorised remuneration was thus not embezzlement or theft. The petition stated that Mr Clark would have been content for Mr Cutland to receive equal remuneration. Mr Seymour submits that on this basis the legal and beneficial interest in the moneys paid without authority passed to the pension fund trustees (see Westdeutsche Landesbank Girozentrale v Islington London BC [1996] 2 All ER 961 at 989–990, [1996] AC 669 at 707 per Lord Browne-Wilkinson). Alternatively, the payments were void. Moreover, if as is conceded, the trustees are not personally liable as constructive trustees there can be no equitable proprietary remedy as against them. In the circumstances, there is simply a personal liability to account on the part of Mr Cutland.

[20] Mr Seymour submits that the final £50,000 was paid out of Mr Cutland's own funds and not out of company funds.

CONCLUSIONS

[21] At the heart of Mr Seymour's submissions on behalf of Mr Cutland is a submission that there is a difference in legal consequence between (on the one hand) a breach of duty which consists of making a payment out of the company's funds which could have been lawfully made if procedures for obtaining approval under the company's constitution had been followed and (on the other hand) a payment which was in effect a theft. Both such payments are, however, breaches of duty. It is the duty of directors to follow the appropriate procedures in the company's constitution as much as it is their duty to apply corporate property only for proper purposes. Failure to obtain appropriate approval and insufficient disclosure is a serious matter. Disclosure plays an important role in company law and the quality of disclosure is important. Disclosure is required for many purposes and it performs at least two valuable functions. It ensures that information is passed from the directors to the shareholders or from one director to another. It also acts as a deterrent against self-dealing. As Brandeis J (a justice of the United States Supreme Court) said extra-judicially, 'sunlight can be the best of disinfectants'. Meaningless disclosure does not perform these functions and inadequate disclosure is often little better than no disclosure at all. Thus in Kaye v Croydon Tramways Co [1898] 1 Ch 358, a notice of meeting was held to give insufficient notice of a resolution which (among other purposes) was to approve directors' benefits when the fact of such benefits under the resolution was not fairly and candidly disclosed. The present case is not a case where a person who was entitled to receive certain information was, in fact, given that information in some other way so that his claim not to have had appropriate disclosure can be seen to be unmeritorious and the non-disclosure merely technical. The judge here concluded that the disclosure of Mr Cutland's remuneration within a global sum for remuneration in the accounts, seen against the context of statements by Mr Cutland that he was not taking any remuneration, was inadequate disclosure. I would add that there is no cross-appeal against his rejection of the defence based on unanimous consent, often referred to as 'the Duomatic principle' following the decision of Buckley J in Re Duomatic Ltd [1969] 1 All ER 161, [1969] 2 Ch 365.

[22] The difference in legal consequence which Mr Seymour seeks to draw between unauthorised and stolen payments is (on his main submission) based on a passage from the judgment of Lord Browne-Wilkinson in the Westdeutsche case. In that case the bank lent money to the local authority for the purposes of a transaction which was outside its powers. The question was whether the bank was entitled to compound interest on the ground that the local authority was a trustee of the moneys lent to it. The bank argued that it only intended to part with its beneficial ownership of the moneys lent in the performance of a valid contract and accordingly neither the legal interest nor the equitable interest passed the local authority at the date of the payment. Lord Browne-Wilkinson rejected this argument. He held:

> 'A person solely entitled to the full beneficial ownership of money or property, both at law and in equity, does not enjoy an equitable interest in that property. The legal title carries with it all rights. Unless and until there is a separation of the legal and equitable estates, there is no separate equitable title. Therefore to talk about the bank "retaining" its equitable interest is meaningless. The only question is whether the circumstances under which the money was paid were such as, in equity, to impose a trust on the local authority. If so, an equitable interest arose for the first time under that trust.' (See [1996] 2 All ER 961 at 989, [1996] AC 669 at 706.)

[23] In my judgment, this passage does not apply in the present situation. The payment made to the local authority was intended to be made by the bank when it was made. By contrast in this case, there was no organ of the company which was duly authorised to form any intention about making the payments. Mr Cutland made the payments as an agent lacking the authority. Accordingly this is not a situation where the full legal and beneficial ownership in the pension contributions passed.

[24] Mr Stockill relied on the following extracts from a passage headed 'Establishing a proprietary claim' by Graham Virgo in Buckley on the Companies Acts (15th edn, 2000) vol 3:

> 'Establishing a proprietary claim
>
> T[A70.229B]
>
> Regardless of whether the company seeks a personal or proprietary restitutionary remedy, whenever its claim is founded on the defendant's interference with the company's property rights it is necessary for the company to establish that the defendant has, at the very least, received property in which the company has a property interest. This property interest may arise either at law or in equity. The recognition of proprietary interests is a matter of law and does not involve the discretion of the court.
>
> T[A70.229C]
>
> (1) Retention of a legal property interest: Generally, where property is transferred from one party to another legal title in the property will also pass because this is what the parties intended. However, in certain limited circumstances title will not pass because the transferor's intention was vitiated in some way. For example, where the company's property has been stolen, it will not have intended title to pass and so it will retain title to the property, at least as long as the property can still be identified ... In other circumstances title may have passed but it will be revested in the company, as will occur where a transaction is voidable at law and has been rescinded. In certain circumstances title will pass even though the nature of the transfer may be suspect for some reason. For example, if property has been transferred pursuant to a void transaction, then title will pass despite the invalidity of the transaction. Similarly, where property has been transferred pursuant to an illegal transaction then title will pass despite the invalidity of the transaction itself.
>
> T[A70.229D]
>
> (2) Creation of an equitable proprietary interest: An equitable proprietary interest cannot be created unless there is some event which enables the equitable title to be separated from the legal title. This can happen in three different circumstances. (1) Where an express trust has been constituted so that the trustee holds the legal title to property and the beneficiary will have an equitable interest in the same property. (2) Where property is held on resulting trust ... (3) Where property is held on a constructive trust. A constructive trust arises by operation of law in a number of different circumstances. Two of the most important are where a defendant receives property in breach of a fiduciary duty and where the defendant has acted unconscionably, which will especially be the case where the defendant receives property knowing that it had been stolen or had been transferred by mistake.' (Footnotes omitted.)

[25] Mr Stockill contends that the proprietary remedy which he seeks falls within para T[A70.229C] because the payments to the pension fund were voidable as a result of Mr Cutland's breach of duty in making them and the pension fund had notice of company's claim. In the alternative, he submits that the court can grant a proprietary remedy because the pension fund trustees

now hold the contributions on constructive trust and that category (3) in para T[A70.229D] applies. To these submissions, Mr Seymour responds that the contributions were, on the judge's findings, paid without authority. They are therefore void. Moreover, he submits that category (3) of para T[A70.229D] does not apply because it is conceded by Mr Stockill there is no personal remedy against the trustees. It is not, however, in doubt but that the pension fund trustees still hold assets representing the contributions totalling £145,000 in question. Moreover, the pension fund trustees are volunteers.

[26] There seems to me to be a basic inconsistency between Mr Seymour's submission that the payments to the pension fund trustees were void and his main submission. His submission on this point seems to me to accept that the contributions were misapplications of the company's assets. However that may be, the position is that reg 76 of table A in the First Schedule to the Companies Act 1948 applied to the company. Under this article, directors were not entitled to any remuneration unless it was authorised by the company in general meeting. The judge held that there was no such authorisation in the present case. It follows that the payments of pension contributions to the pension fund trustees were without legal effect and not merely voidable (see Guinness plc v Saunders [1990] 1 All ER 652 at 661, [1990] 2 AC 663 at 693 per Lord Templeman, with whom Lord Keith of Kinkel, Lord Brandon of Oakbrook and Lord Griffiths agreed, and [1990] 1 All ER 652 at 665–668, [1990] 2 AC 663 at 698–702 per Lord Goff of Chieveley, with whom Lord Griffiths also agreed).

[27] If those payments had merely been made by Mr Cutland in breach of his duty to the company, and he had not also made them without the authority of the company, Mr Stockill's submission that the payments were voidable would have been correct. However, where an agent carries out a transaction without authority, the consequence is (as I have stated) that the transaction is without legal effect. This consequence is more serious in law than that which attaches to a transaction which is voidable since the right to rescind a voidable transaction can be lost. Because the sanction attaching to an unauthorised transaction is more serious, it must supersede the sanction of voidability that would otherwise attach in the present case.

[28] That still leaves category (3) in para T[A70.229D], namely liability on the basis of constructive trust. For this purpose, it does not matter that the payments were void or without legal effect, rather than voidable (see Guinness v Saunders). What matters is that Mr Cutland acted in breach of his fiduciary duty to the company, as to which there is no doubt, and that the pension fund trustees have received notice of the company's claim, which again is not disputed. A further passage from the speech of Lord Browne-Wilkinson in the Westdeutsche case [1996] 2 All ER 961 at 989–990, [1996] AC 669 at 707 illustrates those points:

> 'The bank contended that where, under a pre-existing trust, B is entitled to an equitable interest in the trust property, if the trust property comes into the hands of a third party, X (not being a purchaser of the value of the legal interest without notice), B is entitled to enforce his equitable interest against the property in the hands of X because X is the trustee for B. In my view the third party, X, is not necessarily a trustee for B: B's equitable right is enforceable against the property in just the same way as any other > specifically enforceable right can be enforced against the third party. Even if the third party, X, is not aware that what he has received is trust property B is entitled to assert his title in that property. If X has the necessary degree of knowledge, X may himself become a trustee for B on the basis of knowing receipt. But unless he has the requisite degree of knowledge he is not personally liable to account as a trustee; [Re Diplock's Estate, Diplock v Wintle [1948] 2 All ER 318 at 325, [1948] Ch 465 at 478] ...'

[29] Lord Browne-Wilkinson confirmed the existence of a proprietary remedy against a third party in his analysis, in a later passage in the Westdeutsche case [1996] 2 All ER 961 at 996–997, [1996] AC 669 at 714–715, of the decision by Goulding J in Chase Manhattan Bank NA v Israel-British Bank (London) Ltd [1979] 3 All ER 1025, [1981] Ch 105. In that case, a bank claimed to recover moneys paid under a mistake to another bank. Goulding J held that the paying bank retained an equitable property in the payments and that the conscience of the receiving bank was subject to a fiduciary duty to respect that proprietary right. Lord Browne-Wilkinson disagreed with this approach. In his judgment, the receiving bank did not become a trustee for the paying bank until it learnt of the mistake two days after the receipt of the moneys. He considered that the case would have been correctly decided on that basis.

[30] Mr Seymour relies on the concession which Mr Stockill has made that the company has no personal remedy against the pension fund trustees. Seen in the context of the company's claim for a proprietary remedy it is clear that all that concession amounts to is an acceptance by the company that the pension fund trustees received the contributions as innocent volunteers. The concession is clearly not intended to pull the rug from under the proprietary claim. Furthermore, there is no suggestion that the continued retention of the contributions by the pension fund trustees would not be unconscionable.

[31] Accordingly, in my judgment, the company is entitled to trace the payments of pension fund contributions which Mr Cutland made without authority into the pension fund assets. Mr Clark, on behalf of the company, has elected to pursue a proprietary remedy by seeking a charge over the pension fund assets. In my judgment, this is an appropriate form of remedy and it is open to the court to impose it in the way that Mr Stockill submits, namely by imposing a charge on the benefit of the loan to the company so that set-off can occur and by declaring that the balance is charged on the cash reserves of the pension fund.

THE CONTRIBUTION OF £50,000 IN 2000

[32] As regards the £50,000 paid in 2000, the judge allowed a deduction from misappropriations in the sum of £50,000:

> 'I propose to allow this deduction to Mr Cutland. My reason is that the £50,000 pension contribution which he seeks to offset here as having been loaned to the company and paid out again is also the subject of the express remuneration claim, being the £50,000 paid in respect of the pension contribution for the year ending 31 December 2000. It would in my judgment be double counting if I were to refuse payment here and allow the excess remuneration claim ...'

In effect, the judge treated the £50,000 as having been lent to the company when it was paid to the pension fund trustees and accordingly it must be treated on the same basis for the purpose of the tracing remedy sought.

INTEREST

[33] As to interest, there is no dispute but that interest should be added to the loan at the contractual rate. Likewise, there is no dispute but that interest should be added to the amount to be recovered by the company. Mr Seymour has not suggested that interest should accrue only from the date when the pension fund trustees acquired notice, which might have been the appropriate course if a personal claim had been made against them.

DISPOSITION

[34] Accordingly, in my judgment, the court should allow the appeal and grant a proprietary remedy to the company by making orders in the following terms: (i) a declaration that the company is entitled to a charge over the assets of Mr Cutland's pension fund to secure the sum of £145,000 (being the aggregate of the contributions which Mr Cutland caused to be made to the company in breach of duty) together with interest thereon; (ii) an order that pursuant to such charge the said sum is thereby set against the sum of £100,000 owed by the company to the trustees of Mr Cutland's pension fund, and interest thereon; (iii) an order that the balance of the moneys secured by the charge shall stand charged on the cash reserves of Mr Cutland's pension fund until payment in full; (iv) an order that such balance shall be paid within 28 days of the date of the service of this order on the pension fund trustees with interest calculated down to the date of payment; (v) an order that, forthwith upon such payment being made in full, Mr Cutland is to be given credit in the said sum of £145,000 and interest against the sum of £1,150,753, which by virtue of the judge's order he is liable to pay to the company.

[35] As to costs, in a derivative action it is open to the court to order the company, for whose benefit the action was brought, to indemnify the claimant against the costs reasonably incurred by it (see Buckley para [127.12]). By contrast, in s 459 proceedings, the company is not usually ordered to pay any of the costs (see Buckley para [459.33]). My provisional view in this case (subject to any submissions that Mr Cutland may wish to make) is that, although the relief sought is claimed under s 461 of the 1985 Act, it is sought for the benefit of the company and that it is, therefore, open to Mr Clark to seek an order against the company for payment to him of any costs incurred by him on this appeal (and, possibly, with respect to this issue in the court below). Such costs would then be payable by the company unless Mr Clark obtains an order for them against Mr Cutland and recovers them from him. If the company paid Mr Clark's costs, it would (to that extent) be subrogated to any order for such costs made against Mr Cutland and in favour of Mr Clark.

POTTER LJ.

[36] I agree.

SCHIEMANN LJ.

[37] I agree with the orders proposed by Arden LJ. In particular I agree that: (i) the question of the entitlement of the company to a tracing remedy can properly be raised in this court; (ii) Mr Cutland made the payments of £145,000 a without having any authority from the company to do so; (iii) in making those payments he acted in breach of his fiduciary duty to the company; (iv) the trustees have received notice of the company's claim; (v) in those circumstances the company is entitled to trace the payments; and that (vi) set-off is a convenient and permissible way of doing so.

Appeal allowed.

Celia Fox Barrister.

Trafigura Beheer BV v Golden Stavraetos Maritime Inc

The Sonia

[2003] EWCA Civ 664

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
SIR ANDREW MORRITT V-C, CLARKE AND KAY LJJ
15 MAY 2003

Shipping – Charterparty – Time for bringing claims – Suit barred unless brought within one year after delivery of goods or date on which goods should have been delivered – Consignee alleging goods contaminated and refusing delivery – Charterers ordering vessel to deliver cargo elsewhere – Claim brought within one year of delivery at second port but more than one year from notice of readiness at original discharge port – Whether claim time-barred – Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1971, Schedule, art III, r 6.

The claimant charterers entered into a voyage charterparty with the defendant owners in respect of a shipment of aviation fuel on the owner's vessel. The charterparty incorporated the Hague-Visby Rules (as set out in the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1971) (the rules). Pursuant to the charterparty, the vessel was loaded at a port in Saudi Arabia for delivery at Mombasa. Shortly after sailing, the parties varied the destination to Lagos. The vessel arrived off Lagos on 2 February 2000 and served notice of readiness. Following tests, the intended purchaser of the cargo refused delivery, alleging that the fuel was off-specification. The vessel was thereafter ordered to proceed to Abidjan. In March 2000 the claimant indicated that it wished to sell the cargo, without prejudice to a future claim, in an effort to mitigate damages, and subsequently directed the vessel to a port in Greece, where the cargo was discharged on 1 April 2000. The claimant issued proceedings on 27 March 2001, alleging that the defendant was in breach of contract and claiming the difference between the original contract price to the consignee in Lagos and the price actually received from the sale in Greece. The defendant applied for summary judgment, submitting that the proceedings had been issued out of time because suit had to be brought within the one-year limitation period provided by art III, r 6 of the rules, which provided that the carrier and the ship would in any event be discharged from all liability whatsoever in respect of the goods, 'unless suit is brought within one year of their delivery or of the date when they should have been delivered'.[a] The judge granted the application, holding that the relevant suit was for damage to cargo during the voyage to Lagos, and that nothing which had happened thereafter was relevant to the question he had to decide. The claimant appealed, contending that the judge had misconstrued art III, r 6 of the rules.

Held – Article III, r 6 naturally meant, and could only mean, that the carrier's liability was only to be discharged if suit were not brought either within a year of delivery or within a year of the date when the goods should have been delivered.

a Article III, r 6 is set out, so far as material, at [2], below

Thus, if suit was brought within a year of delivery, the carrier was not discharged of liability even if suit was not brought within a year of the date when the goods should have been delivered. The first question in every case should therefore be whether there was 'delivery' of the goods within the meaning of art III, r 6. If there had been, there remained a second question, namely whether suit had been brought within a year of that delivery. It followed that the essential question in the instant case was whether there had been delivery of the cargo within the meaning of art III, r 6. The relevant question in deciding when delivery had been made was whether the delivery was delivery in performance of the contract. However, an important consideration in deciding that question was whether the delivery was made under an entirely separate and distinct transaction. If, looking at all the circumstances of a case, it could fairly be said that there was delivery under the contract of carriage, even if that contract had been varied in some respects in the light of problems that had arisen during the voyage, it would in general be appropriate to hold that there had been 'delivery' within the meaning of art III, r 6. If, on the other hand, the delivery had been made under an entirely separate and distinct transaction, it would in general be appropriate to hold that there had been no such 'delivery'. Furthermore, there was nothing in art III, r 6 to restrict the meaning of 'delivery' to delivery at the original contractual place of delivery. On the facts of the present case, the delivery in Greece had been made under the contract of carriage, albeit as varied, and not under an entirely separate and distinct transaction. There had therefore been delivery of the goods within the meaning of art III, r 6 and so the proceedings had not been issued out of time. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [31]–[33], [59]–[63], [68]–[70], below).

Decision of Morison J [2002] 2 All ER (Comm) 984 reversed.

Notes

For carrier's liability under the Hague-Visby Rules, see 5(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 418.

For the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1971, Schedule, art III, see 39 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 330.

Cases referred to in judgments

Aries Tanker Corp v Total Transport Ltd [1977] 1 All ER 398, [1977] 1 WLR 185, HL.

Cargill International SA v CPN Tankers (Bermuda) Ltd, The Ot Sonja [1993] 2 Lloyd's Rep 435, CA.

Cerro Sales Corp v Atlantic Marine Enterprises Inc 1976 AMC 376, US DC.

Leo Hess International Corp v Isthmian Steamship Co 1958 AMC 1380, NY SC.

New Hampshire Insurance Co v Saipan Shipping Co Inc 1973 AMC 792.

Universal Ruma Co v Mediterranean Shipping Co 2001 AMC 110, US DC.

Western Gear Corp v States Marine Lines Inc (1966) F 2d 328, US Ct of Apps.

Appeal

The charterers, Trafigura Beheer BV, appealed with permission of Morison J from his order of 12 June 2002 ([2002] 2 All ER (Comm) 984) granting the application under CPR Pt 24 of the owners, Golden Stavraetos Maritime Ltd, for summary judgment against the charterers. The facts are set out in the judgment of Clarke LJ.

Richard Lord QC and Michael Bools (instructed by Clyde & Co) for the charterers.

Stewart Boyd QC and Sara Cockerill (instructed by Watson, Farley & Williams, Piraeus) for the owners.

CLARKE LJ (giving the first judgment at the invitation of Sir Andrew Morritt V-C).

INTRODUCTION

[1] This appeal arises out of a cargo claim brought by the appellant charterers against the respondent owners of the vessel SONIA for damages for breach of a voyage charterparty. The owners issued a Pt 24 application for summary judgment on the basis that the claim had no real prospect of success. The application raised two questions, namely whether the owners had agreed to extend the period of one year in art III, r 6 of the Hague-Visby Rules (as set out in the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1971) and, if not, whether suit was brought within the relevant period of one year. Morison J resolved both questions in favour of the owners and on 12 June 2002 gave judgment for them on the claim ([2002] EWHC 1154 (Comm), [2002] 2 All ER (Comm) 984). He refused permission to appeal on the first point (the 'extension of time point') but granted permission on the second point ('the art III, r 6 point'). The charterers now renew their application for permission to appeal the extension of time point, but it is convenient to consider first the art III, r 6 point, which raises an interesting question of construction of the Hague-Visby Rules.

ARTICLE III, RULE 6

[2] Article III, r 6 of the Hague-Visby Rules provides so far as relevant:

> '... the carrier and the ship shall in any event be discharged from all liability whatsoever in respect of the goods, unless suit is brought within one year of their delivery or of the date when they should have been delivered.'

THE FACTS

[3] The charterers chartered the SONIA from the owners under a voyage charterparty in an amended BEEPEETIME form dated 16 December 1999 for a voyage from 1/2 safe ports in Saudi Arabia to 1/2 safe ports in various places including West Africa at charterers' option at a lump sum freight. The freight for a voyage to and discharge at Lagos was $US470,000 and, by cl 7, was payable immediately after completion of discharge. The charterparty naturally included detailed provisions for laytime and demurrage. It is not necessary to recite those clauses in detail, save perhaps to note that by cl 18 laytime was to be a total of 84 hours (subsequently amended to 96 hours) for loading and discharging and by cl 22 the demurrage rate was to be $US11,000 per running day or pro rata for part of a day. Clause 46 provided that the provisions of arts III, (other than r 8), IV, IV bis and VIII of the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1971 should apply to the charterparty. Those are of course articles of the Hague-Visby Rules and thus include art III, r 6. Clause 52 provided that all bills of lading issued under the charterparty should include a clause paramount making the carriage subject to the Hague-Visby Rules. Finally, cl 55 provided that the charterparty was governed by English law and, subject to an option of London arbitration, conferred exclusive jurisdiction on the High Court in London.

[4] Between 8 and 10 January 2000 the vessel was loaded with a cargo of some 30,596·93 metric tons of Jet A-1 fuel for carriage from Rabigh in Saudi Arabia to Mombasa in Kenya under a bill of lading dated 10 January 2000. It is common ground that the relevant contract of carriage between the owners and the charterers is contained in the charterparty and not in the bill of lading. Shortly after the voyage began the parties varied the port of discharge to Lagos and the charterers provided the owners with a letter of indemnity requesting them to discharge the cargo at Lagos without production of the original bills of lading and agreeing to indemnify them against the consequences of relying upon the request. Given that Mombasa is not (so far as I can see) a port within the range of discharge ports in the charterparty, it is not clear why Mombasa was named as the discharge port in the bill of lading. However, neither party suggested in argument that the agreed change of discharge port from Mombasa to Lagos is relevant to the determination of the issues in this appeal.

[5] The vessel arrived off Lagos at 2142 hrs local time on 2 February 2000 and the master tendered notice of readiness. He tendered it only to the charterers because he had been told that the cargo was on 'financial hold'. The cargo was subsequently sampled by the receivers who rejected it on the ground that it was off-specification.

[6] On 11 February the charterers ordered the vessel to proceed to Abidjan for orders. The master complied and the vessel sailed from Lagos on the same day and arrived at Abidjan at 0400 hrs on 13 February. Further samples of the cargo were thereafter taken and the vessel remained at Abidjan for some considerable time. Nearly a month later, on 7 March, the charterers indicated that they would like to sell the cargo, without prejudice to any future claim, 'at best in an effort to mitigate damages'. Discussions then took place between the parties. They included a consideration of the possibility that the vessel would discharge the cargo in the Mediterranean. The owners quoted a figure of $US 320,000 as a lump sum freight for taking the cargo to the Mediterranean.

[7] On 9 March the charterers asked the owners to confirm the position and on the same day the owners replied that they were 'requesting for west africa/med usd 320,000 lump sum basis 1/1 max d/a 20,000 usd'. On 10 March the owners faxed the charterers saying that they were happy to assist the charterers but that the contractual position needed to be resolved. They observed that the cargo was not discharged at Lagos 'for reasons which still are not known to owners'. They added:

> 'Two issues need to be determined:
>
> a. Compensation in respect of waiting/storage off West Africa.
>
> The basis on which the ship is presently employed by you has yet to be formalised. The ship has left the designated discharge port of Lagos and is now being effectively used as floating storage. Owners are happy to agree compensation for this activity to be at the demurrage rate.
>
> b. Addendum new charter in respect of on-carriage of cargo.
>
> If the cargo has to be on-carried that is outside the scope of the presently agreed charter. Charterers' discharge option has been exercised. For any new voyage an addenda to the present charter or a new agreement need to be made.'

[8] During discussions on 11 March the charterers orally agreed to the owners' quotation for freight for the voyage to the Mediterranean and to the proposal that they should pay storage charges at the demurrage rate plus the costs of the deviation to Abidjan. The vessel accordingly sailed from Abidjan towards Gibraltar for orders at about 2300 hrs on 11 March. As the voyage progressed there were a number of exchanges between the parties. In fact they were I think between the owners' managers and the charterers' brokers but for simplicity I refer to them as being between the owners and charterers.

[9] On 14 March the owners faxed the charterers with an invoice which claimed $US470,000 (less address commission of $US5,875) in respect of the lump sum freight to Lagos under the charterparty, $US21,370 in respect of deviation costs to Abidjan and $US426,257·64 (less $US150,000 paid on account) in respect of 'demurrage/storage'. The total was $US761,752·64.

[10] Although this point was not discussed in argument, the documents appear to me to show that the figure of $US21,370 was calculated as if the order that the vessel proceed to Abidjan was a revised instruction to vary the discharging port from Lagos to Abidjan within the meaning of cl 24 of the charterparty and charging demurrage and other expenses as set out in the clause. The figure of $US426,257·54 was arrived at by reference to a time sheet which in essence showed the following. Laytime began to run at Rabigh in Saudi Arabia. The 96 hours' laytime expired at the load port and the vessel was thus on demurrage while still at Rabigh. She was again on demurrage at Lagos from six hours after notice of readiness was given until she sailed at 1805 hrs on 11 March. As just stated, the period of the voyage to Abidjan was treated as if under cl 24. Finally the vessel was treated as on demurrage at Abidjan from her arrival at 0400 hrs on 13 February to her departure at 2300 hrs on 11 March. The total figure of $US 426,257·54 thus comprised just under two-and-a-half days at Rabigh, just over eight-and-a-half days at Lagos and just over 27¾ days at Abidjan. That invoice, which was sent under cover of a fax headed 'TRAFIGURA CP 16.12.99', was paid on 24 March.

[11] In the meantime it appears that the vessel was proceeding towards Gibraltar, although the documents show that there was a short period in which the vessel drifted waiting for precise orders. In a fax of 18 March, headed 'C/P 16.12.99 TRAFIGURA', the owners told the charterers that the vessel was proceeding towards Gibraltar for orders 'for the final port of discharge' and that any sampling of the cargo done at Gibraltar would be at the charterers' expense. They added that 'as already stated, the cargo remains always Charterers' property and vessel is at their disposal and expenses until the time the cargo is discharged'. On 22 March in a similarly headed telex the charterers asked the owners to instruct the vessel to proceed to Agioi Theodori ready to discharge and deliver to Motor Oil (Hellas) SA, although again subject to specific instructions because of a 'financial hold' on the cargo.

[12] Also on 22 March, the owners faxed the charterers with a further invoice in respect of freight from Abidjan to the new discharge port of Agioi Theodori in Greece in the sum of $US316,000, which was the agreed freight of $US320,000 less address commission. That fax was headed 'TRAFIGURA CP 9.3.00'. The invoice was paid on 3 April.

[13] On 24 March the charterers sent the owners a further telex, again headed 'CP DD 16.12.99', which included the following, having referred to the cargo and the bill of lading:

> 'The above cargo was shipped on the above vessel ... at Rabigh ... for delivery at the port of Mombasa but we, Trafigura Beheer BV, hereby request you to order the vessel to proceed to Agioi Theodori and give delivery of the said cargo at the port of Agioi Theodori and give delivery to Motor Oil (Hellas) SA without production of the original bill(s) of lading.'

The telex continued that in consideration of the owner's complying with that request the charterers would indemnify them against the consequences of delivering the cargo without production of the original bill of lading. The document was in almost identical form to that previously provided when it was proposed to deliver the cargo in Lagos. The owners agreed on the same day in a telex headed 'CP DD 16/12/99', saying

> 'Chrts latest LOI, for the delivery of the goods at Ag Theodori, rcvd and found in order.
>
> The master instructed accordingly.'

[14] Later on 24 March there was an exchange of telexes regarding a possible addendum to the charterparty to reflect the agreement reached. There is in the bundle a document entitled 'Addendum Nr 2' which states that 'it has been mutually agreed and understood between' the owners and the charterers that:

> 'Owners grant the option to charterers to discharge in the Med Area as follows:
>
> Rate: Lumpsum 320,000 USD basis 1/1
>
> Max D/A for owners account USD 30,000
>
> All other terms, conditions, details remain unaltered.'

The document was sent to the owners by the charterers attached to a fax sent on 24 March which simply stated 'kindly find attached herewith charter party + addendum nr 1 – nr 2'.

[15] The judge said in para 4 of his judgment that in formal terms the parties agreed an addendum no 2 to the original charterparty. He must have had the above 'Addendum Nr 2' in mind. However, the owners say in their respondent's notice that the judge was wrong to hold that the parties agreed addendum no 2. They say that they rejected the proposed addendum and that, following that rejection, no further addendum was drawn up. They rely upon the reply which they sent to the charterers' fax, also on 24 March, which includes the following:

> '... many tks indeed for yr addendum no 2 which its content dly ntd and pls note that the same is referred to the new voyage which vsl is performing right now and therefore as per our freight invoice dtd 9.3.00 has to have a complete different cp date ie 9.3.00.
>
> Not only but on top of it you should specify that the l.sum of usd 320,000 has been agreed to perform a voyage ex novo ie from Abidjan to eastmed and all other terms and conditions remain unchanged as per cp dtd 16.12.99 hope above clear enough to enable you to draw the addendum accordingly ...'

It is not, I think, suggested that the charterers replied to that fax.

[16] In compliance with the charterers' requests the vessel in fact proceeded to Agioi Theodori. She tendered notice of readiness at about 0700 on 27 March and made fast at noon. In a document said to have been attached to an invoice dated 31 March it was estimated that discharge would be complete and her hoses disconnected at about 2400 hrs on 31 March. In the event discharge of the cargo at Agioi Theodori by delivery to Motor Oil (Hellas) SA was completed on 1 April.

[17] On 31 March the owners sent the charterers a fax under the heading 'CP 09.03.00' attaching an invoice for $US28,410·30 in respect of drifting expenses off West Africa, sampling at Gibraltar Roads and 12 hours' estimated demurrage at Agioi Theodori. The first two items were presumably simply costs said to have been incurred. The third was calculated on the basis that laytime would began to run at 1200 hrs on 27 March, that the laytime allowed was four days and that it followed that, if the hoses were disconnected at 2400 on 31 March, the owners would be entitled to 12 hours' demurrage at $US11,000 per day or pro rata for part of a day. There is no other evidence of an agreement relating to laytime at the discharge port of Agioi Theodori. The charterers paid the invoice on 3 April.

[18] The contractual position seems to me to have been as follows. I would accept the submission that the owners did not agree addendum no 2 as proposed by the charterers on 24 March. Nor, as I see it, did the charterers accept the proposal in the owners' reply fax. The position is that no further written agreement was drawn up, either by way of fresh charterparty or by way of addendum to the existing charterparty. There is, however, no doubt that the parties reached an agreement with regard to the voyage to and delivery of the cargo at Agioi Theodori. The question is what the agreement was.

[19] As already stated, it was an oral agreement reached on 11 March. The freight was agreed as $US 320,000. It was also agreed that the charterers would pay storage charges at the demurrage rate plus the costs of the deviation to Abidjan. As indicated above, the charterers paid the invoices which the owners sent them. There was thus no issue in respect of the voyage to Abidjan. The owners were paid their expenses together with demurrage at the charterparty rate. Nor was there any issue as to the freight for the voyage to the Eastern Mediterranean or as to the charterers' liability to pay the expenses connected with sampling off Gibraltar.

[20] The exchange of telexes on 24 March suggests that both parties were content that an addendum to the charterparty should be drawn up. It appears that the owners' objection to the proposed addendum no 2 was that it referred to an option being granted by owners, whereas since the vessel was performing a new voyage, the addendum should be given a 'completely different cp date'. For some reason the owners referred to a charterparty of 9 March, although it is correctly accepted by Mr Boyd that no agreement was made on 9 March which was capable of being drawn up either by way of separate charterparty or by way of addendum to the existing charterparty.

[21] Subject to the question whether the agreement made on 11 March should be described as a new charterparty or not, there seems to me to have been little, if anything, between the parties. Indeed, in the exchanges of 24 March both parties expressly contemplated that there should be an addendum to the charterparty. The charterers suggested 'all other terms, conditions, details remain unaltered', whereas the owners suggested 'all other terms and conditions remain unaltered as per cp dtd 16.12.99 hope above clear enough to enable you to draw the addendum accordingly'.

[22] To my mind the difference between the parties is not of any real importance for present purposes. I agree with the judge that whether the new arrangements amounted to a variation of the original charterparty or to a new charterparty is not decisive of the real issue between the parties. If necessary, I would hold that they amounted to a variation of the charterparty, if only because the parties cannot have contemplated that there should be new obligations, for example, of seaworthiness. The purpose of the agreement of 11 March was that the cargo already on board the vessel should be taken to a discharge port and delivered in accordance with the charterers' instructions on terms that the owners would be paid freight for the new voyage, any extra expenses incurred and demurrage at the discharge port. It was also important to the parties, especially the owners, that any possible dispute as to the basis upon which they had carried the cargo to Abidjan and (as it were) stored it off Abidjan should be resolved at the outset. I agree with the judge that the issues should be decided on the basis of the substance of the matter.

[23] As the judge put it, on any view there was an agreement for a new voyage at a new freight rate. I am more doubtful whether it was agreed that there was a new period of laytime. There is no evidence that a new period of laytime was agreed on or before 11 March. Thus it does not appear that the parties applied their minds to that question when the oral agreement was made, although it seems likely that they contemplated that the demurrage rate would be the same as in the charterparty. What seems to have happened with regard to laytime is that for some reason, when the owners sent the invoice of 31 March, they included an estimate for demurrage based on 96 hours' laytime at Agioi Theodori. That compares with the total laytime of 96 hours for both loading and discharging in the charterparty. Why they should have given charterers a further period of laytime at the new discharge port is something of a mystery. One might have thought that they would have asserted either that since the vessel was already on demurrage, it was not appropriate to allow any laytime, or that, since 96 hours was originally allowed for both loading and discharging, the appropriate rate for discharging was, say, no more than 48 hours.

[24] If it were important to ascertain what, if any, agreement was made as to laytime on 11 March, it would in my view be necessary for the evidence to address this point more precisely. However, I do not think that it is. The facts set out above seem to me to be sufficient to resolve the art III, r 6 point.

[25] It is common ground that 'suit was brought' within the meaning of art III, r 6 of the Hague-Visby Rules when the claim form was issued on 27 March 2001. The question is whether the owners had by then been discharged from liability in respect of the goods because suit had not been brought 'within one year of their delivery or of the date when they should have been delivered' within the meaning of art III, r 6 as applied to the facts of this case.

THE CLAIM

[26] The charterers' claim may be summarised shortly as follows. They were the owners of the cargo and the holders of the bill of lading. Clause 2 of the charterparty provided, so far as relevant:

> 'Owners shall before, at the commencement of, and throughout the voyage exercise due diligence to make and maintain the Vessel, her tanks, pumps, valves and pipelines, tight, staunch, strong, in good order and condition, in every way fit for the voyage and fit to carry the cargo provided for in Clause 3, with the Vessel's machinery, boilers and hull in a fully efficient state ...'

The charterers say that the owners were under a duty as carriers and/or bailees for reward to carry the cargo to Lagos and there deliver it in the same good order and condition as when shipped and to take reasonable care not to lose or damage the cargo. The owners also owed similar duties under art III, rr 1 and 2 of the Hague-Visby Rules, which were incorporated into the charterparty by cl 46.

[27] The charterers say that the owners were in breach of each of the above duties in that they tendered delivery of the cargo in a condition in which it was 'severely damaged and/or off specification' due to contamination by residues of soya bean oil. The particulars of claim include an allegation that the owners failed to take reasonable care of the cargo in that they failed to clean the tanks properly before loading. On arrival at Lagos the cargo was rejected by the original receivers because of alleged contamination. In reasonable mitigation of their loss the charterers arranged for the vessel to proceed to Abidjan thence to Gibraltar and Agioi Theodori where the cargo was discharged pursuant to a contract of sale between the charterers and Motor Oil (Hellas) Corinth Refineries SA.

[28] The quantum of the alleged loss is $US2,980,811·92 which is (or is said to be) made up of four items. The first is the difference in the value of the cargo under the original sale to receivers in Lagos and under the sale to Motor Oil. The second is comprised of the additional costs referred to above which were paid to the owners in respect of the deviation from Lagos to Abidjan, the 'demurrage/storage costs Lagos/Abidjan', the freight from Abidjan to Agioi Theodori and the 'demurrage Gibraltar Roads and drifting expenses in West Africa'. The third is the time value of money and the fourth is what is said to be 'cargo hedging and SWAPS loss'. We are not of course concerned with the validity of any of those claims.

[29] There has been some debate between the parties as to how the charterers' claim should properly be described. The charterers say that the owners classified it as a claim for misdelivery, whereas the owners say that they did not. However, whether they did or not, it seems to me that this is a standard cargo claim in which the charterers' principal claim is a claim for damages in respect of damage to cargo which is said to have been caused by contamination which is in turn said to have been caused by the owners' failure properly to prepare the tanks and to look after the cargo. The principal head of claim is loss of value of the cargo which is said to have been so caused, namely the difference between the value of uncontaminated cargo in Lagos and its value where they could reasonably realise it, namely in Greece. In addition they claim what they say are the reasonable costs of mitigating their loss.

[30] In short, this is a standard cargo claim. It is important to note that it is not a claim in respect of misdelivery of the cargo in the sense of delivery to the wrong receiver. It was delivered to the charterers by being delivered to Motor Oil (Hellas) SA in accordance with the charterers' request.

DISCUSSION

[31] The judge held that the court must adopt a process of construction of art III, r 6 which is appropriate to the interpretation of a set of rules agreed internationally and enacted into United Kingdom law. He added that such a process is both purposive and practical. I entirely agree. It seems to me to be appropriate, however, to consider first the wording of the rule. By art III, r 6 a carrier is discharged from liability in respect of the goods 'unless suit is brought within one year of their delivery or of the date when they should have been delivered'. It is to my mind important to note that the rule does not expressly provide 'unless suit is brought within one year of delivery or of the date when the goods should have been delivered, whichever is the earlier' or indeed 'whichever is the later' (my emphasis). The rule naturally means, and I think can only mean, that the carrier's liability is only to be discharged if suit is not brought either within a year of delivery or within a year of the date when the goods should have been delivered. Thus, if suit is brought within a year of delivery, the carrier is not discharged from liability even if suit is not brought within a year of the date when the goods should have been delivered.

[32] It seems to me that in every case the first question is whether there was 'delivery' of the goods within the meaning of art III, r 6. If there was, there remains a second question, namely whether suit was brought within a year of that delivery. If there was not, two further questions arise. The first is on what date the goods 'should have been delivered' and the second is whether suit was brought within a year of that date. I do not understand Mr Boyd to submit the contrary.

[33] It follows that, in my opinion, the essential question here is whether there was delivery of the cargo within the meaning of art III, r 6. Mr Lord submits that there was. He submits that there was delivery to the charterers at Agioi Theodori, delivery being of the same cargo on board the same vessel under the same bill of lading and being completed on 1 April 2000. Mr Boyd submits, on the other hand, that there was no delivery of the cargo within art III, r 6 at all. The judge preferred the submissions of Mr Boyd. The issue in this appeal is whether he was right to do so.

[34] There is no doubt that the cargo was in fact delivered by the owners to the charterers (by delivery to Motor Oil) in Greece. Indeed in para 12 of his judgment the judge posed the question as being whether time runs from the date when the goods should have been delivered in Lagos or when they were delivered in Greece. It is to my mind natural to describe the cargo as being delivered to the charterers in Greece. Mr Lord submits that in those circumstances it is also natural to hold there was 'delivery' of the cargo within art III, r 6.

[35] What then led the judge to reach a different conclusion? As I read his judgment, his conclusion depends upon an analysis of the nature of the charterers' claim. In para 12 he identified the complaint which led to the 'suit' as the non-delivery of the cargo at Lagos, due allegedly to its condition. He said that that was the substance of the claim and observed that no complaint was made about the voyage from Abidjan to Greece or delivery there. The voyage was an attempt by the charterers to mitigate their loss arising from 'the non-delivery of the cargo in Lagos'. He added ([2002] 2 All ER (Comm) 984 at [12]):

> 'Whether the voyage to Greece was a new venture or an amendment to the old one, the fact is that it did not impinge on the previous contractual obligations, otherwise there could have been no claim in relation to the events at Lagos and no claim for damages following on from the voyage to Abidjan and thence to Greece.'

[36] The considerations which persuaded the judge to hold that the relevant period of one year had expired are essentially contained at [13] and [14], which are in these terms:

> '[13] It seems to me, on the facts of this case, that the relevant suit (referred to in the rule) is a claim which is essentially for damaging the cargo during the contractual voyage from the load port to Lagos. The commercial purpose and effect of the rule would be distorted if, as Mr Lord suggests, the second limb does not apply because the goods were eventually delivered in Greece. The delivery in Greece is not the subject of the suit and it would be contrary to the underlying need for certainty and clarity to suggest that time started on delivery in Greece. The cargo might never have been delivered or the vessel lost. In either event, there was a completed cause of action when the vessel was in Lagos and no good reason could be advanced for suggesting that time did not run from that moment; the fact that the cargo was either lost or subsequently delivered does not, I think, alter the position. Lagos was the only legitimate place of delivery in relation to the voyage about which complaint is made; and there was a wrongful refusal by the claimant at Lagos to take delivery there; the defendant had fulfilled the owners' obligations under the voyage charter, subject to any claims that might have been made in relation to the state of the cargo. It would be entirely artificial to extend the contractual time limit period as a result of the new arrangement for the voyage to Greece. Had there been a further problem during the second voyage then art III, r 6 would operate and time would start running from the date of delivery in Greece.

[14] In short, I reject Mr Lord's submission that "[t]here is no basis for saying that 'delivery' during the currency of the contract of carriage pursuant to which the cargo was loaded". What must be identified is the relevant suit; that is, what the claimant is alleging. If the cause of action was complete then it makes good commercial sense in a case such as the present to hold that time starts to run from that date. The owners say that the cargo should have been delivered at Lagos; the claimant complains that it was not. At that time the parties were aware of their rights and an action could have been started there and then. If the cargo was destroyed, stolen or sold on and subsequently delivered to a third party [as here] that would affect the amount of any recovery but not delay the running of time. Had the vessel sunk en route to Greece time would not start running from that time, but rather from the time when delivery should have occurred in Greece, assuming the fulfilment of all contractual obligations; but it could not cause time to start running from the events in Lagos. The delivery in Greece and the non-delivery in Lagos are two separate and distinct events.'

[37] In reaching those conclusions the judge essentially accepted the submissions which had been made to him by Mr Boyd, who submits that the judge was right for the reasons he gave. As I read those paragraphs of the judgment, the key reasons for the judge's conclusions were that the relevant suit was for damage to cargo during the voyage to Lagos and nothing that happened thereafter was relevant to the question he had to decide. In particular the delivery in Greece was not the subject of the suit and was not the relevant delivery because Lagos was the only legitimate place of delivery in relation to the voyage about which complaint is made. The judge also stressed that the charterers' cause of action was complete in Lagos and that it made good sense to hold that time starts to run 'from that date' although I am not quite sure what specific date the judge had in mind.

[38] I am not sure that the judge was asking himself the correct question, which to my mind is whether the delivery which undoubtedly took place in Greece was 'delivery' within art III, r 6 on the facts here. However, if he was asking himself that question he answered it in the negative and, if he was not, it seems clear that he would have answered it in the negative. For my part, I have reached a different conclusion from the judge.

[39] The judge was of course right to say that the charterers' claim did not arise out of the voyage from Abidjan to Greece and that their cause of action had accrued before the vessel left Lagos. In fact, since the charterers assert a number of breaches of contract, they no doubt have a number of causes of action accruing on different dates. For my part, I do not think that those facts, while perhaps relevant, are of any real assistance in deciding whether the cargo was 'delivered' within the meaning of art III, r 6.

[40] The judge also said (at [13]) that the cargo might never have been delivered or the vessel lost, which is of course true. In that event there could have been no delivery and the relevant period of one year would expire one year after the date when the cargo should have been delivered. That consideration does not, however, seem to me to help to answer the question whether the goods were delivered. Nor, to my mind, does an analysis of the nature of the suit. The judge was correct to hold (as in my opinion he did) that the nature of the suit was a claim for damages in respect of cargo damage which had occurred before arrival in Lagos. However, for my part, I do not see that either the nature of the suit or the accrual of the cause of action is central to the question for decision, which is whether there was delivery of the goods. Thus I do not see that the conclusion that delivery in Greece and the non-delivery in Lagos were, as the judge put it, two separate and distinct events helps to determine whether delivery in Greece was relevant 'delivery' within art III, r 6.

[41] Was there delivery of the goods within the meaning of art III, r 6? It is common ground that there is no English authority which assists in identifying the correct approach to this question. We have, however, been referred to a number of American cases which were unfortunately not cited to the judge but which seem to me to be of some assistance. It is perhaps appropriate to refer briefly first to such English materials as are available, which were referred to by the judge.

[42] In Aries Tanker Corp v Total Transport Ltd [1977] 1 All ER 398 at 402, [1977] 1 WLR 185 at 188 Lord Wilberforce said, obiter, that the purpose of providing for discharge of claims of this kind after 12 months meets an obvious commercial need, namely to allow shipowners after that period to clear their books. In Cargill International SA v CPN Tankers (Bermuda) Ltd, The Ot Sonja [1993] 2 Lloyd's Rep 435 this court held that the limit applied where goods had not been loaded and that time would start to run from the date when the goods ought to have been delivered. Unfortunately neither of those cases helps to identify what is meant by 'delivery'.

[43] In Carver on Bills of Lading (1st edn, 2001), edited by two distinguished former professors, namely Sir Guenter Treitel QC and Francis Reynolds QC, para 9-165 is in these terms:

> '"The term 'delivery' in a bill of lading is ordinarily taken to refer to transfer of possession to a consignee ... or to the consignee's agent ... It certainly does not mean the same thing as 'discharge'". [See Cooke on Voyage Charters (1993) p 738.] It seems that the first date provides the rule, with the second providing a variant, principally for the case where the goods are lost or in some other way not delivered (eg because they are so damaged as to have lost their commercial character as goods of the type shipped) or because they are delivered wrongfully, for example not against a bill of lading. The choice, where there is one, must however be that of the claimant. Thus if the goods are delivered late, even though there may be a date at which they should have been delivered, it will be to the claimant's advantage to take the date of actual delivery for the purposes of the time bar.'

[44] For my part, subject to one point of difference between those views and the views of the editors of Cooke on Voyage Charters and subject to one small point, I respectfully agree with that passage, although unfortunately it does not help on what amounts to delivery. The small point is that I am not sure that it is entirely apt to describe the claimant as having a choice. It is simply that if suit is brought within a year of their delivery, the effect of art III, r 6 is that the shipowner is not discharged from liability even though suit was not brought within a year of the date when they should have been delivered.

[45] In Cooke on Voyage Charters (2nd edn, 2001) paras 85.189 and 85.190 include the following:

'85.189 The Hague Rules distinguish discharge (eg Article I(e)) and delivery (Article III, rule 6). Discharge is a purely physical act, whether performed by carrier, charterer or receiver, whereas delivery is a legal concept concerned with the passing of actual or constructive possession. The two are not coextensive. The latter is the concept by reference to which time starts to run under the Hague Rules. However the Rules offer no definition of "delivery" and various different situations may arise.

(i) Delivery of the proper quantity of goods, even in a damaged condition, is clearly delivery for this purpose. There is no reason to produce a different result when the damage is such that the goods are no longer in specie and no longer "the goods" as shipped.

(ii) Where there is no delivery of any goods at all, the rule adopts the starting point "or of the date when they should have been delivered" and for those purposes one must assume that all parties had performed their obligations and then find when the goods ought to have been delivered.

(iii) There are hybrid situations where, by an over-carriage, goods are not delivered when they ought to be but are delivered subsequently or where part of the shipped goods are actually delivered (albeit late) but the rest have been lost, but ought to have been delivered earlier or where the vessel lawfully discharges at a place short of the intended one, or where delivery is tendered but not taken.

(iv) Delivery of goods may be spread over a period of time and receivers can take the different deliveries from the same consignment separately. Does one start time counting from the moment of the first such delivery, on the basis that that is when the undelivered balance "should have been delivered", or is constructively delivered? or does one treat the last such delivery as starting time running, on the basis that it is only then that delivery is complete? or does one count a time period in respect of each instalment of delivery?

85.190 It is thus necessary to impose a gloss as a matter of construction of the rule to give effect to its business purpose and it is important that there should be a practical and easily identifiable starting time. It is therefore submitted that the purposive or pragmatic construction of the Rules, consistent with the reasoning of the Court of Appeal in The Ot Sonja, should be that, where the goods in respect of which the claim is made (or what is left of the goods shipped) actually arrive at a legitimate place of delivery and absent any wrongful refusal by the receiver, time starts when that delivery (or the material part) is completed, and, in all other cases, time starts from the time when delivery of the relevant goods ought to have been completed assuming due performance of all contractual obligations.'

[46] It can be seen that there is a difference between the views expressed in that passage and the views expressed in Carver so far as goods no longer in specie are concerned. However, it is not necessary to express a view on that question here and I do not do so. Indeed, the passage raises a number of questions which might arise in future cases. The editors do not address the precise question which arises here. Nevertheless the passage, in my opinion correctly, stresses the importance of there being a practicable and easily identifiable starting time.

[47] Thus the editors, again in my view correctly, say that where the goods in respect of which the claim is made actually arrive at a legitimate place of delivery time starts when delivery is completed and, in all other cases, time starts when delivery of the relevant goods ought to have been delivered assuming the due performance of all contractual obligations. For my part I agree with that approach, subject to what is meant by a legitimate place of delivery. Was Agioi Theodori a legitimate place of delivery in the sense in which the phrase is used in Cooke? In my view it was. It is I think in connection with questions of this kind that the American cases are of some assistance.

[48] Before turning to the American cases, I should note a reservation which I have as to the qualification in para 85.190 'absent any wrongful refusal by the receiver'. If the goods are delivered to the charterer or contractual receiver I do not think that the qualification can have any effect. It seems to me that there is no reason why there should not be 'delivery' of the goods even if, for example, the charterer or receiver initially wrongfully refuses to accept delivery. It may be that the qualification is simply included to make the point that there will be no 'delivery' if there is misdelivery in the sense that the goods are misdelivered to the wrong receiver.

[49] In my opinion it is a question of fact to be determined in all the circumstances of the case whether there has been 'delivery' of the goods or not. The American cases have considered the problems which can arise where goods have been delivered under what some of them have called an entirely separate and distinct transaction. We were referred to five cases. In all of them the contract of carriage was subject to the Hague or the Hague-Visby Rules so that art III, r 6 (or its equivalent) fell to be considered.

[50] The first in time was Leo Hess International Corp v Isthmian Steamship Co 1958 AMC 1380, which was a decision of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of the State of New York. The facts were very unusual and I do not think that it is necessary to set them out. The court observed that art III, r 6 is a disjunctive limitation provision and held (consistently with the view I expressed earlier) that, where delivery occurs after the goods should have been delivered, time runs from the date of delivery. It then considered whether 'delivery really was made in discharge of the bill of lading' on the facts and held that that question could not be decided on an application for summary judgment.

[51] The second case was Western Gear Corp v States Marine Lines Inc (1966) F 2d 328, a decision of the Ninth Circuit of the United States Court of Appeals. The facts were these. A Barc (a Barge, Amphibious Re-Supply Craft) was shipped on a ship called P&T NAVIGATOR for carriage from Seattle to New Orleans. On 11 March 1963 it was swept overboard. It was recovered by the US Coast Guard and returned to the shipper. The extensive damage to it was repaired and it was shipped on another of the original carrier's ships under a new bill of lading, again for carriage from Seattle to New Orleans. This time it arrived safely and was delivered on 23 August 1963. Suit was brought on 13 August 1964, which was less than a year after delivery on 23 August 1963 but more than a year after it would and should have been delivered from the P&T NAVIGATOR.

[52] The court held that there had not been 'delivery' within art III, r 6. Its reasoning can be seen from the following passage (at 331):

> 'The Court [ie in Leo Hess] concluded that the issue of fact which precluded summary judgment was whether or not the June 1952 delivery and acceptance of the goods was made in discharge of the bill of lading.
>
> This rationale seems to us to be entirely correct. Whenever there is an actual delivery of the goods in performance by the carrier of its obligations under the contract of carriage, the time to sue runs from the date of delivery rather than from the date when the goods should have been delivered. The difficulty with the instant case is that the undisputed evidence shows that the delivery of Barc No 26 on August 23 1963 was not in the performance of the obligations of the contract of carriage (Bill of Lading 106-1395) upon which suit was brought. On the contrary, it was finally delivered under an entirely separate contract of carriage, to wit, Bill of Lading 206-2943. This is not to imply that the presence of two bills of lading would necessarily be conclusive in every case, but here Marine Lines [the carrier] has confirmed, without dispute, that the two shipments, first on the SS P&T Navigator and next on the SS Copper State, were entirely separate and distinct transactions.'

[53] That case seems to me to be of considerable assistance because it stresses that delivery under an entirely separate and distinct transaction will not be 'delivery' of the goods for the purposes of art III, r 6. On the other hand the court made it clear that the fact that there were two bills of lading would not necessarily be decisive. I respectfully agree. All will depend upon the circumstances of the particular case. However, it does seem to me that it is helpful to ask whether the delivery can properly be regarded as delivery under the relevant contract of carriage or under an entirely separate and distinct transaction.

[54] The third case was New Hampshire Insurance Co v Saipan Shipping Co Inc 1973 AMC 792 but it does not seem to me to be of any real assistance here; so I say no more about it.

[55] The fourth case was Cerro Sales Corp v Atlantic Marine Enterprises Inc 1976 AMC 376, which was a decision of the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. The relevant voyage was from San Fernando to Callao, Peru. During the voyage a fire broke out on board and the vessel was abandoned. The vessel was subsequently salved and taken to Honolulu under tow. At Honolulu the cargo was transhipped into another vessel, largely at the plaintiffs' expense and carried to Callao. It was delivered on 31 October 1968. Suit was brought on 23 July 1969, which was less than a year after that delivery but more than a year after the goods should have been delivered.

[56] The plaintiffs said that delivery took place in Callao. The court rejected that argument in this way (at 377–378):

> 'The delivery eventually made at Callao was made under a separate and distinct bill of lading separate and distinct from the contract of carriage sued upon here. In such cases the delivery date is of no importance and the limitations period runs from the date the goods should have been delivered. Western Gear Corporation v States Marine Lines Inc ...'

There was a second point which does not seem to me to be directly relevant. However, as can be seen, the court followed the approach in the Western Gear case.

[57] The fifth and most recent case was the decision of the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York in Universal Ruma Co v Mediterranean Shipping Co 2001 AMC 110. The facts were that palm oil was shipped in a single container for carriage from Dar es Salaam to Baltimore under a single bill of lading which was subject to the Hague or the Hague-Visby Rules, including art III, r 6. During the voyage, which was initially on a ship called the MSC FLORIANO, the palm oil was found to be leaking and about half of it was transferred to another container so that the consignment was now in two containers. Both containers seem to have been transhipped in Felixstowe. The original container was shipped to Baltimore on board the MSC LEVINA and arrived on 8 June 1988, whereas the second container, which (as the report puts it) was misplaced, was shipped to Baltimore on board the MSC BOSTON and arrived on 3 October 1998. The claimant said that it was not aware of the arrival of the second container until 5 November 1998. Suit was brought on 28 October 1999.

[58] The claimant said that the relevant 'delivery' was delivery of the second container and that delivery was not complete until it was aware of the arrival of the container. On the first question the court held that the relevant 'delivery' was indeed delivery of the second container. In doing so it applied the principles in the Western Gear case. Its approach can be seen from the following extracts from the judgment of District Judge Denise Cote:

> 'In Western Gear Corporation v States Marine Lines Inc ... [t]he Ninth Circuit reasoned that a COGSA claim is in essence a breach of contract claim arising from the contract of carriage or bill of lading. Consequently, "only a delivery in performance of that contract ... fixes the date from which time runs" ... Because the delivery in Western Gear was made under a second bill of lading the court concluded that there were "two entirely separate and distinct transactions", the first of which gave rise to the cause of action and therefore provided the date of reference for the statute of limitations, that is the date delivery should have been made under the original bill of lading ... where a delayed shipment is made pursuant to the original bill of lading. In that situation [art III, r 6] is best understood to mean that the statute runs from actual delivery; the statute runs from the time delivery should have been made only where there is no delivery at all

> ... Here, where there was a single bill of lading I hold that the statute ran against Universal Ruma from the date of the delivery of the second bill of lading.'

There was again a second point which is not relevant for present purposes.

[59] As already indicated, those cases do seem to me to be of some assistance. They say that the question is whether the delivery is delivery in performance of the contract but they also seem to me to make it clear an important question in deciding that question is whether the delivery was made under an entirely separate and distinct transaction. In my opinion if, looking at all the circumstances of the case, it can fairly be said that there was delivery under the contract of carriage, even if that contract has been varied in some respects in the light of problems that have arisen during the voyage, it will in general be appropriate to hold (subject perhaps to the circumstances of a particular case) that there has been 'delivery' within the meaning of art III, r 6. If, on the other hand, the delivery is under an entirely separate and distinct transaction it will in general be appropriate to hold that there has been no such 'delivery.'

[60] It might be said that there cannot be delivery under the contract of carriage unless delivery takes place at the original contractual place of delivery or at a place of delivery in accordance with an amended contract of carriage where the amendment is made without reference to the breach of contract of either party. However, for my part, I would not so hold. There is nothing in art III, r 6 to restrict the meaning of 'delivery' in that way. In my opinion, so to restrict it would be to give art III, r 6 too narrow a meaning. The question should be the broad one, whether in all the circumstances of the case the delivery was 'delivery' within the rule.

[61] As appears from the extracts from his judgment set out above, the judge did not approach the problem in quite the way suggested above. He would I think have been more likely to do so if he had had the assistance of the American cases. Mr Lord submits that there was here delivery under the contract of carriage, albeit as varied, and that the delivery was not made under an entirely separate and distinct transaction, whereas Mr Boyd submits, on the other hand, that the voyage from Abidjan in West Africa to Agioi Theodori in the Eastern Mediterranean was an entirely new voyage to a different discharge port and that delivery cannot fairly be held to have been under the contract of carriage.

[62] I prefer the submissions of Mr Lord. For my part, I would hold that there was delivery of the goods within the meaning of art III, r 6. The principal considerations which have led me to that conclusion are the following. (i) The cargo delivered was the same jetoil as was shipped in Rabigh. It remained on the same ship and was delivered by the same shipowners at the same charterers' request to receivers nominated by the charterers, albeit at a different destination. (ii) Although the voyage to Agioi Theodori was a new voyage it was made necessary because of problems at Lagos, whatever the causes of those problems were. Both parties were faced with the problem of what should be done with the cargo on board after it had been rejected by the proposed receivers in Lagos. (iii) In these circumstances both the voyage to Abidjan and the subsequent voyage to the Eastern Mediterranean arose out of the original charterparty and the fact that the cargo remained on board the vessel. Whether the oral agreement was a variation of the charterparty or a new charterparty, it was not to my mind an entirely separate and distinct transaction. Both parties contemplated that an addendum to the charterparty would be drawn up and that many of the terms of the charterparty would continue to apply. (iv) There was no transhipment of the cargo and no new bill of lading was issued in respect of it. The exchange of telexes on 24 March in which the charterers requested the owners to deliver the cargo at Agioi Theodori was a request that delivery be made without production of the original bill of lading, it no doubt being appreciated on both sides that there were potential problems for the owners if they delivered the cargo without either production of the original bill of lading or an indemnity. The owners reply was that the 'latest LOI, for the delivery of the goods at Ag Theodori, recd and found in order'. That exchange suggests to me that both parties regarded the delivery at Agioi Theodori, in one sense at least, as delivery under the bill of lading, even though the bill of lading was not of course the contract of carriage as between the owners and the charterers. (v) The contractual bailment, which began at Rabigh, only came to end when the cargo was delivered to Motor Oil (Hellas) SA at Agioi Theodori.

[63] In short, I have reached the clear conclusion that if all the circumstances of the case are taken into account, there was here 'delivery' of the goods within the meaning of art III, r 6 at Agioi Theodori and that suit was therefore brought within a year of the delivery. In these circumstances I would allow the appeal.

[64] Although the judge was considering the question of delivery in the context of the owners' application for summary judgment and not at a trial, I did not understand Mr Boyd to be saying that if we allowed the appeal on this basis, there would be any purpose in a trial of the question whether there was relevant delivery. Subject to hearing submissions on the question of appropriate relief, I would allow the appeal and make a declaration that the suit was brought within a year of delivery of the goods and that the owners are not discharged from liability by reason of art III, r 6 of the Hague-Visby Rules.

[65] I note by way of postscript that the conclusion which I have reached seems to be consistent with the views at first formed by those advising the parties. For example, the extension of time point arises out of correspondence between the parties in March 2001 because, as Clyde & Co put it in a fax to the owners' club dated 22 March 2001 'it appears that the anniversary of the discharge of the cargo will shortly be upon us' and asked for an extension of time. There followed exchanges between the parties in which the owners' club indicated that it had been verbally advised that owners would give a extension. Clyde & Co issued proceedings because they were not quite sure whether an extension had in fact been granted and the club subsequently expressed disappointment on the basis of the indication that an extension would be granted. No one seems to have contemplated the possibility that time had already expired. Also, in a skeleton argument drafted by leading counsel then representing the owners (not Mr Boyd), it was stated that the charterers issued proceedings on 27 March 2001 'just 3–4 days before the expiry of the contractual time limitation for such a claim'. The point now taken was not taken until the defence served on 2 November 2001.

[66] Finally, difficult questions can sometimes arise as to when cargo should have been delivered for the purposes of art III, r 6 but, at any rate in the light of the conclusion reached above, they do not arise here.

EXTENSION OF TIME

[67] The conclusion on the art III, r 6 point makes it unnecessary to consider the charterers' application for permission to appeal on the extension of time point. I will not therefore further lengthen this judgment by doing so.

CONCLUSION

[68] For the reasons I have given, I would allow the appeal on the ground that the cargo was delivered at Agioi Theodori and that suit was brought within a year of that delivery.

KAY LJ.

[69] I agree.

SIR ANDREW MORRITT V-C.

[70] I also agree.

Appeal allowed.

James Brooks Barrister.

R v G and another

[2003] UKHL 50

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL, LORD BROWNE-WILKINSON, LORD STEYN, LORD HUTTON AND LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY

21, 22 JULY, 16 OCTOBER 2003

Criminal law – Damage to property – Arson – Recklessness whether property would be destroyed or damaged – Test for determining recklessness – Criminal Damage Act 1971, s 1.

The defendants, two boys aged 11 and 12, went camping without their parents' permission. They entered the back yard of a shop in the early hours of the morning, lit some newspapers which they had found in the yard and threw some lit newspaper under a large plastic wheelie-bin. They left the yard without putting out the fire. The newspapers set fire to the wheelie-bin, and the fire spread to a second wheelie-bin next to the shop wall. From the second wheelie-bin, the fire spread up under the overhanging eave, to the guttering and the fascia and then up into the roof space of the shop. Eventually the roof of the shop and the adjoining buildings caught fire. The roof collapsed. Approximately £1m worth of damage was caused. The defendants were charged with 'reckless' arson contrary to s 1[a] of the Criminal Damage Act 1971. Their case at trial was that they had expected the newspapers to extinguish themselves on the concrete floor of the yard. It was accepted that neither of them had appreciated that there was any risk whatsoever of the fire spreading in the way that it eventually did. The judge, holding himself to be bound so to do by binding authority, directed the jury that the prosecution had to prove, inter alia, that the defendants had created a risk which would have been obvious to an ordinary, reasonable bystander that the building would be damaged by fire, either without giving any thought to the possibility of there being such a risk, or, having recognised that there was some risk involved, had none the less gone on and done the act. The defendants were convicted, and their convictions were upheld by the Court of Appeal. On the defendants' appeal to the House of Lords, their Lordships considered the correct test to be applied in determining whether a defendant had acted recklessly within the meaning of s 1 of the 1971 Act, both in respect of a circumstance and a result. In particular, they considered whether a defendant had to be aware of the risk in question.

Held – A person acted recklessly within the meaning of s 1 of the 1971 Act with respect to (i) a circumstance when he was aware of a risk that it existed or would exist; (ii) a result when he was aware of a risk that it would occur; and it was, in the circumstances known to him, unreasonable to take the risk. It was a salutary principle that conviction of serious crime should depend upon proof not simply that the defendant had caused (by act or omission) an injurious result to another, but that his state of mind when so acting was culpable. Although the most obviously culpable state of mind was an intention to cause the injurious result, knowing disregard of an appreciated and unacceptable risk of causing an injurious result or a deliberate closing of the mind to such risk would be readily acceptable as culpable also. It was clearly blameworthy to take an obvious and significant risk of causing injury to another. It was not, however, clearly blameworthy to do something involving a risk of injury to another if (for reasons other than self-induced intoxication) one genuinely did not perceive the risk. Such a person might fairly be accused of stupidity or lack of imagination, but neither of those failings should expose him to conviction of serious crime or the risk of punishment. Moreover, it was neither moral nor just to convict a defendant (least of all a child) on the strength of what someone else would have apprehended if the defendant himself had had no such apprehension. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [32], [33], [41], [42], [60]–[62], [71], below).

a Section 1, so far as material, is set out at [4], below

R v Caldwell [1981] 1 All ER 961 disapproved.

Decision of the Court of Appeal [2003] 3 All ER 206 reversed.

Notes

For recklessness and foresight generally and for the offence of destroying or damaging property, see 11(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 14, 594.

For the Criminal Damage Act 1971, s 1, see 12 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 522.

Cases referred to in opinions

B (a minor) v DPP [2000] 1 All ER 833, [2000] 2 AC 428, [2000] 2 WLR 452, HL.
Beckford v R [1987] 3 All ER 425, [1988] AC 130, [1987] 3 WLR 611, PC.
Black-Clawson International Ltd v Papierwerke Waldhof-Aschaffenburg AG [1975] 1 All ER 810, [1975] AC 591, [1975] 2 WLR 513, HL.
British Railways Board v Herrington [1972] 1 All ER 749, [1972] AC 877, [1972] 2 WLR 537, HL.
DPP v Majewski [1976] 2 All ER 142, [1977] AC 443, [1976] 2 WLR 623, HL.
DPP v Morgan [1975] 2 All ER 347, [1976] AC 182, [1975] 2 WLR 913, HL.
Elliott v C (a minor) [1983] 2 All ER 1005, [1983] 1 WLR 939, DC.
Lawrence v Texas 123 S Ct 2472 (2003), US SC.
R v Bowen [1996] 4 All ER 837, [1997] 1 WLR 372, CA.
R v Briggs [1977] 1 All ER 475, [1977] 1 WLR 605, CA.
R v Caldwell [1981] 1 All ER 961, [1982] AC 341, [1981] 2 WLR 509, HL.
R v Child (1871) LR 1 CCR 307, CCR.
R v Coles [1995] 1 Cr App R 157, CA.
R v Cunningham [1957] 2 All ER 412, [1957] 2 QB 396, [1957] 3 WLR 76, CCA.
R v Faulkner (1877) 13 Cox CC 550, CCR.
R v Graham [1982] 1 All ER 801, [1982] 1 WLR 294, CA.
R v Harris (1882) 15 Cox CC 75.
R v Howe [1987] 1 All ER 771, [1987] AC 417, [1987] 2 WLR 568, HL.
R v K [2001] UKHL 41, [2001] 3 All ER 897, [2002] 1 AC 462, [2001] 3 WLR 471.
R v Lawrence [1981] 1 All ER 974, [1982] AC 510, [1981] 2 WLR 524, HL.
R v Martin [1989] 1 All ER 652, CA.
R v Miller [1983] 1 All ER 978, [1983] 2 AC 161, [1983] 2 WLR 539, HL.
R v Mowatt [1967] 3 All ER 47, [1968] 1 QB 421, [1967] 3 WLR 1192, CA.
R v Parker [1977] 2 All ER 37, [1977] 1 WLR 600, CA.
R v Pembliton (1874) LR 2 CCR 119, [1874–80] All ER Rep 1163, CCR.
R v Reid [1992] 3 All ER 673, [1992] 1 WLR 793, HL.

R v Smith [2000] 4 All ER 289, [2001] 1 AC 146, [2000] 3 WLR 654, HL.
R v Stephen Malcolm R (1984) 79 Cr App R 334, CA.
R v Stephenson [1979] 2 All ER 1198, [1979] QB 695, [1979] 3 WLR 193, CA.
R v Welch (1875) 1 QBD 23, CCR.

Cases referred to in list of authorities

Andrews v DPP [1937] 2 All ER 552, [1937] AC 576, HL.
Barbera v Spain (1989) 11 EHRR 360, [1988] ECHR 10588/83, ECt HR.
Fayed v UK (1994) 18 EHRR 393, [1994] ECHR 17101/90, ECt HR.
Kerry v Carter [1969] 3 All ER 723, [1969] 1 WLR 1372, CA.
Lederer v Hitchins [1961] WAR 99, W Aust SC.
Matthews v Ministry of Defence [2003] UKHL 4, [2003] 1 All ER 689, [2003] 1 AC 1163, [2003] 2 WLR 435.
McHale v Watson (1966) 115 CLR 199, Aust HC.
Mullin v Richards [1998] 1 All ER 920, [1998] 1 WLR 1304, CA.
Nortier v Netherlands (1994) 17 EHRR 273, [1993] ECHR 13924/88, ECt HR.
R (on the application of Anderson) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] UKHL 46, [2002] 4 All ER 1089, [2002] 3 WLR 1800.
R v Adomako [1994] 3 All ER 79, [1995] 1 AC 171, [1994] 3 WLR 288, HL.
R v Bateman (1925) 19 Cr App R 8, CCA.
R v Egan (1985) 15 A Crim R 20.
R v Latimer (1886) 17 QBD 359, [1886–90] All ER Rep 386, CCR.
R v Martin (1881) 8 QBD 54, [1881–5] All ER Rep 699, CCR.
R v Satnam, R v Kewal (1983) 78 Cr App R 149, CA.
R v Seymour [1983] 2 All ER 1058, [1983] 2 AC 493, [1983] 3 WLR 349, HL.
R v Sheppard [1980] 3 All ER 899, [1981] AC 394, [1980] 3 WLR 960, HL.
R v Stone, R v Dobinson [1977] 2 All ER 341, [1977] QB 354, [1977] 2 WLR 169, CA.
R v Tutton (1989) 48 CCC (3d) 129, Can SC.
R v Waite (1986) 28 CCC (3d) 326, Ont CA.
R v Wozniak (1977) 16 SASR 67, Aust SC.
Tziavrangos v Hayes (1991) 55 SASR 416, Aust SC.
V v UK (2000) 30 EHRR 121, [1999] ECHR 24888/94, ECt HR.
Van Droogenbroeck v Belgium (1982) 4 EHRR 443, [1982] ECHR 7906/77, ECt HR.

Appeal

The appellants, two boys known as G and R, appealed with leave of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords given on 9 December 2002 from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Dyson LJ, Silber J and Judge Beaumont QC) on 17 July 2002 ([2002] EWCA Crim 1992, [2003] 3 All ER 206) dismissing their appeal against their convictions on 23 March 2001, following a trial before Judge Maher and a jury in the Crown Court at Aylesbury, of an offence of arson contrary to s 1(1) and (3) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971. The Court of Appeal certified that a point of law of general public importance, set out at [1], below, was involved in its decision. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Bingham of Cornhill.

Alan Newman QC and Andrew Jefferies (instructed by Pictons, Milton Keynes) for G.
Alan Newman QC and Isobel Ascherson (instructed by Borneo Linnells, Milton Keynes) for R.
David Perry and Richard Whittam (instructed by the Crown Prosecution Service) for the Crown.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

16 October 2003. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL.

[1] My Lords, the point of law of general public importance certified by the Court of Appeal to be involved in its decision in the present case is expressed in this way:

> 'Can a defendant properly be convicted under s 1 of the Criminal Damage Act 1971 on the basis that he was reckless as to whether property was destroyed or damaged when he gave no thought to the risk but, by reason of his age and/or personal characteristics, the risk would not have been obvious to him, even if he had thought about it?'

The appeal turns on the meaning of 'reckless' in that section. This is a question on which the House ruled in R v Caldwell [1981] 1 All ER 961, [1982] AC 341, a ruling affirmed by the House in later decisions. The House is again asked to reconsider that ruling.

[2] The agreed facts of the case are very simple. On the night of 21–22 August 2000 the appellants, then aged 11 and 12 respectively, went camping without their parents' permission. In the early hours of 22 August they entered the back yard of the Co-op shop in Newport Pagnell. They found bundles of newspapers which they opened up to read. The boys then lit some of the newspapers with a lighter they had with them. Each of them threw some lit newspaper under a large plastic wheelie-bin, between which and the wall of the Co-op there was another similar wheelie-bin. The boys left the yard without putting out the burning papers. The newspapers set fire to the first wheelie-bin and the fire spread from it to the wheelie-bin next to the shop wall. From the second bin the fire spread up under the overhanging eave, to the guttering and the fascia and then up into the roof space of the shop until eventually the roof of the shop and the adjoining buildings caught fire. The roof collapsed. Approximately £1m worth of damage was caused. The appellants' case at trial was that they expected the newspaper fires to extinguish themselves on the concrete floor of the yard. It is accepted that neither of them appreciated that there was any risk whatsoever of the fire spreading in the way that it eventually did.

[3] An indictment was preferred against the appellants charging them with arson contrary to s 1(1) and (3) of the 1971 Act. The particulars of the offence charged were that they on 22 August 2000 'without lawful excuse damaged by fire commercial premises belonging to ... others being reckless as to whether such property would be damaged'.

[4] Section 1 of the 1971 Act provides:

> '(1) A person who without lawful excuse destroys or damages any property belonging to another intending to destroy or damage any such property or being reckless as to whether any such property would be destroyed or damaged shall be guilty of an offence.
>
> (2) A person who without lawful excuse destroys or damages any property, whether belonging to himself or another—(a) intending to destroy or damage any property or being reckless as to whether any property would be destroyed or damaged; and (b) intending by the destruction or damage to endanger the life of another or being reckless as to whether the life of another would be thereby endangered; shall be guilty of an offence.

(3) An offence committed under this section by destroying or damaging property by fire shall be charged as arson.'

Section 4(1) of the Act provides that a person guilty of arson under s 1 shall on conviction on indictment be liable to imprisonment for life.

THE TRIAL

[5] The appellants stood trial before Judge Maher in March 2001. At the outset of the trial, submissions were made on the meaning of 'reckless' in s 1(1) of the 1971 Act since the appellants were charged with being reckless whether the premises would be destroyed or damaged and not with intending to destroy or damage them. The judge ruled (in effect) that he was bound to direct the jury in accordance with R v Caldwell.

[6] This is what the judge did. He helpfully provided the jury with a typed copy of this part of his direction and said:

'If we look at this together, what the prosecution have to prove is: (1) the defendant damaged by fire the building, the commercial premises, shown in the photographs; (2) that the defendant in doing what he did, created a risk which would have been obvious to an ordinary, reasonable bystander watching that the building, the commercial premises, would be damaged by fire; and (3) that when he, meaning a defendant, did what he did, either he had not given any thought to the possibility of there being such a risk, or having recognised that there was some risk involved in doing what he did, none the less went on and did the act. The word "risk" which appears in para 3 means, as will be apparent, I hope, from the wording of para 2, the risk that the building would be damaged by fire. So, those are the matters which the prosecution have to prove.'

The judge pointed out that proof of the first of these matters was not in dispute. The judge then addressed the second matter and continued:

'That does not mean the boys are guilty of this offence, because it is question nos 2 and 3 which are at the heart of this case. Question no 2: that the defendant, in doing what he did, created a risk which would have been obvious to an ordinary, reasonable bystander watching that the building, the commercial premises, would be damaged by fire. So, this requires you to find as a fact on the whole of the evidence in the case, what did they do? Having established that, this is the test that you will apply: first, focus upon the moment when the two boys left the compound. Then, find as a fact, upon the evidence, what it was that would have been visible to the reasonable bystander, the ordinary, reasonable bystander, looking on. Then, ask yourselves question no 2: at that moment, having determined that, would it have been obvious to that ordinary, reasonable bystander that there was a risk that the fire would spread from paper, or papers, to bin, or bins, up to the building? It is not necessary for the ordinary, reasonable bystander to have foreseen in his mind the full extent of the damage which in fact occurred because, as you will well know, once fire takes hold, it is probably anybody's guess where it is going to end up. The ordinary, reasonable bystander is an adult. He does not have expert knowledge. He has got in his mind that stock of everyday information which one acquires in the process of growing up. This is why to leave this question to a jury of 12 is probably the best tribunal that one could have for answering this question. You will notice also that we are using the language, the vocabulary, of risk—not certainty. When you answer this question as to whether it would have been obvious to an ordinary, reasonable bystander watching that the fire, in effect, would spread as I have just explained it, the ages of these defendants are irrelevant. Their good characters are irrelevant. No allowance is made by the law for the youth of these boys or their lack of maturity or their own inability, if such you find it to be, to assess what was going on. So, if it would have been obvious to an ordinary, reasonable bystander that there was a risk of the fire spreading (as I have just described) to the building, it is irrelevant that you say, "Well, we think this is a bit harsh. We don't think it would have been apparent to these boys, even though it might have been apparent to an ordinary, reasonable bystander." It is too bad. So, in that sense, when you are answering this question, you leave wholly on one side everything you know about these two young boys here because—I repeat—it is what would have been perceived by the ordinary, reasonable bystander which is the test.'

The judge observed:

'Now, I say to you, quite frankly, that you may think this is a harsh test to apply to youngsters, because no allowance is made for age and immaturity. Many people would be sympathetic with you. But, it is my task to expound the law to you as it is, and it is your duty to apply the law as it is—not as you might like it to be—to the facts of the case. Sympathy can play no part in the answering of this question. Now, I cannot tell you—or even begin to help you—and it would be quite wrong for me to try and help you, with what the ordinary, reasonable bystander would not have perceived as a risk in terms of the fire spreading from paper, to bin, to building. You have heard the evidence and you will decide.'

The judge then directed the jury on the third of the matters he had listed:

'Let me assume the prosecution have jumped hurdle no 2. Hurdle no 3 must also be jumped, and here you see it is in two parts: that when he did what he did, either he had not given any thought to the possibility of there being such a risk, or having recognised that there was some risk involved in doing what he did, none the less he went on and did the act. Now, I begin with the second part of para 3 which is a question that does concern the state of mind of the two boys. If you were to say, "We are, all 12 of us, satisfied so that we are sure that these boys when they started the fire and left the compound, appreciated in their minds that there was some risk of the fire spreading from paper to bin, to soffit, to building, and none the less went on and did what they did", then it is difficult to see how they could be anything other than guilty of this offence. It is not primarily the way the prosecution put their case. As you know, to cut a long story short, the boys have said to you, each of them, as they said in their second interview to the police, that it never crossed their minds for a moment that there was this risk of the fire actually spreading to the building itself. Now, it is a matter for you whether you believe them, but I am going to proceed on the basis that you will say either that you are satisfied that they—that their minds did not perceive the risk of the fire spreading to the building, or you will say, "Well, we can't be sure that that serious finding can be made against them". If that is so, then the first part of para 3 is satisfied—that they had not given any thought to the possibility of there being such a risk—that is, a risk of the fire spreading, as I have just described, to the building itself. You will see that if a defendant says, "I didn't give any thought whatsoever to the possibility of the fire spreading from what I had done to a building itself", that is no defence if question no 2 is answered by a jury against such a person. So, pulling it all together—and I suspect that your deliberations may centre around this—if you say, "Well, hurdle no 1 is jumped, and we don't think these young boys, in their minds, gave any thought to the possibility of the fire spreading from paper, to bin, to soffit, to building, but—but, it would have been obvious to an ordinary, reasonable bystander watching that the fire might spread to the building, and that the building might be damaged by the fire", then they are guilty of the offence.'

[7] After the jury had retired on the afternoon of 21 March 2001 the judge made clear, in the presence of the appellants, that 'nothing unpleasant' awaited them even if the jury convicted. But the jury had difficulty reaching a verdict. Later that afternoon they asked the judge why they should consider the risk as perceived by a reasonable person or layman. He replied:

'The answer to that lies in my task. My task is to give you directions on the law as it is, and it is your task to apply the directions on the law as I have expounded it to you to the facts as you find them. I am not free to give you a direction on the law which perhaps some of us might like it to be; nor are you free to substitute your own view of what the law is for the law as I have explained it to you. At the beginning of the trial you took an oath to try the case on the evidence presented to you, and part of that involves taking the law from me. That is my function. Just to explain a little more to you, the Criminal Damage Act 1971 creates the offence of criminal damage. It was not new; it has existed, as you know, for centuries. But, that is the up-to-date statute. The higher courts—the House of Lords, in particular—the Law Lords have given guidance to all courts as to how juries are to be directed as to the meaning of the word "reckless" in this context. That direction must be followed by trial judges because I am no more free to invent the law, or to make it up as I go along, than anyone else is. It is my task to do my best to identify the law, and to expound it to a jury clearly and accurately so that the jury know what the relevant principles of law are. That is what I have done. That is the task that every judge in every trial has. The jury must act upon the direction which they are given. You may remember, I said that some may feel it is a harsh test, and there are many who would be sympathetic to that view. But, sympathy does not permit me to give you a direction on the law other than as it is. Similarly, applying that direction means that you—if I may answer your question—must consider the risk as perceived by a reasonable person or layman because that is the test; that is the law which is applicable in this area.'

The judge went on to repeat his direction on the three matters the prosecution had to prove. The jury were unable to agree on a verdict that afternoon. They returned on another day and convicted. On receiving the verdict the judge adjourned the proceedings for a pre-sentence report, but said:

'For the benefit of whoever may speak to the preparer of the report, I am quite satisfied that they did not intend to burn down the building. Indeed, > the prosecution never alleged that they so intended. I am quite satisfied in my mind that they subjectively did not perceive a risk in their minds that the building would be burned down. As we know, the question posed by the jury as to why they had to act upon the direction which I gave to them strongly suggests to me—and this is the basis upon which I propose to proceed—that the correct approach to sentence is that they have been convicted—this is the basis upon which I propose to sentence—that the risk they created would have been perceived by an adult; by a reasonable bystander as carrying with it a risk of damage to the building.'

The judge expressed regret at the law he had felt bound to apply, and added:

> 'I am satisfied in my mind that this is just one of those almost childish—maybe "prank" is too mild a word—which just went horribly wrong, and there, but for the grace of God, go many people. Members of the jury, with respect, it is irrelevant as to whether you share these sentiments, but I see that some of you may do.'

In due course the judge made a one-year supervision order in the case of each appellant. It was not suggested in argument before the House that the judge's directions to the jury were other than correct on the law as then understood and applied.

THE HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

[8] Section 51 of the Malicious Damage Act 1861 provided, so far as relevant:

> 'Whosoever shall unlawfully and maliciously commit any damage, injury, or spoil to or upon any real or personal property whatsoever ... the damage, injury, or spoil being to an amount exceeding 5l., shall be guilty of a misdemeanour ...'

The defendant in R v Pembliton (1874) LR 2 CCR 119, [1874–80] All ER Rep 1163 was charged under this section. He had been fighting in the street and had picked up a large stone and thrown it at the people he had been fighting with. The stone missed its human target but broke a window causing damage of a value exceeding £5. The jury convicted the defendant, although finding that he had not intended to break the window, and the recorder referred the case to the Court of Crown Cases Reserved (Lord Coleridge CJ, Blackburn J, Pigott B, Lush J and Cleasby B) which quashed the conviction. The words 'unlawfully and maliciously' were very widely used in the Malicious Damage Act 1861 and the issue on appeal was whether the defendant had acted 'maliciously'. Lord Coleridge CJ said ((1874) LR 2 CCR 119 at 122, [1874–80] All ER Rep 1163 at 1164):

> '[I]t seems to me that what is intended by the statute is a wilful doing of an intentional act. Without saying that if the case had been left to them in a different way the conviction could not have been supported, if, on these facts, the jury had come to a conclusion that the prisoner was reckless of the consequence of his act, and might reasonably have expected that it would result in breaking the window, it is sufficient to say that the jury have expressly found the contrary.'

Blackburn J was of the same opinion ((1874) LR 2 CCR 119 at 122, [1874–80] All ER Rep 1163 at 1165):

'The jury might perhaps have found on this evidence that the act was malicious, because they might have found that the prisoner knew that the natural consequence of his act would be to break the glass, and although that was not his wish, yet that he was reckless whether he did it or not; but the jury have not so found, and I think it is impossible to say in this case that the prisoner has maliciously done an act which he did not intend to do.'

Thus the court interpreted 'maliciously' as requiring proof of intention, but were inclined to accept that intention could be shown by proof of reckless disregard of a perceived risk. This was also the approach followed in R v Welch (1875) 1 QBD 23, where the defendant faced charges of unlawfully and maliciously killing, maiming and wounding a mare contrary to s 40(1) of the Malicious Damage Act 1861. The trial judge was held to have been right to direct the jury to convict if they found that the defendant in fact intended to kill, maim or wound the mare or, in the alternative, that he knew that what he was doing would or might kill, maim or wound the mare and nevertheless did what he did recklessly and not caring whether the mare was injured or not.

[9] The first eight sections of the Malicious Damage Act 1861 all related to arson and all used the expression 'unlawfully and maliciously'. In the first edition of his Outlines of Criminal Law published in 1902, Professor Kenny addressed the meaning of 'maliciously' with particular reference to arson. He wrote (pp 163–165, footnotes omitted):

'(a) "Maliciously." Burning a house by any mere negligence, however gross it be, is, as we have seen, no crime; (an omission in our law which may well be considered as deserving the attention of the legislature). Even the fact that this gross negligence occurred in the course of the commission of an unlawful act, or even of a felonious one, will not suffice to render the consequent burning-down indictable as an arson. For in any statutory definition of a crime, "malice" must, as we have already seen, be taken—not in its vague common law sense as a "wickedness" in general, but—as requiring an actual intention to do the particular kind of harm that in fact was done. Consequently, if a criminal, when engaged in committing some burglary or other felony, negligently sets fire to a house, he usually will not be guilty of arson ... But it must not be supposed that everyone who has maliciously set fire to some article which it is not arson to burn, will necessarily become guilty of arson if the fire should happen to spread to an arsonable building. For when a man mischievously tries to burn some chattel inside a house, and thereby, quite accidentally and unintentionally, sets fire to the house, this does not constitute an arson. And even if his setting fire to this chattel inside the building was intrinsically likely to result in setting fire to the building itself, he still will not necessarily be guilty of arson. For it is essential to arson that the incendiary either should have intended the building to take fire, or, at least, should have recognised the probability of its taking fire and have been reckless as to whether or not it did so. Of course the mere fact that this probability was an obviously manifest one will be strong evidence to warrant the jury in finding, if they think fit, that the prisoner did, in fact, thus recognise the danger and regard it with indifference.'

One of the cases cited by Professor Kenny was R v Harris (1882) 15 Cox CC 75, where the charge was of setting fire to a dwelling house. The judge (at 77) directed the jury:

> 'Again, if you think that the prisoner set fire to the frame of the picture with a knowledge that in all probability the house itself would thereby be set on fire, and that he was reckless and utterly indifferent whether the house caught fire or not, that is abundant evidence from which you may, if you think fit, draw the inference that he intended the probable consequences of his act, and if you draw that inference, then, inasmuch as the house was in fact set on fire through the medium of the picture frame, the prisoner's crime would be that of arson.'

This was consistent with the ratio of R v Child (1871) LR 1 CCR 307 (also cited by Professor Kenny) where it was held that the defendant had not intended to set fire to a house and had thought that what he was doing would not do so. Another case cited by Professor Kenny was R v Faulkner (1877) 13 Cox CC 550, decided in the Irish Court of Crown Cases Reserved. The defendant had set fire to a ship while stealing rum from its hold. He had been boring a hole by candlelight and some rum had spilled out and been ignited. It was conceded that he had not intended to burn the vessel, and his conviction was quashed. Barry J said (at 555):

> '[R v Pembliton (1874) LR 2 CCR 119, [1874–80] All ER Rep 1163] must be taken as deciding that to constitute an offence under the Malicious Injuries to Property Act, sect. 1, the act done must be in fact intentional and wilful, although the intention and will may (perhaps) be held to exist in, or be proved by, the fact that the accused knew that the injury would be the probable result of his unlawful act, and yet did the act reckless of such consequences.'

[10] R v Pembliton was again relied on in R v Cunningham [1957] 2 All ER 412, [1957] 2 QB 396. The defendant in that case had wrenched a gas meter from the wall and stolen it. Gas had escaped. He was charged under s 23 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861 with unlawfully and maliciously causing a noxious thing, namely coal gas, to be taken by the victim. He pleaded not guilty but was convicted. Giving the reserved judgment of the Court of Criminal Appeal, Byrne J said ([1957] 2 All ER 412 at 414, [1957] 2 QB 396 at 399–400):

> 'We have considered those cases [among others, R v Pembliton and R v Faulkner], and we have also considered, in the light of those cases, the following principle which was propounded by the late Professor C. S. KENNY in the first edition of his OUTLINES OF CRIMINAL LAW published in 1902, and repeated in the sixteenth edition, edited by Mr. J. W. CECIL TURNER, and published in 1952 (ibid., at p. 186): "... in any statutory definition of a crime, 'malice' must be taken not in the old vague sense of 'wickedness' in general, but as requiring either (i) an actual intention to do the particular kind of harm that in fact was done, or (ii) recklessness as to whether such harm should occur or not (i.e. the accused has foreseen that the particular kind of harm might be done, and yet has gone on to take the risk of it). It is neither limited to, nor does it indeed require any ill-will towards, the person injured." The same principle is repeated by Mr. TURNER in his tenth edition of RUSSELL ON CRIME [vol 2, p 1592].'

That was accepted as an accurate statement of the law. In the course of his able address, Mr Perry (for the Crown) pointed out, correctly, that the words quoted had not appeared in the first (1902) edition written by Professor Kenny. It does not, however, appear that the later summary misrepresents what the professor had written, quoted at [9], above.

[11] R v Mowatt [1967] 3 All ER 47, [1968] 1 QB 421 arose from the robbery by the defendant of a victim W. When W retaliated, the defendant struck him in the face. He was charged with wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm contrary to s 18 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861, on which an alternative verdict of unlawful wounding contrary to s 20 of that Act was open to the jury. The trial judge gave no direction to the jury on the meaning of 'maliciously' and the jury convicted under s 20. The defendant's appeal against conviction on the ground of this non-direction failed. In a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Diplock LJ, Brabin and Waller JJ) reference was made to R v Cunningham and the court ([1967] 3 All ER 47 at 49, [1968] 1 QB 421 at 425) cast no doubt on the proposition that '"maliciously" in a statutory crime postulates foresight of consequence', but the court regarded Professor Kenny's more general statement as inapposite to the specific alternative statutory offences described in ss 18 and 20. The court held ([1967] 3 All ER 47 at 50, [1968] 1 QB 421 at 426) that 'maliciously' imports an awareness that an act may have the consequence of causing some physical harm to some other person, even if the harm foreseen was relatively minor. The court ruled:

> 'But where the evidence for the prosecution, if accepted, shows that the physical act of the accused which caused the injury to another person was a direct assault which any ordinary person would be bound to realise was likely to cause some physical harm to the other person (as, for instance, an assault with a weapon or the boot or violence with the hands) and the defence put forward on behalf of the accused is not that the assault was accidental or that he did not realise that it might cause some physical harm to the victim, but is some other defence such as that he did not do the alleged act or that he did it in self-defence, it is unnecessary to deal specifically in the summing-up with what is meant by the word "maliciously" in the section ... In the absence of any evidence that the accused did not realise that it was a possible consequence of his act that some physical harm might be caused to the victim, the prosecution satisfy the relevant onus by proving the commission by the accused of an act which any ordinary person would realise was likely to have that consequence.'

THE 1971 ACT

[12] In its second programme of law reform the Law Commission, then under the chairmanship of Scarman J, envisaged the codification of the criminal law. As part of that project it examined a number of specific offences, among them the law of malicious damage, on which it published its Working Paper No 23 in April 1969. This described the Malicious Damage Act 1861, despite five later amending statutes, as 'unsatisfactory' (p 1 (para 2)). In a brief statistical introduction the Law Commission drew attention (pp 4–5 (para 9)) to the prevalence of malicious damage offences among the youngest criminal age group (the 10–14-year-olds) as well as among other juveniles, and to the fact that more than half of those convicted of the most serious offence (arson) were under 21. In a section on 'The Mental Element' the Law Commission referred to a working party which was formulating draft propositions on the mental element in crime and observed (p 19 (para 31)):

> 'For the present purpose, we assume that the traditional elements of intention, knowledge and recklessness (in the sense of foresight and disregard of consequences or awareness and disregard of the likelihood of the existence of circumstances) will continue to be required for serious crime.'

The Law Commission identified (p 20 (para 33)) 'intent to do the forbidden act or recklessness in relation to its foreseen consequences' as the 'essential mental element in the existing malicious damage offences' and quoted with apparent approval the passage from R v Cunningham which is set out at [10], above. The Law Commission considered that the word 'maliciously' should be avoided (p 21 (para 34)) and favoured its replacement by 'wilful or reckless' (p 35 (para 64)). It proposed (p 37 (para 68)) that the new group of offences should require—

> 'traditional mens rea, in the sense of intention or recklessness in relation to prescribed consequences, and, where appropriate, knowledge or recklessness in relation to prescribed circumstances.'

The working paper does not suggest that the law as then understood was thought to be leading to unjustified acquittals. In a published comment on the working paper ('Malicious Damage: The Law Commission's Working Paper' [1969] Crim LR 283), Professor Brian Hogan wrote (at 288) :

> 'What is implicit in "maliciously" in the present law will appear explicitly as intention or recklessness in the new code. No doubt the meanings ascribed to intention and recklessness in the codification of the general principles will be applied mutatis mutandis to offences of damage to property.'

[13] In its Report on Offences of Damage to Property (Law Com no 29) published in July 1970, the Law Commission broadly followed, in respects relevant to this appeal, the lines of the working paper. On the mental element of criminal damage offences the Law Commission said (p 17):

> '44. In the area of serious crime (in contrast to offences commonly described as "regulatory offences" in which the test of culpability may be negligence, or even a test founded on strict liability) the elements of intention, knowledge or recklessness have always been required as a basis of liability. The tendency is to extend this basis to a wider range of offences and to limit the area of offences where a lesser mental element is required. We consider, therefore, that the same elements as are required at present should be retained, but that they should be expressed with greater simplicity and clarity. In particular, we prefer to avoid the use of such a word as "maliciously", if only because it gives the impression that the mental element differs from that which is imposed in other offences requiring traditional mens rea. It is evident from such cases as R. v. Cunningham ([1957] 2 All ER 412, [1957] 2 QB 396) and R. v. Mowatt ([1967] 3 All ER 47, [1968] 1 QB 421) that the word can give rise to difficulties of interpretation. Furthermore, the word "maliciously" conveys the impression that some ill-will is required against the person whose property is damaged.'

It does not appear from the report that the Law Commission's consultation had elicited any complaint that the existing law was unduly favourable to defendants. Annexed to the report was a draft Bill: in this cl 1(1) and (2) were exactly as enacted in the 1971 Act, but what became s 1(3) was omitted. On 16 June 1970, a month before this report was published, the Law Commission had published its Codification of the Criminal Law: General Principles: The Mental Element in Crime (Working Paper No 31). In that working paper a definition of recklessness was proposed (p 48):

> 'A person is reckless if, (a) knowing that there is a risk that an event may result from his conduct or that a circumstance may exist, he takes that risk, and (b) it is unreasonable for him to take it having regard to the degree and nature of the risk which he knows to be present.'

In the 1971 Act as passed all except six sections of the Malicious Damage Act 1861, a lengthy Act, were repealed, very much as the Law Commission had proposed.

[14] Enactment of the 1971 Act did not at once affect the courts' approach to the causing of unintentional damage. In R v Briggs [1977] 1 All ER 475, [1977] 1 WLR 605 the defendant had been charged under s 1(1) of the 1971 Act as a result of damage caused to a car and the appeal turned on the trial judge's direction on the meaning of 'reckless'. The appeal succeeded since the judge had not adequately explained that the test to be applied was that of the defendant's state of mind. The Court of Appeal (James LJ, Kenneth Jones and Peter Pain JJ) ruled ([1977] 1 All ER 475 at 477–478, [1977] 1 WLR 605 at 608):

> 'A man is reckless in the sense required when he carries out a deliberate act knowing that there is some risk of damage resulting from that act but nevertheless continues in the performance of that act.'

This definition was adopted but modified in R v Parker [1977] 2 All ER 37, [1977] 1 WLR 600 where the defendant in a fit of temper had broken a telephone by smashing the handset violently down on to the telephone unit and had been convicted under s 1(1) of the 1971 Act. The court (Scarman and Geoffrey Lane LJJ and Kenneth Jones J) ([1977] 2 All ER 37 at 39–40, [1977] 1 WLR 600 at 603–604) readily followed R v Briggs but held that the defendant had been fully aware of all the circumstances and that if—

> 'he did not know, as he said he did not, that there was some risk of damage, he was, in effect, deliberately closing his mind to the obvious—the obvious being that damage in these circumstances was inevitable.'

The court accordingly modified the R v Briggs definition in this way:

> 'A man is reckless in the sense required when he carries out a deliberate act knowing or closing his mind to the obvious fact that there is some risk of damage resulting from that act but nevertheless continuing in the performance of that act.'

This modification made no inroad into the concept of recklessness as then understood since, as pointed out by Professor Glanville Williams Textbook of Criminal Law (1st edn, 1978) p 79, cited by Lord Edmund-Davies in his dissenting opinion in R v Caldwell [1981] 1 All ER 961 at 970, [1982] AC 341 at 358:

'A person cannot, in any intelligible meaning of the words, close his mind to a risk unless he first realises that there is a risk; and if he realises that there is a risk, that is the end of the matter.'

[15] The meaning of 'reckless' in s 1(1) of the 1971 Act was again considered by the Court of Appeal (Geoffrey Lane LJ, Ackner and Watkins JJ) in R v Stephenson [1979] 2 All ER 1198, [1979] QB 695. The defendant had tried to go to sleep in a hollow he had made in the side of a haystack. Feeling cold, he had lit a fire in the hollow which had set fire to the stack and damaged property worth £3,500. He had been charged and convicted under s 1(1) and (3) of the 1971 Act. The defendant however had a long history of schizophrenia and expert evidence at trial suggested that he may not have had the same ability to foresee or appreciate risks as the mentally normal person. Giving the reserved judgment of the court, Geoffrey Lane LJ ([1979] 2 All ER 1198 at 1201–1203, [1979] QB 695 at 700–703) reviewed the definition of recklessness in the Law Commission's Working Paper No 31 (see [13], above), the acceptance of that definition by the leading academic authorities and the House of Lords' adoption of a subjective meaning of recklessness in tort in British Railways Board v Herrington [1972] 1 All ER 749, [1972] AC 877. The court thought it fair to assume that those who were responsible for drafting the 1971 Act were intending to preserve its legal meaning as described in Kenny and expressly approved in R v Cunningham. The court then continued:

'What then must the prosecution prove in order to bring home the charge of arson in circumstances such as the present? They must prove that (1) the defendant deliberately committed some act which caused the damage to property alleged or part of such damage; (2) the defendant had no lawful excuse for causing the damage (these two requirements will in the ordinary case not be in issue); (3) the defendant either (a) intended to cause the damage to the property, or (b) was reckless whether the property was damaged or not. A man is reckless when he carries out the deliberate act appreciating that there is a risk that damage to property may result from his act. It is however not the taking of every risk which could properly be classed as reckless. The risk must be one which it is in all the circumstances unreasonable for him to take. Proof of the requisite knowledge in the mind of the defendant will in most cases present little difficulty. The fact that the risk of some damage would have been obvious to anyone in his right mind in the position of the defendant is not conclusive proof of the defendant's knowledge, but it may well be, and in many cases doubtless will be, a matter which will drive the jury to the conclusion that the defendant himself must have appreciated the risk.'

The appeal was accordingly allowed. But the court recognised that what it called the subjective definition of recklessness produced difficulties. One of these was where a person by self-induced intoxication deprived himself of the ability to foresee the risks involved in his actions. The court suggested that a distinction was to be drawn between crimes requiring proof of specific intent and those, such as offences under s 1(1) of the 1971 Act, involving no specific intent ([1979] 2 All ER 1198 at 1204, [1979] QB 695 at 704):

'Accordingly it is no defence under the 1971 Act for a person to say that he was deprived by self-induced intoxication of the ability to foresee or appreciate an obvious risk.'

[16] In Archbold's Pleading, Evidence and Practice in Criminal Cases (40th edn, 1979) p 958 (para 1443c), on which jury directions were no doubt routinely based at the time, the better view was said to be—

'that whereas "intent" requires a desire for consequences or foresight of probable consequences, "reckless" only requires foresight of possible consequences coupled with an unreasonable willingness to risk them.'

R v CALDWELL

[17] R v Caldwell [1981] 1 All ER 961, [1982] AC 341 was a case of self-induced intoxication. The defendant, having a grievance against the owner of the hotel where he worked, got very drunk and set fire to the hotel where guests were living at the time. He was indicted upon two counts of arson. The first and more serious count was laid under s 1(2) of the 1971 Act, the second count under s 1(1). He pleaded guilty to the second count but contested the first on the ground that he had been so drunk at the time that the thought there might be people in the hotel had never crossed his mind. His conviction on count 1 was set aside by the Court of Appeal which certified the following question ([1981] 1 All ER 961 at 964, [1982] AC 341 at 344):

'Whether evidence of self-induced intoxication can be relevant to the following questions—(a) Whether the defendant intended to endanger the life of another; and (b) Whether the defendant was reckless as to whether the life of another would be endangered, within the meaning of Section 1(2)(b) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971.'

In submitting that the two questions should be answered (a) Yes and (b) No, counsel for the Crown did not challenge the correctness of R v Briggs or R v Stephenson.

[18] In a leading opinion with which Lord Keith of Kinkel and Lord Roskill agreed, but from which Lord Wilberforce and Lord Edmund-Davies dissented, Lord Diplock discounted ([1981] 1 All ER 961 at 964–965, [1982] AC 341 at 351) Professor Kenny's statement of the law approved in R v Cunningham (see [10], above) as directed to the meaning of 'maliciously' in the Malicious Damage Act 1861 and having no bearing on the meaning of 'reckless' in the 1971 Act. It was, he held, no less blameworthy for a man whose mind was affected by rage or excitement or drink to fail to give his mind to the risk of damaging property than for a man whose mind was so affected to appreciate that there was a risk of damage to property but not to appreciate the seriousness of the risk or to trust that good luck would prevent the risk occurring. He observed ([1981] 1 All ER 961 at 965, [1982] AC 341 at 352):

'My Lords, I can see no reason why Parliament when it decided to revise the law as to offences of damage to property should go out of its way to perpetuate fine and impracticable distinctions such as these, between one mental state and another. One would think that the sooner they were got rid of the better.'

Reference was made to R v Briggs, R v Parker and R v Stephenson, but Lord Diplock saw no warrant for assuming that the 1971 Act, whose declared purpose was to revise the law of damage to property, intended 'reckless' to be interpreted as 'maliciously' had been ([1981] 1 All ER 961 at 966, [1982] AC 341 at 353). He preferred the ordinary meaning of 'reckless' which— a

> 'surely includes not only deciding to ignore a risk of harmful consequences resulting from one's acts that one has recognised as existing, but also failing to give any thought to whether or not there is any such risk in circumstances where, if any thought were given to the matter, it would be obvious that there was. If one is attaching labels, the latter state of mind is neither more nor less "subjective" than the first. But the label solves nothing. It is a statement of the obvious; mens rea is, by definition, a state of mind of the accused himself at the time he did the physical act that constitutes the actus reus of the offence; it cannot be the mental state of some non-existent hypothetical person.' b c

To decide whether a person had been reckless whether harmful consequences of a particular kind would result from his act it was necessary to consider the mind of 'the ordinary prudent individual' ([1981] 1 All ER 961 at 966, [1982] AC 341 at 354). In a passage which has since been taken to encapsulate the law on this point, d and which has founded many jury directions (including that in the present case) Lord Diplock then said ([1981] 1 All ER 961 at 967, [1982] AC 341 at 354):

> 'In my opinion, a person charged with an offence under s 1(1) of the 1971 Act is "reckless as to whether or not any property would be destroyed or damaged" if (1) he does an act which in fact creates an obvious risk that property will be destroyed or damaged and (2) when he does the act he either has not given any thought to the possibility of there being any such risk or has recognised that there was some risk involved and has none the less gone on to do it. That would be a proper direction to the jury; cases in the Court of Appeal which held otherwise should be regarded as overruled.' e f

On the facts Lord Diplock concluded ([1981] 1 All ER 961 at 967, [1982] AC 341 at 355) that the defendant's unawareness, owing to his self-induced intoxication, of the risk of endangering the lives of hotel residents was no defence if that risk would have been obvious to him had he been sober. He held ([1981] 1 All ER 961 at 967, [1982] AC 341 at 356) that evidence of self-induced intoxication was g relevant to a charge under s 1(2) based on intention but not to one based on recklessness.

[19] In his dissenting opinion Lord Edmund-Davies expressed ([1981] 1 All ER 961 at 969, [1982] AC 341 at 357) 'respectful, but profound, disagreement' with Lord Diplock's dismissal of Professor Kenny's statement which was— h

> 'accurate not only in respect of the law as it stood in 1902 but also as it has been applied in countless cases ever since, both in the United Kingdom and in other countries where the common law prevails ...'

Lord Edmund-Davies drew attention to the Law Commission's preparation of j the 1971 Act and its definition of recklessness in Working Paper No 31 and continued:

> 'It was surely with this contemporaneous definition and the much respected decision of R v Cunningham in mind that the draftsman proceeded to his task of drafting the 1971 Act.'

He observed ([1981] 1 All ER 961 at 970, [1982] AC 341 at 358):

> 'In the absence of exculpatory factors, the defendant's state of mind is therefore all-important where recklessness is an element in the offence charged, and s 8 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 has laid down that: "A court or jury, in determining whether a person has committed an offence,—(a) shall not be bound in law to infer that he intended or foresaw a result of his actions by reason only of its being a natural and probable consequence of those actions; but (b) shall decide whether he did intend or foresee that result by reference to all the evidence, drawing such inferences from the evidence as appear proper in the circumstances." (Emphasis added.)'

Lord Edmund-Davies differed from the majority on the relevance of evidence of self-induced intoxication: in his opinion ([1981] 1 All ER 961 at 972, [1982] AC 341 at 361) such evidence was relevant to a charge under s 1(2) whether the charge was based on intention or recklessness.

R v LAWRENCE

[20] Judgment was given by the House in R v Lawrence [1981] 1 All ER 974, [1982] AC 510 on the same day as R v Caldwell, although only two members (Lord Diplock and Lord Roskill) were party to both decisions. The defendant had ridden a motor cycle along an urban street after nightfall and had collided with and killed a pedestrian. He had been charged and convicted under s 1 of the Road Traffic Act 1972 which made it an offence to cause the death of another person by driving a motor vehicle on a road recklessly. His appeal had succeeded on the ground of an inadequate direction to the jury. The issue on appeal to the House concerned the mental element in a charge of reckless driving.

[21] Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC ([1981] 1 All ER 974 at 975, 978, [1982] AC 510 at 516, 520, 521), agreeing with Lord Diplock and with the majority in R v Caldwell, understood recklessness to evince 'a state of mind stopping short of deliberate intention, and going beyond mere inadvertence ...' Lord Diplock ([1981] 1 All ER 974 at 982, [1982] AC 510 at 526) rehearsed the history of motoring offences based on recklessness beginning with s 1 of the Motor Car Act 1903 and applied essentially the same test as laid down in R v Caldwell, by reference to the 'ordinary prudent individual'. He formulated an appropriate jury direction to the same effect, mutatis mutandis, as that in R v Caldwell. But he added ([1981] 1 All ER 974 at 982, [1982] AC 510 at 527):

> 'It is for the jury to decide whether the risk created by the manner in which the vehicle was being driven was both obvious and serious and, in deciding this, they may apply the standard of the ordinary prudent motorist as represented by themselves. If satisfied that an obvious and serious risk was created by the manner of the defendant's driving, the jury are entitled to infer that he was in one or other of the states of mind required to constitute the offence and will probably do so; but regard must be given to any explanation he gives as to his state of mind which may displace the inference.'

Lord Fraser of Tullybelton, Lord Roskill and Lord Bridge of Harwich agreed with Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC and Lord Diplock.

LATER CASES

[22] The decisions in R v Caldwell and R v Lawrence were applied by the House (Lord Diplock, Lord Keith of Kinkel, Lord Bridge of Harwich, Lord Brandon of Oakbrook and Lord Brightman) in R v Miller [1983] 1 All ER 978, [1983] 2 AC 161, although subject to a qualification germane to the facts of that case but not to the facts of the present case ([1983] 1 All ER 978 at 983, [1983] 2 AC 161 at 179).

[23] In Elliott v C (a minor) [1983] 2 All ER 1005, [1983] 1 WLR 939 the defendant was a 14-year-old girl of low intelligence who had entered a shed in the early morning, poured white spirit on the floor and set it alight. The resulting fire had flared up and she had left the shed, which had been destroyed. She was charged under s 1(1) of the 1971 Act and at her trial before justices the prosecution made plain that the charge was based not on intention but on recklessness. The justices sought to apply the test laid down in R v Caldwell [1981] 1 All ER 961, [1982] AC 341 but inferred that in his reference to 'an obvious risk' Lord Diplock had meant a risk which was obvious to the particular defendant. The justices acquitted the defendant because they found that the defendant had given no thought at the time to the possibility of there being a risk that the shed and contents would be destroyed, and this risk would not have been obvious to her or appreciated by her if she had thought about the matter ([1983] 2 All ER 1005 at 1007–1008, [1983] 1 WLR 939 at 945). The prosecutor's appeal was allowed. Glidewell J, giving the first judgment, accepted the submission that—> 'if the risk is one which would have been obvious to a reasonably prudent person, once it has also been proved that the particular defendant gave no thought to the possibility of there being such a risk, it is not a defence that because of limited intelligence or exhaustion she would not have appreciated the risk even if she had thought about it.'

Robert Goff LJ felt constrained by the decisions of the House in R v Caldwell, R v Lawrence and R v Miller to agree, but he expressed his unhappiness in doing so and plainly did not consider the outcome to be just. A petition for leave to appeal against this decision was dismissed by an appeal committee.

[24] The defendant in R v Stephen Malcolm R (1984) 79 Cr App R 334 had thrown petrol bombs at the outside wall of the bedroom of a girl who he believed had informed on him in relation to a series of burglaries. He had admitted throwing the bombs but claimed he had done so to frighten the girl and without realising that if a bomb had gone through the window it might have killed her. He was charged with arson under s 1(2) of the 1971 Act, on the basis of recklessness. At trial, it was submitted on the defendant's behalf that when considering recklessness the jury could only convict him if he did an act which created a risk to life obvious to someone of his age and with such of his characteristics as would affect his appreciation of the risk (at 337). On the trial judge ruling against that submission the defendant changed his plea and the issue in the Court of Appeal (Ackner LJ, Bristow and Popplewell JJ) was whether the ruling had been correct. The court held that it had: if the House had wished to modify the Caldwell principle to take account of, for instance, the age of the defendant, the opportunity had existed in Elliott's case and it had not been taken. Although concerned at the principle it was required to apply, the court had little doubt that on the facts of the case the answer would have been the same even if the jury had been able to draw a comparison with what a boy of the defendant's age would have appreciated.

[25] On his appeal to the House (Lord Keith of Kinkel, Lord Roskill, Lord Ackner, Lord Goff of Chieveley and Lord Browne-Wilkinson) in R v Reid [1992] 3 All ER 673, [1992] 1 WLR 793 the defendant, convicted of causing death by reckless driving contrary to s 1 of the Road Traffic Act 1972, later re-enacted in s 1 of the Road Traffic Act 1988, asked the House to reconsider its decision in R v Lawrence on which the trial judge's jury direction had been based. The House unanimously affirmed its earlier decision as correct in principle for essentially the reasons which Lord Diplock had given. Lord Keith, however, accepted ([1992] 3 All ER 673 at 675, [1992] 1 WLR 793 at 796) that Lord Diplock's suggested jury direction might call for modification or addition—

> 'where the driver acted under some understandable and excusable mistake or where his capacity to appreciate risks was adversely affected by some condition not involving fault on his part. There may also be cases where the driver acted as he did in a sudden dilemma created by the actions of others.'

Lord Ackner ([1992] 3 All ER 673 at 684, [1992] 1 WLR 793 at 806) drew attention to Lord Diplock's acceptance that 'regard must be given to any explanation [the defendant] gives as to his state of mind which may displace the inference' (see [21], above) and commented:

> 'I read this as no more than a cautionary instruction to the jury that, while it would be open to them at first sight to find that the accused was driving recklessly from the mere manner of his driving, if it shows a clear disregard for the lives or safety of others without any explanation for this conduct, yet before reaching any firm conclusions they must have regard to any explanation which accounts for his conduct. In short, they must have regard to all the available evidence.'

Lord Ackner, Lord Goff and my noble and learned friend Lord Browne-Wilkinson ([1992] 3 All ER 673 at 683, 685, 694, [1992] 1 WLR 793 at 805, 807, 816–817, respectively) all, with varying degrees of emphasis, made plain that their observations were directed to recklessness in the context of driving and not to recklessness in the context of s 1 of the 1971 Act or any other context.

[26] In R v Coles [1995] 1 Cr App R 157 a 15-year-old defendant convicted under s 1(2) of the 1971 Act on the basis of recklessness again challenged, unsuccessfully, the rule laid down by Lord Diplock in R v Caldwell. Since recklessness was to be judged by the standard of the reasonable, prudent man, it followed that expert evidence of the defendant's capacity to foresee the risks which would arise from his setting fire to hay in a barn had been rightly rejected.

[27] In the present case the Court of Appeal (Dyson LJ, Silber J and Judge Beaumont QC) reviewed the authorities ([2002] EWCA Crim 1992 at [18], [2003] 3 All ER 206 at [18]) but was in no doubt that the Caldwell test had been rightly applied. It acknowledged (at [23]) that the Caldwell test had been criticised and had not been applied in a number of Commonwealth jurisdictions and saw great force in these criticisms but held that it was not open to the Court of Appeal to depart from it.

CONCLUSIONS

[28] The task confronting the House in this appeal is, first of all, one of statutory construction: what did Parliament mean when it used the word 'reckless' in s 1(1) and (2) of the 1971 Act? In so expressing the question I mean to make it as plain as I can that I am not addressing the meaning of 'reckless' in any other statutory or common law context. In particular, but perhaps needlessly since 'recklessly' has now been banished from the lexicon of driving offences, I would wish to throw no doubt on the decisions of the House in R v Lawrence and R v Reid.

[29] Since a statute is always speaking, the context or application of a statutory expression may change over time, but the meaning of the expression itself cannot change. So the starting point is to ascertain what Parliament meant by 'reckless' in 1971. As noted at [13], above, s 1 as enacted followed, subject to an immaterial addition, the draft proposed by the Law Commission. It cannot be supposed that by 'reckless' Parliament meant anything different from the Law Commission. The Law Commission's meaning was made plain both in its report (Law Com no 29) and in Working Paper No 23 which preceded it. These materials (not, it would seem, placed before the House in R v Caldwell) reveal a very plain intention to replace the old-fashioned and misleading expression 'maliciously' by the more familiar expression 'reckless' but to give the latter expression the meaning which R v Cunningham [1957] 2 All ER 412, [1957] 2 QB 396 and Professor Kenny had given to the former. In treating this authority as irrelevant to the construction of 'reckless' the majority fell into understandable but clearly demonstrable error. No relevant change in the mens rea necessary for proof of the offence was intended, and in holding otherwise the majority misconstrued s 1 of the Act.

[30] That conclusion is by no means determinative of this appeal. For the decision in R v Caldwell was made more than 20 years ago. Its essential reasoning was unanimously approved by the House in R v Lawrence. Invitations to reconsider that reasoning have been rejected. The principles laid down have been applied on many occasions, by Crown Court judges and, even more frequently, by justices. In the submission of the Crown, the ruling of the House works well and causes no injustice in practice. If Parliament had wished to give effect to the intention of the Law Commission it has had many opportunities, which it has not taken, to do so. Despite its power under Practice Statement (Judicial Precedent) [1966] 3 All ER 77, [1966] 1 WLR 1234 to depart from its earlier decisions, the House should be very slow to do so, not least in a context such as this.

[31] These are formidable arguments, deployed by Mr Perry with his habitual skill and erudition. But I am persuaded by Mr Newman QC for the appellants that they should be rejected. I reach this conclusion for four reasons, taken together.

[32] First, it is a salutary principle that conviction of serious crime should depend on proof not simply that the defendant caused (by act or omission) an injurious result to another but that his state of mind when so acting was culpable. This, after all, is the meaning of the familiar rule actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea. The most obviously culpable state of mind is no doubt an intention to cause the injurious result, but knowing disregard of an appreciated and unacceptable risk of causing an injurious result or a deliberate closing of the mind to such risk would be readily accepted as culpable also. It is clearly blameworthy to take an obvious and significant risk of causing injury to another. But it is not clearly blameworthy to do something involving a risk of injury to another if (for reasons other than self-induced intoxication (see DPP v Majewski [1976] 2 All ER 142, [1977] AC 443)) one genuinely does not perceive the risk. Such a person may fairly be accused of stupidity or lack of imagination, but neither of those failings should expose him to conviction of serious crime or the risk of punishment.

[33] Secondly, the present case shows, more clearly than any other reported case since R v Caldwell [1981] 1 All ER 961, [1982] AC 341, that the model direction formulated by Lord Diplock (see [18], above) is capable of leading to obvious unfairness. As the excerpts quoted at [6]–[7], above, reveal, the trial judge regretted the direction he (quite rightly) felt compelled to give, and it is evident that this direction offended the jury's sense of fairness. The sense of fairness of 12 representative citizens sitting as a jury (or of a smaller group of lay justices sitting as a bench of magistrates) is the bedrock on which the administration of criminal justice in this country is built. A law which runs counter to that sense must cause concern. Here, the appellants could have been charged under s 1(1) of the 1971 Act with recklessly damaging one or both of the wheelie-bins, and they would have had little defence. As it was, the jury might have inferred that boys of the appellants' age would have appreciated the risk to the building of what they did, but it seems clear that such was not their conclusion (nor, it would appear, the judge's either). On that basis the jury thought it unfair to convict them. I share their sense of unease. It is neither moral nor just to convict a defendant (least of all a child) on the strength of what someone else would have apprehended if the defendant himself had no such apprehension. Nor, the defendant having been convicted, is the problem cured by imposition of a nominal penalty.

[34] Thirdly, I do not think the criticism of R v Caldwell expressed by academics, judges and practitioners should be ignored. A decision is not, of course, to be overruled or departed from simply because it meets with disfavour in the learned journals. But a decision which attracts reasoned and outspoken criticism by the leading scholars of the day, respected as authorities in the field, must command attention. One need only cite (among many other examples) the observations of Professor John Smith [1981] Crim LR 392 at 393–396 and Professor Glanville Williams 'Recklessness Redefined' (1981) 40 CLJ 252. This criticism carries greater weight when voiced also by judges as authoritative as Lord Edmund-Davies and Lord Wilberforce in R v Caldwell itself, Robert Goff LJ in Elliott v C (a minor) [1983] 2 All ER 1005, [1983] 1 WLR 939 and Ackner LJ in R v Stephen Malcolm R (1984) 79 Cr App R 334. The reservations expressed by the trial judge in the present case are widely shared. The shop floor response to R v Caldwell may be gauged from the editors' commentary, to be found in Archbold's Pleading, Evidence and Practice in Criminal Cases (41st edn, 1982) pp 1009–1010 (para 17-25). The editors suggested that remedial legislation was urgently required.

[35] Fourthly, the majority's interpretation of 'reckless' in s 1 of the 1971 Act was, as already shown, a misinterpretation. If it were a misinterpretation that offended no principle and gave rise to no injustice there would be strong grounds for adhering to the misinterpretation and leaving Parliament to correct it if it chose. But this misinterpretation is offensive to principle and is apt to cause injustice. That being so, the need to correct the misinterpretation is compelling.

[36] It is perhaps unfortunate that the question at issue in this appeal fell to be answered in a case of self-induced intoxication. For one instinctively recoils from the notion that a defendant can escape the criminal consequences of his injurious conduct by drinking himself into a state where he is blind to the risk he is causing to others. In R v Caldwell it seems to have been assumed (see [18], above) that the risk would have been obvious to the defendant had he been sober. Further, the context did not require the House to give close consideration to the liability of those (such as the very young and the mentally handicapped) who were not normal, reasonable adults. The overruling by the majority of R v Stephenson [1979] 2 All ER 1198, [1979] QB 695 does however make it questionable whether such consideration would have led to a different result.

[37] In the course of argument before the House it was suggested that the rule in R v Caldwell might be modified, in cases involving children, by requiring comparison not with normal, reasonable adults but with normal, reasonable children of the same age. This is a suggestion with some attractions but it is open to four compelling objections. First, even this modification would offend the principle that conviction should depend on proving the state of mind of the individual defendant to be culpable. Second, if the rule were modified in relation to children on grounds of their immaturity it would be anomalous if it were not also modified in relation to the mentally handicapped on grounds of their limited understanding. Third, any modification along these lines would open the door to difficult and contentious argument concerning the qualities and characteristics to be taken into account for purposes of the comparison. Fourth, to adopt this modification would be to substitute one misinterpretation of s 1 for another. There is no warrant in the Act or in the travaux préparatoires which preceded it for such an interpretation.

[38] A further refinement, advanced by Professor Glanville Williams (1981) 40 CLJ 252 at 270–271, adopted by the justices in Elliott's case and commented upon by Robert Goff LJ in that case is that a defendant should only be regarded as having acted recklessly by virtue of his failure to give any thought to an obvious risk that property would be destroyed or damaged, where such risk would have been obvious to him if he had given any thought to the matter. This refinement also has attractions, although it does not meet the objection of principle and does not represent a correct interpretation of the section. It is, in my opinion, open to the further objection of over-complicating the task of the jury (or bench of justices). It is one thing to decide whether a defendant can be believed when he says that the thought of a given risk never crossed his mind. It is another, and much more speculative, task to decide whether the risk would have been obvious to him if the thought had crossed his mind. The simpler the jury's task, the more likely is its verdict to be reliable. Robert Goff LJ's reason for rejecting this refinement ([1983] 2 All ER 1005 at 1011–1012, [1983] 1 WLR 939 at 950) was somewhat similar.

[39] I cannot accept that restoration of the law as understood before R v Caldwell would lead to the acquittal of those whom public policy would require to be convicted. There is nothing to suggest that this was seen as a problem before R v Caldwell, or (as noted at [12]–[13], above) before the 1971 Act. There is no reason to doubt the common sense which tribunals of fact bring to their task. In a contested case based on intention, the defendant rarely admits intending the injurious result in question, but the tribunal of fact will readily infer such an intention, in a proper case, from all the circumstances and probabilities and evidence of what the defendant did and said at the time. Similarly with recklessness: it is not to be supposed that the tribunal of fact will accept a defendant's assertion that he never thought of a certain risk when all the circumstances and probabilities and evidence of what he did and said at the time show that he did or must have done.

[40] In his printed case, Mr Newman advanced the contention that the law as declared in R v Caldwell was incompatible with art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). While making no concession, he forbore to address legal argument on the point. I need say no more about it.

[41] For the reasons I have given I would allow this appeal and quash the appellants' convictions. I would answer the certified question obliquely, basing myself on cl 18(c) of the Criminal Code Bill annexed by the Law Commission to its report A Criminal Code for England and Wales (1989) (Law Com no 177) vol 1, Report and Draft Criminal Code Bill):

> '[A] person acts ... "recklessly" [within the meaning of s 1 of the 1971 Act] with respect to—(i) a circumstance when he is aware of a risk that it exists or will exist; (ii) a result when he is aware of a risk that it will occur; and it is, in the circumstances known to him, unreasonable to take the risk ...'

LORD BROWNE-WILKINSON.

[42] My Lords, I agree with the reasons given by Lord Bingham of Cornhill. I would allow the appeal and answer the certified question as he proposes.

LORD STEYN.

[43] My Lords, this appeal raises an important question on the interpretation of s 1(1) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971. It provides:

> 'A person who without lawful excuse destroys or damages any property belonging to another intending to destroy or damage any such property or being reckless as to whether any such property would be destroyed or damaged shall be guilty of an offence.'

The focus of the appeal is on the meaning of the words 'being reckless as to whether any such property would be destroyed or damaged'. In broad terms, the issue is whether 'reckless' in s 1(1) of the 1971 Act covers only advertent wrongdoing or is wide enough to include inadvertent wrongdoing. In R v Caldwell [1981] 1 All ER 961, [1982] AC 341 the House by a three to two majority held that the wider interpretation is the correct one. The House followed R v Caldwell in later decisions. The House is now asked to re-examine the question, to depart from R v Caldwell, and to rule that the narrower interpretation of s 1(1) is the correct one.

DEPARTING FROM A HOUSE OF LORDS DECISION

[44] The target of the appellants is an ambitious one. The relevant words in s 1(1), taken by themselves, are capable of bearing either the narrower or wider meaning. In these circumstances it could be said that there was in R v Caldwell a choice to be made, and that choice was made by the requisite majority in favour of the wide view. The conclusion of the House in R v Caldwell produced a clear rule expressed by Lord Diplock as follows ([1981] 1 All ER 961 at 967, [1982] AC 341 at 354):

> '... a person charged with an offence under s 1(1) of the 1971 Act is "reckless as to whether or not any property would be destroyed or damaged" if (1) he does an act which in fact creates an obvious risk that property will be destroyed or damaged and (2) when he does the act he either has not given any thought to the possibility of there being any such risk or has recognised that there was some risk involved and has none the less gone on to do it. That would be a proper direction to the jury; cases in the Court of Appeal which held otherwise should be regarded as overruled.'

Lord Diplock also stated (and has always been so understood) ([1981] 1 All ER 961 at 966, [1982] AC 341 at 354) that the criterion is the mind of the ordinary, prudent adult individual. In accordance with R v Caldwell no allowance is to be made by a jury for the youth or lack of mental capacity of the defendant. The clarity of the decision is a factor weighing against departing from it. Moreover, a fair reading of the judgment of Lord Diplock reveals that the House was probably influenced by the consideration that the opposite view could leave beyond the reach of the criminal law wrongdoers who should be punished. If this perception was correct it would be a strong thing to depart from such a view. In combination these factors militate in favour of following R v Caldwell. A departure from R v Caldwell could only be justified if compelling legal considerations demand it.

CONCLUSIONS IN OUTLINE

[45] In my view the very high threshold for departing from a previous decision of the House has been satisfied in this particular case. In summary I would reduce my reasons to three propositions. First, in R v Caldwell the majority should have accepted without equivocation that before the passing of the 1971 Act foresight of consequences was an essential element in recklessness in the context of damage to property under s 51 of the Malicious Damage Act 1861. Secondly, the matrix of the immediately preceding Law Commission recommendations shows convincingly that the purpose of s 1 of the 1971 Act was to replace the out of date language of 'maliciously' causing damage by more modern language while not changing the substance of the mental element in any way. Foresight of consequences was to remain an ingredient of recklessness in regard to damage to property. Thirdly, experience has shown that by bringing within the reach of s 1(1) cases of inadvertent recklessness the decision in R v Caldwell became a source of serious potential injustice which cannot possibly be justified on policy grounds. These three propositions require some explanation.

THE PRE-EXISTING LAW

[46] In enacting s 1 of the 1971 Act Parliament must be presumed to have been aware of the relevant pre-existing law. The best evidence of the state of the law was the reserved judgment of the Court of Criminal Appeal in R v Cunningham [1957] 2 All ER 412, [1957] 2 QB 396. Giving the judgment of the Court of Appeal Byrne J said ([1957] 2 All ER 412 at 414, [1957] 2 QB 396 at 399–400):

> 'We have considered those cases, and we have also considered, in the light of those cases, the following principle which was propounded by the late Professor C. S. KENNY in the first edition of his OUTLINES OF CRIMINAL LAW published in 1902, and repeated in the sixteenth edition, edited by Mr. J. W. CECIL TURNER and published in 1952 (ibid., at p. 186): "... in any statutory definition of a crime, 'malice' must be taken not in the old vague sense of 'wickedness' in general, but as requiring either (i) an actual intention to do the particular kind [emphasis in original] of harm that in fact was done, or (ii) recklessness as to whether such harm should occur or not (i.e. the accused has foreseen that the particular kind of harm might be done, and yet has gone on to take the risk of it). [My emphasis.] It is neither limited to, nor does it indeed require, any ill-will towards, the person injured." The same principle is repeated by Mr. TURNER in his tenth edition of RUSSELL ON CRIME [vol 2, p 1592].'

This was a clear statement that under s 51 of the 1861 Act foresight of the consequences of an act was necessary. It would without doubt have been the basis on which the parliamentary draftsman would have prepared the provision in the Bill which became s 1 of the 1971 Act. In substance the reference to Professor Kenny's views was correct. His explanation had then been the traditional view for at least 70 years. The pedigree and consistency of this interpretation would also have been known at the time of the drafting and enactment of the 1971 Act. As Lord Edmund-Davies pointed out in his powerful dissenting judgment in R v Caldwell (assented to by Lord Wilberforce) Lord Diplock was unnecessarily dismissive of the views of the distinguished author who contributed so much to the rational explanation of the criminal law. But the real basis of Lord Diplock's judgment in R v Caldwell [1981] 1 All ER 961 at 965, [1982] AC 341 at 351 was that the meaning of 'maliciously' under s 51 of the 1861 Act 'has no bearing on the meaning of the adjective "reckless" in s 1 of the Criminal Damage Act 1971'. This is the foundation of the view of the majority. It must now be examined in the light of the internal and external aids to the interpretation of s 1 of the 1971 Act.

THE PURPOSE OF SECTION 1 OF THE 1971 ACT

[47] Lord Diplock's formulation leaves no room, in the great majority of cases, for any inquiry into the defendant's state of mind. In a withering contemporary criticism Professor John Smith explained with precision what Lord Diplock's meaning of recklessness involved ([1981] Crim LR 393 at 394):

> '... it amounts to no more than this: "If there was an obvious risk of damage to property, the defendant is guilty: it makes no difference whether he realised there was a risk or not." It does not require the jury to inquire into the defendant's state of mind at all and is apparently inconsistent with his Lordship's view that "mens rea is a state of mind of the accused himself." Whether there is an "obvious" risk can be answered only by considering whether any ordinary, prudent person would have realised there was a risk; and, if he would, it makes no difference what the defendant thought, because he is guilty whether he realised there was a risk or not. Only very exceptionally will there be any room for any inquiry into the actual state of mind of the defendant. If he considered the question whether there was a risk and decided wrongly, that there was not, then he would not be reckless within the new definition. Such cases are likely to be extremely rare. In the absence of any evidence by the defendant that he had performed this mental operation, it seems the judge need not direct the jury about it.'

Unquestionably, R v Caldwell was a radical departure from the law as previously understood.

[48] The question is: on what grounds did the majority infer that it represented the meaning which Parliament intended? Lord Diplock ([1981] 1 All ER 961 at 964, [1982] AC 341 at 351) pointed out that, in accordance with the long title, the purpose of the 1971 Act was 'to revise the law' (he italicised the word 'revise'). Lord Diplock said ([1981] 1 All ER 961 at 965, [1982] AC 341 at 352) that he could 'see no reason why Parliament when it decided to revise the law ... should go out of its way to perpetuate fine and impracticable distinctions ...' This reasoning attributes to Parliament a remedial intent, viz to change the mental element of the offence by including cases of inadvertent wrongdoing.

[49] What are the grounds for this assumption? It is true that the 1971 Act revised the law in a number of respects. This is, however, a neutral fact. Apart from replacing the word 'maliciously' by more modern language there is no indication in s 1, and in the rest of the 1971 Act, that Parliament intended to embark on a revision of the mental element of the offence. No reliance was placed in R v Caldwell on any external aids supporting the interpretation. There are none. In its own terms the majority reasoning in R v Caldwell rests on fragile foundations.

[50] The decisive factor is, however, that there was overwhelming evidence that Parliament did not intend to alter the existing meaning of recklessness in regard to damage to property. That follows from the fact that, as far as the mental element is concerned, Parliament was implementing the Law Commission reports. In plain terms the recommendation of the Law Commission was that subject to replacing 'maliciously' by more contemporary language the mental element of the offence should remain the same. This material was published and was therefore available to the House in R v Caldwell: Lord Edmund-Davies explained in outline the effect of it. In his already cited note Professor John Smith described in detail the Law Commission materials which show convincingly there was no intention to change the mental element of the offence. It is unnecessary for me to marshal these materials again. The evidence is all one way.

[51] The conclusion is inescapable: R v Caldwell adopted an interpretation of s 1 of the 1971 Act which was beyond the range of feasible meanings.

JUSTICE AND POLICY

[52] In the case before the House the two boys were 11 and 12 respectively. Their escapade of camping overnight without their parents' permission was something that many children have undertaken. But by throwing lit newspapers under a plastic wheelie-bin they caused £1m of damage to a shop. It is, however, an agreed fact on this appeal that the boys thought there was no risk of the fire spreading in the way it eventually did. What happened at trial is highly significant. The jury were perplexed by the Caldwell directions which compelled them to treat the boys as adults and to convict them. The judge plainly thought this approach was contrary to common sense but loyally applied the law as laid down in R v Caldwell. The view of the jurors and the judge would be widely shared by reasonable people who pause to consider the matter. The only answer of the Crown is that where unjust convictions occur the judge can impose a lenient sentence. This will not do in a modern criminal justice system. Parliament certainly did not authorise such a cynical strategy.

[53] Ignoring the special position of children in the criminal justice system is not acceptable in a modern civil society. In 1990 the United Kingdom ratified the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (New York, 20 November 1989; TS 44 (1992); Cm 1976) (the UN convention) which entered into force on 15 January 1992. Article 40(1) provides:

> 'States Parties recognize the right of every child alleged as, accused of, or recognized as having infringed the penal law to be treated in a manner consistent with the promotion of the child's sense of dignity and worth, which reinforces the child's respect for the human rights and fundamental freedoms of others and which takes into account the child's age and the desirability of promoting the child's reintegration and the child's assuming a constructive role in society.' (My emphasis.)

This provision imposes both procedural and substantive obligations on state parties to protect the special position of children in the criminal justice system.

For example, it would plainly be contrary to art 40(1) for a state to set the age of criminal responsibility of children at, say, five years. Similarly, it is contrary to art 40(1) to ignore in a crime punishable by life imprisonment, or detention during Her Majesty's pleasure, the age of a child in judging whether the mental element has been satisfied. It is true that the UN convention became binding on the United Kingdom after R v Caldwell was decided. But the House cannot ignore the norm created by the UN convention. This factor on its own justified a reappraisal of R v Caldwell.

[54] If it is wrong to ignore the special characteristics of children in the context of recklessness under s 1 of the 1971 Act, an adult who suffers from a lack of mental capacity or a relevant personality disorder may be entitled to the same standard of justice. Recognising the special characteristics of children and mentally disabled people goes some way towards reducing the scope of s 1 of the 1971 Act for producing unjust results which are inherent in the objective mould into which the Caldwell analysis forced recklessness. It does not, however, restore the correct interpretation of s 1 of the 1971 Act. The accepted meaning of recklessness involved foresight of consequences. This subjective state of mind is to be inferred 'by reference to all the evidence, drawing such inferences from the evidence as appear proper in the circumstances' (per Lord Edmund-Davies [1981] 1 All ER 961 at 970, [1982] AC 341 at 358, citing s 8 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967). That is what Parliament intended by implementing the Law Commission proposals.

[55] This interpretation of s 1 of the 1971 Act would fit in with the general tendency in modern times of our criminal law. The shift is towards adopting a subjective approach. It is generally necessary to look at the matter in the light of how it would have appeared to the defendant. Like Lord Edmund-Davies I regard s 8 of the 1967 Act, as of central importance. There is, however, also a congruence of analysis appearing from decisions of the House. In Director of Public Prosecutions v Morgan [1975] 2 All ER 347, [1976] AC 182 the House ruled that a defence of mistake must be honestly rather than reasonably held. In Beckford v R [1987] 3 All ER 425 at 432, [1988] AC 130 at 145 per Lord Griffiths, the House held that self-defence permits a defendant to use such force as is reasonable in the circumstances as he honestly believed them to be. B (a minor) v Director of Public Prosecutions [2000] 1 All ER 833, [2000] 2 AC 428 concerned the offence contrary to s 1(1) of the Children Act 1961 (inciting a girl under 14 to commit an act of gross indecency). The House held that the accused's honest belief that a girl was over 14 need not be based on reasonable grounds. Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead observed ([2000] 1 All ER 833 at 837, [2000] 2 AC 428 at 462):

> 'Considered as a matter of principle, the honest belief approach must be preferable. By definition the mental element in a crime is concerned with a subjective state of mind, such as intent or belief.'

To same effect is R v K [2001] UKHL 41, [2001] 3 All ER 897, [2002] 1 AC 462 where it was held that while a girl under the age of 16 cannot in law consent to an indecent assault, it is a defence if the defendant honestly believed she was over 16. It is true that the general picture is not entirely harmonious. Duress requires reasonable belief (see Lord Lane CJ in R v Graham [1982] 1 All ER 801 at 806, [1982] 1 WLR 294 at 300, approved by the House of Lords in R v Howe [1987] 1 All ER 771, [1987] AC 417; R v Martin [1989] 1 All ER 652). Duress is a notoriously difficult corner of the law. However, in R v Graham [1982] 1 All ER 801 at 806, [1982] 1 WLR 294 at 300 Lord Lane CJ stated that in judging the accused's response the test is:

> '... have the prosecution made the jury sure that a sober person of reasonable firmness, sharing the characteristics of the defendant, would not have responded to whatever he reasonably believed [the threatener] said or did by taking part in the [offence].' (My emphasis.)

The age and sex of the defendant (but possibly no other characteristics) are relevant to the cogency of the threat (see R v Bowen [1996] 4 All ER 837, [1997] 1 WLR 372). In regard to provocation a wider view of the impact on defendant has prevailed (see R v Smith [2000] 4 All ER 289, [2001] 1 AC 146 (by a three to two majority)).

[56] These developments show that what Lord Diplock described in R v Caldwell [1981] 1 All ER 961 at 966, [1982] AC 341 at 353 as an 'esoteric meaning' of recklessness was also consistent with the general trend of the criminal law.

CONCLUSION ON CALDWELL

[57] The surest test of a new legal rule is not whether it satisfies a team of logicians but how it performs in the real world. With the benefit of hindsight the verdict must be that the rule laid down by the majority in R v Caldwell failed this test. It was severely criticised by academic lawyers of distinction. It did not command respect among practitioners and judges. Jurors found it difficult to understand: it also sometimes offended their sense of justice. Experience suggests that in R v Caldwell the law took a wrong turn.

[58] That brings me to the question whether the subjective interpretation of recklessness might allow wrongdoers who ought to be convicted of serious crime to escape conviction. Experience before R v Caldwell did not warrant such a conclusion. In any event, as Lord Edmund-Davies explained ([1981] 1 All ER 961 at 970, [1982] AC 341 at 358), if a defendant closes his mind to a risk he must realise that there is a risk and, on the evidence, that will usually be decisive. One can trust the realism of trial judges, who direct juries, to guide juries to sensible verdicts and juries can in turn be relied on to apply robust common sense to the evaluation of ridiculous defences. Moreover, the endorsement by Parliament of the Law Commission proposals could not seriously have been regarded as a charter for the acquittal of wrongdoers.

[59] In my view the case for departing from R v Caldwell has been shown to be irresistible.

[60] I agree with the reasons given by Lord Bingham of Cornhill. I have nothing to add to his observations on self-induced intoxication.

DISPOSAL

[61] I would also make the orders proposed by Lord Bingham of Cornhill.

LORD HUTTON.

[62] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches of my noble and learned friends Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Steyn. I agree with them, and for the reasons which they give I too would allow this appeal.

LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY.

[63] My Lords, I have had the privilege of reading the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill in draft. As I explain below, I was initially doubtful whether it would be proper for your Lordships' House to overrule R v Caldwell [1981] 1 All ER 961, [1982] AC 341, especially when it had previously declined an express invitation to do so. In a very different context Scalia J formulated some of the kinds of issues I had in mind in part 1 of his characteristically forthright dissenting opinion in Lawrence v Texas 123 S Ct 2472 (2003). But I have reached the clear view that, whatever the intrinsic merits or demerits of the concept of recklessness which Lord Diplock espoused, Parliament did not intend the word 'reckless' in s 1 of the Criminal Damage Act 1971 to bear the meaning he gave it. Moreover, his speech has proved notoriously difficult to interpret and those difficulties would not have ended with any refinements which your Lordships might have made to the decision. Indeed those refinements themselves would almost inevitably have prompted further questions and appeals. In these circumstances the preferable course is to overrule R v Caldwell.

[64] There is nothing on the face of the 1971 Act—and Lord Diplock certainly points to nothing—to indicate that in enacting this particular statute Parliament intended to innovate upon the concept of recklessness as it had been understood to apply in English law immediately prior to 1971. So the natural assumption is that Parliament was using the term in its contemporary legal sense. Section 1(1) and (2) correspond precisely to provisions in the draft Bill attached to the Law Commission Report on Offences of Damage to Property (1970) (Law Com no 29). Nothing in that report suggests that the Commission had intended their draft Bill to incorporate a new notion of recklessness. Indeed, as Lord Bingham of Cornhill has shown, the indications are the other way. Although in R v Caldwell Lord Edmund-Davies referred to the Law Commission report, Lord Diplock did not—perhaps because it was not cited or else on the view that, at most, it would show the meaning that the Law Commission had attached to recklessness and it was up to the judges and no one else to decide what the words in the statute meant. I refer to his well-known speech in Black-Clawson International Ltd v Papierwerke Waldhof-Aschaffenburg AG [1975] 1 All ER 810, [1975] AC 591, especially at 834–835 and 636–637 respectively. None the less in this case the Law Commission report (Law Com no 29) at least indicates the scope of the legislative changes in contemplation and, in that way, tends to confirm the interpretation that I would be disposed to adopt in any event.

[65] It is no secret that, for a long time, many of the leading academic writers on English criminal law have been 'subjectivists'. By that I mean, at the risk of gross over-simplification, that they have believed that the criminal law should punish people only for those consequences of their acts which they foresaw at the relevant time. Those who subscribe to that philosophy will tend to approve the concept of recklessness in R v Cunningham [1957] 2 All ER 412, [1957] 2 QB 396. The late Professor Glanville Williams and the late Professor John Smith, who were members of the influential Criminal Law Revision Committee, were two of the most distinguished proponents of such views.

[66] Professor Glanville Williams (as well as Edmund-Davies LJ) was also a member of the working party set up by the Law Commission to examine the general principles of the criminal law. In June 1970 they produced Codification of the Criminal Law: General Principles: The Mental Element in Crime (Working Paper No 31). And, not surprisingly, on the matter of recklessness it espoused (pp 48–51) the subjectivist standpoint. Three of the five Law Commissioners also sat on the working party. A month after publishing that working paper, the Law Commission published their report on property offences (Law Com no 29). In these circumstances it would have been surprising, to say the least, if they had intended their draft Bill to do other than incorporate the concept of recklessness that had been developed in R v Cunningham and subsequent cases. Sitting in R v Caldwell Lord Edmund-Davies was well placed to appreciate all these factors.

[67] The same view is reflected, of course, in the definition of recklessness in cl 18(c) of the draft code of criminal law published by the Law Commission in 1989 (A Criminal Code for England and Wales (Law Com no 177) vol 1, Report and Draft Criminal Code Bill)). Again this is scarcely surprising since much of the work was done by a team of academic lawyers that included Professor John Smith. It goes without saying that there are powerful arguments in favour of the view which the Law Commission favoured.

[68] On the other hand it is equally clear that other views are not only possible but have actually been adopted by English judges at different times over the centuries. Their judgments reveal many strands of thinking (see J Horder 'Two Histories and Four Hidden Principles of Mens Rea' (1997) 113 LQR 95). There is therefore no reason to treat the concept of recklessness expounded in R v Cunningham either as being the quintessence of the historic English criminal law on the point or as necessarily providing the best solution in all circumstances. Indeed in R v Stephenson [1979] 2 All ER 1198, [1979] QB 695, a case on s 1(1) of the 1971 Act, Geoffrey Lane LJ recognised that the subjective approach was problematical in certain situations. Having made it quite clear that in his view the test of recklessness under the 1971 Act remained subjective and that the knowledge or appreciation of risk of some damage must have entered the defendant's mind, he commented ([1979] 2 All ER 1198 at 1204, [1979] QB 695 at 704):

> 'There is no doubt that the subjective definition of "recklessness" does produce difficulties. One of them which is particularly likely to occur in practice is the case of the person who by self-induced intoxication by drink or drugs deprives himself of the ability to foresee the risks involved in his actions. Assuming that by reason of his intoxication he is not proved to have foreseen the relevant risk, can he be said to have been "reckless"? Plainly not, unless cases of self-induced intoxication are an exception to the general rule. In our judgment the decision of the House of Lords in Director of Public Prosecutions v Majewski ([1976] 2 All ER 142, [1977] AC 443) makes it clear that they are such an exception.'

In R v Caldwell just the kind of problem envisaged by Geoffrey Lane LJ arose: the defendant said that he was so drunk that it did not occur to him that there might be people in the hotel whose lives might be endangered if he set fire to it. Part of what Lord Diplock did to confront the kind of difficulty identified by Geoffrey Lane LJ was to adopt a wider definition of recklessness that covered culpable inadvertence. In so doing, as the House now holds, he misconstrued the terms of the 1971 Act.

[69] It does not follow, however, that Lord Diplock's broader concept of recklessness was undesirable in terms of legal policy. On the contrary, there is much to be said for the view that, if the law is to operate with the concept of recklessness, then it may properly treat as reckless the man who acts without even troubling to give his mind to a risk that would have been obvious to him if he had thought about it. This approach may be better suited to some offences than to others. For example, in the context of reckless driving the House endorsed and re-endorsed a more stringent version (see R v Lawrence [1981] 1

All ER 974, [1982] AC 510; R v Reid [1992] 3 All ER 673, [1992] 1 WLR 793). I refer in particular to the discussion of the policy issues by Lord Goff of Chieveley in R v Reid [1992] 3 All ER 673 at 686–689, [1992] 1 WLR 793 at 808–812. Moreover, the opposing view, that only advertent risk-taking should ever be included within the concept of recklessness in criminal law, seems to be based, at least in part, on the kind of thinking that the late Professor Hart demolished in his classic essay, 'Negligence, Mens Rea and Criminal Responsibility' (1961), reprinted in HLA Hart Punishment and Responsibility (1968) pp 136–157.

[70] Because the decision in R v Caldwell involved this legitimate choice between two legal policies, I was initially doubtful whether it would be appropriate for the House to overrule it. An alternative way to allow the appeal by reanalysing Lord Diplock's speech and overruling Elliott v C (a minor) [1983] 2 All ER 1005, [1983] 1 WLR 939 might well have been found. But, for the reasons that I have already indicated, I have come to share your Lordships' view that we should indeed overrule R v Caldwell and set the law back on the track that Parliament originally intended it to follow. If Parliament now thinks it preferable for the 1971 Act to cover culpably inadvertent as well as advertent wrongdoers, it can so enact. The Law Commission recognised that, if codifying the law, Parliament might wish to adopt that approach (see A Criminal Code for England and Wales (1989) (Law Com no 177) vol 2, Commentary on Draft Criminal Code Bill, p 366 (para 8.21), pp 446–447 (para 17.6)).

[71] Subject to these comments, I respectfully agree with the speech of Lord Bingham of Cornhill and would allow the appeal and answer the certified question as he proposes.

Appeal allowed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

D v East Berkshire Community Health NHS Trust

K and another v Dewsbury Healthcare NHS Trust and another

K and another v Oldham NHS Trust and another

[2003] EWCA Civ 1151

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

LORD PHILLIPS OF WORTH MATRAVERS MR, HALE AND LATHAM LJJ

19–21 MAY, 31 JULY 2003

Practice – Preliminary point of law – Trial of preliminary issue determining no duty of care arising in performance by local authority of its statutory duties to children – Whether exclusion of existence of duty of care as preliminary issue constituting breach of right to fair trial – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 6.

Negligence – Duty to take care – Existence of duty – Children – Local authority – Accusations of child abuse made against parents – Accusations later proving unfounded – Whether duty of care owed to parents and children.

Each of three appeals before the court involved accusations of abusing a child made against a parent by the professionals concerned for the welfare of that child. All the accusations proved to be unfounded. In each case a parent claimed damages from an NHS trust for psychiatric harm alleged to have been caused by the false accusations or their consequences and in the second case, where the local authority was also a defendant, the child also claimed. The events all took place before the Human Rights Act 1998 came into force. In each case the primary case was advanced in negligence, and preliminary issues were tried, including whether any duty of care was owed to the claimant or claimants. It was common ground that the test to be applied was whether it was 'fair, just and reasonable' to impose such a duty. In each case the court of first instance held that no duty was owed to the parents, applying the principles contained in a decision of the House of Lords in 1995 that a common law duty of care could not be imposed upon a statutory duty as the observance of the common law duty of care would be inconsistent with, or have a tendency to discourage, the due performance by a local authority of its statutory duties. In the second case the child was held to have an arguable claim for clinical negligence against the NHS trust but not against the local authority, whose personnel were held to be entitled to the protection of witness immunity. The claimants appealed to the Court of Appeal, and the issues on the appeal were (i) whether the decisions in the trials of preliminary issues violated their rights to a fair trial under art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act), since to exclude any duty of care on the part of those involved in making decisions for the protection of children against suspected child abuse was to grant them immunity against liability in negligence, thus denying the claimants the right to have their claims determined on the facts of the individual cases; (ii) whether subsequent decisions had varied the principles laid down in the 1995 authority relied upon; and (iii) whether the introduction of the 1998 Act had affected the common law principles of the law of negligence. The Convention rights considered included art 3[a], prohibiting torture and inhuman or degrading treatment, and art 8[b], providing the right to respect for private and family life.

Held – (1) No violation of art 6 of the convention was involved in the procedure of determining, by way of preliminary issues, whether the test of what was 'fair, just and reasonable', applied with the required respect for case precedent, precluded the existence of a duty of care (see [22], below); Osman v UK (1998) 5 BHRC 293, Z v UK [2001] 2 FCR 246 considered.

(2) The effect of the authority relied on in the judgments at first instance in each of the instant appeals was now restricted to the proposition that decisions by local authorities whether or not to take a child into care were not reviewable by way of a claim in negligence (see [49], below); X and ors (minors) v Bedfordshire CC, M (a minor) v Newham London BC, E (a minor) v Dorset CC [1995] 3 All ER 353 disapproved in part; Barrett v Enfield London BC [1999] 3 All ER 193, S v Gloucestershire CC, L v Tower Hamlets London BC [2000] 3 All ER 346 and Phelps v Hillingdon London BC, Anderton v Clwyd CC, Jarvis v Hampshire CC, Re G (a minor) [2000] 4 All ER 504 considered.

(3) The effect of the 1998 Act was that it was no longer legitimate to rule that, as a matter of law, no common duty of care was owed to a child in relation to the investigation of child abuse and the initiation and pursuit of care proceedings. Given the obligation of a local authority to respect a child's convention rights, the recognition of a duty of care to the child on the part of those involved should not have a significantly adverse effect on the manner in which they performed their duties. In the context of suspected child abuse, breach of a duty of care in negligence would frequently also amount to a violation of arts 3 or 8 of the convention although those asserting that wrongful acts or omissions occurred before the 1998 Act came into force would have no claim under that Act. It was possible that there would be factual situations where it was not fair, just or reasonable to impose a duty of care, but each case would fall to be determined on its individual facts. The common law duty of care did not replicate the duty not to violate arts 3 and 8. Liability for breach of that duty and entitlement to compensation could arise in circumstances where the tort of negligence was not made out. However, there were cogent reasons of public policy for concluding that, where consideration was being given to whether the suspicion of child abuse justified taking proceedings to remove a child from the parents, while a duty of care could be owed to the child, no common law duty of care was owed to the parents (see [83]–[87], below).

(4) In the instant appeals a concurrent duty imposed in respect of the parent would conflict with the duties owed to the child. However, in the second appeal, the judge had erred in finding that witness immunity precluded any liability on the part of those employed by the local authority. Accordingly the first and third a Article 3 provides: 'No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.'

---

b Article 8, so far as material, provides: 'Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and correspondence …'

appeals would be dismissed and the second appeal would be allowed in part (see [96], [99], [104], [109], [110], [116], [117], [124], [127], below); X and ors (minors) v Bedfordshire CC, M (a minor) v Newham London BC, E (a minor) v Dorset CC [1995] 3 All ER 353 applied; Darker (suing as personal representative of Docker, decd) v Chief Constable of the West Midlands Police [2000] 4 All ER 193 considered.

Notes

For the right to a fair trial, and for the test for determining a notional duty of care, see 8(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 134, and 33 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 604, respectively.

For the Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 6, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 554.

Cases referred to in judgments

A-G v Prince [1998] 1 NZLR 262, NZ CA.
Ashingdane v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 528, [1985] ECHR 8225/78, ECt HR.
B v A-G of New Zealand [2003] UKPC 61, [2003] 4 All ER 833.
Barrett v Enfield London BC [1999] 3 All ER 193, [2001] 2 AC 550, [1999] 3 WLR 79, HL; rvsg [1997] 3 All ER 171, [1998] QB 367, [1997] 3 WLR 628, CA.
Bronda v Italy (2001) 33 EHRR 4, [1998] ECHR 22430/93, ECt HR.
Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568, [1990] 2 AC 605, [1990] 2 WLR 358, HL.
Darker (suing as personal representative of Docker, decd) v Chief Constable of the West Midlands Police [2000] 4 All ER 193, [2001] 1 AC 435, [2000] 3 WLR 747, HL.
E v UK [2002] 3 FCR 700, ECt HR.
Elsholz v Germany [2000] 3 FCR 385, ECt HR.
Fayed v UK (1994) 18 EHRR 393, [1994] ECHR 17101/90, ECt HR.
Fogarty v UK (2001) 12 BHRC 132, ECt HR.
Hill v Chief Constable of West Yorkshire [1988] 2 All ER 238, [1989] AC 53, [1988] 2 WLR 1049, HL.
Hokkanen v Finland [1995] 2 FCR 320, ECt HR.
Johansen v Norway (1996) 23 EHRR 33, [1996] ECHR 17383/90, ECt HR.
Kent v Griffiths [2000] 2 All ER 474, [2001] QB 36, [2000] 2 WLR 1158, CA.
Klass v Germany (1978) 2 EHRR 214, [1978] ECHR 5029/71, ECt HR.
McMichael v UK [1995] 2 FCR 718, ECt HR.
Matthews v Ministry of Defence [2003] UKHL 4, [2003] 1 All ER 689, [2003] 1 AC 1163, [2003] 2 WLR 435.
Osman v UK (1998) 5 BHRC 293, ECt HR.
P, C and S v UK [2002] 3 FCR 1, ECt HR.
Phelps v Hillingdon London BC, Anderton v Clwyd CC, Jarvis v Hampshire CC, Re G (a minor) [2000] 4 All ER 504, [2001] 2 AC 619, [2000] 3 WLR 776, HL.
Powell v Boladz (1997) 39 BMLR 35, CA.
S v Gloucestershire CC, L v Tower Hamlets London BC [2000] 3 All ER 346, [2001] Fam 313, [2001] 2 WLR 909, CA.
TP v UK [2001] 2 FCR 289, ECt HR.
Venema v Netherlands [2003] 1 FCR 153, ECt HR.
W v UK (1988) 10 EHRR 29, [1987] ECHR 9749/82, ECt HR.
X and ors (minors) v Bedfordshire CC, M (a minor) v Newham London BC, E (a minor) v Dorset CC [1995] 3 All ER 353, [1995] 2 AC 633, [1995] 3 WLR 152, HL; affg sub nom M (a minor) v Newham London BC, X and ors (minors) v Bedfordshire CC [1994] 4 All ER 602, [1995] 2 AC 633, [1994] 2 WLR 554, CA.

Yousef v Netherlands [2002] 3 FCR 577, ECt HR.
Z v UK [2001] 2 FCR 246, ECt HR.

Appeals

D v East Berkshire Community Health NHS Trust

The claimant, JD, the mother of M (a child), appealed from the decision of Judge Hale on 6 September 2002 determining certain preliminary issues, summarised at [94], below, in proceedings between the claimant and East Berkshire Community Health NHS Trust. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

K and another v Dewsbury Health Care NHS Trust and another

The claimants, MAK and his daughter, R (a child), appealed from the decision of Judge Grenfell on 22 September 2002 determining certain preliminary issues, summarised at [107], below, in proceedings between the claimants and Dewsbury Health Care NHS Trust and Kirklees Metropolitan Council. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

K and another v Oldham NHS Trust and another

The claimants, RK and another, the mother and father of M (a child) appealed from the decision determining certain preliminary issues summarised at [121], below, in proceedings between the claimants and Oldham NHS Trust and Dr Blumenthal. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Allan Levy QC and Scott Donovan (instructed by Carter Hodge) for M's mother.
Robert Francis QC and Angus Moon (instructed by Hempsons) for East Berkshire Community Health NHS Trust.
Allan Levy QC and David Gripton (instructed by Levi & Co) for R and R's father.
Robert Francis QC and Angus Moon (instructed by Hempsons) for Dewsbury Healthcare NHS Trust.
Edward Faulks QC and Alastair Hammerton (instructed by Hill Dickinson) for Kirklees Metropolitan Council.
Allan Levy QC and Mary Ruck (instructed by Pannone & Partners) for M's mother and father.
Robert Francis QC and Angus Moon (instructed by Hempsons) for Oldham NHS Trust and Dr Blumenthal.

Cur adv vult

31 July 2003. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

LORD PHILLIPS OF WORTH MATRAVERS MR.

INTRODUCTION

[1] These three appeals have been heard together because they have common features and raise common issues. Each involves accusations of abusing a child made against a parent by the professionals concerned for the welfare of that child. In each case the accusations proved to be unfounded. In each case a parent claims damages for psychiatric harm alleged to have been caused by the false accusations or their consequences. In one case the child also claims. In each case the primary case is advanced in negligence. In each case, preliminary issues have been tried, including whether any duty of care was owed to the claimant or claimants. In each case it has been common ground that the test to be applied is that identified by the House of Lords in Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568, [1990] 2 AC 605. In each case the court of first instance has held that no duty was owed, because it was not 'fair, just and reasonable' to impose such a duty, applying the principles laid down by the House of Lords in X and ors (minors) v Bedfordshire CC and M (a minor) v Newham London BC, so that each claim has been dismissed: see X and ors (minors) v Bedfordshire CC, M (a minor) v Newham London BC, E (a minor) v Dorset CC [1995] 3 All ER 353, [1995] 2 AC 633 (Bedfordshire). The primary issue in each appeal is whether the decision in Bedfordshire is fatal to the claim. There are, however, a number of subsidiary issues.

[2] In the first appeal (D v East Berkshire Community Health NHS Trust) a mother claims in respect of acute anxiety and distress that she alleges she suffered as a result of being incorrectly accused of suffering from Munchausen Syndrome by Proxy. In her case she was not, in fact, separated from her child. In the second case (K and another v Dewsbury Health Care NHS Trust and another) a father and his daughter claim for psychiatric injury and financial loss resulting from unfounded allegations that the father might have sexually abused his daughter, which led to the father being denied access to his daughter for a short period. In the third appeal (K and another v Oldham NHS Trust and another), a mother and father claim in respect of psychological distress suffered as a result of unfounded allegations of having inflicted injuries on their daughter, which led to the child being separated from her parents for nearly a year.

THE ISSUES

[3] Mr Allan Levy QC, who has appeared for all the appellants, has contended that the decision in each case violates art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act). This is the first general issue that we shall consider.

[4] Mr Levy contends that the law has developed since the decision in Bedfordshire and that we should hold, on the basis of recent authority, that it is 'fair, just and reasonable' to impose a duty of care on the defendants in the circumstances common to each appeal. Whether more recent authority has varied the principles laid down in Bedfordshire is the second general issue that we shall consider.

[5] Mr Levy submits that there was, in each case, a violation of art 8 of the convention and that the first instance decisions violate art 13. He urges that, in order to avoid these violations, each case should be permitted to go to trial and that the test of negligence that the court should apply is one that provides a remedy for the breach of art 8 that has occurred in each case. The effect of the impact of the convention is the third general issue that we shall consider.

[6] Mr Levy submits that, in each case, Bedfordshire can be distinguished on the facts. This issue we shall have to consider individually, having regard to the facts of each appeal.

[7] In each action, one or more NHS trusts have been sued as defendants. They have been represented by Mr Robert Francis QC. In the Oldham case Simon J held that the requirement of 'proximity' laid down by the Caparo Industries case was not satisfied. Any duty was owed to the child and there was no room for an additional duty owed to the parents. By a respondents' notice Mr Francis seeks a finding in the other two appeals that there was no proximity between the parent claimants and the NHS defendants. Whether there was a lack of such proximity is a second issue that we shall have to consider on the facts of each individual case.

[8] In the Dewsbury case Judge Grenfell held that the second defendants, the council, were protected by witness immunity. Mr Levy challenges that finding. Mr Francis, for his part, seeks, by respondents' notice, a finding that all the NHS defendants were protected by witness immunity. Whether the defendants are protected by witness immunity is a third issue that we shall have to consider in each case.

THE FIRST GENERAL ISSUE

[9] In advancing his argument in relation to art 6 of the convention, Mr Levy explained that he was seeking to 'resurrect' Osman v UK (1998) 5 BHRC 293. His argument based on Osman's case is, as we understand it, as follows. To exclude any duty of care on the part of those involved in making decisions for the protection of children against suspected child abuse is to grant them immunity against liability in negligence. To enable the defendants to invoke the protection of such immunity by way of preliminary issue is to deny the claimants the right to have their claims determined on the facts of the individual cases. This violates their right to a fair trial under art 6. The court should not adopt such an approach.

[10] It is convenient to consider these submissions in the context of the two Bedfordshire child abuse cases (X and ors (minors) v Bedfordshire CC, M (a minor) v Newham London BC, E (a minor) v Dorset CC [1995] 3 All ER 353, [1995] 2 AC 633). At this stage we can touch lightly on the facts and the decisions in those cases. In the Bedfordshire case five children claimed against a local authority damages for breach of statutory duty and negligence in failing to exercise statutory powers and duties to protect them from parental abuse and neglect. In the Newham case a child and her mother claimed damages for breach of statutory duty and negligence against a local authority, an area health authority and a consultant psychiatrist employed by the latter. The alleged negligence included failure competently to investigate the identity of a man who had sexually abused the child, with the result that the child was unnecessarily removed from the mother and both suffered psychiatric injury. Both actions were struck out on the basis that they disclosed no reasonable cause of action, and appeals were dismissed.

[11] The House of Lords held that both actions had properly been struck out. The relevant statutes imposed no duty in favour of the claimants. As for the claims in negligence, as a matter of public policy it was not just and reasonable to impose a common law duty of care, either to children or to their parents, on those entrusted with the difficult and delicate task of deciding whether action was necessary to protect children from suspected abuse.

[12] The decisions in Bedfordshire were followed by the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Osman's case. In that case also, a statement of claim had been struck out as disclosing no reasonable cause of action. In Osman's case the applicants complained that their rights under art 6 of the convention had been infringed. They had brought an action in the United Kingdom against the police alleging negligence in the prevention and pursuit of crime. The Court of Appeal struck out the proceedings on the ground that they disclosed no reasonable cause of action. This was on the basis that it was a clearly established principle of the law of negligence that the police owed no duty of care to individual citizens in relation to the vigour with which they carried out their duties of prevention and detection of crime: see Hill v Chief Constable of West Yorkshire [1988] 2 All ER 238, [1989] AC 53.

[13] The Strasbourg court upheld the applicants' claim. The reasoning of the court appears from its judgment (at 327 (para 139)):

> 'On that understanding the court considers that the applicants must be taken to have had a right, derived from the law of negligence, to seek an adjudication on the admissibility and merits of an arguable claim that they were in a relationship of proximity to the police, that the harm caused was foreseeable and that in the circumstances it was fair, just and reasonable not to apply the exclusionary rule outlined in Hill v Chief Constable of West Yorkshire. In the view of the court the assertion of that right by the applicants is in itself sufficient to ensure the applicability of art 6(1) of the convention.'

[14] This decision perplexed common law judges and jurists. In Barrett v Enfield London BC [1999] 3 All ER 193 at 199, [2001] 2 AC 550 at 559–560 Lord Browne-Wilkinson explained the difficulty that he had in following the reasoning of the court:

> 'Having so defined the ambit of art 6, the Strasbourg court held that there was in Osman's case a breach of such right of access to the English court, such breach lying in the application of a blanket exclusionary rule which excludes all claims against the police for negligent failure to investigate or protect from crime. In the view of the Strasburg court, apparently, the applicability of such exclusionary rule has to be decided afresh in each individual case. If this is not done then it is impossible to determine whether the public interest in an efficient police force is or is not proportionate to the seriousness of the harm suffered by the plaintiff in the individual case (see 5 BHRC 293 at 329 (para 150)). On these grounds, the Strasbourg court held that the English court had breached art 6 by striking out the claim made by the Osmans against the police without hearing any evidence by reference to which the proportionality of the rule in that particular case could be judged. The court said that the police had been granted a "blanket immunity" which was disproportionate and therefore an unjustifiable restriction on the Osmans' right of access to the court. The Osmans were entitled to have their case against the police determined in deserving cases (see 5 BHRC 293 at 329–330 (paras 151, 152)). The problems in applying this reasoning to the English law of negligence are many and various. For example, the correct answer to the following points is not immediately apparent. (1) Although the word "immunity" is sometimes incorrectly used, a holding that it is not fair, just and reasonable to hold liable a particular class of defendants whether generally or in relation to a particular type of activity is not to give immunity from a liability to which the rest of the world is subject. It is a prerequisite to there being any liability in negligence at all that as a matter of policy it is fair, just and reasonable in those circumstances to impose liability in negligence. (2) In a wide range of cases public policy has led to the decision that the imposition of liability would not be fair and reasonable in the circumstances, eg some activities of financial regulators, building inspectors, ship surveyors, social workers dealing with sex abuse cases. In all these cases and many others the view has been taken that the proper performance of the defendant's primary functions for the benefit of society as a whole will be inhibited if they are required to look over their shoulder to avoid liability in negligence. In English law the decision as to whether it is fair, just and reasonable to impose a liability in negligence on a particular class of would-be defendants depends on weighing in the balance the total detriment to the public interest in all cases from holding such class liable in negligence as against the total loss to all would-be plaintiffs if they are not to have a cause of action in respect of the loss they have individually suffered. (3) In English law, questions of public policy and the question whether it is fair and reasonable to impose liability in negligence are decided as questions of law. Once the decision is taken that, say, company auditors though liable to shareholders for negligent auditing are not liable to those proposing to invest in the company (see Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568, [1990] 2 AC 605), that decision will apply to all future cases of the same kind. The decision does not depend on weighing the balance between the extent of the damage to the plaintiff and the damage to the public in each particular case.'

[15] Osman's case led to an understandable reluctance on the part of the English courts in Barrett's case and other cases to use the striking out procedure, as we shall show when we come to address the second issue. Lord Woolf MR commented on this in Kent v Griffiths [2000] 2 All ER 474, [2001] QB 36. He went on to observe ([2000] 2 All ER 474 at 485, [2001] QB 36 at 51 (para 38)):

'In so far as Osman's case underlined the dangers of a blanket approach so much the better. However, it would be wrong for the Osman decision to be taken as a signal that, even when the legal position is clear and an investigation of the facts would provide no assistance, the courts should be reluctant to dismiss cases which have no real prospect of success. Courts are now encouraged, where an issue or issues can be identified which will resolve or help resolve litigation, to take that issue or those issues at an early stage of the proceedings so as to achieve expedition and save expense. There is no question of any contravention of art 6 of the ECHR in so doing. Defendants as well as claimants are entitled to a fair trial and it is an important part of the case management function to bring proceedings to an end as expeditiously as possible. Although a strike-out may appear to be a summary remedy, it is in fact indistinguishable from deciding a case on a preliminary point of law.'

[16] Four of the five unsuccessful claimants in Bedfordshire took their case to Strasbourg: see Z v UK [2001] 2 FCR 246. They alleged violation of arts 3 and 13 but also, relying on Osman's case, of art 6. The Commission expressed the view that there had been a breach of art 6, but the United Kingdom succeeded in persuading the court that this was not so. In reviewing the English law of negligence the court quoted from the passage in the speech of Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Barrett's case that we have set out above, and commented (at 264 (para 68)):

'The striking out procedure, now contained in Pt 3.4(2) of the Civil Procedure Rules in force since 1999, is regarded as an important feature of English civil procedure, performing the function of securing speedy and effective justice, inter alia by allowing it to be decided promptly which issues need full investigation and trial and disposing summarily of the others. By means of this procedure, it can be determined at an early stage, with minimal cost to the parties, whether the facts as pleaded reveal a claim existing in law.' a

[17] The court considered the alleged breach of art 6 at length and concluded that no violation had occurred. The most material passage in the lengthy reasoning of the court is to be found in the following paragraphs (at 271): b

'100. The applicants, and the Commission in its report, relied on Osman's case as indicating that the exclusion of liability in negligence, in that case concerning the acts or omissions of the police in the investigation and prevention of crime, acted as a restriction on access to court. The Court considers that its reasoning in Osman's case was based on an understanding c of the law of negligence (see, in particular, ((1998) 5 BHRC 293 at 327 (paras 138, 139)) which has to be reviewed in the light of the clarifications subsequently made by the domestic courts and notably the House of Lords. The Court is satisfied that the law of negligence as developed in the domestic courts since the case of Caparo Industries plc v Dickman ([1990] 1 All ER 568, [1990] 2 AC 605) and as recently analysed in the case of Barrett includes the d fair, just and reasonable criterion as an intrinsic element of the duty of care and that the ruling of law concerning that element in this case does not disclose the operation of an immunity. In the present case, the Court is led to the conclusion that the inability of the applicants to sue the local authority flowed not from an immunity but from the applicable principles governing e the substantive right of action in domestic law. There was no restriction on access to court of the kind contemplated in [Ashingdane v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 528].

101. The applicants may not therefore claim that they were deprived of any right to a determination on the merits of their negligence claims. Their f claims were properly and fairly examined in light of the applicable domestic legal principles concerning the tort of negligence. Once the House of Lords had ruled on the arguable legal issues that brought into play the applicability of art 6(1) of the Convention (see paras 87–89 above), the applicants could no longer claim any entitlement under art 6(1) to obtain any hearing concerning the facts. As pointed out above, such a hearing would have served no g purpose, unless a duty of care in negligence had been held to exist in their case. It is not for this Court to find that this should have been the outcome of the striking out proceedings since this would effectively involve substituting its own views as to the proper interpretation and content of domestic law. h

102. It is none the less the case that the interpretation of domestic law by the House of Lords resulted in the applicants' case being struck out. The tort of negligence was held not to impose a duty of care on the local authority in the exercise of its statutory powers. Their experiences were described as "horrific" by a psychiatrist (see para 40 above) and the Court has found that j they were victims of a violation of art 3 (see para 74 above). Yet the outcome of the domestic proceedings they brought is that they, and any children with complaints such as theirs, cannot sue the local authority in negligence for compensation, however foreseeable—and severe—the harm suffered and however unreasonable the conduct of the local authority in failing to take steps to prevent that harm. The applicants are correct in their assertions that a the gap they have identified in domestic law is one that gives rise to an issue under the Convention, but in the Court's view it is an issue under art 13, not art 6(1).'

[18] The two claimants in M (a minor) v Newham London BC also made an application to the Strasbourg court: see TP v UK [2001] 2 FCR 289. They alleged breaches of arts 8 and 13 of the convention, and also of art 6. The court rejected b the claim of breach of art 6 for similar reasons to those advanced in Z v UK.

[19] On the face of it, these decisions of the European Court would seem fatal to the contention that the approach adopted by each court in the appeals before us infringed art 6. Mr Levy, however, in support of that contention, referred us to the analysis of the relevant Strasbourg jurisprudence made by Lord Walker of c Gestingthorpe in Matthews v Ministry of Defence [2003] UKHL 4 at [130]–[140], [2003] 1 All ER 689 at [130]–[140], [2003] 1 AC 1163.

[20] Lord Walker referred to the decision of the Strasbourg court in Fayed v UK (1994) 18 EHRR 393. In that case the Fayed brothers contended that the defence of qualified privilege, which defeated their claim in a libel action, was a violation d of art 6. The court observed (at 429 (para 65)):

> 'Whether a person has an actionable domestic claim may depend not only on the substantive content, properly speaking, of the relevant civil right as defined under national law but also on the existence of procedural bars preventing or limiting the possibilities of bringing potential claims to court. e In the latter kind of case Article 6(1) may have a degree of applicability. Certainly the Convention enforcement bodies may not create by way of interpretation of Article 6(1) a substantive civil right which has no legal basis in the State concerned. However, it would not be consistent with the rule of law in a democratic society or with the basic principle underlying Article 6(1)—namely that civil claims must be capable of being submitted to f a judge for adjudication—if, for example, a State could, without restraint or control by the Convention enforcement bodies, remove from the jurisdiction of the courts a whole range of civil claims or confer immunities from civil liability on large groups or categories of persons.'

The court added (at 430 (para 67)):

g

> 'It is not always an easy matter to trace the dividing line between procedural and substantive limitations of a given entitlement under domestic law. It may sometimes be no more than a question of legislative technique whether the limitation is expressed in terms of the right or its remedy.'

h

[21] The court repeated these observations in Fogarty v UK (2001) 12 BHRC 132. This led Lord Walker to remark ([2003] 1 All ER 689 at [140]): 'The uncertain shadow of Osman v UK still lies over this area of the law.'

[22] We do not consider that the shadow of Osman v UK (1998) 5 BHRC 293 stretches far enough to obscure the position in the appeals under consideration. j They do not concern an area where it is difficult to draw a line between procedural and substantive rules of law. They are concerned with the application of a fundamental principle of our common law of negligence. In performing their accepted function of tailoring the law of negligence to new factual situations, the courts will not recognise a duty of care unless it is 'fair, just and reasonable' that such a duty should exist: see Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568, [1990] 2 AC 605. The procedure that has given rise to these appeals involves determining, by way of preliminary issues, whether the test of what is 'fair, just and reasonable', applied with that respect for case precedent which our law requires, precludes the existence of a duty of care, even if all the facts alleged by the claimants are established. Those preliminary issues have reached the Court of Appeal and may well reach the House of Lords. No violation of art 6 is involved in this procedure, as the Strasbourg court expressly recognised in Z v UK and TP v UK.

[23] For these reasons Mr Levy does not succeed on the first issue. The judgments appealed against involve no violation of art 6.

THE SECOND ISSUE

[24] We now turn to consider whether, as Mr Levy submits, subsequent decisions have varied the principles laid down by Bedfordshire. It is necessary at the outset to identify what was decided in Bedfordshire.

What did the Bedfordshire cases decide?

[25] In the Bedfordshire cases (X and ors (minors) v Bedfordshire CC, M (a minor) v Newham London BC, E (a minor) v Dorset CC [1995] 3 All ER 353, [1995] 2 AC 633) no less than five appeals were heard together. It is convenient to consider them in two groups—the child abuse cases (the Bedfordshire case and the Newham case) and the educational cases (the Dorset case, the Hampshire case and the Bromley case).

The child abuse cases

[26] In the Bedfordshire case five children brought claims, which included claims for damages in negligence, against the council for failing to take action to prevent them from suffering parental abuse and neglect. In the Newham case a child and her mother brought claims, which included claims for damages in negligence against the local authority, the area health authority and a consultant psychiatrist employed by the latter. The relevant allegations were that the authority had failed to conduct with due care its statutory duty to investigate allegations of child abuse, with the result that the mother's cohabitee was wrongfully identified as the abuser. As a result of this the child was removed from the mother and placed in foster care. Both mother and daughter claimed that they had sustained psychiatric injury as a result of this.

[27] Lord Browne-Wilkinson gave the leading speech. The relevant part is that in which he considered whether, in the course of carrying out its statutory duties, the local authority had, through its employees, brought about such a relationship with the plaintiffs as to give rise to a duty of care at common law. In this context, he remarked ([1995] 3 All ER 353 at 371, [1995] 2 AC 633 at 739):

> '... the question whether there is such a common law duty and if so its ambit, must be profoundly influenced by the statutory framework within which the acts complained of were done ... in my judgment, a common law duty of care cannot be imposed on a statutory duty if the observance of such common law duty of care would be inconsistent with, or have a tendency to discourage, the due performance by the local authority of its statutory duties.'

[28] Having regard to this comment it may be helpful to refer to Lord Browne-Wilkinson's summary of the relevant statutory provisions of his speech ([1995] 3 All ER 353 at 376–377, [1995] 2 AC 633 at 744–746):

> 'Since 1932 there has been legislation designed by Parliament to provide protection for children in need of care and protection. The first statute directly relied upon in the abuse cases is the Children and Young Persons Act 1969. Section 1 provided that a court could make a care order in care proceedings if satisfied, inter alia, that the child was being neglected or ill treated. Under s 2(1) a duty was imposed on the local authority which received information "suggesting that there are grounds for bringing care proceedings" to cause inquiries to be made. Section 2(2) provided: "If it appears to a local authority that there are grounds for bringing care proceedings in respect of a child or young person who resides or is found in their area, it shall be the duty of the authority to exercise their power under the preceding section to bring care proceedings in respect of him ..." Sections 1 and 2 of the Child Care Act 1980 provided, so far as relevant:
>
> > "1.—(1) It shall be the duty of every local authority to make available such advice, guidance and assistance as may promote the welfare of children by diminishing the need to receive children into or keep them in care under this Act or to bring children before a juvenile court ...
> >
> > 2.—(1) Where it appears to a local authority with respect to a child in their area appearing to them to be under the age of seventeen ... (b) that his parents ... are, for the time being or permanently, prevented by reason of mental or bodily disease or infirmity or other incapacity or any other circumstances from providing for his proper accommodation, maintenance and upbringing; and (c) in either case, that the intervention of the local authority under this section is necessary in the interests of the welfare of the child, it shall be the duty of the local authority to receive the child into their care under this section."
>
> Section 76(1)(a) gave the Secretary of State power to direct an inquiry in relation to the child care services. Those were the only directly relevant statutory duties in force during the events complained of in the Newham case. The Children Act 1989 came into force on 14 October 1991 and is therefore relevant in relation to the later stages of the Bedfordshire case. Part III of the Act includes s 17(1) and (2), which provide as follows:
>
> > "(1) It shall be the general duty of every local authority (in addition to the other duties imposed on them by this Part)—(a) to safeguard and promote the welfare of children within their area who are in need; and (b) so far as is consistent with that duty, to promote the upbringing of such children by their families, by providing a range and level of services appropriate to those children's needs.
> >
> > (2) For the purpose principally of facilitating the discharge of their duty under this section, every local authority shall have the specific duties and powers set out in Part I of Schedule 2."
>
> Paragraphs 1(1) and 4(1) of Pt 1 of Sch 2 provide:

"1.—(1) Every local authority shall take reasonable steps to identify the extent to which there are children in need within their area.

4.—(1) Every local authority shall take reasonable steps, through the provision of services under Part III of this Act, to prevent children within their area suffering ill-treatment or neglect."

Part III of the Act includes s 20(1), which provides:

"(1) Every local authority shall provide accommodation for any child in need within their area who appears to them to require accommodation as a result of ... (c) the person who has been caring for him being prevented (whether or not permanently, and for whatever reason) from providing him with suitable accommodation or care."

In Pt V of the Act, s 47(1) and (8) provides:

"(1) Where a local authority ... (b) have reasonable cause to suspect a child who lives, or is found, in their area is suffering, or is likely to suffer, significant harm, the authority shall make, or cause to be made, such inquiries as they consider necessary to enable them to decide whether they should take any action to safeguard or promote the child's welfare.

(8) Where, as a result of complying with this section, a local authority conclude that they should take action to safeguard or promote the child's welfare they shall take that action (so far as it is both within their power and reasonably practicable for them to do so)."

Amongst the steps the local authority can take to safeguard the child's welfare is to apply to the court for a care order under s 31. If a care order is made, the local authority is under a duty to receive the child into its care.'

[29] Lord Browne-Wilkinson went on to refer to statutory guidance in relation to the performance of these statutory duties which emphasised—

'the importance in this field of inter-disciplinary and inter-agency links and the need for a close working relationship between "social service departments, the police service, medical practitioners, community health workers, the education service and others who share a common aim to protect the child at risk".' (See [1995] 3 All ER 353 at 378, [1995] 2 AC 633 at 746–747.)

[30] Lord Browne-Wilkinson recorded ([1995] 3 All ER 353 at 380, [1995] 2 AC 633 at 749):

'The local authority accepts that they could foresee damage to the plaintiffs if they carried out their statutory duties negligently and that the relationship between the authority and the plaintiffs is sufficiently proximate [to give rise to a duty of care].'

He held, however, that there were special considerations for concluding that it was not just and reasonable to impose such a duty.

[31] Those reasons were summarised by May LJ in S v Gloucestershire CC, L v Tower Hamlets London BC [2000] 3 All ER 346 at 361, [2001] Fam 313 at 329–330 and we shall adopt his summary:

'(1) A common law duty of care would cut across the whole statutory system set up for the protection of children at risk. This is inter-disciplinary, involving the participation of the police, educational bodies, doctors and others. It would be almost impossible to disentangle the respective liability of each for reaching a decision found to be negligent. (2) The task of the local authority and its servants in dealing with children at risk is extraordinarily delicate. (3) If there were potential liability for damages, it might well mean that local authorities would adopt a more cautious and defensive approach to their duties. (4) The relationship between the social worker and the child's parents is often one of conflict. This would be likely to breed ill feeling and often hopeless litigation which would divert money and resources away from the performance of the social service for which they were provided. (5) There were other remedies for maladministration of the statutory system for the protection of children in statutory complaints procedures and the power of the local authorities ombudsman to investigate cases. (6) The development of novel categories of negligence should proceed incrementally and by analogy with decided categories. There were no close such analogies. The court should proceed with great care before holding liable in negligence those who have been charged by Parliament with the task of protecting society from the wrong doings of others.'

[32] Lord Browne-Wilkinson went on to consider whether the individual social workers and psychiatrists involved owed individual duties of care to the claimants. He concluded that they did not. His reasoning appears in the following passages of his speech ([1995] 3 All ER 353 at 383, 384, [1995] 2 AC 633 at 752, 753, 754):

'The social workers and the psychiatrists were retained by the local authority to advise the local authority, not the plaintiffs. The subject matter of the advice and activities of the professionals is the child. Moreover, the tendering of any advice will in many cases involve interviewing and, in the case of doctors, examining the child. But the fact that the carrying out of the retainer involves contact with and a relationship with the child cannot alter the extent of the duty owed by the professionals under the retainer from the local authority ... In my judgment in the present cases, the social workers and the psychiatrist did not, by accepting the instructions of the local authority, assume any general professional duty of care to the plaintiff children. The professionals were employed or retained to advise the local authority in relation to the well-being of the plaintiffs but not to advise or treat the plaintiffs ... Even if, contrary to my view, the social workers and psychiatrist would otherwise have come under a duty of care to the plaintiffs, the same considerations which have led me to the view that there is no direct duty of care owed by the local authorities apply with at least equal force to the question whether it would be just and reasonable to impose such a duty of care on the individual social workers and the psychiatrist.'

The educational cases

[33] The educational cases involved claims against local authorities for negligently failing to identify that children had special educational needs. Lord Browne-Wilkinson held that the education authorities owed no relevant duty of care to children in the performance of their duties under the Education Acts 1944–1981, but that individual employees of the authorities might be in such a relationship with a child as to owe a common law duty of care, breach of which would render the authority vicariously liable.

Subsequent decisions

[34] A number of relevant decisions have been given since Bedfordshire, including two in the House of Lords. In neither of these did the House of Lords purport to depart from the decision in Bedfordshire, and this puts difficulties in Mr Levy's way when seeking to persuade us that 'the law has moved on' since Bedfordshire. At the same time, it is always possible for the House of Lords to reduce the impact of a previous decision by distinguishing it or confining it narrowly to its particular facts, and it is necessary to consider whether this has occurred in relation to the approach to child abuse cases.

[35] In Barrett v Enfield London BC [1999] 3 All ER 193, [2001] 2 AC 550 the claimant, who had been in the care of the defendant local authority under a care order between the ages of ten months and 17 years claimed to have been caused psychological and psychiatric problems as a result of the negligent way that the authority had cared for him. It was alleged that both the local authority and the social workers employed by it, for whom it was vicariously liable, had been in breach of the common law duty of care to the plaintiff in the exercise of the local authority's functions under the Children Act 1948, the Children and Young Persons Act 1969 and the Child Care Act 1980. The claim had been struck out as disclosing no reasonable cause of action, and this decision had been upheld by the Court of Appeal, purporting to apply Bedfordshire. The House of Lords reversed the decision.

[36] Barrett's case was exhaustively analysed by May LJ in S's case and we do not propose to repeat that exercise. We shall simply summarise the reasoning of the House of Lords. There are two strands to this. In the first place, the House of Lords held that the factual situation in Barrett's case was significantly different from that in Bedfordshire. This was indeed the submission in that case of Mr Levy, who appeared for the claimant (see [2001] 2 AC 550). Lord Slynn of Hadley, who gave the leading speech, considered the factors that had led the House in Bedfordshire to conclude that it was not just and reasonable to impose on the local authority a duty of care. He commented ([1999] 3 All ER 193 at 208, [2001] 2 AC 550 at 568–569):

> 'Whilst not casting doubt on the validity of these factors in the context of the investigations, or the steps which it was said should have been taken, in those cases of child abuse and neglect of educational needs, it does not seem to me that they necessarily have the same force separately or cumulatively in the present case. Thus, although once a child is in care, there may well be co-operation between different social welfare bodies, the responsibility is that of the local authority and its social and other professional staff. The decision to remove the child from its home is already taken and the authority has statutory powers in relation to the child which do not necessarily involve the exercise of the kind of discretion involved in taking a child from its family into care. As to the likelihood of an authority being over-cautious, I am of the same opinion as Evans LJ in the Court of Appeal in this case: "I would agree that what is said to be a 'policy' consideration, namely that imposing a duty of care might lead to defensive conduct on the part of the person concerned and might require him to spend time or resources on keeping full records or otherwise providing for self-justification, if called upon to do so, should normally be a factor of little, if any, weight. If the conduct in question is of a kind which can be measured against the standards of the reasonable man, placed as the defendant was, then I do not see why the law in the public interest should not require those standards to be observed." (See [1997] 3 All ER 171 at 181, [1998] QB 367 at 380.) Nor do I think that the remedies accepted to be available in X and ors (minors) v Bedfordshire CC are likely to be as efficacious as the recognition by the court that a duty of care is or may be owed at common law. I agree with Bingham MR in his dissenting judgment in the Court of Appeal in X and ors (minors) v Bedfordshire CC [1994] 4 All ER 602 at 619, [1995] 2 AC 633 at 662: "I cannot accept, as a general proposition, that the imposition of a duty of care makes no contribution to the maintenance of high standards." In summary X and ors (minors) v Bedfordshire CC establishes that decisions by local authorities whether or not to take a child into care with all the difficult aspects that involves and all the disruption which may come about are not ones which the courts will review by way of a claim for damages in negligence, though there may be other remedies by way of judicial review or through extra judicial routes such as the ombudsman. The question in the present case is different, since the child was taken into care; it is therefore necessary to consider whether any acts or omissions and if so what kind of acts or omissions can ground a claim in negligence. The fact that no completely analogous claim has been accepted by the courts previously points to the need for caution and the need to proceed "incrementally and "by analogy with decided cases".'

[37] The speech of Lord Hutton had a passage to like effect ([1999] 3 All ER 193 at 227–229, [2001] 2 AC 550 at 588–590).

[38] The second strand in the reasoning was that it was only in the clearest case in the type of matter under consideration that a claim should be struck out as disclosing no cause of action without considering the material facts: see [1999] 3 All ER 193 at 213, [2001] 2 AC 550 at 574 per Lord Slynn. Lord Browne-Wilkinson referred expressly to Osman v UK (1998) 5 BHRC 293 in the passage that we cited earlier. Lord Slynn did not, but we have no doubt that he had the effect of that decision in mind.

[39] The effect of Barrett's case was considered by the Court of Appeal in S's case. Two appeals were heard together. Each was by a claimant who alleged that a local authority had been negligent in leaving them in the care of foster parents who were sexually abusing them. At first instance each case had been struck out as disclosing no cause of action. The Court of Appeal reversed this result in one case. In the other they gave summary judgment in favour of the defendant under CPR 24.2 on the ground that the claim had no real prospect of success.

[40] In the leading judgment, May LJ set out the strands of the law to be derived from Barrett's case (see [2000] 3 All ER 346 at 369–370, [2001] Fam 313 at 338–339). The following passage of his judgment is particularly relevant:

> 'It is clear from these principles that in an ordinary case a local authority defendant is unlikely to establish a defence which relies on a blanket immunity. There would be a blanket immunity for this purpose if it were decided without reference to particular facts that all cases which have certain basic characteristics were not justiciable; or that in every case with certain characteristics it was not just or reasonable to impose a duty of care. Thus it seems to me that it would be incorrect to say, as counsel for the local authorities were inclined to submit in appeals before this court, that cases which may be labelled as child abuse cases are bound to fail as a class. The "child abuse cases" was no more than a convenient label under which X and ors (minors) v Bedfordshire CC and M (a minor) v Newham London BC travelled. Remembering always that the critical question is a composite one which embraces the alleged duty of care and its breach in the context of the damage alleged to have been caused, the court has to consider the nature of the actions and decisions of the local authority which are said to have been negligent. From this it may be seen that a decision whether or not to take a child said to have been abused away from its natural parents and into care may often be acutely difficult. But many of the decisions about care and upbringing of a child once he or she has been taken into care, difficult though they may be, may not have the acute complications, strains and conflicts identified in X and ors (minors) v Bedfordshire CC.'

[41] While in this passage, May LJ distinguished Bedfordshire, he did so in a way which came close to suggesting that its effect should be confined to its own particular facts. May LJ then referred to the fact that the Commission in Z v UK [2001] 2 FCR 246 had concluded that there had been, in that case, a violation of art 6. He commented ([2000] 3 All ER 346 at 371, [2001] Fam 313 at 340):

'This reinforces my reading of Barrett's case to the effect that it is unlikely that claims of the kind presently before this court will be seen as non-justiciable or ones where it is not just and reasonable to impose a duty of care without a proper examination of the individual facts.'

[42] In Phelps v Hillingdon London BC, Anderton v Clwyd CC, Jarvis v Hampshire CC, Re G (a minor) [2000] 4 All ER 504, [2001] 2 AC 619 four appeals were heard together by a Committee of seven members of the House of Lords. In each the complainant contended that the local education authority had negligently failed to make proper provision for his or her special educational needs. The cases were advanced both on the basis that the education authority was vicariously liable for breaches of a duty of care owed by the individual teachers or other professionals and on the basis that the education authority was in breach of a duty of care owed directly by the authority.

[43] It is of interest that counsel for the claimants argued that the decision in Bedfordshire that local education authorities could be under no duty of care should be departed from in that it had the effect of conferring a blanket immunity and was therefore inconsistent with Osman's case as interpreted in Barrett's case.

[44] Speeches were delivered by Lord Slynn, Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead and Lord Clyde. Lord Jauncey of Tullichettle agreed with all of these and Lord Lloyd of Berwick, Lord Hutton and Lord Millett agreed with the speeches of Lord Slynn and Lord Clyde.

[45] Lord Slynn held that it was arguable that the individual professionals concerned with the claimants owed them a duty of care, for breach of which the authorities were vicariously liable. He observed ([2000] 4 All ER 504 at 517, [2001] 2 AC 619 at 653):

> 'I accept that, as was said in X (minors) v Bedfordshire CC, there may be cases where to recognise such a vicarious liability on the part of the authority may so interfere with the performance of the local education authority's duties that it would be wrong to recognise any liability on the part of the authority. It must, however, be for the local authority to establish that: it is not to be presumed and I anticipate that the circumstances where it could be established would be exceptional.'

He added ([2000] 4 All ER 504 at 518, [2001] 2 AC 619 at 654):

> 'But where an educational psychologist is specifically called in to advise in relation to the assessment and future provision for a specific child, and it is clear that the parents acting for the child and the teachers will follow that advice, prima facie a duty of care arises.'

[46] So far as a direct claim in negligence against the education authority was concerned, Lord Slynn differed from Bedfordshire in that he saw no reason of principle why such a claim should never be possible. He held ([2000] 4 All ER 504 at 522, [2001] 2 AC 619 at 658):

> 'Since the authority can only act through its employees or agents, and if they are negligent vicarious liability will arise, it may rarely be necessary to invoke a claim for direct liability. After the argument in these cases, I do not, however, accept the absolute statement that an education authority "owe[s] no common law duty of care in the exercise of the powers ... relating to children with special educational needs" (see [1995] 3 All ER 353 at 392, [1995] 2 AC 633 at 762) under the 1981 Act. That issue, however, as I have said does not fall for decision in Pamela's case. I would accordingly allow the appeal and restore the order of Garland J.'

[47] Lord Nicholls left open the question of whether Lord Browne-Wilkinson had been correct in Bedfordshire to hold that an education authority owes no common law duty of care in the exercise of powers and discretions relating to children with special educational needs conferred on it by the Education Act 1981 (see [2000] 4 All ER 504 at 531, [2001] 2 AC 619 at 668).

[48] Lord Clyde also found that there were strong grounds for arguing that the individual professionals involved owed the children a duty of care, breach of which would result in the education authorities becoming vicariously liable. He too left open the question of whether education authorities could owe a direct duty of care to the children. He made the following comment in relation to one of the factors that had led Lord Browne-Wilkinson to hold that it was not just and reasonable to impose a duty of care in the child abuse cases ([2000] 4 All ER 504 at 537, [2001] 2 AC 619 at 674):

> 'Another circumstance which may give rise to difficulty in the present context is that there may be a multi-disciplinary unit concerned in the giving of the advice. But that is a practical problem which cannot constitute a legal bar on a claim. Even where such a situation exists it should be possible to disentangle the relevant parts played by particular individuals and identify where the alleged negligence occurred.'

A little later, however, he commented:

'The distinction noted by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in X (minors) v Bedfordshire CC [1995] 3 All ER 353 at 393, [1995] 2 AC 633 at 763–764 is drawn between education cases and child abuse cases. In the former case it may more readily be concluded that the involvement of the parents is both consistent with and supports the conclusion that a duty of care existed through them to the child. In the latter, despite the general intention that all the interested parties should work together, the opportunity for conflict between the parents and the professional advisers may be far greater than in the educational context.'

The effect of the decisions

[49] These decisions significantly restrict the effect of Bedfordshire. So far as the education authority cases are concerned, doubt was cast in Phelps' case on the proposition that an education authority owes no duty of care to children when exercising powers and discretions under the 1981 Act. So far as child abuse cases are concerned, much of the reasoning advanced by Lord Browne-Wilkinson to justify holding that there was no duty of care was called into question. Lord Slynn in Barrett's case stated that Bedfordshire established that decisions by local authorities whether or not to take a child into care were not reviewable by way of a claim in negligence. We consider that the effect of Barrett's case and the other decisions that we have considered above is to restrict the effect of Bedfordshire to that core proposition.

New Zealand decisions

[50] In A-G v Prince [1998] 1 NZLR 262 a child and his mother brought claims in negligence against the Crown in relation to the manner in which a child welfare officer had prepared reports which had led to the adoption of the child by unsatisfactory adoptive parents. Proximity was conceded but the Crown sought to have the claim struck out on the grounds that it disclosed no cause of action in that, for reasons of policy, no duty of care was owed. The decision in Bedfordshire was relied upon.

[51] The New Zealand Court of Appeal declined to strike out the claim. In the following passage the majority of the court distinguished Bedfordshire (at 284–285):

'In the Bedfordshire case Lord Browne-Wilkinson ([1995] 3 All ER 353 at 371, [1995] 2 AC 633 at 739) emphasised that the question whether there is a common law duty, and if so its ambit, must be profoundly influenced by the statutory framework within which the acts complained of were done. In the various respects we have been discussing the Children and Young Persons Act 1974 is clearly distinguishable from the statutes before the House of Lords in the Bedfordshire case and the statutes under consideration in the large number of cases (but few in the child protection field) canvassed in argument. Little is to be gained from a point-by-point comparison. Also, the rescue cases are not comparable because in those cases any statutory framework was very different from the 1974 Act. There are other policy considerations to be considered although we would not weigh them as heavily in this case as the scheme and policy of the 1974 Act. First, the difficulty and delicacy of the social worker's task and its judgmental nature are relevant. Intrusion into the family has been handled with tact in the interests of the child or young person. The social worker must also have regard to the advantages of not disrupting the family environment and to the advantages and disadvantages of other options for the care of the young person. Clearly a plaintiff would have difficulty in establishing that an assessment made by a social worker fell outside the bounds sanctioned by professional opinion. Nevertheless considerations of that kind cannot absolve the department and social workers from the responsibility of considering and responding to specific complaints with professional skill and care. Next, the Solicitor-General submitted that the imposition of a duty would or could cause the department and social workers to adopt a more cautious and defensive approach to their duties. He drew our attention to a considerable body of professional literature on that point and to the recognition of it in the Bedfordshire case (see also Barrett v Enfield London BC ([1997] 3 All ER 171 at 178–179, 181, [1998] QB 367 at 377, 380)). But like lawyers and doctors, social workers are professionals. At that triggering step (and at other steps) they should be expected to have shouldered willingly a standard of reasonable skill and care that their private sector counterparts were expected to discharge. And in the absence of any data as to potential claims based on the roles and responsibilities of the department and social workers under the 1974 Act, which was replaced eight years ago by a very different legislative scheme, it would be unwise to give any particular weight to the resource implications of allowing for a common law duty of care. Finally, and as pointing against the imposition of a duty, there are the obvious difficulties of reaching conclusions as to causation and damages. Clearly any such claims would be very difficult to establish. That in itself cannot, we think, be adequate justification for ruling out the possibility of any claim for negligence whatever the circumstances. For these reasons, on the pleadings as they stand, we would not strike out the cause of action in negligence.'

[52] It is apparent that, while there were grounds for distinguishing Bedfordshire, some of the policy considerations which weighed with Lord Browne-Wilkinson did not carry the same weight with the Court of Appeal.

[53] The decision in Prince's case lay at the heart of an appeal to the Privy Council in B v A-G of New Zealand [2003] UKPC 61, [2003] 4 All ER 833. The Court of Appeal had struck out a claim by a father and his two daughters against a social worker, a clinical psychologist, and the Attorney General, sued on behalf of the Minister of Social Welfare and the Department of Social Welfare. The claim was for negligence in the investigation of the suspected abuse of the daughters by their father, with the consequence that the daughters were removed from their father and placed with foster parents. The decision of the Court of Appeal preceded that in Prince's case, and the Court of Appeal was much influenced by Bedfordshire. Before the Privy Council Prince's case was not challenged. The issue was whether it could be distinguished.

[54] The Privy Council concluded that, as far as the daughters were concerned, there was no basis upon which Prince's case could validly be distinguished. Their claims were permitted to proceed. Different considerations applied in the case of the father. The court said ([2003] UKPC 61 at [30], [2003] 4 All ER 833 at [30]):

'... their Lordships consider no common law duty of care was owed to the father. He stands in a very different position. He was the alleged perpetrator > of the abuse. In an inquiry into an abuse allegation the interests of the alleged perpetrator and of the children as the alleged victims are poles apart. Those conducting the inquiry must act in good faith throughout. But to impose a common law duty of care on the department and the individual professionals in favour of the alleged victims or potential victims and, at one and the same time, in favour of the alleged perpetrator would not be satisfactory. Moreover, a duty of care in favour of the alleged perpetrator would lack the juridical basis on which the existence of a common law duty of care was largely founded in Prince's case. The decision in Prince's case rests heavily on the feature that the duty imposed on the Director-General by s 5(2)(a) of the 1974 Act is for the benefit of the particular child. Self-evidently this statutory duty was not imposed for the benefit of alleged perpetrators of abuse. To utilise the existence of this statutory duty as the foundation of a common law duty in favour of perpetrators would be to travel far outside the rationale in Prince's case.'

The distinction between the position of children and the position of their parents is a matter to which we shall revert.

The impact of the Human Rights Act 1998

[55] The facts that have given rise to the cases with which we are concerned predate October 2000, when the 1998 Act came into force. It follows that no claim can be brought under the 1998 Act. It is none the less necessary to consider whether the introduction of the 1998 Act has affected the common law principles of the law of negligence. As that law develops all who have outstanding claims are in a position to profit from the development and in this area of the law, where children are victims, claims may be brought many years after the events to which they relate.

[56] We have referred to Z v UK [2001] 2 FCR 246 and TP v UK [2001] 2 FCR 289 in relation to art 6 of the convention. It is now necessary to consider the effect of these decisions of the Strasbourg court in relation to the claims that were based on art 3 and art 8.

[57] In Z v UK the Commission had found that there was a positive obligation on the government to protect children from treatment contrary to art 3. The authorities had been aware of the serious ill-treatment and neglect suffered by the four applicants over a period of years at the hands of their parents and had failed to take effective steps to bring this to an end. The treatment reached the level of severity prohibited by art 3. It followed that the state had failed in its positive obligation to provide the applicants with adequate protection against inhuman and degrading treatment. The government did not challenge these findings, and the court indorsed them.

[58] It would have been open to the government to argue that the statutory scheme in place satisfied the government's positive obligation and that it was in the interest of the effective operation of the scheme that neither public authorities nor their employees should be subject to liability for shortcomings in relation to the decision of whether or not to take a child into care. Instead counsel for the government submitted that after October 2000, when the 1998 Act had come into force, a victim would be able to bring proceedings in the courts against a public authority for a breach of a substantive right and the courts would be empowered to award damages.

[59] The court held ([2001] 2 FCR 246 at 273 (para 109)):

> 'There should however be available to the victim or the victim's family a mechanism for establishing any liability of state officials or bodies for acts or omissions involving the breach of their rights under the Convention. Furthermore, in the case of a breach of arts 2 and 3 of the Convention, which rank as the most fundamental provisions of the Convention, compensation for the non-pecuniary damage flowing from the breach should in principle be available as part of the range of redress.'

The United Kingdom was held to have been in breach of both arts 3 and 13.

[60] In order to understand the decision in TP v UK [2001] 2 FCR 289 it is necessary to say a little more about the facts. The applicants were respectively mother and daughter. The local authority (Newham) had reason to suspect that KM had been sexually abused. In the course of their investigations KM was interviewed by a consultant child psychiatrist employed by the health authority. A social worker was present, but TP was not. The interview was video-recorded. KM disclosed that she had been abused by a man and gave his first name. This happened to be the first name of the boyfriend of TP, who was living with her. KM was, however, referring to another man with the same first name and some of her answers should have disclosed that this might be the case. Newham obtained a place of safety order from the magistrates' court, identifying the boyfriend as the abuser. At this stage TP was denied access to the video recording. After about a year of separation, Newham allowed KM to be rehabilitated with TP. This coincided with the release of the video recording to the mother.

[61] The applicants contended that there had been a breach of their rights under arts 6, 8 and 13. As we have already explained, the court dismissed the claim under art 6.

[62] So far as art 8 was concerned, it was common ground that the removal of KM from her mother constituted an interference with respect for family life. The issue was whether this had been justified in accordance with art 8(2), which provides:

> 'There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.'

[63] The government submitted that the removal of KM was in accordance with the law and pursued the legitimate aim of protecting her welfare. The applicants contended that there were insufficient reasons to justify the removal, as the investigation had not been competently carried out. They further complained of the procedure that had been adopted and, in particular, of the failure to permit the mother to see the video recording.

[64] The court held that the removal of KM was 'in accordance with the law' and in pursuit of a 'legitimate aim'. As to whether the removal of KM had been 'necessary in a democratic society' the court set out the following general principles (at 310–311):

> '70. In determining whether the impugned measures were "necessary in a democratic society", the Court will consider whether, in the light of the case as a whole, the reasons adduced to justify them were relevant and sufficient for the purposes of art 8(2) of the Convention. Undoubtedly, consideration of what lies in the best interest of the child is of crucial importance in every case of this kind. Moreover, it must be borne in mind that the national authorities have the benefit of direct contact with all the persons concerned. It follows from these considerations that the Court's task is not to substitute itself for the domestic authorities in the exercise of their responsibilities regarding custody and access issues, but rather to review, in the light of the Convention, the decisions taken by those authorities in the exercise of their power of appreciation (see Hokkanen v Finland ([1995] 2 FCR 320 at 330–331 (para 55)), and, mutatis mutandis, Bronda v Italy ((2001) 33 EHRR 81 at 102 (para 59)) ...

71. The margin of appreciation to be accorded to the competent national authorities will vary in accordance with the nature of the issues and the importance of the interests at stake. Thus, the Court recognises that the authorities enjoy a wide margin of appreciation, in particular when assessing the necessity of taking a child into care. However, a stricter scrutiny is called for in respect of any further limitations, such as restrictions placed by those authorities on parental rights of access, and of any legal safeguards designed to secure an effective protection of the right of parents and children to respect for their family life. Such further limitations entail the danger that the family relations between the parents and a young child would be effectively curtailed (see, amongst other authorities, Johansen v Norway (1996) 23 EHRR 33 at 67–68 (para 64)).

72. The Court further recalls that whilst art 8 of the Convention contains no explicit procedural requirements, the decision-making process involved in measures of interference must be fair and such as to afford due respect to the interests safeguarded by art 8: "[W]hat therefore has to be determined is whether, having regard to the particular circumstances of the case and notably the serious nature of the decisions to be taken, the parents have been involved in the decision-making process, seen as a whole, to a degree sufficient to provide them with the requisite protection of their interests. If they have not, there will have been a failure to respect their family life and the interference resulting from the decision will not be capable of being regarded as 'necessary' within the meaning of Article 8." (See W v UK (1987) 10 EHRR 29 at 50 (para 64)).

73. It has previously found that the failure to disclose relevant documents to parents during the procedures instituted by the authorities in placing and maintaining a child in care meant that the decision-making process determining the custody and access arrangements did not afford the requisite protection of the parents' interests as safeguarded by art 8 (see McMichael v UK ([1995] 2 FCR 718 at 740 (para 92)).'

[65] Applying those principles to the facts, the court first dealt with the decision to seek a place of safety order ([2001] 2 FCR 289 at 311–312):

'74. As concerns the measure taken to remove the second applicant into care, the Court considers that this was supported by relevant and sufficient reasons, namely, the strong suspicions that she had been abused and the doubts which existed as to the first applicant's ability to protect her (see paras 10 to 16 above). In that latter context, it may be noted that the abuse had taken place in the first applicant's home without her apparently being aware and that the first applicant's reaction, however natural in the circumstances, tended towards a denial of the allegations. It also appears from the interview that while at one point the second applicant had described the abuser as having been thrown out of the house, at another point she referred to X as coming to the house the next day (see para 14 above).

75. The Court is not persuaded however that the mistake made by Dr V and Mr P in assuming that the second applicant was referring to the first applicant's boyfriend XY was of such a nature as to deprive the decision to remove the second applicant into care of a legitimate basis. The second applicant was less than five-years-old at the time of the interview and the process of questioning her was a sensitive and delicate one, as was interpreting the sense of her responses, verbally and with regard to her body language. The second applicant frequently did not speak in grammatical sentences and appeared to contradict herself on several occasions. The fact that the second applicant shook her head would not necessarily indicate an unequivocal denial of the question put. Dr B, the consultant psychiatrist instructed by the first applicant, commented positively on the way in which Dr V handled the interview and agreed with her conclusions as to the existence of the abuse and the identity of the abuser (see para 23 above).

76. The Court finds therefore that the use of the emergency procedure to take the second applicant into care may be regarded as a proportionate measure and "necessary in a democratic society" for protecting the second applicant's health and rights.'

[66] We observe that the test applied by the court approximates to that which would be appropriate when considering whether there had been a breach of a duty of care. It is implicit that, had the court accepted the criticisms made by the applicants of the conduct of Dr B and Dr V, a breach of art 8 would have been established.

[67] The court went on to find that there were shortcomings in the procedure that had been adopted, which constituted a breach of art 8 (at 313 (para 83)):

'The Court concludes that the question whether to disclose the video of the interview and its transcript should have been determined promptly to allow the first applicant an effective opportunity to deal with the allegations that her daughter could not be returned safely to her care. The local authority's failure to submit the issue to the court for determination deprived her of an adequate involvement in the decision-making process concerning the care of her daughter and thereby of the requisite protection of their interests. There was in this respect a failure to respect their family life and a breach of art 8 of the Convention.'

[68] The applicants contended that the decision of the House of Lords that they were owed no duty of care had the effect that they were denied an effective remedy, contrary to art 13. The court accepted this submission (at 320 (para 109)):

'The Court considers that the applicants should have had available to them a means of claiming that the local authority's handling of the procedures was responsible for the damage which they suffered and obtaining compensation for that damage. It does not agree with the government that pecuniary compensation would not provide redress. If, as is alleged, psychiatric damage occurred, there may have been elements of medical costs as well as significant pain and suffering to be addressed. The Court does not consider it appropriate in this case to make any findings as to whether only court proceedings could have furnished effective redress, though judicial remedies indeed furnish strong guarantees of independence, access to the victim and family and enforceability of awards in compliance with the requirements of art 13 (see, mutatis mutandis, Klass v Germany (1978) 2 EHRR 214 at 239 (para 67)). The possibility of applying to the Ombudsman and to the Secretary of State did not however provide the applicants with any enforceable right to compensation.'

[69] In relation to damages, the court recorded that the government disputed that there was any clear case of negligence or evidence that the applicants had required physical or psychiatric treatment. The court then proceeded to award damages on the following basis ([2001] 2 FCR 289 at 321 (para 115)):

'The Court recalls that the applicants were reunited after a year's separation (see para 29 above). Though it cannot be asserted that they would have been reunited earlier if the video had been available at the initial stage of the procedure, it cannot be excluded either that it might have reduced the duration of their separation. They thereby suffered a loss of opportunity. In addition, the applicants certainly suffered non-pecuniary damage through distress and anxiety and in the case of the first applicant through feelings of frustration and injustice.'

[70] There have been a number of other recent decisions of the Strasbourg court in relation to child abuse. We shall refer first to an art 3 case. In E v UK [2002] 3 FCR 700 four children complained that their local authority in Scotland had been in breach of its statutory duties in failing to protect them from sexual abuse by their stepfather. They had not pursued a domestic claim to damages, having been advised that, in the light of the decision in Bedfordshire, their claim was doomed to failure. The court held that there had been breaches of their art 3 and art 13 rights. The court found that their treatment by their stepfather constituted inhuman and degrading treatment that fell within the scope of art 3. Indeed, this was not contested. The court then asked the question (at 722 (para 92))—

'whether the local authority (acting through its social work department) was, or ought to have been, aware that the applicants were suffering or at risk of abuse and, if so, whether they took the steps reasonably available to them to protect them from that abuse.'

[71] Once again, we observe, that this question raised issues that were very similar to those that would be raised in a claim based on common law negligence. The court found the conduct of the local authority deficient in a large number of respects and awarded substantial sums of compensation, even taking into account that the applicants had recovered compensation from the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board.

[72] It is notable that, in the context of the claim for breach of art 13, the government argued (at 726) that the applicants had abandoned civil claims which were potentially viable in that they 'arguably raised operational matters not affected by the ruling in X (minors) v Bedfordshire CC'.

[73] We now turn to two art 8 cases. In P, C and S v UK [2002] 3 FCR 1 the applicants were a husband and wife and their daughter. The wife had been convicted in the United States of administering laxatives to her young son, thereby endangering his health. She was also adjudged to suffer from Munchausen Syndrome by Proxy. She moved to England and married. Her daughter was then born. The local authority brought proceedings which resulted in the daughter being removed from her mother at birth and being freed for adoption.

[74] The court found that there had been a breach of art 6, in that the mother had not been provided with legal representation at the proceedings. The court also found that there had been breaches of art 8. It made the following comments (at 29–30):

> '116. ... While the authorities enjoy a wide margin of appreciation in assessing the necessity of taking a child into care, in particular where an emergency situation arises, the court must still be satisfied in the circumstances of the case that there existed circumstances justifying the removal of the child, and it is for the respondent state to establish that a careful assessment of the impact of the proposed care measure on the parents and the child, as well as of the possible alternatives to taking the child into public care, was carried out prior to implementation of a care measure ...
>
> 117. ... The taking into care of a child should normally be regarded as a temporary measure to be discontinued as soon as the circumstances permit, and any measure of implementation of temporary care should be consistent with the ultimate aim of reuniting the natural parent and child ... In this regard a fair balance has to be struck between the interests of the child remaining in care and those of the parent in being reunited with the child ... In carrying out this balancing exercise, the court will attach particular importance to the best interests of the child which, depending on their nature and seriousness, may override those of the parent ...'

[75] Detailed individual criticisms were advanced as to the conduct of the local authority in relation to the care proceedings. The manner in which the court dealt with these (at 35 (para 136)) is of interest:

> 'The court does not propose to attempt to untangle these opposed considerations, which raise difficult and sensitive issues concerning S's welfare. It considers rather that the complexity of the case, and the fine balance which had to be struck between the interests of S and her parents, required that particular importance be attached to the procedural obligations inherent in art 8 of the Convention. It was crucial for the parents in this case to be able to put forward their case as favourably as possible, emphasising for example whatever factors militated in favour of a further assessment of a possible rehabilitation, and for their viewpoints on the possible alternatives to adoption and the continuation of contact even after adoption to be put forward at the appropriate time for consideration by the court.'

[76] When dealing with damages the court found that it could not be asserted that S would not have been adopted but for the flaws in the procedure that the court had identified. Damages of €12,000 were awarded to each parent in respect of a 'loss of opportunity'.

[77] In Venema v Netherlands [2003] 1 FCR 153 the applicants were a married couple and their young daughter. The mother was suspected of suffering from Munchausen Syndrome by Proxy and of harming her daughter. A report was made by medical and child welfare professionals to the Child Welfare Board. The board sought and obtained a provisional order under which the daughter was removed from her parents. After further hearings, and five months of separation, this order was rescinded. Plainly there had been an interference with the enjoyment of respect for family life; the issue was whether this could be justified under art 8(2). The court held that it could not in that the procedure had not been fair. The parents should have been more involved in the decision-making process, and at an earlier stage. €15,000 was awarded to the applicants jointly in respect of 'distress and anxiety as a result of feelings of frustration and injustice' (at 173).

[78] Finally we refer to a recent case in which the Strasbourg court gave consideration to the potential conflict between the interests of the parent and the interests of the child. In Yousef v Netherlands [2002] 3 FCR 577 a father who had been absent for two-and-a-half years complained that, in breach of his art 8 rights, he had been denied the contact that he sought with his child, whose mother had died and who was settled in the family of her brother. The court rejected his application, observing (at 590 (para 73)):

> 'The court reiterates that in judicial decisions where the rights under art 8 of parents and those of a child are at stake, the child's rights must be the paramount consideration. If any balancing of interests is necessary, the interests of the child must prevail (see Elsholz v Germany [2000] 3 FCR 385 at 397–398 (para 52) and TP v UK [2001] 2 FCR 289 at 311 (para 72)).'

The effect of these decisions

[79] Section 2(1) of the Human Rights Act 1998 requires the court to have regard to the jurisprudence of the Strasbourg court where relevant to proceedings under the Act. Thus any English court, when dealing with a claim under the 1998 Act in relation to action or inaction after October 2000 on the part of a local authority in relation to suspected child abuse, must take into account the decisions to which we have just referred. Where a claim alleges breach of art 3, in circumstances such as those in Z v UK and E v UK, the court is likely to have to consider whether the local authority knew, or should have known, that positive action was called for. This will necessarily involve consideration of the conduct of the individuals involved. A claim of this nature will, so it seems to us, necessarily be a claim by a child rather than a parent.

[80] Where a claim alleges breach of art 8, on the ground that a child has been removed from a parent without justification, this will also require examination of the conduct of the individuals involved to see whether, on the particular facts, the action was 'necessary in a democratic society'.

[81] Thus litigation involving factual inquiries of the nature considered above is now a potential consequence of the conduct of those involved in taking decisions in child abuse cases. In these circumstances the reasons of policy that led the House of Lords to hold that no duty of care towards a child arises, in so far as those reasons have not already been discredited by the subsequent decisions of the House of Lords, will largely cease to apply. Substantial damages will be available on proof of individual shortcomings, which will be relevant alike to a claim based on breach of s 6 of the 1998 Act and a claim based on breach of a common law duty of care.

[82] Can there, in these circumstances, be any justification for preserving a rule that no duty of care is owed in negligence because it is not fair, just and reasonable to impose such a duty? It is true that a claim under the 1998 Act will only lie against public authorities and not against the individuals employed by them. But the reality is that claims in negligence are brought primarily to establish liability on the part of the local authorities and individuals are unlikely to be personally at risk. In so far as the risk of legal proceedings will inhibit individuals from boldly taking what they believe to be the right course of action in the delicate situation of a case where child abuse is suspected, we think that this factor will henceforth be present, whether the anticipated litigation is founded on the 1998 Act or on the common law duty of care.

[83] In so far as the position of a child is concerned, we have reached the firm conclusion that the decision in Bedfordshire cannot survive the 1998 Act. Where child abuse is suspected the interests of the child are paramount: see s 1 of the Children Act 1989. Given the obligation of the local authority to respect a child's convention rights, the recognition of a duty of care to the child on the part of those involved should not have a significantly adverse effect on the manner in which they perform their duties. In the context of suspected child abuse, breach of a duty of care in negligence will frequently also amount to a violation of arts 3 or 8. The difference, of course, is that those asserting that wrongful acts or omissions occurred before October 2000 will have no claim under the 1998 Act. This cannot, however, constitute a valid reason of policy for preserving a limitation of the common law duty of care which is not otherwise justified. On the contrary, the absence of an alternative remedy for children who were victims of abuse before October 2000 militates in favour of the recognition of a common law duty of care once the public policy reasons against this have lost their force.

[84] It follows that it will no longer be legitimate to rule that, as a matter of law, no common law duty of care is owed to a child in relation to the investigation of suspected child abuse and the initiation and pursuit of care proceedings. It is possible that there will be factual situations where it is not fair, just or reasonable to impose a duty of care, but each case will fall to be determined on its individual facts.

[85] In reaching this decision we do not suggest that the common law duty of care will replicate the duty not to violate arts 3 and 8. Liability for breach of the latter duty and entitlement to compensation can arise in circumstances where the tort of negligence is not made out. The area of factual inquiry where breaches of the two duties are alleged are, however likely to be the same.

[86] The position in relation to the parent is very different. Where the issue is whether a child should be removed from the parents, the best interests of the child may lead to the answer Yes or No. The Strasbourg cases demonstrate that failure to remove a child from the parents can as readily give rise to a valid claim by the child as a decision to remove the child. The same is not true of the parents' position. It will always be in the parents' interests that the child should not be removed. Thus the child's interests are in potential conflict with the interests of the parents. In view of this, we consider that there are cogent reasons of public policy for concluding that, where child care decisions are being taken, no common law duty of care should be owed to the parents. Our reasoning in reaching this conclusion is supported by that of the Privy Council in B v A-G of New Zealand [2003] 4 All ER 833.

[87] For the above reasons, where consideration is being given to whether the suspicion of child abuse justifies taking proceedings to remove a child from the parents, while a duty of care can be owed to the child, no common law duty of care is owed to the parents.

[88] We now turn to consider the individual appeals in order to resolve the further issues that arise in each. It is necessary in each case to outline the facts.

D v EAST BERKSHIRE COMMUNITY HEALTH NHS TRUST

[89] The claimant is the mother of M who was born on 18 November 1988. From birth, he presented with allergic symptoms which Dr Connell, a consultant paediatrician at the Wexham Park Hospital diagnosed as an allergy. In 1990 he was referred to Professor Strobel, consultant paediatric immunologist at the Great Ormond Street Hospital who diagnosed atopy and food allergic disease. Between 1990 and 1994 he was admitted on at least nine occasions because of allergic reactions of one sort or another. In particular he suffered from asthma attacks and had trouble breathing at night, as a result of which he slept in the same room as his mother. He was therefore referred to Professor Southall at the North Staffordshire Hospital for an assessment as to whether or not it would be possible to provide a monitor for his breathing so that he could sleep in his own room.

[90] He was admitted to the North Staffordshire Hospital between 12 and 15 December 1994. In a telephone conversation with Professor Strobel, Professor Southall said he considered that the appellant was exaggerating symptoms, that his condition was an example of fabricated illness and that a social services strategy meeting was required. He then referred M to Professor Warner, an expert in allergic conditions at Southampton General Hospital. Unfortunately Professor Warner was not given the opportunity to examine M until September 1997. Between 1995 and 1997, it is clear that many treating M, including Professor Strobel believed that his condition could be an example of exaggerated or fabricated illness as Professor Southall had said, and indeed a discharge summary on 15 December 1996 from the Wexham Park Hospital referred to possible 'Munchausen by Proxy'.

[91] Up until the end of 1996 the consultant community paediatrician responsible for M was Dr Lessing. She clearly did not share the concerns which had been expressed by others; and the social services were not at that stage involved. However in December 1996, Dr Whiting took over from Dr Lessing and took the view that M might be at risk from his mother. After a number of discussions between doctors a meeting took place on 13 March 1997 at which M's parents, Professor Strobel, Dr Whiting and three social workers were present. Although it is clear that both Professor Strobel and Dr Whiting remained of the view that, as Professor Strobel said in a letter 'False reporting remains a distinct possibility', that was not disclosed to the appellant. However, some days later the appellant by chance had an opportunity to read the notes and discovered what the view of the doctors was. She sought a second opinion.

[92] Between March 1997 and June 1997 there was substantial discussion between the doctors and the social services which resulted in a case conference on 2 June 1997, at which the appellant, the doctors and the social workers were present. It was determined that M should be included on the 'At Risk Register'.

He was also then referred once again to Professor Warner who was at last able to examine M and concluded, after investigations, that M was indeed suffering from extensive and severe allergies. After this opinion was reported to the social services, he was removed from the at-risk register on 29 September 1997.

[93] The claim is brought against NHS trusts, who are alleged to be vicariously liable for the negligence of the doctors employed by them. In her particulars of claim, the appellant asserts that she suffered a reaction of acute anxiety and depression as a result of the stress of dealing with the accusations against her and the investigations of her and M, and consequential financial loss. The relevant allegations of negligence against the doctors are that they negligently misdiagnosed her as suffering from Munchausen Syndrome by Proxy and negligently maintained that diagnosis until September 1997. It was submitted on her behalf that it was foreseeable that this negligent misdiagnosis could cause her psychological damage and that it would result in the intervention of the social services, with the stress that that would inevitably cause her.

[94] Three preliminary issues were ordered to be tried: firstly whether the claimant was owed a duty of care by any of the defendants, and if so the extent of that duty; secondly whether the injury complained of by the claimant was recognised by law as being compensatable; and thirdly whether the claimant's cause of action against any of the defendants was statute-barred. The judge, Judge Hale, in his judgment of 6 September 2002, found in favour of the appellant on the second and third issues, but held that the doctors owed no duty of care to the claimant and accordingly dismissed her claim. He did so on the basis that although it was arguable that the appellant could foreseeably suffer the kind of injury and damage which occurred, it was not just and reasonable to impose a duty of care in the circumstances; he relied on the speeches in the House of Lords in X and ors (minors) v Bedfordshire CC, M (a minor) v Newham London BC, E (a minor) v Dorset CC [1995] 3 All ER 353, [1995] 2 AC 633 and in particular the speech of Lord Browne-Wilkinson. He considered that public policy considerations militated strongly against any duty of care towards the appellant on the facts of the case.

Can Bedfordshire be distinguished?

[95] Mr Levy submitted that the policy considerations that led the House of Lords to conclude that there was no duty of care in Bedfordshire did not apply to the facts of this case. He identified as the critical distinction the fact that M was referred in the first instance to Professor Southall by his general practitioner at the request of his mother herself. He submitted that in these circumstances Professor Southall owed the duty of care of a medical practitioner to both mother and child. Both should be considered as patients. The case should be approached simply as one of clinical negligence. Professor Southall and, subsequently, Dr Whiting were negligent in their diagnosis of the mother. This negligence predated any involvement on the part of the social services, against whom no claim was made. It was the negligent diagnosis which led to the involvement of the social services.

[96] We do not accept this analysis. M, and not his mother, was the patient. The moment that it was suspected that his injuries might be deliberately exaggerated by his mother, the duty owed to M was in potential conflict with the interests of his mother. It was essential that the professionals should not be inhibited in acting in the best interests of M by concern that they might be held in breach of a duty owed to his mother.

[97] The judge accepted as correct submissions advanced on the part of the defence, which he summarised as follows:

> '... I should be slow to impose any duty that could cut across public policy considerations relating to the care of children. The son, M, was a patient; to impose a concurrent duty in whatever terms in respect of the mother would lead to conflict with their duties towards her son. The conflict here is identical with sex abuse cases. The possibility that somebody who may be subject to Munchausen's by Proxy endangering her son is one which the doctor must concern himself about in the context of his care for the patient, the son. Once a suspicion arises about someone who was the mother of a patient, there was a clear duty to investigate in the interests of M, even if initiating the process might damage the mother. In fact they could be negligent in certain circumstances to the child if they did not do so. The defendants add that the interests of the child are paramount and the questions of child protection override the possibility of the duty that the claimant asserts, however it is expressed.'

[98] The judge observed that these submissions received powerful support from Bedfordshire.

[99] We consider that the judge was correct to accept these submissions. The reasoning in Bedfordshire plainly applies to the facts of this case and does so in a manner which, for the reasons that we have given, remains valid. The judge was correct to rule that no duty of care was owed to the claimant.

Proximity

[100] The judge recited arguments addressed to him on the issue of proximity, but concluded that the issue was a difficult one which he did not need to resolve. In so far as there is difficulty, we think it arises out of the unusual facts of this case and the problem of identifying the cause of action to which, arguably, they give rise. The claim was advanced as one for clinical negligence leading to a false diagnosis, which gave rise to stress-related psychiatric injury. Such a claim is intelligible where the diagnosis is of a serious illness and the patient believes the diagnosis. In this case, however, the claimant discovered the suggestion that she suffered from Munchausen Syndrome by Proxy because she chanced to see medical records relating to her son two years after the suggestion was first made. It has not been alleged that she believed that there was any truth in the suggestion. She was subsequently present at a case conference at which it was decided to place M on the at-risk register, from which he was removed three months later. No other action was taken in relation to the suspicion of the mother's condition. She claims, however, that it and its consequences caused her psychiatric illness.

[101] Every aspect of this claim gives rise to problems, including foreseeability and recoverability in respect of the damage alleged to have been sustained. The judge was not called upon to resolve these issues, but to decide whether they were arguable. He concluded that the issue of foreseeability and recoverability was sufficiently arguable to go to trial and these conclusions have not been challenged. In these circumstances, we would not have thought it right to refuse to permit this action to go to trial had the sole challenge been that there was no proximity.

[102] We would add one reflection which occurred to us after the hearing had been concluded. On one view of the facts this claim has the elements of a claim for defamation. There are statutory defences to such a claim, including that of qualified privilege. It cannot be open to a claimant to by-pass these defences by advancing a claim for defamation in the guise of a claim for negligence.

Witness immunity

[103] No plea of witness immunity was advanced before the judge. We shall consider this matter in the appeal in K and another v Dewsbury Health Care NHS Trust and another, where it is a live issue. The problems in relation to the cause of action make consideration of witness immunity an unrealistic and hypothetical exercise. It is certainly far from clear that it would be open to Professor Southall to invoke witness immunity in relation to the view he expressed at the end of 1994 and we would not have been prepared to rule that the action was bound to fail because of the protection afforded by witness immunity.

[104] For the reasons that we have given the appeal in the East Berkshire case will be dismissed.

K AND ANOTHER v DEWSBURY HEALTHCARE NHS TRUST AND ANOTHER

[105] The appellants are R, who was nine years old at the relevant time and her father. R suffered from a disease known as Schamberg's disease which produces discoloured patches on the skin. Her mother had taken her to her general practitioner in September 1997 about what she described as bruising to R's legs. The marks disappeared after treatment, and no diagnosis of Schamberg's disease was made at the time. On 15 March 1998, R hurt herself in the genital area whilst riding her bicycle. On 17 March her swimming teacher expressed concern about the marks on her legs, so R's mother again took her to the general practitioner who referred her to Dr Wilson a consultant paediatrician at the Dewsbury District Hospital. Her father took R there that same day. Dr Wilson's provisional diagnosis was that the marks did not appear to be the result of skin disease but were suggestive of abuse. She informed social services. R was examined at the hospital and Dr Wilson concluded that she had been sexually abused. Her mother was informed of this. As a result the father and his son, R's elder brother, were told that they should not sleep at home when R was released from hospital. The father and mother were stopped from seeing R in the hospital that evening in front of other patients and visitors who included members of the Gujarati community. R remained in the hospital until 27 March 1998. The father was unable to visit her at all during that period. All of these matters became known in the family's local community. By 27 March, the diagnosis of Schamberg's disease was made and no further steps were taken by the social services. It was accepted that there was no evidence of abuse.

[106] The claims are brought against both the NHS trust responsible for the hospital and the local authority responsible for the social services. The father claims in negligence damages for psychiatric injury and financial loss resulting from the misdiagnosis and the steps taken by the social services which, he submits, were the foreseeable result, particularly within his community, of an allegation of sexual abuse. R also claims damages for psychiatric injury resulting from the misdiagnosis. The respondents applied to strike out the claims under CPR 3.4, alternatively for summary judgment under Pt 24.

[107] In his judgment dated 22 September 2002, Judge Grenfell held that R had an arguable claim for clinical negligence against Dr Wilson, and thus against the first respondent NHS trust, which claim should be permitted to proceed. The trust has not appealed against that finding. So far as the father is concerned, the judge found that it would not be fair, just and reasonable to impose a duty of care towards him on the part of the trust. The father appeals against that finding. The judge held that the local authority was protected from liability by witness immunity. He further held that it would not be fair, just and reasonable to impose on the local authority a duty of care towards either the father or R.

R's claim against the local authority

[108] Judge Grenfell applied the decision in Bedfordshire in the following manner. Once the possibility of child abuse had been identified and the social services were involved public policy precluded the finding of a duty of care. This did not, however, preclude a claim based on negligence of Dr Wilson in making the prior diagnosis of abuse that initiated the child protection investigation. Thus there was an arguable claim against the NHS trust by R. So far as her father was concerned, any psychiatric consequences that he suffered could only be attributed to the child protection investigation itself. At that stage, his claim, and equally his daughter's claim, was precluded by Bedfordshire.

[109] For the reasons that we have given, we do not consider that Bedfordshire stands in the way of a claim by R against the local authority for negligence in the manner in which their employees contributed to the child protection investigation and we reverse the judge's decision to give judgment in favour of the local authority on that point.

Can Bedfordshire be distinguished?

[110] Mr Levy argued that the reasoning in Bedfordshire did not apply to the facts of this case and that we should approach it as a case in clinical negligence where the false diagnosis was foreseeably likely to cause physical harm to third parties. We consider that the judge's careful application of Bedfordshire was correct. The reasons of public policy that we have identified preclude any finding of a duty of care to R's father.

Proximity

[111] Proximity does not seem to have been in issue in the court below. Before us it was taken in relation to the father's claim and not, of course, R's. Once again it is necessary to consider the nature of the father's claim. The psychiatric injury in respect of which he claims is said, as we understand it, to result from the stress of being wrongly accused, to the knowledge of his local community, of sexually abusing his daughter. Given an arguable case on foreseeability and causation, we would not rule that there was insufficient proximity between Dr Wilson and the other professionals involved and R's father to give rise to a duty of care.

[112] We would add that it is a difficult and artificial exercise to distinguish between proximity and the question of whether it is fair, just and reasonable to impose a duty of care. The reason why we have held that no duty of care is owed to the father is, essentially, that it would conflict with a duty owed to a person more proximate than he, namely his daughter. To this extent it could, perhaps, be said that the father's relationship is insufficiently proximate.

Witness immunity

[113] Judge Grenfell held that the local authority personnel were entitled to the protection of witness immunity. He held that because the social workers were potential witnesses in criminal or child protection proceedings that might result from their investigations, they could not be subject to a claim for negligence in relation to those investigations. As we read his judgment, he left open the question of whether witness immunity provided a defence to the doctors employed by the trust.

[114] In so finding Judge Grenfell followed the approach of Lord Browne-Wilkinson in relation to the interview conducted by the child psychiatrist in the Newham case. Lord Browne-Wilkinson first referred to the basis upon which witness immunity is accorded to the preparation of statements for the purpose of a criminal prosecution. He then held that the same principle applies to protect investigations by a local authority as to whether to bring proceedings for the protection of a child from abuse. He held ([1995] 3 All ER 353 at 386, [1995] 2 AC 633 at 755):

> 'In the present case, the psychiatrist was instructed to carry out the examination of the child for the specific purpose of discovering whether the child had been sexually abused and (if possible) the identity of the abuser. The psychiatrist must have known that, if such abuse were discovered, proceedings by the local authority for the protection of the child would ensue and that her findings would be the evidence on which those proceedings would be based. It follows in my judgment that such investigations having such an immediate link with possible proceedings in pursuance of a statutory duty cannot be made the basis of subsequent claims.'

[115] Witness immunity has recently received more detailed consideration by the House of Lords than that which it received in Bedfordshire. In Darker (suing as personal representative of Docker, decd) v Chief Constable of the West Midlands Police [2000] 4 All ER 193, [2001] 1 AC 435 the claimants sought damages from the police for conspiracy to injure and misfeasance in public office on the ground that they had fabricated evidence against them for use in a criminal trial. The judge struck out the claim on the ground that the police were covered by an immunity or absolute privilege. The Court of Appeal upheld the judgment, but the House of Lords reversed the decision. Lord Hope of Craighead drew a distinction between carrying out an investigation and preparing evidence to be given as a witness at a trial. He said ([2000] 4 All ER 193 at 197, [2001] 1 AC 435 at 448):

> 'But there is a crucial difference between statements made by police officers prior to giving evidence and things said or done in the ordinary course of preparing reports for use in evidence, where the functions that they are performing can be said to be those of witnesses or potential witnesses as they are related directly to what requires to be done to enable them to give evidence, and their conduct at earlier stages in the case, when they are performing their functions as enforcers of the law or as investigators. The actions which the police take as law enforcers or as investigators may, of course, become the subject of evidence. It may then be necessary for the police officers concerned to assume the functions of witnesses at the trial to describe what they did or what they heard or what they saw. But there is no good reason on grounds of public policy to extend the immunity which attaches to things said or done by them when they are describing these matters to things done by them which cannot fairly be said to form part of their participation in the judicial process as witnesses. The purpose of the immunity is to protect witnesses against claims made against them for something said or done in the course of giving or preparing to give evidence. It is not to be used to shield the police from action for things done while they are acting as law enforcers or investigators.'

[116] It may not be easy in some cases to draw the line between investigation and preparation of evidence in the case of suspected child abuse, but in the Newham case it seems to us that the activities of the social workers probably fell into the category of investigations. We say 'probably' because the findings of fact as to the precise role that they played are sparse. At all events we have reached the conclusion that the judge, who did not have the benefit of having Darker's case cited to him, erred in making a firm finding that witness immunity precluded any liability on the part of those employed by the local authority.

[117] It follows, for the reasons that we have given, that the appeal by R will be allowed, so that her claim against the local authority can proceed, but that her father's appeal will be dismissed.

K AND ANOTHER v OLDHAM NHS TRUST AND ANOTHER

[118] The appellants are the mother and father of M who was born on 24 July 1998. On 26 September 1998 whilst M was in the care of her grandmother she started to scream and appeared to be in pain. She was taken to the Royal Oldham Hospital where she was seen in the Accident and Emergency Department. An X-ray of her left thigh showed an oblique displaced fracture. The second respondent who was the consultant paediatrician, attended the casualty department, interviewed the parents and the grandmother and concluded that it was an 'inflicted injury'. He recorded this, underlined, in the clinical notes. The police and social services were informed.

[119] Between 27 September 1998 and 16 October 1998, the position was considered by the social services; and a child protection case conference was held. The second respondent maintained his opinion that the injury was non-accidental. Accordingly an application was made for an interim care order, which was made on 16 October 1998 granting the local authority parental responsibility of M. She was ultimately discharged from hospital on 23 October 1998 into the care of her aunt.

[120] The matter came back to court on 23 December 1998 when Judge Wilkinson, having heard evidence, determined that the injuries were not accidental. Care of M was then given to the aunt. In March 1999 M suffered bilateral femoral fractures whilst in the care of her aunt. Detailed examinations then followed from which it became plain that M had osteogenesis imperfecta, a bone condition rendering M particularly susceptible to fracture. Accordingly, an application was made for the interim care order to be discharged which was granted on 17 June 1999.

[121] The appellants claim damages for the psychological distress resulting from their separation from M until 17 June 1999, on the grounds that the diagnosis of non-accidental injury was both made and maintained negligently. Two preliminary issues relevant to this appeal were ordered to be tried: firstly whether there was a duty of care owed by either of the respondents to the appellants; secondly whether they had a valid claim under the convention justiciable in the English courts. There was a third preliminary issue relating to a claim brought on behalf of M which was whether the medical evidence put forward to support her claim disclosed an injury for which the law recognised a remedy. As far as this latter issue was concerned, the judge concluded that it did not; and there is no appeal from his finding. As far as the first issue is concerned, he concluded that for the reasons given by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Bedfordshire there was no duty owed to the appellants. As to the second, he concluded that they did not. Accordingly he dismissed the appellant's claims.

Can Bedfordshire be distinguished?

[122] Once again Mr Levy argued that the reasoning in Bedfordshire did not apply to the facts of this case. He submitted that at the start of the story there was a duty of care owed by Dr Blumenthal both to M and M's parents. He emphasised that M was taken to the hospital by her parents. At that point there was no question of Dr Blumenthal's duty to the child conflicting with his duty to the parents. Conflict only arose after he had negligently involved the social services and the police. It was not open to Dr Blumenthal to argue that the consequences of his negligence absolved him from any duty of care.

[123] This argument was advanced before Simon J and rejected by him. He held:

> 'In my view this approach is unrealistic since inevitably the initial diagnosis will be refined as further information becomes available. Indeed, the claimants themselves allege that there was an obligation to refine and develop an initial diagnosis. Furthermore, the diagnosis that was reached necessarily involved an obligation owed to the child and to the OMBC [Oldham] and there is no room for an additional duty owed to the parents: see Powell v Boladz (1997) 39 BMLR 35 at 45, and X v Bedfordshire (the Newham case): the observations of Bingham MR [1994] 4 All ER 602 at 621–622, [1995] 2 AC 633 at 665: "... the mother was not in any meaningful sense the psychiatrist's patient. The psychiatrist's duty was to act in the interests of the child, and that might very well mean acting in a way that would be adverse to the ... interests of the mother ..." Once there is material on which the doctor can properly initiate the multi-disciplinary investigation, the doctor cannot owe a duty to the parents in relation to the diagnosis which commences the process. In the present case the claimants do not contend that there was no material upon which the doctor could act; and there is no point which they can identify when a special relationship with the parents can be said to exist, which is not in conflict with the duty to the child and the OMBC. By setting in motion the multi-disciplinary process, the doctor acts in the interests of his patient, and begins a process, which is designed to ensure that recognition is given to a number of conflicting factors, including the interests of the parents, and which is ultimately resolved by the court.'

[124] We agree with this analysis. The moment that Dr Blumenthal suspected that M had been abused, and before he took any action in consequence of this suspicion, his duty to M was in potential conflict with the interests of her parents. The judge was right to find that the case was covered by Bedfordshire and that no duty of care was owed to the parents.

Proximity

[125] The judge held that, because the defendants' duty of care was owed exclusively to M, the relationship between the parents and the defendants was too remote to give rise to a duty of care upon the latter. We refer to our discussion on this point at [112], above. We have some difficulty with the proposition that there is insufficient proximity between doctors and care workers, who are responsible for the removal of a child from her parents, and those parents. We prefer to hold that the reason why no duty of care is owed to the parents is because it would not be fair, just and reasonable and not because of lack of proximity.

Witness immunity

[126] At the case management conference Judge Holman determined that the issue of witness immunity was one which required evidence. For this reason it was not one of the preliminary issues considered by the judge below. In these circumstances it would not be appropriate for us to consider this issue on the material before us. In the light of our other findings, this issue is, in any event, academic.

[127] For the reasons that we have given this appeal will be dismissed.

Appeals in East Berkshire and Oldham cases dismissed. Appeal in Dewsbury case allowed in part.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

B and others v Attorney General of New Zealand

[2003] UKPC 61

PRIVY COUNCIL

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD, LORD HUTTON, LORD HOBHOUSE OF WOODBOROUGH, LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY AND LORD WALKER OF GESTINGTHORPE

5 JUNE, 16 JULY 2003

Negligence – Duty to take care – Existence of duty – Children – Department of Social Welfare, New Zealand – Complaint of sexual abuse of child made against parent – Parent and children bringing proceedings in respect of alleged failure to investigate complaint of sexual abuse properly – Whether duty of care owed to parents and children.

A social worker made a complaint under the Children and Young Persons Act (New Zealand) 1974 that the father of two daughters aged seven and five had sexually abused his younger daughter. That Act imposed on the Director General of Social Welfare the duty of inquiry where he knew or had reason to suspect that any child or young person was suffering or likely to suffer from ill-treatment. The father and the daughters subsequently claimed damages in respect of the allegedly negligent way in which the complaint had been investigated by the professionals involved. At first instance the judge struck out the proceedings summarily on interlocutory application as proceedings which were bound to fail. That decision was upheld by the Court of Appeal of New Zealand. The father and the daughters appealed. The question raised on the appeal was whether the case was distinguishable from a decision of the New Zealand Court of Appeal where the court declined to strike out a claim in negligence brought by a child in respect of an alleged failure by social workers to investigate a complaint that his adoptive parents were neglecting him, holding that the statutory framework within which the social welfare department and its social workers acted was consistent with the imposition of a common law duty of care.

Held – The common law duty of care was owed by the Director-General of Social Welfare and individual social workers to the child or young person in respect of whom the statutory duty to arrange for a prompt inquiry existed in a particular case. The common law duty was temporally co-extensive with the statutory duty. In the instant case the duty was owed to the elder daughter as much as the younger daughter since if the younger daughter's abuse allegation had been well founded the elder daughter would also have been at risk. No common law duty was owed to the father. It would not be satisfactory to impose a common law duty on the department and the individual professionals in favour of the alleged victims or potential victims and, at the same time, in favour of the alleged perpetrator. Moreover, a duty of care in favour of the alleged perpetrator would lack the juridical basis on which the existence of a common law duty of care was largely founded. Accordingly the daughters' appeal would be allowed and the father's appeal dismissed (see [24], [29], [30], [33], below).

Notes

For public services implementing statutory duties, see 33 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 617.

Cases referred to in judgment

A-G v Prince [1998] 1 NZLR 262, NZ CA.

B v A-G [1999] 2 NZLR 296, CA; affg [1997] NZFLR 550

Simpson v A-G [1994] 3 NZLR 667, NZ CA.

X and ors (minors) v Bedfordshire CC, M (a minor) v Newham LBC, E (a minor) v Dorset CC [1995] 3 All ER 353, [1995] 2 AC 633, [1995] 3 WLR 152, HL.

Appeal

The plaintiffs, B and his two daughters, appealed from the decision of the New Zealand Court of Appeal (Keith, Blanchard and Tipping JJ) on 18 March 1999 ([1999] 2 NZLR 296) dismissing the plaintiffs' appeal from the decision of Gallen J ([1997] NZFLR 550) allowing the application of the defendants, the Attorney General of New Zealand on behalf of the Minister and Department of Social Welfare, a social worker and a registered clinical psychologist, to strike out proceedings brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants claiming damages for negligence on the grounds that they disclosed no reasonable cause of action. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead.

John Gibson QC and Christopher Sygrove (both of the New Zealand bar) (instructed by Radcliffes LeBrasseur) for the plaintiffs.

Terence Arnold QC and Christopher Mathieson (both of the New Zealand bar) (instructed by Moon Beever) for the first and third defendants.

Kristy McDonald QC (of the New Zealand bar) (instructed by Moon Beever) for the second defendant.

The Board took time for consideration.

16 July 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD.

[1] In A-G v Prince [1998] 1 NZLR 262 a five-judge Court of Appeal, by a majority of four to one, declined to strike out a claim in negligence brought by a child in respect of an alleged failure by social workers to investigate a complaint that his adoptive parents were neglecting him. In the present case a father and his two daughters (D1 and D2) claim damages in respect of the allegedly negligent way a social worker and a clinical psychologist investigated a complaint that the father had sexually abused D2. In Prince's case the claim was founded on an alleged failure to investigate at all. In the present case the claim is founded on an alleged failure to investigate properly. The question raised by this appeal is whether the present case is distinguishable from the decision in Prince's case. In addition to the social worker and the psychologist, the Attorney General is a defendant. He is sued on behalf of the Minister of Social Welfare and the Department of Social Welfare.

THE HISTORY

[2] As in Prince's case, the present case comes before the court on interlocutory applications by the defendants to strike out the proceedings summarily as proceedings which are bound to fail. No trial has yet taken place. Thus, in accordance with well-established principles, these applications are to be approached on the footing that at the trial, if one takes place, the plaintiffs may succeed in proving the facts they allege in their statement of claim. It is right to record, however, that all the defendants deny the alleged negligence. At first instance Gallen J struck out the proceedings: B v A-G [1997] NZFLR 550. The Court of Appeal, comprising Keith, Blanchard and Tipping JJ, dismissed an appeal: [1999] 2 NZLR 296.

[3] The incidents of which the plaintiffs complain took place as long ago as July 1988. D1 was then aged seven. Her sister, D2, was five years old. The father was a widower. D2 told a friend at school that her father had sexually abused her. The friend told her mother who, in turn, informed the Department of Social Welfare. The department began an investigation on 18 July 1988. On the following day at the request of the department the second defendant, a registered clinical psychologist, separately interviewed the two girls at their school in the presence of a senior teacher and the third defendant, a social worker employed by the department. The second defendant had considerable experience in the field of child sex abuse and was a member of the sexual abuse team at Wellington.

[4] Later on the same day, 19 July, the social worker laid a complaint under s 27 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1974 on the ground that she reasonably believed the children were in need of care, protection or control because their physical or mental health or emotional state was being avoidably impaired or neglected (sub-s (2)(b)) or the children were being, or were likely to be, neglected or ill-treated (sub-s (2)(c)). As a result a warrant was obtained for the removal of the children from the care of their father pursuant to s 28 of the 1974 Act. The deputy registrar of the district court was satisfied there was reasonable ground for suspecting the children were likely to be ill-treated, as provided in s 28(1). The children were then taken from their home and placed in foster care.

[5] At the time the father knew nothing of the allegations, the interviews or their results. The first he knew of any of these matters was when, later on the same day, he was interviewed by the police. He was told the children had been taken away and that he was not to attempt to find them or get in touch with them. He was not told where the children were. At all times the father denied the allegations against him. No charges were ever laid by the police.

[6] The father then made arrangements to leave the family home and for the children to return there in the care of an employee. He also made arrangements for his parents to return to New Zealand from England. They had earlier helped him with the care of the children following the death of his wife.

[7] Two days after the interviews, on 21 July, the social worker arranged for the children to be examined by a doctor. The doctor concluded there was no evidence to suggest full penile penetration in respect of either child, but her examination did not rule out lesser degrees of penetration or other forms of sexual molestation.

[8] The statement of claim alleges respects in which, it is said, the interview carried out by the psychologist, and the investigation carried out by the social worker, were conducted negligently. For instance, it is said the psychologist failed to note or evaluate important factual errors. D2 gave a detailed description of an attic in her home although the psychologist knew D2's home was a single storey building. D2 said both she and her elder sister, D1, had been sexually abused by their father. But the psychologist ignored answers given by D1

denying sexual abuse of either her or her sister. The social worker failed to follow up a report made to her by the doctor that at the outset of the doctor's examination D2 said to the doctor that sometimes she, D2, told lies. Within two weeks of the issue of the warrant D2 told a friend of the father that the allegations were untrue, and that she had told this untruth to the ladies who had come to see her and her sister at the school because she was allowed to tell lies at school. This information was passed to the department by telephone but, it is said, this was not acted upon by any of the defendants.

[9] The complaint made by the social worker came before AB Beatson DCJ for hearing on 5 December 1988, together with an application by the father's parents for custody of the children. The hearing occupied nine weeks of court sitting time. On 13 April 1989, before the hearing had been completed, the complaint was amended to add s 27(2)(e) as an additional ground on which the children were in need of care, protection or control: that the children were exhibiting behaviour beyond the control of their father. The father admitted this amended ground of complaint under s 27(2)(e) but not the original 'abuse' complaints under s 27(2)(b) and (c). With the consent of all concerned, including the father, the court made a supervision order and an order giving shared custody of the children to the father's parents and the father. The father's parents and the father were also appointed joint guardians of the children.

[10] Following this hearing the father's parents went back to the United Kingdom with D1 and D2. The girls returned to New Zealand with their grandmother in late January 1990 and were reunited with their father. The supervision ended by order of the court in April 1991.

[11] These proceedings were started in 1993. The children claim general damages of $50,000 and exemplary damages of $500,000 for upset to their lives and the trauma of being removed from their father. Their father claims a like amount of general damages and exemplary damages, together with special damages in respect of matters such as child minding expenses, medical expenses and legal costs, and his parents' air fares and other expenses.

PRINCE'S CASE

[12] Before their Lordships' Board none of the parties challenged the correctness of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Prince's case or the reasoning of the majority. Their Lordships are content to proceed on this basis. The relevant legislation is not now in force and has not been so for some years. Accordingly, as already noted, the sole issue before the Board is whether the present case falls within the principle enunciated by the Court of Appeal in Prince's case regarding what was there referred to as 'the 1983 complaint'. This was a complaint that although the Department of Social Welfare knew the adoptive parents were not looking after their adopted child the department 'did nothing': it failed to investigate the complaint 'adequately or at all'.

[13] Whether the manner of discharge of a statutory function admits of a concurrent common law duty of care depends primarily upon the scheme and policy of the relevant legislation. As noted by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in X and ors (minors) v Bedfordshire CC, M (a minor) v Newham LBC, E (a minor) v Dorset CC [1995] 3 All ER 353 at 371, [1995] 2 AC 633 at 739, the statutory framework within which the act or omission took place is a profoundly influential factor when deciding the existence and ambit of a common law duty. For this reason the Court of Appeal in Prince's case left on one side the current New Zealand legislation, the Children, Young Persons and Their Families Act 1989, describing this as a very different legislative scheme. The Court of Appeal also considered that the 1974 Act was 'clearly distinguishable' from the statutes before the House of Lords in X and ors (minors) v Bedfordshire CC. The court focused its attention on the 1974 Act itself.

[14] Section of the 1974 Act set out its objects. These included promotion of the welfare of children by assisting individuals and families to overcome social problems confronting them, promotion of the welfare of the family, and assisting parents in the discharge of their parental responsibilities. Section 4 provided that any person exercising powers conferred by the Act shall treat the interests of the child as the first and paramount consideration. Section 5 imposed positive duties on the Director-General of Social Welfare to undertake preventive work:

> '(1) It shall be the duty of the Director-General to take positive action and such steps under this Act as in his opinion may assist in preventing children or young persons from being exposed to unnecessary suffering or deprivation ...
>
> (2) In pursuance of the duty imposed on him by subsection (1) of this section the Director-General shall arrange—(a) for prompt inquiry where he knows or has reason to suspect that any child or young person is—(i) Suffering or likely to suffer from ill-treatment or from inadequate care or control ...'

[15] Against this background Richardson P, in a judgment of himself, Thomas and Keith JJ, A-G v Prince [1998] 1 NZLR 263 at 282 explained why he considered there was sufficient proximity to found a duty of care:

> 'The 1974 Act is directed to the care and protection of children and young persons. The class of persons for whom the statutory protection was enacted is clear. The discharge of the particular function calls for the exercise of special social work skills and responsibilities. There is a professional relationship between social worker and client child or young person. Children and young persons are seen as vulnerable. Because of their youth and immaturity they cannot assert their own rights and needs. Others must do it for them. Just as it is right that the department and its professionals have a generalised duty under the statute to promote the well-being of children and young persons (s 3), so, too, when exercising their statutory duties in respect of a particular child or young person they assume a responsibility to that child or young person (s 4). And the duty to consider a complaint of neglect is specific to the particular child or young person, the subject of the complaint (s 5). While a deprived child or young person may have no particular expectation that the department will seek to assist him or her, given general community expectations reflected in the statute it is not unreasonable to conclude that a child or young person is to be regarded as implicitly relying on the department and its officers to consider complaints that they are in need. Finally, it is readily foreseeable that inadequate consideration of complaints that a young person is neglected might cause harm ... the department is not in a position to say that the imposition of a duty of care would expose the officer and the department to a burden out of proportion to their own moral culpability.'

[16] On wider policy considerations, Richardson P observed (at 284):

'That statutory scheme does not lead inevitably to a conclusion that there was a common law duty of care to take proper steps to investigate allegations of neglect and thereafter to take such further and successive steps as the circumstances required. The question is whether it is just and reasonable to superimpose a common law duty of care on the department in relation to the performance of its statutory responsibilities for the protection and care of children and young persons. But, given the conclusion that proximity is satisfied, the statutory framework within which the department and its social workers act is consistent with the imposition of a common law duty of care. The narrow argument is that liability may arise where the person charged with the responsibility either unreasonably fails to carry out the duty to consider the matter or reaches a conclusion so unreasonable as to show its failure to do its duty ... it cannot be said that a common law duty in these terms would cut across the whole statutory scheme. At that early triggering step a specific positive duty rests on the Director-General. At that step it does not require participation with other agencies. The duty suggested does not conflict with any other duty by the department and its officers. On the contrary it enhances it.'

[17] Richardson P rejected a contrary argument based on the difficulty and delicacy of the social worker's task and its judgmental nature. A plaintiff will have difficulty in proving that an assessment made by a social worker fell outside the bounds sanctioned by professional opinion. But considerations of this kind cannot absolve the department and social workers from the responsibility of considering and responding to specific complaints with professional skill and care. Richardson P also rejected a submission that the imposition of a duty would or might cause the department and social workers to adopt a more cautious and defensive approach to their duties. Like lawyers and doctors, social workers are professionals. At that triggering step, and at other steps, they should be expected to have shouldered willingly a standard of reasonable skill and care that their private sector counterparts were expected to discharge. Difficulties of reaching conclusions on causation and damages, although making claims very difficult to establish, are not adequate justification for ruling out the possibility of any claim for negligence whatever the circumstances.

[18] Tipping J (at 292) delivered a concurring judgment. The statutory framework supports a common law duty to investigate with reasonable care a complaint that a child was not being looked after properly. To the extent possible the law should reflect the reasonable expectations of the society it serves. To hold that the Director-General owed no duty in the circumstances would not only fail to meet society's reasonable expectations. It would cause legitimate concern why the breach of an express public duty afforded no private remedy to a person for whose benefit the public duty existed in the first place.

[19] Henry J disagreed. Failure of an alleged duty to inquire would, on its own, be insufficient to establish an entitlement to damages. There would need to be a duty to protect, by taking reasonable consequential follow-up action. But under the 1974 Act the avoidance of harmful consequences involves a carefully constructed and integrated process, including the possible involvement of police, teachers, doctors and others, resulting ultimately in the court taking the final necessary steps in the exercise of a discretion. It is not just or reasonable to impose such a duty.

THE DECISIONS OF GALLEN J AND THE COURT OF APPEAL

[20] In the present case Gallen J delivered his judgment after the decision of the House of Lords in X and ors (minors) v Bedfordshire CC, but before the decision of the Court of Appeal in Prince's case. In reaching his decision to strike out the proceedings Gallen J was clearly much influenced by the decision of the House of Lords.

[21] In the Court of Appeal all members of the court seem to have envisaged that the common law duty of care enunciated in Prince's case would not subsist in the present case once the social worker had applied to the court for a warrant under s 28 on 19 July 1988. The joint judgment of Keith and Blanchard JJ was delivered by Keith J. He held ([1999] 2 NZLR 296 at 304 (para 26)) that the duty of care recognised in Prince's case is 'limited in time to the triggering and closely-related steps':

> '[The duty of care] is to be tied to the "positive duty" stated by Parliament relating to that initial stage of deciding whether to arrange a 'prompt inquiry' and when appropriate arranging it.'

[22] Keith J gave the reason for this temporal limit on the scope of the duty of care (para 27):

> '... the statutory scheme cuts across a common law duty of care once the triggering step of the "prompt inquiry" is completed and the officials are moving beyond that initial obligation and are assembling relevant information before considering whether to exercise their statutory powers.'

He then noted (at para 28) that the breaches of duty alleged in the present case 'fall outside that initial period of positive statutory obligations during which, in accordance with Prince's case, a common law duty of care may also arise'.

[23] In a separate judgment Tipping J (at para 39) drew the same distinction. There is no duty of care beyond 'the triggering step'. This step encompasses 'the whole process of investigation up until steps were taken to obviate the perceived harm to the child'. This is for policy reasons, largely of the kind identified by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in X and ors (minors) v Bedfordshire CC. Here, it was obtaining and executing the warrant that caused the father and the children the harm and loss for which they claim compensatory damages.

THE DUTY TO INQUIRE

[24] Their Lordships confess to having difficulty with the decision of the Court of Appeal. They respectfully consider it emasculates the scope of the common law duty of care recognised in Prince's case. Their Lordships can see nothing in Prince's case to suggest that the concurrent common law duty is less extensive temporally than the statutory duty imposed on the Director-General by s 5(2)(a) of the 1974 Act.

[25] What, then, is the ambit of this statutory duty? Under s 5(2)(a) of the 1974 Act the Director-General is under a duty to 'arrange for prompt inquiry' where he knows or has reason to suspect a child is suffering, or likely to suffer, ill-treatment. This obligation to arrange a prompt inquiry comprehends a duty to arrange and conduct an adequate inquiry. The Director-General would not discharge his statutory obligation under s 5(2)(a) by merely 'arranging' for an inquiry, whatever precisely that may mean. He must conduct whatever inquiry is necessary. A duty to set an inquiry by his own officials in motion, but no duty to take reasonable steps to see the inquiry duly proceeded, would be a poor sort of statutory duty. That cannot be the proper interpretation of s 5.

[26] Take the facts in the present case. On being told of what D2 had said at school the Director-General had reason to suspect that D2, and consequently D1 also, were at risk. He had reason to suspect they were suffering or likely to suffer from ill-treatment. So he was under a duty to arrange an inquiry, and under a duty to do so promptly. The psychologist's visit to the school, along with the social worker, was a first step in discharge of this duty. The social worker then proceeded to apply to the court, on the same day, for a warrant for the removal of the two girls from their home. The warrant was obtained and executed. That did not end the inquiry or the Director-General's duty in that regard. The grant of urgent interlocutory relief by the court did not mean that the department's obligation to conduct an adequate inquiry was satisfied. Understandably and properly, the department next arranged for D1 and D2 to be examined by a doctor. But that also cannot be regarded as the end of the inquiry. Why should it, especially when the outcome was inconclusive? If, as alleged, material further information thereafter came to hand the Director-General's s 5(2) duty required him to follow up that information. This was so irrespective of whether the information tended to support or undermine the abuse allegation. It cannot be that the department was under a duty to investigate further only if the further information tended to support the allegation.

[27] Given that the Director-General's statutory duty under s 5, as distinct from the exercise by him of his discretionary powers, extends thus far, there seems to their Lordships to be no basis on which the concurrent common law duty of care recognised in Prince's case should have a less extensive temporal scope. Substantially the same considerations apply to the conduct of the inquiry at the later stage as at the earlier stage. At the later stage, if not at the outset, other agencies, including the police, would be involved. They were in the present case, more or less from the very beginning. At that time inquiry into sexual offences against children was carried out by a multi-disciplinary sexual abuse team procedure. The police interviewed the father on the same day as the children were first interviewed. But this multi-disciplinary procedure is not inconsistent with the Director-General having a continuing positive statutory duty to inquire, that is, to investigate. That being so, the concurrent common law duty he owed the children continued to exist, reinforcing his statutory duty. Such an investigatory obligation is of course quite distinct from making decisions and assessments on what should be done in the light of what is revealed by the investigation.

[28] For these reasons their Lordships respectfully part company with Keith and Blanchard JJ when they express the view that the common law duty of care enunciated in Prince's case is to be limited to the 'initial stage of deciding whether to arrange a 'prompt inquiry' and when appropriate arranging it' (para 26) and with Tipping J when he confined the duty of care to the period ending when steps were taken to obviate the perceived harm (para 39).

THE DUTY OF CARE

[29] It is clear from Prince's case that the Court of Appeal in that case envisaged that the common law duty of care was owed by the Director-General. Further, it is reasonably clear that the Court of Appeal also envisaged that such a duty would be owed by the individual social worker: see [1998] 1 NZLR 262 at 285. Some support for this view, although of limited weight, is to be found in s 41(8) of the 1974 Act. This provision exempted a social worker who furnished a report under that section from civil and criminal liability unless he acted 'in bad faith or without reasonable care'. If a social worker owes a common law duty of care to the child, so must a clinical psychologist, another professional, who undertakes an assessment of the child. There can be nothing surprising in holding that a psychologist owes to a child whom she is examining a duty to exercise due professional skill and care.

[30] To whom is the duty of care owed? Clearly the duty is owed to the child or young person in respect of whom the statutory duty to arrange for a prompt inquiry exists in the particular case. In the present case that is D1 as much as D2. If D2's abuse allegation was well founded D1 also was at risk. But their Lordships consider no common law duty of care was owed to the father. He stands in a very different position. He was the alleged perpetrator of the abuse. In an inquiry into an abuse allegation the interests of the alleged perpetrator and of the children as the alleged victims are poles apart. Those conducting the inquiry must act in good faith throughout. But to impose a common law duty of care on the department and the individual professionals in favour of the alleged victims or potential victims and, at one and the same time, in favour of the alleged perpetrator would not be satisfactory. Moreover, a duty of care in favour of the alleged perpetrator would lack the juridical basis on which the existence of a common law duty of care was largely founded in Prince's case. The decision in Prince's case rests heavily on the feature that the duty imposed on the Director-General by s 5(2)(a) of the 1974 Act is for the benefit of the particular child. Self-evidently this statutory duty was not imposed for the benefit of alleged perpetrators of abuse. To utilise the existence of this statutory duty as the foundation of a common law duty in favour of perpetrators would be to travel far outside the rationale in Prince's case.

WITNESS PRIVILEGE

[31] Miss McDonald QC, representing the psychologist, developed a further ground on which, so she submitted, the proceedings should be struck out. In substance, she submitted, the claim in the present proceedings is that the defendants were negligent in deciding to set the law in motion and in inflicting upon the father and children the proceedings which followed. It is settled law that damages are recoverable for setting the law in motion, if at all, only where malice and absence of reasonable and proper cause can be proved: see Simpson v A-G [1994] 3 NZLR 667 at 673 per Cooke P. There are no such allegations in the present case. From the outset the purpose of the investigation in which the psychologist was involved was to decide whether to bring proceedings to remove the children from their father's care. The conclusion of the psychologist was that the children had been abused and it was this conclusion which led to the decision to seek the warrant. The case is on all fours with that of the psychologist in the Newham case in X and ors (minors) v Bedfordshire CC regarding whom Lord Browne-Wilkinson said ([1995] 3 All ER 353 at 386, [1995] 2 AC 633 at 755) that her investigations had such an immediate link with possible proceedings in pursuance of a statutory duty that they could not be made the basis of subsequent claims.

[32] This submission gives rise to a difficulty which not infrequently arises in striking out applications. Their Lordships do not have sufficient factual information to reach a firm decision on this issue. Their Lordships lack background information about how the sexual abuse team procedure worked in practice and the role of the psychologist. Further information would also be desirable on the detailed sequence of events in the present case, including full details of all aspects of the psychologist's involvement, together with a copy of her report or reports. Without this evidence too much is left to conjecture. This is not a satisfactory basis for attempting to form a view on whether the link between the psychologist's report and the court proceedings was sufficiently close to attract witness privilege. This is an issue on which the facts should be investigated and found at trial before a decision can properly be made.

CONCLUSION

[33] For these reasons their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal by the two children should be allowed but the appeal by their father should be dismissed. So far as the claims by the children are concerned the proceeding should not be struck out but should be allowed to proceed to trial. To that extent the orders of Gallen J and the Court of Appeal will be varied. In permitting the children's claims to proceed their Lordships are mindful of the formidable difficulties in establishing negligence. But, on the basis of the decision in Prince's case, it cannot be said that in law there is no cause of action.

Appeal allowed in part.

Celia Fox Barrister.

P v P (ancillary relief: proceeds of crime)

[2003] EWHC Fam 2260

FAMILY DIVISION

DAME ELIZABETH BUTLER-SLOSS P

15–17 JULY, 8 OCTOBER 2003

Practice – Family Division – Ancillary relief – Arrangement involving acquisition, retention, use or control of criminal property – Guidance – Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, ss 328, 333, 335, 338, 342.

A petitioner in divorce proceedings (the wife) applied for ancillary relief including financial provision. On receiving certain information about the husband's financial position the wife's legal advisers became suspicious that part of the matrimonial assets might be 'criminal property' within the meaning of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 and were therefore concerned that in acting for the wife they might be entering into or becoming concerned in an 'arrangement' which facilitated the acquisition, retention, use or control of criminal property by or on behalf of another person contrary to s 328(1)[a] of the 2002 Act, thereby committing an offence. Accordingly, they sought the protection offered by s 328(2) under which an offence was not committed if an authorised disclosure under s 338[b] was made and appropriate consent under s 335[c] was obtained, by making a disclosure to the National Criminal Intelligence Service (NCIS). Under s 335 a person who had made an authorised disclosure was treated as having the appropriate consent to do an otherwise prohibited act if he did not receive notice that consent was refused before the end of a period of seven working days. If consent was refused a moratorium period of 31 days came into force. The NCIS advised the wife's legal advisers, incorrectly, that they could not tell either the husband, his solicitors or their own client that the disclosure had been made without contravening s 333[d] of the 2002 Act which made it a criminal offence inter alia for a person who knew that a disclosure within s 338 had been made to make a disclosure which was likely to prejudice any investigation which might be conducted (the offence of 'tipping off') and/or s 342[e] under which it was a criminal offence for a person who inter alia suspected that an investigation was being conducted to make a disclosure which was likely to prejudice that investigation. Both sections contained exemptions for the actions of professional legal advisers for disclosures by such advisers to a client or a client's representative in connection with the giving by the adviser of legal advice to the client or to any person in connection with legal proceedings or contemplated legal proceedings. The legal professional exemptions did not apply to disclosures 'made with the intention of furthering a criminal purpose'. Three days before a financial dispute resolution appointment, the wife's legal advisers, who had been unable to obtain further clarification of their position from the NCIS, applied to the court without notice for directions in respect of their obligations under the 2002 Act. As a result

a Section 328, so far as material, is set out at [12], below
b Section 338, so far as material, is set out at [16], below
c Section 335, so far as material, is set out at [15], below
d Section 333, so far as material, is set at [18], [19], below
e Section 342, so far as material, is set out at [21], [22], below of that application the financial dispute resolution date was vacated and the hearing adjourned for two days to afford the NCIS and other interested bodies the opportunity to be heard. The husband's legal advisers obtained a transcript of the adjourned hearing and applied to attend the substantive hearing. They were permitted to do so on the condition that they did not inform the husband. The court gave guidance on two issues in the context of family proceedings: (i) whether and in what circumstances it was permitted to act in relation to an 'arrangement', and (ii) whether and in what circumstances a legal adviser, having made an authorised disclosure, was permitted to inform others that he had done so.

Held – (1) The duties of a barrister or solicitor engaged in family litigation under s 328 of the 2002 Act were straightforward. Nothing in that section prevented a solicitor or a barrister from taking instructions from a client. If, having taken instructions, the solicitor or barrister knew or suspected that their client would become involved in an 'arrangement' that might involve the acquisition, retention, use or control of criminal property, then an authorised disclosure should be made and the appropriate consent sought under s 335. The effect of s 335 was that a person could make a disclosure to the NCIS seeking consent to continue taking steps in relation to an arrangement. That person could not take further steps until they had received notice of consent within the notice period of seven working days, or received deemed consent by hearing nothing within the notice period, or received notice of refusal within the notice period. If they received such notice of refusal they could not act in relation to the arrangement for a period of 31 days. It was important to take into account that the 2002 Act made no distinction between degrees of criminal property; an illegally obtained sum of £10 was no less susceptible to the definition of 'criminal property' than a sum of £1m (see [49], [51], [56], below).

(2) There was an enhanced duty of full and frank disclosure upon legal professionals acting in family proceedings and particularly in ancillary relief proceedings. In accordance with that duty, details of the size and description of family assets and actual or potential debts were crucial to the attempts of the legal advisers to settle these cases and to the financial dispute resolution process. The discovery and investigation of financial irregularities might diminish the value of the assets which were the subject of ancillary relief proceedings. The purpose of the financial dispute resolution process would be frustrated if the judge did not have the true facts and the parties were unable to negotiate a genuine settlement in the absence of the requisite knowledge as to the true value of the assets. In general terms the professional duties in family proceedings attracted the protection of ss 333(3) and 342(4) in order to permit a legal adviser to inform, for instance, the other side that a disclosure had been, or would be, made to the NCIS. Those sections specifically recognised a legal adviser's duty, in ordinary circumstances, to make the relevant disclosures, even where the result would be to tip off their client, where to do so would fall within the ambit of being in connection with the giving of legal advice, or with actual or contemplated proceedings. The legal professional exemptions in ss 333(3) and 342(5) would be lost if a disclosure to a client were made 'with the intention of furthering a criminal purpose'. The intention of a legal adviser in choosing to make a disclosure belonged to the adviser alone. The time lines set out in ss 328, 335, and 338 were independent from the provisions of ss 333 and 342. Having complied with the obligations under s 328, there was nothing in the statute to require a solicitor to delay in informing his client forthwith if he were entitled to do so by virtue of the s 333(3) exemption (see [60], [62], [66], below); Francis & Francis (a firm) v Central Criminal Court [1988] 3 All ER 775 considered.

(3) As a matter of good practice, as opposed to statutory obligation, the investigation authorities should be permitted time to do their job without frustration. In most cases a delay of, at most, seven working days before informing a client of an authorised disclosure will not generally cause particular difficulty to a solicitor's obligations to his client or his opponent. Where appropriate consent is refused and a 31-day moratorium is imposed, best practice would suggest that the legal adviser and the NCIS, or other relevant investigating body, try to agree on the degree of information which can be disclosed during the moratorium period without harming the investigation. In the absence of agreement or other urgent circumstances where even a short delay would be unacceptable, such as where a hearing or financial dispute resolution is imminent, or orders for discovery require immediate compliance, the guidance of the court may be sought. It would be appropriate for the legal advisers to make the application without notice to the other side, making the NCIS, or other relevant investigating body, the respondent to the application. The application would be within the ambit of existing court proceedings and there would be no difficulty in the court making any appropriate order. The application would be heard in private and the court should direct that any mechanical recording of the proceedings should not be disclosed or transcribed without the leave of the judge (see [67], [68], below).

(4) It is not necessary for legal advisers to make repeated disclosures on the same facts, unless it is proposed to enter into a new arrangement or variation of the same arrangement. Each time a further disclosure is made, time will start running again for seven days, or possibly seven plus 31 days (see [69], below).

Notes

For offences in connection with money laundering, see Supp to 11(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 408C.

For the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, ss 328, 333, 335, 338, 342, see 12 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 2673, 2677, 2679, 2681, 2685.

Cases referred to in judgment

Bank of Scotland v A Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 52, [2001] 3 All ER 58, [2001] 1 WLR 751.

C v S [1999] 2 All ER 343, [1999] 1 WLR 1551, CA.

Clibbery v Allan [2002] EWCA Civ 45, [2002] 1 All ER 865, [2002] Fam 261, [2002] 2 WLR 1511.

Francis & Francis (a firm) v Central Criminal Court [1988] 3 All ER 775, [1989] AC 346, [1988] 3 WLR 989, HL.

Livesey (formerly Jenkins) v Jenkins [1985] 1 All ER 106, [1985] AC 424, [1985] 2 WLR 47, HL.

R v Cox (1884) 14 QBD 153, [1881–5] All ER Rep 68, CCR.

Application

Solicitors and counsel acting for P (the wife) made a disclosure to the National Criminal Intelligence Service (NCIS) under s 338 of the Proceeds of Crime Act without the knowledge of their client and applied, without notice, on 15 July 2003, to Butler-Sloss P for the ruling of the court as to the effect of the 2002 Act on the wife's application for ancillary relief in divorce proceedings. The application was adjourned until 17 July to afford the opportunity to be heard to the NCIS, the Inland Revenue, the Law Society and the Bar Council. The husband's solicitors applied on 16 July to attend the hearing on 17 July and Butler-Sloss P granted permission on condition that their client not be informed. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Nicholas Mostyn QC and Christopher Pocock (instructed by Manches) for the applicant.

Florence Baron QC and Deborah Bangay (instructed by Mishcon De Reya) for the respondent.

Andrew Mitchell QC (instructed by Winckworth Sherwood) for the National Criminal Intelligence Service.

Andrew Tidbury and Kennedy Talbot (instructed by the Solicitor of Inland Revenue) for the Inland Revenue.

Nicholas Elliott QC for the Law Society.

Phillip Moor QC for the Bar Council.

Cur adv vult

8 October 2003. The following judgment was delivered.

DAME ELIZABETH BUTLER-SLOSS P.

[1] An application was made to me on 15 July 2003 by Mr Mostyn QC, on behalf of the wife to seek the ruling of the court as to the effect of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 on his client's application for ancillary relief in divorce proceedings. Counsel and solicitors acting for the wife sought urgent directions from the court in respect of their obligations under the 2002 Act. Exceptionally they did so without giving notice to the respondent (the husband), his solicitors or counsel. The genesis of these extraordinary events is apparent from the history of the wife's correspondence with the National Criminal Intelligence Service (NCIS) to which I shall refer later.

THE FAMILY BACKGROUND

[2] The husband and wife were married in April 1979. He is now 50 years old, and she is 52 years old. In January 2002, the wife filed her divorce petition. This court has not been asked to make any findings as to the parties' assets, but it is suggested by the wife that they are substantial and may exceed £19m. The wife made her application for financial relief, and a financial dispute resolution appointment (FDR) was listed for 18 July 2003 before a High Court judge.

[3] The accountants' forensic reports were first made available in October 2002. The husband's accountant's reply to the wife's additional questions was supplied on 2 May 2003. It was not until a conference was held with leading and junior counsel for the wife on 16 June that the wife's legal advisers became sufficiently concerned about the husband's financial position to consider that issues under Pt 7 of the 2002 Act might arise. In particular, her legal team was concerned about the possibility of committing an offence under s 328 of the Act. Based on the financial information they had seen and the advice of their forensic accountant, the wife and her legal team became suspicious that part of the matrimonial assets might be 'criminal property' within the meaning of the Act.

The wife's solicitors and counsel were worried that, in acting for the wife in the litigation and/or settlement of a financial dispute, they might fall foul of the s 328 prohibition and might become concerned in an arrangement which might facilitate 'the acquisition, retention, use or control of criminal property' by the wife. Accordingly, they sought to protect themselves and their client by invoking the protection offered by s 328(2)(a) and on 18 June 2003 the wife's solicitors wrote to the NCIS making disclosure of the following information: (a) that the wife and the husband were involved in ancillary relief proceedings listed for trial in December 2003; (b) certain identifying information about the husband's business interests; (c) that the wife and her solicitors had suspicions that the assets might comprise criminal property; (d) that the wife would be seeking a substantial sum from the husband in the ancillary relief proceedings; and (e) that the disclosure was being made on behalf of the wife, her solicitors and counsel.

[4] The solicitors' letter stated that an answer would be expected within seven days as to whether the solicitors 'should continue to take steps in the proceedings'. Further, the letter sought advice as to whether in light of the 'tipping off' rules, the letter could be disclosed to the husband's solicitors. The NCIS did not respond in writing to that letter. A number of telephone calls were made by the wife's solicitors to the duty officer at NCIS, whose advice (which NCIS now accepts was misleading) was that the decision to continue to act was purely a 'business decision' for the solicitors. The officer advised that a report was only required if money were actually about to change hands. He also thought, however, that if the money were not to pass through the solicitors' hands that a report might not be necessary at all. This advice was wrong. Crucially, the NCIS officer also advised that the wife's solicitors were not permitted to tell either the other side, or their own client, that the disclosure report had been made, as it would contravene the tipping off provisions and/or the prohibition against prejudicing an investigation.

[5] Having been instructed not to disclose the fact of their report to either the husband or the wife, nor to the husband's solicitors, the wife's solicitors felt that they were left in an extremely difficult position. Further attempts to seek clarification from the NCIS proved unsuccessful. Letters were sent on 25 June and 9 July, but by 15 July a response had not been received.

[6] On 15 July I first heard this application on an urgent ex parte basis. Mr Mostyn, on behalf of himself and the wife's solicitors, submitted that they had been placed in an untenable position. It was impossible, he said, to reconcile the NCIS's instructions to them not to disclose the fact of the report, with their professional obligations to the court, his client, and the respondent. He could not see how they could proceed with the financial dispute resolution on 18 July whilst prevented from disclosing the full facts to either of the parties, the opposing solicitors or the court.

[7] Given the complexity of the issues and the proximity of the FDR appointment, I saw no alternative but to vacate the listed FDR date. I also adjourned the ex parte application until 17 July so as to afford the NCIS, the Inland Revenue, the Law Society and the Bar Council the opportunity to be heard. In light of the extremely unusual nature of the case I ordered that neither the husband nor his legal representatives were to be given a copy of any order other than my order to vacate the date of the FDR.

[8] As it happened, on receipt of the order to vacate the FDR, the husband's representatives obtained from the mechanical recording department, as they were quite entitled to do in the absence of any specific order of the court, a copy of the transcript of 15 July hearing and immediately made an urgent application before me on 16 July to attend 17 July hearing. I gave them permission to do so, on the condition that they were not to tell their client. That order was of a type rarely made in this court, and whilst clearly necessary at the time in the extremely unusual circumstances of this case, I hope that it will seldom be necessary in the future. In the result, the order endured for not more than 24 hours and I am satisfied that the temporary interference with the husband's art 6 rights of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) was necessary and proportionate in all the circumstances.

[9] The wife's solicitors finally received a letter from NCIS, dated 15 July and received on 16 July, clarifying their response to the request for consent to act. In the letter the NCIS advised that—

> 'On this occasion NCIS consents to you proceeding with the transaction specified in [the] Disclosure Report [of 9 July].
>
> This is an "appropriate consent" within s 335 of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, with the result that if you do proceed with that transaction you will not be committing an offence under s 327, 328 or 329 of that Act ...'

[10] On 17 July I heard submissions from the wife, the husband, the NCIS, the Inland Revenue, the Law Society and the Bar Council. I am particularly grateful to Mr Mitchell QC on behalf of NCIS, whose submissions have been most helpful in illuminating the workings of the Act. By agreement, I received further written submissions from all the parties, other than the Inland Revenue who supported the final submissions of NCIS.

THE PROCEEDS OF CRIME ACT 2002

[11] The 2002 Act came into force on 24 February 2003. Part 7 is headed 'Money Laundering'; Pt 8 is headed 'Investigations'. Within Pts 7 and 8, there are three key aspects of relevance to the present case: (i) acting in relation to an arrangement; (ii) tipping off; and (iii) prejudicing an investigation.

(i) Section 328—an arrangement

[12] Section 328 makes it an offence to enter into or become concerned in a relevant arrangement. Section 328 reads as follows:

> '328. Arrangements.—(1) A person commits an offence if he enters into or becomes concerned in an arrangement which he knows or suspects facilitates (by whatever means) the acquisition, retention, use or control of criminal property by or on behalf of another person.
>
> (2) But a person does not commit such an offence if—(a) he makes an authorised disclosure under section 338 and (if the disclosure is made before he does the act mentioned in subsection (1)) he has the appropriate consent; (b) he intended to make such a disclosure but had a reasonable excuse for not doing so; (c) the act he does is done in carrying out a function he has relating to the enforcement of any provision of this Act or of any other enactment relating to criminal conduct or benefit from criminal conduct.'

[13] 'Criminal property' is defined in s 340(3):

'Property is criminal property if—(a) it constitutes a person's benefit from criminal conduct or it represents such a benefit (in whole or part and whether directly or indirectly), and (b) the alleged offender knows or suspects that it constitutes or represents such a benefit.'

[14] 'Criminal conduct' is defined in s 340(2):

'Criminal conduct is conduct which—(a) constitutes an offence in any part of the United Kingdom, or (b) would constitute an offence in any part of the United Kingdom if it occurred there.'

[15] Consequently, a person is protected from potential liability under s 328(1) if before acting he makes an 'authorised disclosure' and obtains the 'appropriate consent', as defined in ss 338 and 335 respectively. Section 335 reads, inter alia, as follows:

'335. Appropriate consent.—(1) The appropriate consent is—(a) the consent of a nominated officer to do a prohibited act if an authorised disclosure is made to the nominated officer; (b) the consent of a constable to do a prohibited act if an authorised disclosure is made to a constable; (c) the consent of a customs officer to do a prohibited act if an authorised disclosure is made to a customs officer.

(2) A person must be treated as having the appropriate consent if—(a) he makes an authorised disclosure to a constable or a customs officer, and (b) the condition in subsection (3) or the condition in subsection (4) is satisfied.

(3) The condition is that before the end of the notice period he does not receive notice from a constable or customs officer that consent to the doing of the act is refused.

(4) The condition is that—(a) before the end of the notice period he receives notice from a constable or customs officer that consent to the doing of the act is refused, and (b) the moratorium period has expired.

(5) The notice period is the period of seven working days starting with the first working day after the person makes the disclosure.

(6) The moratorium period is the period of 31 days starting with the day on which the person receives notice that consent to the doing of the act is refused ...

(9) A nominated officer is a person nominated to receive disclosures under section 338.'

[16] Section 338 provides for 'authorised disclosures' which may be made to a constable, a customs officer or a nominated officer (authorised by the Director General of NCIS) and made in the form and manner prescribed in s 339. The disclosure is authorised only upon the satisfaction of one or other or the two conditions set out in s 338:

'(2) The first condition is that the disclosure is made before the alleged offender does the prohibited act.

(3) The second condition is that—(a) the disclosure is made after the alleged offender does the prohibited act, (b) there is good reason for his failure to make the disclosure before he did the act, and (c) the disclosure is made on his own initiative and as soon as it is practicable for him to make it.'

[17] Failure to comply with the requirements of Pt 7 is a criminal offence and the penalties are set out in s 334. As I understand, the Secretary of State for the Home Office has not yet provided regulations under the provisions of s 339.

(ii) Section 333—Tipping off

[18] Under s 333 of the Act:

> 'A person commits an offence if—(a) he knows or suspects that a disclosure falling within sections 337 or 338 has been made, and (b) he makes a disclosure which is likely to prejudice any investigation which might be conducted following the disclosure referred to in paragraph (a).'

[19] An important exception, however, is contained in sub-ss (2) and (3) which state:

> '(2) But a person does not commit an offence under subsection (1) if—(a) he did not know or suspect that the disclosure was likely to be prejudicial as mentioned in subsection (1); (b) the disclosure is made in carrying out a function he has relating to the enforcement of any provision of this Act or of any other enactment relating to criminal conduct or benefit from criminal conduct; (c) he is a professional legal adviser and the disclosure falls within subsection (3).
>
> (3) A disclosure falls within this subsection if it is a disclosure—(a) to (or to a representative of) a client of the professional legal adviser in connection with the giving by the adviser of legal advice to the client, or (b) to any person in connection with legal proceedings or contemplated legal proceedings.
>
> (4) But a disclosure does not fall within subsection (3) if it is made with the intention of furthering a criminal purpose.'

[20] The act of informing the client or any other person that a disclosure has been made to NCIS would itself appear to be a 'disclosure' within the meaning of s 333(1).

(iii) Section 342—Prejudicing an investigation

[21] In addition to the 'tipping off' offences, s 342 of the Act makes it an offence to prejudice an investigation. It states:

> '342. Offences of prejudicing investigation.—(1) This section applies if a person knows or suspects that an appropriate officer or (in Scotland) a proper person is acting (or proposing to act) in connection with a confiscation investigation, a civil recovery investigation or a money laundering investigation which is being or is about to be conducted.
>
> (2) The person commits an offence if—(a) he makes a disclosure which is likely to prejudice the investigation, or (b) he falsifies, conceals, destroys or otherwise disposes of, or causes or permits the falsification, concealment, destruction or disposal of, documents which are relevant to the investigation.'

[22] As in s 333, s 342 contains the legal professional exemption:

> '(3) A person does not commit an offence under subsection (2)(a) if—(a) he does not know or suspect that the disclosure is likely to prejudice the investigation, (b) the disclosure is made in the exercise of a function under this Act or any other enactment relating to criminal conduct or benefit from criminal conduct or in compliance with a requirement imposed under or by virtue of this Act, or (c) he is a professional legal adviser and the disclosure falls within subsection (4).

(4) A disclosure falls within this subsection if it is a disclosure—(a) to (or to a representative of) a client of the professional legal adviser in connection with the giving by the adviser of legal advice to the client, or (b) to any person in connection with legal proceedings or contemplated legal proceedings.'

(5) But a disclosure does not fall within subsection (4) if it is made with the intention of furthering a criminal purpose.'

[23] The act of informing the client or any other person that a disclosure is about to be made to NCIS would appear to be a 'disclosure' within the meaning of s 342(2).

THE ISSUES

[24] From the above provisions two main issues arise in the context of family proceedings and the application by the wife in the present proceedings: (a) whether and in what circumstances it is permitted to act in relation to an arrangement; and (b) whether and in what circumstances a legal adviser, having made an authorised disclosure, is permitted to tell others of the fact that s/he has done so.

[25] It is not appropriate for this judgment to range more widely since the issues which may arise in the future would be more appropriately considered within the factual matrix giving rise to those problems.

THE SUBMISSIONS

NCIS

[26] Mr Mitchell QC, on behalf of NCIS, recognised that the advice given by the desk officer to the wife's solicitors was wrong and misleading. This arose from a misunderstanding of the questions asked. The solicitors were correct to bring the matter to the attention of the NCIS when they did. At that stage the NCIS should have advised the solicitor whether consent was appropriate and was wrong to have advised the solicitor that it was not an appropriate case to seek consent. The NCIS did later give advice as to consent by a letter of 15 July and consent was given so that the legal adviser would be able to conclude a financial settlement with disclosure made. It was not necessary, in order for there to be a disclosure, that funds actually passed through solicitors' client's account. The test for the legal adviser would be whether s/he had become concerned in an arrangement.

[27] In a later written submission in response to the submissions of the husband and the wife, Mr Mitchell pointed out that the requirement under s 328 was to disclose 'suspicion' not 'belief'. The purpose of the legislation was to stop the movement of criminal property and the obligation on a legal adviser was to make sure that s/he did not become involved at any stage with such an arrangement and to make the appropriate disclosure. There was no legal professional privilege protection in s 328. In written submissions he said:

'It is and remains the view of the NCIS that any common law obligation to make full and frank disclosure during the statutory waiting period of seven days and then the subsequently triggered 31 days is overridden by the statute. There is plainly room for an exception to this where the lawyer seeks the permission of the NCIS or makes application to the court in the absence of agreement. No obligation to be full and frank about the affairs and circumstances of a person in private law proceedings can override the statutory waiting period which permits for inquiries and then investigation. There can be no matrimonial exception to this position.'

[28] He pointed out that when the money laundering regulations came into force, probably in January 2004, then the legal advisers would be regulated and obligations under s 330 would arise, albeit with the legal professional privilege exception.

[29] In relation to tipping off, he said that no offence was committed by a legal adviser who informed his client or the other side of a future intention to disclose a suspicion. But he questioned whether there would ever be any legitimate purpose for a solicitor to make such a disclosure. To inform the client or the other side of the actual intention to disclose his suspicions would have the effect of warning the client and would be tantamount to becoming concerned in an arrangement, since if such a suspicion was well founded the client was bound to try and avoid detection. To inform the client before or after making a disclosure might also come within the provisions of s 342 by prejudicing an investigation.

[30] Mr Mitchell submitted that the intention of 'furthering a criminal purpose' in ss 333(4) and 342(5) need not belong to the discloser. He referred me to the decision of Francis & Francis (a firm) v Central Criminal Court [1988] 3 All ER 775, [1989] AC 346, in which the House of Lords was considering s 27 of the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986. The police had obtained an ex parte order for the production of files from a firm of solicitors relating to financial transactions of one of their clients. The police believed that the client had been provided with money to purchase property by an alleged drug trafficker. The solicitors relied on the exemption in s 27(4)(ii) that the material to which the order related included 'items subject to legal privilege'. The definition of 'items subject to legal privilege' was to be found in s 10(1) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 which states:

'10. Meaning of "items subject to legal privilege".—(1) Subject to subsection (2) below, in this Act "items subject to legal privilege" means—(a) communications between a professional legal adviser and his client or any person representing his client made in connection with the giving of legal advice to the client; (b) communications between a professional legal adviser and his client or any person representing his client or between such an adviser or his client or any such representative and any other person made in connection with or in contemplation of legal proceedings and for the purposes of such proceedings; and (c) items enclosed with or referred to in such communications and made—(i) in connection with the giving of legal advice; or (ii) in connection with or in contemplation of legal proceedings and for the purposes of such proceedings, when they are in the possession of a person who is entitled to possession of them.'

[31] It will be seen that this definition was subject to s 10(2) which stated: 'Items held with the intention of furthering a criminal purpose are not items subject to legal privilege.'

[32] The House of Lords took the view that on a purposive construction of s 10(2), the relevant 'intention' did not have to belong to the particular person holding the items; rather, if the intention of furthering a criminal purpose were held by anyone, the items would lose their privilege. A drug trafficker with criminal intent could not protect himself by placing his documents in the hands of a solicitor. Privilege belonged to the client, not the solicitor, and a criminal intent disentitled the client to privilege. This was simply the statutory form of the established principle in common law since R v Cox (1884) 14 QBD 153, [1881–5] All ER Rep 68, that legal privilege did not attach where the advice sought was being obtained for the purpose of committing a crime. The alternative construction of s 10(2) could only lead to, in the words of Lord Goff of Chieveley ([1988] 3 All ER 775 at 796, [1989] AC 346 at 391), 'absurd consequences'.

[33] Mr Mitchell submitted that, by analogy, the Francis case would apply to the passing of information by a legal adviser, who might therefore not be protected under the legal professional exemption. He submitted that the statute overrode the private law right of full and frank disclosure. The purpose of the 2002 Act was to place an obligation on anyone who became suspicious about money laundering, to report their concerns if received in pursuit of a regulated business and or, whoever was concerned, not to enter into an arrangement in relation to criminal property.

The wife

[34] Mr Mostyn believed that it was clearly necessary for the wife's legal advisers to make the disclosure under s 328 since they had a strong suspicion that part of the husband's assets might have been derived from untaxed income. They had been placed in a very difficult position by the advice given by NCIS and the requirements of the NCIS after the disclosure had been made. NCIS had never withdrawn its requirement that they should not tell the other side about the disclosure. They therefore felt it necessary to seek directions from the court.

[35] In a later written submission Mr Mostyn expressed his concern about the 'clash' between the requirements under ss 333 and 342 not to 'tip off' nor to 'prejudice an investigation' and the clear obligation in ancillary relief applications to make full and frank disclosure. The protection afforded by s 333(2)(c) and (3)(a) or s 342(3)(c) and (4)(a) would be ineffective in the light of Mr Mitchell's submission that to disclose to the client or to the other party would bring counsel and/or solicitors within s 333(4) or s 342(5) that is to say a disclosure made with the intention of furthering a criminal purpose.

The husband

[36] Miss Baron QC, on behalf of the husband, made it clear that the husband's legal team was, of course, equally bound by the provisions of the 2002 Act. They did not, however, consider that there was anything to report to NCIS. They could well understand why the wife's legal team felt it necessary to make disclosure but had themselves carefully considered the facts available to them and were satisfied that disclosure under the 2002 Act was not necessary.

[37] Miss Baron pointed out that, since the NCIS had not responded to the letter of 18 June from the wife's solicitors, there was no necessity to write a further letter on 25 June, the seven-day period having elapsed. The further disclosure of 9 July was unnecessary since no new issue had arisen and time did not run again. She also submitted that s 333 stood alone and was not tied to or part of the time periods imposed by the 2002 Act.

[38] In a later written submission on behalf of the husband, it was argued that, contrary to the submission of Mr Mitchell, the 2002 Act made considerable changes to the pre-existing legislation although it borrowed heavily from parts of it. In particular there was now, in general, no distinction between drug trafficking offences and other offences. There were two significant changes made by the 2002 Act which affected the role and duties of professionals. Firstly the definition of 'criminal conduct' was far wider than before and secondly there was now a positive duty to report criminal conduct in cases involving no attempt to conceal or launder the proceeds of crime.

The Law Society and the Bar Council

[39] The provisions of Pt 7 and s 342 of the 2002 Act have become of increasing concern to the legal profession practising civil litigation and, more particularly, in the field of family law. The Bar and solicitors dealing with financial relief disputes of clients with substantial assets or making ancillary relief claims in such cases have been unsure as to their obligations under the 2002 Act and the extent to which the provisions of the 2002 Act might be a barrier to the resolution of financial disputes. When the present application was made, the Law Society and the Bar Council made it clear that each wished to be heard on the wider aspects of the impact of the 2002 Act on the legal profession.

[40] The Law Society and the Bar Council, in written submissions, welcomed the opportunity to intervene and pointed out that the present case was not exceptional. The issues raised by the application reflected wider problems faced by barristers and solicitors, particularly those handling matrimonial matters.

The Law Society

[41] The main concern of the Law Society related to the effect of s 328 which was drafted widely and appeared to cover non-transactional matters. One crucial problem in ancillary relief applications arising from divorce was the requirement of full disclosure of the assets of the spouses under the Family Proceedings Rules 1991, SI 1991/1247 as amended. Tax evasion by one of the parties might well be disclosed or revealed in the family proceedings, often in cases in which the assets were not substantial. This information might become available at any stage of the proceedings and would come within s 328. The Law Society was most concerned that there should be no uncertainty as to the exact extent of a solicitor's duties in relation to potential money-laundering offences. It submitted that the ambit of s 328 was potentially wider than the NCIS had suggested and therefore the appropriate consent would be required in a greater number of cases than had been envisaged. The application of s 328 to disclosures made before the 'prohibited act' was causing practical difficulties but s 328 did apply to less specific activity and, in the view of the Law Society, it was necessary to make a request for consent in such cases to 'becoming concerned in an arrangement'.

[42] In a further written submission the Law Society referred to the ethical difficulties experienced by solicitors arising from s 333, 'tipping off' and s 342, 'prejudicing investigations', in acting for and communicating openly with clients. The Law Society suggested that it should be an acceptable form of compliance with s 328 if, in the case of a wife applicant, there was one joint authorised disclosure by the barrister, solicitor and client. The proposals put forward by NCIS in its position statement represented a sensible and practical way forward in cases similar to the present application. In other more complicated cases, particularly those in which the solicitor may have to make an authorised disclosure to NCIS about his own client, the position of the solicitor was more uncertain and placed solicitors in the impossible position of withholding material matters from their clients. There was urgent need for guidance about circumstances where a solicitor could tell a client or third party about an authorised disclosure of which the client's activities were the subject.

[43] Mr Elliott QC, on behalf of the Law Society, stressed the concerns of individual solicitors around the country and the volume of inquiries made to the Law Society by solicitors seeking guidance in quite small cases. It was an everyday problem.

The Bar Council

[44] Mr Moor QC on behalf of the Bar Council expressed similar concerns to those of the Law Society. The Bar Council had issued guidance to barristers in respect of money laundering. In a written submission it pointed out that the inclusion of suspicion in s 342(1) broadened the scope of the offence and might include those representing clients. The suggestion in the NCIS written submission that 'the solicitor should not tell the other side that a report has been made unless not to do so would breach an obligation to make disclosure in the context of the particular financial settlement proceedings' was not realistic in the context of family law. All ancillary relief cases required full and frank disclosure. If there was anything relevant in the report to the NCIS it might well affect the value of the assets. It followed therefore that, when a report was made, the other side and the clients on both sides would have to be informed. One particular problem might arise on disclosures made at the door of the court.

The Inland Revenue

[45] In matrimonial financial proceedings the Inland Revenue is the most likely agency to be involved. In its submissions the Inland Revenue accepted that the wife's solicitors needed to make an authorised disclosure pursuant to s 338 and that the interpretation of the law as expressed by the NCIS to the wife's solicitors was not correct. The statute did not state that it is only when funds pass through the hands of solicitors that consent is required. The wording of ss 327, 328, 329 and 330 was much broader. Repeated consent was not required for the same facts. Where an authorised disclosure has been made and the facts have not materially changed there is no need for further consent even if a further letter is written and no need for a further time delay for consent or refusal of consent.

[46] The Inland Revenue was not however able to give the appropriate consent under s 335 which had to be given by NCIS. Equally the Inland Revenue was not in a position to sanction the disclosure by the wife's solicitors to the husband that an authorised disclosure had been made to NCIS. The Inland Revenue had no objection to consent being given to the wife's solicitors.

CONCLUSIONS

[47] The Law Society, the Bar Council and family law practitioners in particular are understandably concerned about the implications for the legal profession of Pt 7 and s 342 of the 2002 Act. Although Mr Mitchell pointed out that similar legislation has been in force for over ten years, without entering into a careful comparison of the earlier legislation and the 2002 Act, I agree with Miss Baron that the 2002 Act appears to be broader in its ambit with the result that there is a greater potential effect on members of the legal profession engaged in particular in family financial applications.

(a) Whether and in what circumstances it is permitted to act in relation to an arrangement

[48] There is a range of ways in which a legal professional might become 'concerned in' an arrangement. It was not submitted to me, nor do I believe it could be the case, that the offence under s 328 can only be committed at the point of execution of the arrangement. None of the parties before me disagreed with the submission of Mr Mitchell that the act of negotiating an arrangement would equally amount to being 'concerned in' the arrangement.

[49] In my view, the duties under s 328 of a barrister or solicitor engaged in family litigation are straightforward. There is nothing in that section to prevent a solicitor or barrister from taking instructions from a client. However, if having taken instructions the solicitor or barrister knows or suspects s/he or his/her client will become involved in an arrangement that might involve the acquisition, retention, use or control of criminal property, then an authorised disclosure should be made and the appropriate consent sought under s 335. Therefore, if it seems to the solicitor or barrister that there are grounds for suspicion that any arrangement being sought from the court or negotiated between the parties is contrary to the requirements of s 328(1), then authorisation should be sought. Whilst the provisions under ss 327 and 329 were not raised before me in this case, it would seem that the position as set out above would apply equally to both of those sections.

[50] Issues of legal professional privilege do not seem to me to arise under ss 327, 328 or 329 and there is no professional privilege exemption in these sections.

[51] The effect of s 335 is that a person may make a disclosure, generally but not necessarily, to NCIS seeking consent to continue taking steps in relation to an arrangement. The person must not take any further steps in relation to the arrangement, until the person either: (i) receives from NCIS notice of consent within seven working days from the next working day after the disclosure is made ('the notice period'—s 335(5)), in which case the person may resume acting in relation to the arrangement (by virtue of s 335(3)); or (ii) hears nothing from NCIS within the notice period, in which case the person is treated as having deemed consent to resume acting in relation to the arrangement (by virtue of s 335(3)); or (iii) receives from NCIS notice of refusal of consent within the notice period, in which case the person must not act in relation to the arrangement for the duration of the moratorium period of 31 days starting with the day on which the person receives the refusal notice (by virtue of s 335(4)). Once the moratorium period has expired the person may resume acting in relation to the arrangement.

[52] In practice then, the longest possible time for which a person could be prevented from taking steps in relation to an arrangement, after sending a notice to the NCIS, will be 31 days plus seven working days.

[53] The statutory purpose behind s 335(4) is clearly to allow the relevant investigating authority time to take any action it deems necessary in relation to the disclosure where it has decided that consent should be refused.

[54] In most cases in the family courts, the criminal property will have been acquired by some form of tax evasion or possibly social security fraud and I would be surprised if there were to be refusal of consent within the notice period in the majority of cases.

[55] The consent procedures in ss 335 and 338 apply to those persons who make the authorised disclosure. So, for example, if a solicitor makes an authorised joint disclosure on behalf of himself, counsel and his client, then all three will be protected from prosecution. Indeed where the solicitor acts for the innocent party, it would be sensible as a matter of practice for solicitors to do so. If a solicitor is disclosing suspicions about his own client, it may, of course, be a different matter.

[56] It is important for the legal profession to take into account, as Mr Mitchell reminded us, that the Act makes no distinction between degrees of criminal property. An illegally obtained sum of £10 is no less susceptible to the definition of 'criminal property' than a sum of £1m. Parliament clearly intended this to be the case. Whatever may be the resource implications, the legal profession would appear to be bound by the provisions of the Act in all cases, however big or small. If this approach is scrupulously followed by the legal advisers, the result is likely to have a considerable and potentially adverse impact upon the NCIS and would create serious consequential delays in listing and hearing family cases, including child cases.

(b) Whether and in what circumstances a legal adviser, having made an authorised disclosure, is permitted to tell others of the fact that s/he has done so

[57] Of much greater concern to the legal profession are the implications of ss 333 and 342, which prevent a person from 'tipping off', or prejudicing an investigation. Section 93D of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 (now repealed) contained a prohibition against tipping off in relation to criminal investigations of money laundering. In Bank of Scotland v A Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 52, [2001] 3 All ER 58, [2001] 1 WLR 751, the Court of Appeal considered the meaning of the legal professional exemption contained in s 93D(4) of the Criminal Justice Act 1988, a provision dealing with 'tipping off' in almost identical terms to s 333. In that case the bank suspected that the moneys held in a client's account had been obtained by fraud. Lord Woolf CJ said (at [7]):

> 'During argument there was discussion as to the extent of the defence provided by s 93D(4). Mr Crow helpfully drew our attention to the similarity between the language of s 93D(4) and the scope of legal professional privilege. Based on this assistance, we conclude that the subsection broadly protects a legal adviser when that adviser is engaged in activities which attract legal professional privilege.'

[58] That passage would appear to support the protection given to members of the legal profession in carrying out their duties to their clients, and that was the joint view of Mr Tidbury and Mr Talbot, for the Inland Revenue, who submitted in their skeleton argument that the natural meaning of s 333 was such as to permit a solicitor or barrister to carry out his duties to the court and to his client without fear of committing the tipping off offence.

[59] There were no submissions made to me about the nature of the duties of a legal professional, whether solicitor or barrister, to the court, his client and his opponent, but the relevant principles are widely known and accepted. In general terms, of course, all legal professionals are bound by professional ethics which require openness and disclosure of relevant information to both the client and the opponent. (See generally 44(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 148–149.)

[60] In addition, there is an enhanced duty of full and frank disclosure upon legal professionals acting in family proceedings, and particularly in ancillary relief proceedings. (See Livesey (formerly Jenkins) v Jenkins [1985] 1 All ER 106, [1985] AC 424; Clibbery v Allan [2002] EWCA Civ 45, [2002] 1 All ER 865, [2002] Fam 261.) In accordance with this duty of full and frank disclosure in financial disputes between spouses, details of the size and description of family assets and actual or potential debts are crucial to the attempts of the legal advisers to settle these cases and to the FDR process, see the Family Proceedings Rules 1991, SI 1991/1247 (as amended) r 2.61A-E. If financial irregularities are discovered and investigated, it may diminish the value of the assets, the subject of the ancillary relief proceedings. The purpose of the FDR would be frustrated if the judge or district judge did not have the true facts and the parties were unable to negotiate a genuine settlement in the absence of the requisite knowledge as to the true value of the assets. In general terms the professional duties in family proceedings do, in my view, appear to attract the protection of s 333(3) and 342(4) in order to permit a legal adviser to inform, for instance, the other side that a disclosure either will be, or has been, made to the NCIS.

[61] I see the force of the contrary submission of Mr Mitchell that the full effect of the legislation may be impeded by the passing of information of those who may seek to take advantage of it. I am not however convinced that the words of the statute support the interpretation which Mr Mitchell suggested. In the Francis case the court was concerned with the attachment, and loss, of legal professional privilege to items held on a client's behalf. The decision of the House of Lords in that case reflected the historical position and genesis of s 10(2) by confirming that clients with a criminal purpose cannot hide behind privilege. However, the present case does not appear to me to be analogous. This case raises the issue of the right of a solicitor to make a disclosure to a client, or another, such as an opponent. The question of privilege does not arise.

[62] Sections 333 and 342 specifically recognise a legal adviser's duty in ordinary circumstances to make the relevant disclosures, even where the result would be to tip off their client, where to do so would fall within the ambit of being in connection with the giving of legal advice or with legal proceedings actual or contemplated. A central element of advising and representing a client must be, in my view, the duty to keep one's client informed and not to withhold information from him/her. (See Halsbury's Laws, above.) Since the function of the Act is to regulate the proceeds of criminal behaviour, it is clear that in every circumstance where a solicitor believes an authorised disclosure to the NCIS is necessary there will be at least a suspicion of criminal purpose. If, as the NCIS suggests, ss 333(4) and 342(5) bite every time a party who is suspected of holding a criminal purpose is given notice that a disclosure has been or will be made to the NCIS (ie, is 'tipped off'), then the legal professional exemptions in ss 333(3) and 342(4) would be rendered meaningless. Sections 333(4) and 342(5) must have some purpose and the interpretation suggested by the NCIS cannot in my view be correct. The exemption is lost if a disclosure to a client is made 'with the intention of furthering a criminal purpose'. The natural meaning of those words would seem to be clear. The approach which the House of Lords took to the construction of the word 'held' in the Francis case should not be transposed into this context in relation to the word 'made', nor would it be necessary or proper to attempt to do so. Whereas the purpose of holding documents can be tainted by the intention of any number of people (including client and third parties), the intention of a legal adviser in choosing to make a disclosure would seem to belong to the adviser alone. The context and purpose of this particular section of the 2002 Act is distinguishable from that in the Francis case, not least because the 2002 Act has specifically underlined the duty of disclosure by legal advisers.

[63] The speech of Lord Griffiths in the Francis case indeed recognises the distinction between loss of privilege on the one hand, and the right to discuss matters with a client on the other hand. In dealing with a submission that the solicitors could not consult their client about the appeal for fear of breaching the equivalent tipping off provisions, Lord Griffiths said ([1988] 3 All ER 775 at 792, [1989] AC 346 at 386):

> 'I have no doubt that ... if an order to give access to documentation is made under s 27, the solicitor-client relationship provides a reasonable excuse within the meaning of the section for the solicitor to take his client's instructions as to whether the order should be contested.'

[64] In other words, even though the client's criminal intent disqualified him from claiming privilege, it did not disqualify him from his entitlement to be consulted by his lawyer without falling foul of the tipping off rules.

[65] Of course there may well be instances where a solicitor's disclosure to a client is in breach of s 333(4) or s 342(5), because the solicitor makes the disclosure with an improper purpose. In such a case the legal professional exemption would, of course, be lost. I cannot, as I understood Mr Mostyn to suggest, give a blanket guarantee to all family practitioners that they will never lose the protection of the exemption. But unless the requisite improper intention is there, the solicitor should be free to communicate such information to his/her client or opponent as is necessary and appropriate in connection with the giving of legal advice or acting in connection with actual or contemplated legal proceedings.

[66] I recognise that the conclusion I have reached may cause some difficulty to the investigating authorities. The time lines set out in ss 328, 335 and 338 are independent from the provisions of ss 333 and 342. Having complied with the obligations under s 328, there is nothing in the statute to require a solicitor to delay in informing his client. Either he is entitled to do so forthwith by virtue of the s 333(3) exemption, or if s 333(4) or 342(5) bites, he is not entitled to do so at all. There is no middle ground.

GOOD PRACTICE

[67] I am however concerned that the purpose of the Act be respected, and that as a matter of good practice (as opposed to statutory obligation) the investigation authorities should be permitted time to do their job without frustration. In most cases I cannot see why a delay of, at most, seven working days before informing a client would generally cause particular difficulty to the solicitor's obligations to his client or his opponent. Where appropriate consent is refused and a 31-day moratorium is imposed, best practice would suggest that the legal adviser and the NCIS (or other relevant investigating body) try to agree on the degree of information which can be disclosed during the moratorium period without harming the investigation. In the absence of agreement, or in other urgent circumstances where even a short delay in disclosure would be unacceptable (such as where a hearing or FDR is imminent, or orders for discovery require immediate compliance) the guidance of the court may be sought.

[68] The Court of Appeal in C v S [1999] 2 All ER 343, [1999] 1 WLR 1551 set out a procedure to be followed where compliance with an order for disclosure of information in civil proceedings might reveal money-laundering and cause the financial institution to be in breach of tipping off provisions under s 93D of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 (as amended). In Bank of Scotland v A Ltd the Court of Appeal suggested a similar procedure whereby the bank in that case could have made an application to the court naming the Serious Fraud Office as respondent. The application could be held in private and there would be no question of serving the customer since he would not be a party. The procedures suggested by the Court of Appeal in those two cases might usefully be adapted to the family financial proceedings where a disclosure has been made. Since the purpose of such an application is to protect the legal advisers and, in some cases, the client, I cannot see how one can impose an obligation on the NCIS to be the applicant (although the NCIS would however also be entitled to approach the court if it wished to do so). In my view, it would be appropriate for the legal advisers to make the application without notice to the other side, making the NCIS the respondent to the application. It would be an application however within the ambit of the existing court proceedings and I do not see any difficulty at the moment in the court making any appropriate order, including, if in the High Court, declarations. In the present case I granted declarations since the situation was entirely new and I did so to clarify the situation. It would not seem to me to be necessary for the court generally to grant declarations, but rather to deal with the practical consequences of the authorised disclosure to the NCIS. The application would of course be heard in private and the court should direct that any mechanical recording of the proceedings should not be disclosed or transcribed without the leave of the judge.

[69] I should like to remind legal advisers that it would not seem to be necessary to make repeated disclosures on the same facts, unless it is proposed to enter into a new arrangement or a variation of the same arrangement. Each time a further disclosure is made, time will start running again for seven days or possibly seven plus 31 days.

NCIS POSITION STATEMENT

[70] Mr Mitchell has provided to the court a position statement setting out the approach of the NCIS to the 2002 Act, which has now have posted on the NCIS' website (www.ncis.co.uk/legaldisclosures.asp). I have appended a copy of it to this judgment.

[71] Subject to my expanded conclusions above, paras 2–8 of the position statement are not substantially altered by my judgment in this case.

[72] Paragraphs 9 and 10 purport to be expressed in different terms from each other, but the only possible reading of them is that the legal professional exemption under ss 333(3) and 342(4) is lost, by virtue of ss 333(4) and 342(5), whenever any person possesses a criminal purpose regardless of whether the disclosure to the client/opponent is made before or after the making of the authorised disclosure. For the reasons set out above, I do not accept the NCIS' interpretation and would recommend that in light of my judgment, paras 9 and 10 of the guidance be amended.

[73] Paragraphs 11 and 12 accord entirely with my views set out herein, and do not require amendment. Paragraphs 13 and 14 do not require my comments. I do however note that the view taken by the NCIS in the last sentence of para 14 simply underlines the importance of a legal adviser making use of his professional exemption and disclosing the relevant information to his/her client so that the client is jointly protected from potential liability under the Act.

THE PRESENT CASE

[74] In the circumstances of this case, the wife's legal advisers were clearly right to make an authorised disclosure to NCIS. It was also entirely proper for the wife's legal team to approach the court for guidance. The coming into force of this Act in February has caused immense confusion and disruption in family proceedings, and no criticism should be made of the wife's representatives for seeking clarification of their statutory obligations, particularly in the light of the approach of the NCIS to the disclosure made by them. In fact, since there was no reply by the end of the seven-day period, the wife's legal advisers were free to continue to deal freely with the other side and to inform the other side that a disclosure had been made to NCIS. They would not have been exposed to the risk of prosecution for tipping off or prejudicing an investigation, as I have found, contrary to the submissions on behalf of the NCIS. But they could not have reasonably known this at the time. This position was reinforced by the consent given in the NCIS letter of 15 July. The wife's solicitors were not however certain from the NCIS letter that they had that right. Mr Mitchell and Mr Tidbury told me that neither the NCIS nor the Inland Revenue had any objection to the husband being informed of the fact that the disclosure report had been made. Accordingly, I ordered that my previous order of 16 July preventing the husband's legal team from making the disclosure to their client should be set aside. I also granted the declarations sought by the wife's representatives, that: (1) the wife's representatives can disclose to the husband and his representatives a copy of their report to the NCIS; (2) the wife's representatives can disclose to the wife a copy of their report to the NCIS; (3) the consent given by the NCIS to the wife's solicitors extends to counsel and the wife herself; and (4) the consent given by the NCIS extends to implementation of any arrangement agreed.

[75] I indicated that I would hear the parties' submissions on costs after I handed down this judgment, should they wish me to do so.

Order accordingly.

Celia Fox Barrister.

APPENDIX

Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, Part 7.

Position of the National Criminal Intelligence Service in relation to disclosures by the legal profession (NCIS website August 2003)

1. In the view of the NCIS the following constitutes good practice on the part of a legal advisor who is advising a client in relation to a matter that might involve a suspicious financial arrangement.

2. There is no need to seek the consent of the NCIS to act—that is to take instructions and learn what a case is about. The NCIS will not accept such requests for consent.

3. Should a concern arise in relation to a prospective financial arrangement then the legal advisor should learn sufficient about the client and the source (or final destination) of any funds involved in the arrangement, including as necessary seeking information from the legal advisors, if any, on the other side.

4. Should the legal advisor then have a suspicion at the stage that there is a step to be taken in the case that would involve the legal advisor or their client becoming involved in an arrangement which he knows or suspects facilitates by whatever means the acquisition, retention, use or control of criminal property by or on behalf of another person or there is the possibility of offences under s 327 or s 329 of Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, a written report setting out all relevant details including the grounds for any suspicion should be submitted to the NCIS.

5. Where consent is to be sought to enter into an arrangement this should be explicitly stated and highlighted in the written report faxed to the NCIS Duty Desk.

6. For there to be a disclosure there is no necessity at all for any funds to be contemplated as having to pass through the legal advisors client account or actually to pass through such an account. The test for the legal advisor would simply be whether he had become concerned in an arrangement.

7. At that stage the NCIS will follow the procedure in accordance with s 335 either giving or with holding consent as the case may be. That is that they will give or refuse consent within seven days; if after seven days there has been no response from the NCIS consent to proceed on the basis of the information disclosed will be deemed to have occurred. If the NCIS refuse to give consent then there would follow a 31-day period from the date of the refusal during which the legal advisor could not proceed with the arrangement, without risking the commission of a money laundering offence.

8. Once a disclosure has been made to the NCIS then the solicitor is free to continue with the arrangement (as reported to NCIS) if consent is given, or at the end of the moratorium period if consent is withheld.

9. If a legal advisor takes the view that he should inform his client (or any other person) before making such a disclosure to the NCIS, then he must have regard to s 342. If the legal advisor at least suspects that an investigator, a customs officer, a police officer or in some cases the director of the assets recovery agency is acting or proposing to act in connection with a confiscation, money laundering or civil recovery investigation which is being or is about to be conducted the offence of prejudicing an investigation is made out, whether or not there has been a disclosure to the NCIS. The legal advisor needs to be alert to the defence contained in s 342(3) which permits disclosures to a client or to any person in connection with legal proceedings. This defence is not available where the disclosure is made with the intention of furthering a criminal purpose. The NCIS take the view that the legal advisor does not have to share or be a party to this intention (which may be held solely by the client) for the defence in s.342(3) not to be available (see Francis & Francis (a firm) v Central Criminal Court [1988] 3 All ER 775, [1989] AC 346).

10. The NCIS would wish the legal profession to note that subject to s 333(4), under s 333(3) POCA there is no restriction on the legal advisor informing any person of the fact that they have made a report to the NCIS if such a disclosure is to a client or his representative in connection with the giving of legal advice to the client or the disclosure is made in connection with legal proceedings or contemplated legal proceedings.

11. Where the legal advisor has made a disclosure to the NCIS, the NCIS would prefer as a matter of practise the legal advisor not to make any reference to that fact during the seven days following the disclosure or during the period of 31 days following a refusal to consent to an arrangement, unless not to do so would be in breach of a disclosure obligation imposed by the particular proceedings.

12. In the event that the legal advisor considers that a requirement of the legal proceedings is to require disclosure of the fact of the disclosure to the NCIS, but there has been no consent from NCIS within seven days or the period is still running then the legal advisor should firstly inform the NCIS and try to seek agreement on the way ahead. In the absence of such agreement the legal advisor should consider making a without notice application to the Court for directions giving the NCIS an opportunity to make representations. (See C v S [1999] 2 All ER 343, [1999] 1 WLR 1551 and Bank of Scotland v A Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 52, [2001] 3 All ER 58, [2001] 1 WLR 751).

13. Legal advisors must not assume that 'the other side' in proceedings has reported a suspicion to the NCIS and such enquiries should not be made of the NCIS.

14. Where the client of the legal advisor has joined in the disclosure that has been made the client would, from the point in time when a disclosure is made to the NCIS, not be regarded as having committed an offence under ss 327–329. Where a legal advisor makes a disclosure without the knowledge of their client then plainly and necessarily such protection for the client would not apply.

Re Buildlead Ltd
Quicksons (South and West) Ltd v Katz and another

[2003] EWHC 1981 (Ch)

CHANCERY DIVISION
EVANS-LOMBE J
28 JULY, 8 AUGUST 2003

Company – Voluntary winding up – Liquidator – Application for removal of liquidator – Court possessing discretionary power requiring applicant to give security for liquidator's costs – Approach to exercise of discretion – Insolvency Rules 1986, r 4.120(3).

The applicant company had a wholly-owned subsidiary which went into creditors' voluntary liquidation. Over five years later the respondent liquidators applied for an order requiring the company and its bank to provide certain information about the subsidiary's affairs and sums transferred from the subsidiary to the company's bank account. The company started proceedings under the Insolvency Act 1986 to remove the liquidators, whose impartiality it questioned, and who it believed had unnecessarily prolonged the application. The liquidators applied for security for their costs in the proceedings under r 4.120(3)[a] of the Insolvency Rules 1986 which provided that the court 'may require' an applicant for the removal of a liquidator to make a deposit or give security for the costs to be incurred by the liquidator on that application. CPR 25.13[b] specified conditions under which, inter alia, a court could make an order for security for costs, including, where the claimant was a company, only the conditions that it was resident outside the United Kingdom and certain international conventions did not apply or that there was reason to believe it would be unable to pay a defendant's costs if ordered to do so. The issue before the court was the identification of the criteria by which the court should exercise its jurisdiction under r 4.120(3) of the 1986 rules.

Held – The proper approach to the use of the discretionary power conferred on the court by r 4.120(3) of the 1986 rules was to use sub-r (3) as a means to winnow out applications to remove liquidators which stood little chance of success rather than using it as a means by which the court might protect liquidators from having to pay personally the costs of defending an application to remove them. The legislature could not be taken to have intended the power to be used primarily for both purposes and if the latter approach were adopted the wide ambit of the power conferred by sub-r (3) would be inconsistent with the conditions for ordering the giving of security for costs contained in CPR 25.13. In the instant case, it had not been suggested that the company's application to remove the liquidators stood no reasonable chance of success and, accordingly, no order a Rule 4.120, so far as material, is set out at [1], below

b CPR 25.13 provides, so far as material: '(1) The court may make an order for security for costs ... if ...(2)(c) the claimant is a company ... and there is reason to believe that it will be unable to pay the defendant's costs if ordered to do so ...'

would be made for security for the liquidators' costs of defending the application (see [9], [16], [18], below).

Notes

For removal of liquidator by the court and for conditions to be satisfied in security for costs, see 7(3) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (1996 reissue) para 2743 and 37 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 835, respectively.

For the Insolvency Rules 1986, SI 1986/1925, r 4.120(3), see 3 Halsbury's Statutory Instruments (2001 issue), 489.

Application

Stephen Mark Katz and John Stephen Kelmanson, the liquidators of Buildlead Ltd, a wholly-owned subsidiary company of Quicksons (South and West) Ltd, in creditors' voluntary liquidation, applied pursuant to r 4.120(3) of the Insolvency Rules 1986 for security for their costs in proceedings brought by Quicksons under s 108(2) of the Insolvency Act 1986 for their removal as liquidators. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Stephen Davies QC (instructed by DJ Murphy, Cardiff) for Quicksons.
Jane Giret QC (instructed by Moon Beaver) for the liquidators.

Cur adv vult

8 August 2003. The following judgment was delivered.

EVANS-LOMBE J.

[1] I have before me an application in proceedings by Quicksons (South and West) Ltd (Quicksons) against Stephen Mark Katz and John Stephen Kelmanson (together, the liquidators) for the removal of the liquidators pursuant to s 108(2) of the Insolvency Act 1986. That application is by the liquidators for security for their costs of the proceedings pursuant to r 4.120(3) of the Insolvency Rules 1986, SI 1986/1925. So far as material r 4.120 provides:

> '(1) This Rule applies where application is made to the court for the removal of the liquidator, or for an order directing the liquidator to summon a creditors' meeting for the purpose of removing him.
>
> (2) The court may, if it thinks no sufficient cause is shown for the application, dismiss it; but it shall not do so unless the applicant has had an opportunity to attend the court for an ex parte hearing, of which he has been given at least 7 days' notice.
>
> (3) The court may require the applicant to make a deposit or give security for the costs to be incurred by the liquidator on the application.
>
> (4) The applicant shall, at least 14 days before the hearing, send to the liquidator a notice stating the venue and accompanied by a copy of the application, and of any evidence which he intends to adduce in support of it.
>
> (5) Subject to any contrary order of the court, the costs of the application are not payable out of the assets ...'

[2] The background facts to this case are these. Buildlead Ltd (the company) was the wholly-owned subsidiary of Quicksons. On 2 September 1997 the company was placed in creditors' voluntary winding up. Its statement of affairs shows a small surplus against preferential creditors but a substantial deficit against unsecured creditors.

[3] During August 1997 the company made a series of transfers totalling approximately £155,000 to the credit of Quicksons' account at Lloyds Bank (the bank). There was an arrangement between Quicksons and the bank that there would be a guarantee from Buildlead of Quicksons indebtedness from time to time to the bank. Each company in the Quicksons group had a floating charge over its assets in favour of the bank. In so far as the group required overdraft facilities those were made available to Quicksons. It was a term of the provision of those facilities that the bank should be at liberty to require any subsidiary, including the company, to transfer any credit in a subsidiary account to Quicksons account with the bank so long as that account was in overdraft. It is Quicksons' contention that the sums transferred by the company to Quicksons in August 1997 were transferred by the company to Quicksons' account with the bank as a result of demands made by the bank pursuant to this arrangement.

[4] Mr Kelmanson was appointed liquidator of the company consequent on the resolution to wind it up. On 13 October 1997 Mr Katz was appointed joint liquidator with him.

[5] In April 1998 Mr Katz commenced correspondence with Quicksons and the bank seeking to obtain particulars of the extent of Quicksons' overdraft at the time of the August 1997 transfers. Mr Katz's requests for information were unsuccessful and on 31 October 2002 the liquidators applied for an order pursuant to s 236 of the 1986 Act directed to both the bank and Quicksons requiring them to provide—

> 'all such information regarding the affairs of Buildlead Ltd in their possession including, but not limited to, information concerning the balance of the account between [Quicksons] and [the bank] in August 1997 at which time sums were transferred from the account of [the company] to the account of [Quicksons].'

[6] On 14 January 2003 Quicksons commenced proceedings to remove the liquidators pursuant to s 108(2) of the 1986 Act. On 11 February the liquidators' solicitors wrote to Quicksons' solicitors seeking security for the liquidators' costs pursuant to r 4.120(3) and on 24 April application was made for such security in the sum of £59,750.

[7] In the s 108 proceedings Quicksons have filed points of claim extending to 38 pages and setting out a number of criticisms of the conduct by the liquidators of the liquidation of the company. Their primary criticism is that the liquidation has been unnecessarily prolonged and used by the liquidators as a means of generating fees for themselves. The liquidators reject these criticisms. They say that, apart from the question of whether some or all of the August 1997 transfers can be recovered from Quicksons or the bank for the benefit of the company's creditors, the winding up is complete. It is the liquidators' submission that the application to remove them was triggered by the s 236 application but otherwise it is not suggested that Quicksons' proceedings do not disclose an arguable case for the removal of the liquidators. This is denied by Quicksons. Quicksons' contention is that, whereas the circumstances of the August 1997 transfers are accepted to be a legitimate area of inquiry for a liquidator of the company, the s 236 application has been made far too late in the day. Quicksons' attitude is that they will make the relevant information about the balance of Quicksons' overdraft at the time of the transfers available to the new liquidator of the company following on the success of their application to remove the liquidators whose impartiality they question.

[8] It is not in issue that, whatever may have been the position in August 1997, Quicksons are presently solvent with cash reserves more than sufficient to pay the amount of security sought by the liquidators.

[9] As is apparent from the wording of r 4.120(3) the power conferred by that sub-rule on the court is permissive. The first question, therefore, is what are the criteria by which the court should exercise the consequent discretion? It seems to me that these can be grouped under two possible heads, 'security' and 'merits'. Under security I would place consideration of the sub-rule as a means by which the court might protect liquidators from having to pay personally the costs of defending a claim to remove them. Under the heading merits I would place consideration by the court of using the sub-rule as a means to winnow out claims to remove liquidators which stand little chance of success. It does not seem to me that the legislature can be taken to have intended the discretionary power contained in the sub-rule to be used primarily for both purposes, although in some circumstances the fact that an order would protect a liquidator from loss would be an additional reason for ordering money to be brought into court in a doubtful case.

[10] Counsel appearing in the case, both experienced in insolvency practice, were not able to point to any established practice as to how the sub-rule is being used if at all. My own researches have failed to uncover any such practice. Beyond setting out the text of the rule, counsel have told me that there is no description of any established practise as to its use in the authoritative textbooks.

[11] Proceedings under s 108 of the 1986 Act are proceedings like any other to which the CPR apply. Thus in an application to remove a liquidator it would be open to the applicant or the respondent liquidator to invoke the court's summary judgment powers under CPR Pt 24. Thus, by means of the Pt 24 rules the claim to remove a liquidator or his defence of the claim could be subjected to preliminary examination of the merits with a view either to striking out the claim or giving summary judgment to the claimant.

[12] Equally CPR Pt 25 applies to proceedings under s 108 of the 1986 Act so that a respondent liquidator would be able to apply to the court to order the applicant seeking to remove him to give security for his costs under r 25.12 provided that the conditions proscribed by r 25.13 were complied with.

[13] Similar powers of course existed under the old Rules of the Supreme Court which preceded the CPR.

[14] It is to be observed that r 4.120(3) of the 1986 rules contains an initial filtering provision through which applications for the removal of liquidators must pass.

[15] Similar filtering provisions to those contained in sub-r (2) and for the provisions of security in r 4.120(3) are found in relation to applications to remove liquidators in compulsory winding up (see r 4.119(3)) and in members' voluntary winding up (see r 4.140(3)). Unaccountably in r 6.132, which deals with the removal of trustees in bankruptcy, whereas a filtering power similar to r 4.120(2) is found in r 6.132(2), there is no provision for ordering security for costs similar to r 4.120(3). All of these provisions were introduced into the insolvency rules in 1986.

[16] I have come to the conclusion, in the absence of any authority or other guidance, that the proper approach to the use of the powers conferred by r 4.120(3) is merits based. I do so because if a security-based approached were adopted, the wide ambit of the power conferred by sub-r (3) would be inconsistent with the conditions for ordering the giving of security for costs contained in CPR 25.13. Thus under that rule, without more, only an insolvent company claimant can be ordered to give security for costs whereas r 4.120(3) of the 1986 rules would allow an order to be made in respect of an insolvent individual. a

[17] I accept Mr Davies QC's submission for Quicksons that there is an analogy between the powers conferred by r 4.120 and those conferred by CPR Pt 24, in particular, the power of the court to grant conditional permission to defend. I accept his submission that, in the scheme of the rules generally, r 4.120(3) of the 1986 rules is best read as a power intended to be exercised by the court at the first filter stage dealt with in r 4.120(2). Thus at that stage if the court were to conclude that the case to remove the liquidator though arguable was likely to fail it would order the applicant to bring a sum of money into court or otherwise give security for the liquidators' costs as an alternative to dismissing the application forthwith. b c

[18] In the present case it has not been suggested by the liquidators that Quicksons' case to remove them, set out in Quicksons' points of claim in the s 108 proceedings, stands no reasonable chance of success, or, in the words of r 4.120(2), shows 'no sufficient cause'. It follows, in my judgment, that I should not order security for the liquidators' costs of defending Quicksons' claim to remove them. I should, perhaps, add that had my conclusion been that the proper approach to the application of the sub-rule was 'security based' the result would have been the same because it is accepted that Quicksons are, and in the foreseeable future will be, well able to pay the amount sought by the liquidators as security. d e

Application dismissed.

Victoria Parkin Barrister.

R v Poulton
R v Celaire
[2002] EWCA Crim 2487

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION
ROSE LJ, HUGHES AND ROYCE JJ
24 OCTOBER 2002

Sentence – Possession of an offensive weapon in a public place – Guidance – Prevention of Crime Act 1953, s 1.

Where an offence of possession of an offensive weapon in a public place, contrary to s 1[a] of the Prevention of Crime Act 1953 (a weapons offence) is committed in conjunction with another offence, the usual considerations in relation to totality apply. Concurrent sentences are usually appropriate if the weapons offence is ancillary to a more serious offence, and a consecutive sentence is appropriate if the weapons offence is distinct and independent from any other offence charged. In determining the appropriate sentence for weapons offences, a balance has to be struck between the fact that the offence in itself does not involve physical injury, and the public's legitimate concern that the culture of carrying weapons encourages violence and may lead to more serious criminal behaviour. In ascertaining the seriousness of a particular offence it may often be helpful for sentencing courts to consider the nature of the weapon involved; the use to which it may be put; the defendant's intention in carrying it, and the defendant's previous record. Three specific factors, as to intention, may aggravate an offence: (i) a specifically planned use of the weapon to commit or threaten violence or intimidate others; (ii) if the offence is motivated by hostility towards a minority individual or group; and (iii) if the defendant was acting under the influence of drugs or alcohol while carrying the weapon. The circumstances of the offence may be an aggravating feature if the offence is committed at vulnerable premises (including schools, hospitals, or other places where vulnerable people may be present); at large public gatherings, especially if there is be a risk of disorder; on public transport; on licensed premises, or on premises where public services are carried out, such as doctors' surgeries and social security offices. Another aggravating feature is if the defendant is on bail. While some weapons are more dangerous than others, the nature of the weapon is not the primary determinative factor in relation to the seriousness of the offence, because relatively less dangerous weapons may be used to create fear, and more obviously dangerous weapons may be carried for reasons of self defence (with no attempt being made to use them). On the other hand, the carrying of certain weapons (eg flick-knives or butterfly knives, or weapons designed or adapted to cause serious injury) may shed some light on the defendant's intention.

a Section 1, so far as material, provides: '(1) Any person who without lawful authority or reasonable excuse ... has with him in any public place any offensive weapon shall be guilty of an offence, and shall be liable—(a) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or a fine ... or both; (b) on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding four years or a fine or both. (2) Where any person is convicted of an offence ... the court may make an order for the forfeiture ... of any weapon in respect of which the offence was committed ...'

Mitigating factors include the fact that the weapon is being carried only on a temporary basis, the defendant's co-operation with police, and a timely plea of guilty. A defendant with previous convictions for violence or carrying weapons who is convicted of carrying a particularly dangerous weapon, in circumstances aggravated by any of the above factors, with the clear intent of causing fear or injury, can expect to receive a sentence at or near the statutory maximum. The custody threshold will almost invariably be passed, in the case of an adult defendant of previous good character, where there is a combination of dangerous circumstances and actual use of the weapon to threaten or cause fear. The nature of the weapon and other aggravating and mitigating features will bear on the length of the custodial term. Custody may still be appropriate where no threatening use is made of the weapon. However, the custody threshold may not be passed in cases which lack any aggravating features, where no threat is made, and where the weapon is not particularly dangerous. In such cases, a community penalty towards the top end of the available range is appropriate. If the defendant has previous convictions for violence, or for other weapon offences, a longer sentence is likely. Courts in passing sentence have also to accord with certain statutory duties, including the prevention of offending in young people and the interests of the child. In cases involving young offenders, a pre-sentence report should be obtained before proceeding to sentence. Sentencing courts will also wish to bear in mind the power to order forfeiture (which will almost invariably follow in most cases) and the power to make a compensation order (see [18]–[29], below).

Notes

For possession of offensive weapons, see Supp to 11(1) Halsbury's Laws, para 167.

For the Prevention of Crime Act 1953, s 1, see 12 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 228.

Cases referred to in judgment

R v Avis [1998] 2 Cr App R (S) 178, CA.
R v Buzzer [1996] 2 Cr App R (S) 271, CA.
R v Edwards [2002] EWCA Crim 1474, [2002] All ER (D) 578 (May).
R v Hopkins [1996] 1 Cr App R (S) 18, CA.
R v Norman (1995) 16 Cr App R (S) 848, CA.
R v Shorter (1988) 10 Cr App R (S) 4, CA.

Appeals against sentence

R v Poulton

Sarah Jane Poulton appealed, with leave of a single judge, against the sentence of twelve months' imprisonment imposed upon her by Mr Recorder Hall in the Crown Court at Hove on 28 November 2002 for an offence of possessing an offensive weapon. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

R v Celaire

Mario Rolando Celaire applied for permission to appeal against the sentence of twelve month's imprisonment imposed upon him by Mr Recorder Raggatt QC in the Inner London Crown Court on 12 July 2002 for an offence of possessing an offensive weapon. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Pam Rose (assigned by the Registrar of Criminal Appeals) for Poulton.
John Barker (assigned by the Registrar of Criminal Appeals) for Celaire.

24 October 2002. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

ROSE LJ.

[1] Very few appeals against sentence in relation to the offence of carrying an offensive weapon reach this court. The appeal of Poulton and the renewed application for leave to appeal by Celaire provide what, it has transpired, is a slightly tenuous opportunity for this court to suggest guidelines for sentencing for this offence, in the light of the report of the Sentencing Advisory Panel made in May 2000. I say slightly tenuous because, as will emerge, both of these cases have somewhat unusual features.

[2] So far as the appellant, Poulton, is concerned, she on 19 October 2001, at Hove Crown Court, pleaded guilty to having an offensive weapon and, on 28 November, at the same court, was convicted of attempted robbery. She was sentenced by Mr Recorder Hall to three years for attempted robbery and 12 months concurrently for having an offensive weapon. She appeals against that sentence by leave of the single judge.

[3] The facts were that, shortly after midnight, on 26 July 2001, a woman called Miss Crocket and a friend were on their way home from a nightclub. They went towards a taxi rank in central Brighton and were approached by the appellant, who asked Miss Crocket whether she had any cigarettes. Miss Crocket said 'No, sorry', and the appellant produced a penknife with a three or four inch blade from her pocket, showed it to Miss Crocket and demanded that she open her handbag. Miss Crocket complied and, when the appellant found that there were no cigarettes in the bag, she walked away. Miss Crocket followed and telephoned the police. When the officers arrived, the appellant was arrested. When she was interviewed she made no comment.

[4] In passing sentence, the learned recorder, rightly, referred to the fact that two young women had been placed in fear and that this was, in effect, a street robbery using a knife.

[5] The appellant was born on 12 July 1966. She has a considerable number of convictions spanning a period of some 20 years. They include a conviction for assault occasioning actual bodily harm, one for threatening behaviour and one for assaulting a constable; and many convictions for dishonesty. She has been dealt with by way of fine, conditional discharge, probation orders and short periods of imprisonment, the longest being for a period of three months.

[6] There is a psychiatrist's report, dated 19 June 2002, which refers to the appellant's history of growing up in an unstable and insecure environment and of the physical difficulties which she has endured, including a leaking brain aneurysm and the removal of a kidney. She has made several attempts on her life and has been admitted to a psychiatric hospital on more than one occasion. She is described as having a personality disorder and could be categorised as suffering from a psychopathic disorder but absent highly-specialised services, no useful purpose would be served, in the psychiatrist's view, from making an order under the Mental Health Act 1983.

[7] On the other hand, ongoing and repeated custodial sentences are not likely to have an improving effect on her behaviour. The psychiatrist contemplated that, as and when the appellant was released from custody, any treatment which she then had should include within it a residential component. There are before the court further reports, apart from that of the psychiatrist. In particular, there is one dated 18 October 2002, from Louise Chase, a counsellor at Downview Prison. She first saw the appellant at the beginning of August 2002, and the appellant has expressed a desire to change her way of life and to commit to her children. She has been working hard to come to terms with her position. She gives every indication of having gained more stability than was apparent at the time of the psychiatric report. She has caused no trouble, nor has she subjected herself to self harm while at Downview. She appears to be handling matters, which include having been bullied, well. She has been, it is said, enhancing her life skills and her understanding of herself and the view is expressed that she might have the chance of putting increasing self knowledge to use outside the prison. Furthermore, if she were to be released, a structured day care unit at the Oasis Project in Brighton (who have, as appears from a report from Peter Hale of CARAT within the prison service, agreed to her starting a programme on 25 October 2002) may be of benefit to her.

[8] The submission made on her behalf by Miss Rose was that, as she has now served the equivalent of a 22-month sentence, it would be appropriate to order her immediate release without more. This court has invited the liaison probation officer to see the appellant during the currency of these proceedings and, in due course, we shall return to the outcome of matters so far as this appellant is concerned.

[9] The applicant, Celaire, to whom we give leave to appeal, pleaded guilty on 20 May 2002, at Camberwell Green Magistrates' Court, to possessing an offensive weapon and using a motor vehicle with no insurance. He was convicted of dangerous driving and committed to Inner London Crown Court for sentence. There, on 12 July 2002, by Mr Recorder Raggatt QC, he was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment for possession of an offensive weapon. No separate penalty was imposed for using the vehicle with no insurance and he was sentenced to six months consecutively for dangerous driving, that is to say the total sentence was 18 months' imprisonment, and he was disqualified from driving for three years.

[10] The facts were these. On the evening of 8 December 2001 police officers in Brixton stopped the appellant, Celaire, who was riding a Yamaha motorcycle, because of the way in which he had overtaken some other vehicles. The officers parked their car in front of the appellant's motorcycle at an angle to prevent him getting away. But, after one of the officers had alighted from the police motorcar, the appellant revved up the engine and sped off through a gap. The officers set off in pursuit. The appellant drove at a speed of 50 miles per hour, in an area restricted to 30. He went through a red light and he passed between two pedestrians on a pelican crossing, causing them to jump out of the way. He drove into a busy road which was solid with traffic and came in contact with four vehicles before coming to a halt. He then began to run off but was detained by plain clothes police officers. He was asked if he had anything on him which he ought not to have. He then produced from his pocket a kitchen knife with a blade between four and five inches long.

[11] He was arrested. In interview, he said he carried the knife for his own protection and he admitted he had no insurance. He said he recalled almost colliding with the pedestrians but was not looking at the lights and could not remember going through them on red.

[12] The recorder, in passing sentence, referred to the carrying of knives as being extremely dangerous because the production of a knife to threaten people, in circumstances of potential violence, has the capacity to cause the serious escalation of such violence. With that expression of view this court agrees. He went on to pass the sentence to which earlier we referred.

[13] This appellant was born on 4 February 1978, so he is 24 years of age. He has a previous conviction for rape and indecent assault, in relation to which he was initially sentenced to five years, reduced by this court on appeal to four years' detention in a young offender institution in 1995.

[14] There was a pre-sentence report before the learned recorder, which referred to a high risk of the appellant re-offending, although he appeared to regret his actions. He has no history of mental illness.

[15] The present position, so far as the appellant is concerned, as Mr Barker on his behalf has told this court, is that he is in custody awaiting trial, due to start next week, for murder. It is said, on his behalf, that he was carrying this knife in the circumstances which we have described because the family of the man whom he is alleged to have murdered, before police involvement implicating the appellant, had expressed views adverse to the appellant. Because he was fearful of what they might do, he was carrying a knife in the way which we have described.

[16] Mr Barker submits, by reference to a number of authorities, that the sentence passed in relation to the offensive weapons offence was approximately double what it ought properly to have been. So far as the sentence for dangerous driving is concerned, although initially he had been minded to contend that it was excessive, he accepted, in this court, that that submission could not be advanced; but six months was, he submitted, towards the upper end of the appropriate bracket for this appellant in relation to that offence. Mr Barker, in relation to the offensive weapon offence, drew our attention to R v Shorter (1988) 10 Cr App R (S) 4, a decision of this court prior to the increase by Parliament of the maximum penalty for the offence of carrying an offensive weapon from two years to four years, R v Buzzer [1996] 2 Cr App R (S) 271, where a sentence of six months was reduced to three months, following conviction for possession of a flick-knife, R v Edwards [2002] EWCA Crim 1474, [2002] All ER (D) 578 (May) where a sentence of 12 months was reduced to nine months and R v Norman (1995) 16 Cr App R (S) 848, where an appeal against a sentence of 15 months for possession of a broken snooker cue and a nasal spray containing ammonia solution was dismissed, the appellant in that case having many previous convictions for possession of an offensive weapon and violence. Mr Barker also referred to R v Hopkins [1996] 1 Cr App R (S) 18, where a sentence of six months passed on a minicab driver, fearful for his own safety, was reduced to three months in relation to the possession by him of a lemon juice bottle containing hydrochloric acid.

[17] The task of issuing guidelines is not made easier by the fact that the maximum penalty for possession of an offensive weapon in a public place, contrary to s 1 of the Prevention of Crime Act 1953, which was two years until 1996 is now four years' imprisonment. But the maximum penalty for possessing an article with a blade or point in a public place, contrary to s 139 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 is still only two years. It is not obvious to the court why the maximum sentence should be different. It is to be noted that the case of R v Edwards, to which Mr Barker referred, involved possessing a bladed article.

[18] For the avoidance of doubt, this judgment relates to offences of possessing an offensive weapon with the four-year maximum, which we shall refer to, in shorthand terms, as a weapons offence. We also emphasise, as with all guideline decisions of this court, that this judgment affords guidance not a straitjacket to sentencers.

[19] As will become apparent we largely, although not entirely, adopt the proposals of the Sentencing Advisory Panel. Where the weapons offence was committed in conjunction with another offence, the usual considerations in relation to totality will apply. A concurrent sentence will usually be appropriate if the weapons offence is ancillary to another more serious offence, as it was in the case of the appellant, Poulton. Where the weapons offence is distinct and independent of another offence, a consecutive sentence will usually be called for, as in the case of the appellant, Celaire. In this respect, therefore, the approach of the sentencing judge in both these cases, the subject of appeal, was correct.

[20] There is, in determining the appropriate sentence for an offence of this kind, a balance to be struck between the fact that the offence does not in itself involve physical injury and the public's legitimate concern that a culture of carrying weapons encourages violence and may lead to more serious criminal behaviour.

[21] We agree with the panel that, in assessing the seriousness of an offence, it is necessary to consider the offender's intention, the circumstances of the offence and the nature of the weapon involved. In this respect, we also agree that it may often be helpful for a sentencer to ask the sort of questions posed by this court in relation to firearms in R v Avis [1998] 2 Cr App R (S) 178, that is to say, to consider the nature of the weapon involved, the use to which it may be put and the defendant's intention in carrying it and the defendant's previous record.

[22] As to intention there are, in our judgment, three specific factors which may aggravate the offence. First, there may be a specifically planned use of the weapon, to commit violence or threaten violence or intimidate others. Secondly, the offence may be motivated by hostility towards a minority individual or group, which may give rise to an aggravating feature, such as racial motivation within s 28 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998. Thirdly, we would regard it as an aggravating aspect if the defendant was acting under the influence of alcohol or drugs while carrying such a weapon.

[23] As to the circumstances of the offence, these may be aggravated if its commission takes place at particularly vulnerable premises such as a school, (which may give rise to the possibility of a separate charge under s 139A of the 1988 Act), or a hospital or other place where vulnerable people may be present. Likewise, an offence may be aggravated if committed at a large public gathering, especially one where there may be a risk of disorder; or, if committed on public transport or on licensed premises or on premises where people are carrying out public services, such as in a doctor's surgery or at a social security office. Finally, in this regard, the offence will obviously be aggravated if it is committed while the defendant is on bail. That, of course, is a statutorily aggravating feature under s 29(2) of the Criminal Justice Act 1991.

[24] As to the nature of the weapon, some weapons are inherently more dangerous than others. But the nature of the weapon will not be the primary determinant as to the seriousness of the offence, because a relatively less dangerous weapon, such as a billiard cue, or a knuckle-duster, may be used to create fear and such an offence may be at least as serious as one in which a more obviously dangerous weapon, such as a knife, or an acid spray is being carried for self-defence or no actual attempt has been made by the offender to use it.

[25] On the other hand, light may be shed on an offender's intention, if he is carrying a weapon which is offensive per se, such as a flick-knife or a butterfly knife, or a weapon designed or adapted to cause serious injury.

[26] Mitigation will be found if the weapon was being carried only on a temporary basis. As in most other cases, there will be mitigation arising from personal factors, co-operation with the police and a timely plea of guilty. A defendant, with previous convictions for violence or carrying weapons, who is convicted of carrying a particularly dangerous weapon, in circumstances aggravated by any of the factors which we have identified and doing so with the clear intention of causing injury or fear, can expect to receive a sentence at or near the statutory maximum.

[27] In relation to an adult offender of previous good character, the custody threshold will almost invariably be passed where there is a combination of dangerous circumstances and actual use of the weapon to threaten or cause fear. The nature of the weapon and other aggravating or mitigating factors will bear on the length of the custodial term.

[28] Custody may still be appropriate, depending on the circumstances, where no threatening use was made of the weapon. Alternatively, depending on the circumstances, there will be cases where, absent aggravating features of the kind which we have identified and where no threat has been made and where the weapon is not particularly dangerous, the custody threshold may not be passed and a community sentence towards the top end of the available range may be appropriate. Of course, if the defendant has previous convictions for violence or for other weapon offences, then the sentence imposed on him or her is likely to be longer.

[29] So far as young offenders are concerned, the courts will of course, in passing sentence, have regard to their statutory duty to prevent offending by children and young persons, under s 37 of the 1998 Act and the need to have regard to the welfare of the child by virtue of s 44 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933. It will almost invariably be appropriate, in the case of young offenders, to obtain a pre-sentence report before proceeding to sentence. The sentencing court will also wish to bear in mind its powers to order forfeiture which will almost inevitably follow in relation to offences of this kind, and its powers to make a compensation order.

[30] In the light of those general considerations, we return to the cases of these appellants. So far as Celaire is concerned, as we have already indicated, consecutive sentences were entirely appropriate. There is nothing wrong with the sentence of six months passed in relation to the dangerous driving offence, save that the recorder ought to have ordered and we order, in pursuance of our statutory obligation, that before driving again the appellant undergo a driving test.

[31] So far as the 12-month sentence for possessing an offensive weapon is concerned, we accede, in part, to the submission made by Mr Barker. We take the view that 12 months was somewhat longer than all the circumstances of this case merited. We bear in mind those circumstances, as we have identified them, not least the fact that this was a dangerous knife with a four or five inch blade. We are prepared to quash the sentence of 12 months' imprisonment. We substitute for it a sentence nine months' imprisonment. The total sentence to be served therefore will be one of 15 months rather than 18 months' imprisonment. To that extent, Celaire's appeal is allowed and he may go down.

[32] With regard to the appellant, Poulton, we are indebted to the court's liaison probation officer for making inquiries during the adjournment in relation to this appellant. The sentence of three years which the learned sentencing judge passed cannot, on its face, be regarded as manifestly excessive, in the light of all the material which was before him, when he passed the sentence. This, however, is one of those comparatively rare cases in which, having regard to the material which is before this court bearing upon this appellant, it is possible to take a merciful view at this stage. In this regard we bear in mind that the appellant has already served the equivalent of a 22-month sentence. But we bear principally in mind the signs which are beginning to appear that this appellant is going to change her way of life. It is in the public interest, as well as her interest and the interests of her children, that she does change her way of life. If she does not do so, she will inevitably spend ever-increasing periods in custody.

[33] The view which we take is that, at this stage, we can properly quash the two sentences of imprisonment which were passed upon her in the court below and substitute for them, in each case concurrently, a 12-month community rehabilitation order. We emphasise that this decision is no authority for what is generally the appropriate level of sentencing in relation either to attempted street robbery or for the carrying of an offensive weapon in a public place. We shall attach to that probation order a condition that she attend the Oasis Project in Brighton as identified in the reports before this court to which earlier we referred, or other project as directed by the probation officer.

Celaire's appeal allowed in part. Poulton's sentences of imprisonment quashed and community rehabilitation orders substituted.

Lynne Townley Barrister.

R v T

[2003] EWCA Crim 1011

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION
AULD LJ, FULFORD J AND JUDGE ZUCKER
17 FEBRUARY 2003

Sentence – Custodial sentence – Sexual offence – Extended licence – Statutory provision empowering court to extend until end of sentence licence period in respect of sexual offences – Whether provision applying to sentence imposed for offence committed before its implementation – Criminal Justice Act 1991, s 44 (as originally enacted) – Human Rights Act 1998, s 3, Sch 1, Pt I, art 7 – Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, s 86.

The defendant was sentenced to a total of two-and-a-half years' imprisonment for sexual offences committed before the implementation, on 1 October 1992, of s 44[a] of the Criminal Justice Act 1991. Section 44 had given the court power, when sentencing for a sexual offence, to make an order extending to the whole of the sentence the period spent by the offender on licence following his release. Prior to the implementation of s 44, there had been no provisions available for ordering supervision and recall throughout the whole of the sentence. In respect of sexual offences committed before 30 September 1998, s 44 had been replaced by s 86[b] of the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, a provision that was in essentially the same terms as s 44. When sentencing the defendant, the judge purported to make an order under s 86 of the 2000 Act. He appealed, contending that a s 86 order, made in respect of an offence committed before 1 October 1992, would violate art 7[c] of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998)—the provision which prohibited the imposition of a heavier penalty than the one that had been applicable at the time that the criminal offence had been committed. The Court of Appeal was therefore required to determine whether, applying the interpretive obligation contained in s 3[d] of the 1998 Act, s 86 of the 2000 Act was to be read as if it contained a limitation to offences committed on or after 1 October 1992.

Held – Section 86 of the 2000 Act was without effect as regards any sentence passed for an offence committed before 1 October 1992. It was punitive and was properly to be contrasted with purely preventative measures that did not invoke any principle against retrospective penalty. Accordingly, s 3 of the 1998 Act was a Section 44, as originally enacted, is set out, so far as material, at [10], below

b Section 86, so far as material, provides: '(1) Where in the case of a long-term or short-term prisoner—(a) the whole or any part of the sentence was imposed for a sexual offence committed before 30 September 1998, and (b) the court by which he was sentenced for that offence, having had regard to the matters mentioned in section 32(6)(a) and (b) of the Criminal Justice Act 1991, ordered that this section should apply, sections 33(3) and 37(1) of that Act shall each have effect as if for the reference to three-quarters of his sentence there were substituted a reference to the whole of that sentence ...'

c Article 7 is set out at [16], below

d Section 3 is set out at [18], below to be applied so as to read s 86 of the 2000 Act in a manner that was compatible with art 7 of the convention. That interpretation of s 86 would, however, have been reached independently of the 1998 Act. It was a general principle of law, long applied in England and Wales, that where an act or admission constituted an offence when committed, no penalty was usually imposed that was heavier than the one applicable at that time. The legislation contained no clear terms which required it to be construed as having retrospective operation. Nor was there any necessary or distinct implication that it was to have such effect. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed, and the purported extension of the licence period under s 86 would be quashed (see [19]–[22], below).

Notes

For the convention prohibition on heavier retrospective penalties and for the power to impose on a sexual offender an extended period of post-release supervision, see respectively 8(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 148 and Supp to 11(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 1206.

Section 44 of the Criminal Justice Act 1991, as originally enacted and as it applied to persons sentenced for sexual offences committed before 30 September 1998, has been replaced by s 86 of the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000.

For the Human Rights Act 1998, s 3, Sch 1, Pt I, art 7, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 532, 554.

For the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, s 86, see 12 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 1864.

Case referred to in judgment

Ibbotson v UK (1999) 27 EHRR CD 332, E Com HR.

Appeal against sentence

The appellant, T, appealed against the order made in the Crown Court at Maidstone on 30 November 2001 under s 86 of the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, extending to the whole term of his sentence of two-and-a-half years' imprisonment for various sexual offences the period that he would spend on licence on his release. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Stephen Wilson (assigned by the Registrar for Criminal Appeals) for the appellant.

FULFORD J (giving the judgment of the court at the invitation of Auld LJ).

[1] On 8 November 2001 in the Crown Court at Maidstone the appellant was convicted of various offences and on 30 November 2001 was sentenced as follows. On counts 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 8 and 9, all of indecent assault on a female, he was sentenced to two-and-a-half years' imprisonment on each to be served concurrently. On counts 3, 7, 10 and 11, all of gross indecency with a child, the appellant was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment on each, concurrent with each other and concurrent with the sentences imposed on the earlier offences. The total sentence was, therefore, one of two-and-a-half years' imprisonment.

[2] Having passed that sentence of imprisonment, the learned judge, after some discussion with counsel, stated that his licence period was to be extended for two years under s 86 of the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000. The learned judge indicated in terms that he wanted to ensure that the appellant was to be under supervision for a period of two years following his release.

[3] Although we do not have a transcript of any court proceedings following the original sentencing hearing, it appears that the learned judge purported to vary the extended licence period after counsel returned to court in order to address him on the terms and effect of s 86. We are told that he stated by way of variation of sentence that the supervision of the appellant would run not for two years, but for the entirety of the sentence. In those circumstances, and in the absence of a proper record, it is difficult to determine exactly what order was made finally by the learned judge.

[4] It is important to note that the offences spanned the period of 4 July 1981 to 2 November 1988. The effect of s 86 is that if an offender is sentenced to a determinate sentence of 12 months or more, and the whole or any part of his sentence was imposed for a sexual offence committed before September 30 1998, the court may order that s 86 of the 2000 Act will apply to him. The consequence of the order is that when he is released on licence he will remain on licence until the end of the whole of his sentence. The offender will not necessarily remain in custody any longer than otherwise would be the case, but he will be liable to supervision and recall throughout the whole of sentence.

[5] The appellant appeals against the part of the sentence that concerns that licence period with the leave of the single judge, the Registrar having granted an extension of time, 159 days, for the filing of grounds of appeal. We turn, briefly to the facts.

[6] Since the issue that falls for determination on this appeal is not fact dependent and relates solely to the validity of the extension of the licence period we are able to deal with the background facts in summary form only.

[7] Between 4 July 1981 and 2 November 1988 the appellant committed a number of indecent acts with three of the female grandchildren of his partner. The victims were all under 13 years of age at the time. The indecent assaults consisted initially of touching the genital area of two of the victims and progressed to digital penetration, oral sex, simulation of sexual intercourse and finally to forcing the children to masturbate him. The appellant indecently exposed himself to the third victim.

[8] The offences were reported to the police in January 2001. On 16 January 2001 the appellant was arrested. When interviewed he denied the offences.

[9] In passing sentence the learned judge observed that the appellant had been convicted of a number of offences of indecency with young girls who were effectively his grandchildren and in those circumstances only a custodial sentence could be justified. In deciding the appropriate sentence account was taken of the fact that the matters were the subject of discussion within the family in 1993, and his partner was currently in ill health, but those were not, in the view of the court, exceptional circumstances such as to justify suspension of the sentence. We have set out above the learned judge's purported orders under s 86 of the 2000 Act.

[10] It is argued that this sentence is invalid in that the offences were committed prior to the coming into force of the relevant legislation that gave the courts the power to extend the licence period. The courts gained these powers by way of s 44 of the Criminal Justice Act 1991, which was later replaced by s 86. Section 44 contains the following:

'(1) Where, in the case of long-term or short-term prisoner—(a) the whole or any part of his sentence was imposed for a sexual offence; and (b) the court by which he was sentenced for that offence, having had regard to the matters mentioned in section 32(6)(a) and (b) above, ordered that this section should apply, sections 33(3) and 37(1) above shall each have effect as if for the reference to three-quarters of his sentence there were substituted a reference to the whole of that sentence.'

[11] Section 33(3) of the 1991 Act required a short-term prisoner who had been released on licence, and then recalled, to be released on licence once he would (but for his release) have served three-quarters of his sentence. Section 37(1) limited the licence period of all prisoners to three-quarters of their sentence.

[12] The matters mentioned in s 32(6)(a) and (b) are the linked needs of protecting the public from serious harm from offenders; preventing the commission by them of further offences and securing their rehabilitation.

[13] Section 86 of the 2000 Act sets out as follows:

'(1) Where, in a case of a long-term or short-term prisoner—(a) the whole or any part of his sentence was imposed for a sexual offence committed before 30th September 1998, and (b) the court by which he was sentenced for that offence, having had regard to the matters mentioned in section 32(6)(a) and (b) of the Criminal Justice Act 1991, ordered that this section should apply.'

There are similar references, as in s 44, to s 33 and s 37 of the 1991 Act (see [11], above).

[14] The provision from which s 86 is derived, s 44 of the 1991 Act, came into force on 1 October 1992 (Criminal Justice Act 1991 (Commencement No 3) Order 1992, SI 1992/333). Before that date the longest period which an offender could serve under any determinate sentence was two thirds of the sentence.

[15] Prior to that date there were no provisions available for ordering supervision and recall throughout the whole of the sentence. It is submitted that the extension of the supervision to the end of the sentence represents a heavier penalty than could have been imposed in accordance with the provisions in force at the time. Article 7 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) is relied on in this regard.

[16] Article 7 provides as follows:

'1. No one shall be held guilty of a criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence under national or international law at the time when it was committed. Nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time the criminal offence was committed.

2. This Article shall not prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for any act or omission which, at the time it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognised by civilised nations.'

[17] It is submitted that these provisions would be violated if an order under s 86 is made in respect of an offence committed before 1 October 1992. Counsel for the appellant argues that s 86 must be interpreted in accordance with s 3 of the 1998 Act as if it contained a limitation to offences committed on or after that date.

[18] Section 3 of the 1998 Act contains the following:

'(1) So far as it is possible to do so, primary legislation and subordinate legislation must be read and given effect in a way which is compatible with Convention rights.

(2) This section—(a) applies to primary legislation and subordinate legislation whenever enacted; (b) does not affect the validity, continuing operation or enforcement of any incompatible primary legislation; and (c) does not affect the validity, continuing operation or enforcement of any incompatible subordinate legislation if (disregarding any possibility of revocation) primary legislation prevents removal of the incompatibility.'

[19] There is no doubt, in our judgment, that these provisions are punitive and are properly to be contrasted with purely preventative measures that do not invoke any principle against retrospective penalty: see Ibbotson v UK (1999) 27 EHRR CD 332, where, by contrast, the European Commission held that the registration requirements of the Sex Offenders Act 1997, which have a partially retrospective operation were preventative, rather than punitive in character, and did not therefore constitute a penalty for the purposes of art 7.

[20] We, therefore, accept the submissions that we should apply s 3 of the 1998 Act so as to read s 86 in a manner that is compatible with art 7 of the convention. There is no incompatibility with primary legislation, and, accordingly, we have no hesitation in applying to s 86 the interpretation contended for, namely that it is without effect as regards any sentence passed for an offence committed before 1 October 1992. We add that we would have arrived at this conclusion independently of the 1998 Act for it is a general principle of law long applied in England and Wales that where an act or admission constituted an offence when committed no penalty is usually to be imposed which is heavier than the one applicable at that time.

[21] Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes (12th edn, 1969) p 215 puts the matter in emphatic terms:

'It is a fundamental rule of English law that no statute shall be construed to have a retrospective operation unless such a construction appears very clearly in the terms of the Act, or arises by necessary and distinct implication.'

No such terms or necessary or distinct implication is to be found under the relevant legislation.

[22] We quash the purported extension of the licence period under s 86, but otherwise the sentence in all other respects remains as passed, namely two-and-a-half years' imprisonment.

[23] It is an offence to publish the name and address of the victim, or any matter which might lead to identification of the victim.

Appeal allowed.

Stephen Leake Barrister.

R v R

[2003] EWCA Crim 2199

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION
4, 25 JULY 2003
KENNEDY LJ AND PITCHERS J

Sentence – Custodial sentence – Sexual offence – Extended licence – Statutory provision empowering court to extend until end of sentence licence period in respect of sexual offences – Whether such extension violating convention prohibition on heavier retrospective penalties if imposed in respect of offence committed before provision implemented – Criminal Justice Act 1991, s 32(6) – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 7 – Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, s 86.

The defendant was sentenced to two years' imprisonment for sexual offences committed before the implementation, on 1 October 1992, of the Criminal Justice Act 1991. If he had been sentenced for those offences when they had been committed, he would have been eligible to apply for parole after serving 12 months and would have remained on licence until the two-thirds point. However, s 86[a] of the Power of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, when read with certain provisions of the 1991 Act, gave the sentencing court power, in respect of sexual offences committed before 30 September 1998, to extend the licence period until the end of the sentence. That power, which replaced a similar power originally contained in the 1991 Act, could be invoked once the court had had regard to the matters mentioned in s 32(6)[b] of the 1991 Act, namely the need to protect the public from serious harm from offenders and the desirability of preventing the commission by them of further offences and of securing their rehabilitation. If he were in breach of his licence, a person subject to an order under s 86 of the 2000 Act could be fined or recalled to prison for up to six months. The sentencing judge imposed a s 86 order on the defendant. He appealed, contending that such an order, when made in respect of an offence committed before 1 October 1992, violated art 7(1)[c] of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998)—the provision which prohibited the imposition of a heavier penalty than the one that had been applicable at the time that the criminal offence had been committed.

Held – The imposition, under s 86 of the 2000 Act, of an order for an extended licence in respect of offences committed before 1 October 1992 did not violate art 7 of the convention. Such an order was preventive, not punitive. Its operation related to the execution of the sentence and was part of the machinery of carrying out the penalty. Adding such an order to a sentence of imprisonment for an offence committed before 1 October 1992 did not constitute the imposition of a heavier penalty than was available when the offence was committed. It followed in the instant case that there was no violation of art 7, and accordingly the appeal would be dismissed (see [29], [34], below).

a Section 86 is set out at [5], below
b Section 32, so far as material, is set out at [6], below
c Article 7(1) is set out at [12], below

R v Hodgeon [1997] 1 Cr App Rep (S) 399 considered.
R v T [2003] 4 All ER 877 disapproved.

Notes

For the convention prohibition on heavier retrospective penalties and for the power to impose on a sexual offender an extended period of post-release supervision, see respectively 8(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 148 and Supp to 11(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 1206.

For the Criminal Justice Act 1991, s 32, see 34 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2001 reissue) 805.

For the Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 7, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 554.

For the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000, s 86, see 12 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 1864.

Cases referred to in judgment

Hogben v UK (1986) 46 DR 231, E Com HR.
Ibbotson v UK (1999) 27 EHRR CD 332, E Com HR.
R v Field, R v Young [2002] EWCA Crim 2913, [2003] 3 All ER 769, [2003] 1 WLR 882.
R v Hodgeon [1997] 1 Cr App Rep (S) 399, CA.
R v Simpson [2003] EWCA Crim 1499, [2003] 3 All ER 531, [2003] 3 WLR 337.
R v T [2003] EWCA Crim 1011, [2003] 4 All ER 877.
R v Taylor [1996] 2 Cr App Rep 64, CA.
R (on the application of Anderson) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] UKHL 46, [2002] 4 All ER 1089, [2002] 3 WLR 1800.
R (on the application of McFetrich) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2003] EWHC 1542 (Admin), [2003] All ER (D) 386 (Jun), DC.
R (on the application of Uttley) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2003] EWHC 950 (Admin), [2003] All ER (D) 130 (Apr); rvsd [2003] EWCA Civ 1130, [2003] 4 All ER 891.
Stafford v UK (2002) 35 EHRR 1121, [2002] ECHR 46295/99, ECt HR.
Taylor v UK [1998] EHRLR 90, E Com HR,
Welch v UK (1995) 20 EHRR 247, [1995] ECHR 17440/90, ECt HR.

Adjourned appeal against sentence

Following its dismissal on 8 May 2003 ([2003] EWCA Crim 1518) of an appeal by the appellant, R, against the sentence of two years' imprisonment imposed on him in the Crown Court at Bury St Edmunds on 16 December 2002 for four offences of indecent assault, the Court of Appeal adjourned for further argument that part of the appeal which related to the judge's decision to impose on the appellant an order under s 86 of the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000 extending, until the end of his sentence, the period that he would spend on licence. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Jonathan Goodman (assigned by the Registrar of Criminal Appeals) for the appellant.
Tim Owen QC and Alison Macdonald (instructed by the Crown Prosecution Service) as advocates to the court.

Cur adv vult

25 July 2003. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

PITCHERS J.

INTRODUCTION

[1] On 8 May 2003 ([2003] EWCA Crim 1518), we heard the appeal of this appellant against his sentence of two years imposed for four offences of indecent assault. We dismissed the appeal against the custodial term but adjourned consideration of the legality of the order that his licence be extended under s 86 of the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000 so that counsel might be instructed as an advocate to the court to assist the court on what is a matter of law of some importance. As will become clear in this judgment, we have been greatly assisted by Mr Tim Owen QC who was so instructed.

[2] For the full details of the facts of the case and our reasons for dismissing that part of the appeal, reference should be made to the judgment delivered on 8 May. For the purposes of this part of the judgment, the only relevant facts are these: (i) The appellant pleaded guilty to four offences of indecent assault for which he was sentenced to a total of two years, which custodial term we upheld; (ii) the charges represented a course of conduct of indecency against his two stepdaughters who at the time of the offences were 10 and 8; (iii) the offences were committed between 1976 and 1979 and 1976 and 1982 respectively.

[3] The judge wished to include as part of his order an extension to the licence period to which the appellant would normally have been subject. The power to do so under s 85 of the 2000 Act was not available because that section expressly applies only to offences that were committed after 30 September 1998. The judge therefore purported to exercise his power under s 86 which applies to sexual offences committed before 30 September 1998. The question raised in this part of the appeal is whether there was power to extend the licence in the way that the judge did or whether that was unlawful as being a retrospective penalty and as such in breach of art 7(1) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998).

[4] Before dealing with the major point in the appeal, we should dispose of a subsidiary argument advanced by Mr Goodman in his written submissions but not elaborated orally. He argues that, if the order was lawful, it should not have been made on the facts of this case. We disagree. The necessary criteria, which we set out in full below, were satisfied and it was not wrong in principle for the judge to make the order that he did.

THE STATUTORY FRAMEWORK

[5] Section 86 of the 2000 Act:

> 'Sexual offences committed before 30th September 1998.—(1) Where, in the case of a long-term or short-term prisoner—(a) the whole or any part of his sentence was imposed for a sexual offence committed before 30th September 1998, and (b) the court by which he was sentenced for that offence, having had regard to the matters mentioned in section 32(6)(a) and (b) of the Criminal Justice Act 1991, ordered that this section should apply, sections 33(3) and 37(1) of that Act shall each have effect as if for the reference to three-quarters of his sentence there were substituted a reference to the whole of that sentence.

(2) Expressions used in this section shall be construed as if they were contained in Part II of the Criminal Justice Act 1991.

(3) The reference in subsection (1) above to section 33(3) of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 is to section 33(3) as it has effect without the amendment made by section 104(1) of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 (which substituted the words "on licence" for the word "unconditionally" and does not apply in relation to a prisoner whose sentence or any part of whose sentence was imposed for an offence committed before 30th September 1998).'

[6] The matters mentioned in s 32(6)(a) and (b) are 'the need to protect the public from serious harm from offenders' and 'the desirability of preventing the commission by them of further offences and of securing their rehabilitation'. That section was originally contained in s 44 of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 which came into force on 1 October 1992. That section was itself amended by s 58 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998.

[7] The effect of the interplay of these sections is this. In an ordinary case, if the sentence is at least twelve months but less than four years ('a short term prisoner'), the prisoner is released after one half of his sentence and remains on licence until he would have served three quarters of his sentence had he not been released. If his sentence is four years or more ('a long term prisoner'), he is eligible for release on parole after one half of his sentence, he must be released after two-thirds and also remains on licence until three quarters of his sentence would have been served. If, in a sexual case, the judge passing sentence has made an order under s 86 of the 2000 Act, the licence continues not until the prisoner would (but for his release) have served three-quarters of his sentence but until the end of the total sentence.

[8] The consequences of any breach of licence were set out in s 38 of the 1991 Act:

'(1) A short-term prisoner—(a) who is released on licence under this Part; and (b) who fails to comply with such conditions as may for the time being be specified in the licence, shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.

(2) The magistrates' court by which a person is convicted of an offence under subsection (1) above may, whether or not it passes any other sentence on him—(a) suspend the licence for a period not exceeding six months; and (b) order him to be recalled to prison for the period during which the licence is so suspended.

(3) On the suspension of the licence of any person under this section, he shall be liable to be detained in pursuance of his sentence and, if at large, shall be deemed to be unlawfully at large.'

This section applies to any prisoner who is serving a sentence for an offence committed before 30 September 1998 although it has been repealed for all other purposes.

[9] The potential consequences for a defendant in respect of whom an order under s 86 of the 2000 Act is made are thus that he may, if in breach of his licence, be fined or recalled to prison for up to six months.

[10] It is those potential consequences that lead counsel for the appellant in the present case to argue that a sentence passed under s 86 for an offence committed before 1 October 1992 (the commencement date of the 1991 Act) violates art 7(1) of the convention as being a heavier retrospective penalty. Consistent with the court's duty under s 3 of the Human Rights Act 1998 to give effect to legislation in a way that is compatible with convention rights so far as is possible, counsel argues that this provision should be interpreted as not applying to cases involving offences committed before 1 October 1992. This argument is not advanced in relation to sentences for offences committed after 1 October 1992 but before 30 September 1998.

[11] Had the appellant been sentenced for these offences at the time he committed them, his release would have been governed by the Criminal Justice Act 1967. Under s 60 of that Act, a prisoner serving a two-year sentence was eligible to apply for parole after twelve months of his sentence and would have remained on licence until the two-thirds point.

THE TEST UNDER THE CONVENTION

[12] Article 7(1) reads as follows:

> 'No one shall be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence under national or international law at the time when it was committed. Nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time the criminal offence was committed.'

[13] Certain matters are not in dispute between the parties. First, 'penalty' is an autonomous concept under the convention. Secondly, the relevant leading case in the European Court of Human Rights is Welch v UK (1995) 20 EHRR 247. The criteria for determining whether an order is a penalty, distilled from that case, were set out by this court in R v Field, R v Young [2002] EWCA Crim 2913, [2003] 3 All ER 769, [2003] 1 WLR 882. (i) The starting point is whether the measure is imposed following a criminal conviction (see Welch's case (1995) 20 EHRR 247 at 262 (paras 28 and 29)). (ii) The nature and purpose of the measure are also relevant (see (1995) 20 EHRR 247 at 262 (paras 28 and 30)). (iii) Its characterisation under national law is relevant (see paras 28 and 31 (at 262)). (iv) The procedures involved in the making and implementation of the measure are relevant (see para 28). (v) Its severity is relevant (see paras 28 and 32 (at 262–263)). (vi) The court will look at the substance, rather than the form, in determining whether the measure forms part of a 'regime of punishment' (see paras 27, 33 and 34 (at 261, 263)).

RELEVANT CASE LAW

[14] The courts have been called upon to determine whether a measure is a penalty and to apply the Welch criteria in a number of recent cases. For present purposes they can be divided into two broad categories: those where the court had to consider a measure which stood on its own and those where the court was considering early release from a custodial sentence. The first group of cases is helpful in showing the approach of the courts to this issue but it is the second group which is most closely analogous to the present case.

CASES INVOLVING STAND-ALONE MEASURES

[15] The case of Welch itself concerned a confiscation order made under the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986, the operative provisions of which came into force on 12 January 1987. The drug offences triggering the order were committed in 1986. The European Court of Human Rights held that the measure was a penalty. The sweeping nature of the statutory assumptions, the fact that confiscation was not limited to the actual enrichment, the discretion in the judge to have regard to the culpability of the accused and the possibility of imprisonment in default were elements which taken together provided a strong indication of a regime of punishment.

[16] In R v Taylor [1996] 2 Cr App Rep 64 this court held that a confiscation order which involved confiscating the proceeds of drug trafficking before the coming into effect of the relevant Act did not violate art 7 because the conviction which triggered the confiscation proceedings related to conduct after the coming into effect of the Act so the defendant must be presumed to have known the consequences of his offending when he committed the offence. This distinction from Welch's case was also made in the subsequent decision in the European Commission of Human Rights (see Taylor v UK [1998] EHRLR 90)

[17] In Ibbotson v UK (1999) 27 EHRR CD 332, an application to the Court of Human Rights in respect of the registration requirement under the Sex Offenders Act 1997 was refused on the grounds that the measure was preventive rather than punitive and hence did not violate art 7. The same view for the same reason was taken by this court of a disqualification order under s 28 of the Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000 in so far as it operated retrospectively (see R v Field [2003] 3 All ER 769)

CASES CONCERNING EARLY RELEASE

[18] Understandably, Mr Goodman for the appellant puts the decision of this court in R v T [2003] EWCA Crim 1011, [2003] 4 All ER 877 at the forefront of his argument. That case is the only one in which the precise issue of orders made under s 86 of the 2000 Act in respect of offences committed before 1 October 1992 has been considered. The court said (at [19]):

> 'There is no doubt, in our judgment, that these provisions are punitive and are properly to be contrasted with purely preventative measures that do not invoke any principle against retrospective penalty ...'

Accordingly, the court held that s 86 must be read as not applying to offences committed before 1 October 1992. It follows that, if we come to a contrary conclusion, it can only be on the basis that R v T was decided per incuriam.

[19] In an admissibility decision, Hogben v UK (1986) 46 DR 231 the Commission rejected the argument that the introduction in 1983 of the tariff system by the then Home Secretary was a breach of art 7. Although part of their reasoning can no longer be regarded as sound following the decision of the Court of Human Rights in Stafford v UK (2002) 35 EHRR 1121 and of the House of Lords in R (on the application of Anderson) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] UKHL 46, [2002] 4 All ER 1089, [2002] 3 WLR 1800, the following paragraph is unaffected by those decisions:

> 'Although [the change in parole policy] may give rise to the result that his imprisonment is effectively harsher than if he had been eligible for release on parole at an earlier stage, such matters relate to the execution of the sentence as opposed to the "penalty" which remains that of life imprisonment. Accordingly it cannot be said that the "penalty" imposed is a heavier one than that imposed by the trial judge.' (See (1986) 46 DR 231 at 236.)

[20] The nature of licence provisions in determinate sentences was considered recently by Moses J in the Administrative Court in R (on the application of Uttley) v

Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2003] EWHC 950 (Admin), [2003] All ER (D) 130 (Apr). The claimant was a long-term prisoner whose offences had been committed before 1983. The passing of the 1991 Act meant that he would be eligible for release on licence at a later point in his sentence than would have been the case had he been sentenced in 1983. He argued that these provisions were contrary to art 7. In rejecting that argument, Moses J said:

> '[14] It is plain that the purpose of a licence is to enable the long-term prisoner to stay out of trouble, both for his own benefit and for the benefit of the community, and so that thereby he does not lose his liberty. True it is that, if he breaches his licence, he is at risk of recall, but the licence itself is designed to avoid the risk of further offences and a return to prison. Nor in any real sense can it be said that the imposition of the licence follows conviction. The judge makes no order. The licence follows by virtue of the operation of s 33 on release and is plainly part of the rehabilitation process.
>
> [15] I conclude that the nature and purpose of the licence are such that they dominate the factors which go to the conclusion as to whether the imposition of the licence is a penalty or not. The imposition of the licence is designed to protect the public once a prisoner is released, and assist in preventing the prisoner from committing further offences.'

In the present case, the extension of the licence is imposed by the judge at the time of sentence. However, in our judgment, the analysis of the purpose and effect of licence provisions set out in that passage is correct.

[21] The case of R (on the application of McFetrich) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2003] EWHC 1542 (Admin), [2003] All ER (D) 386 (Jun) was decided on 30 June 2003 but the judgment was not available at the time of the oral hearing of this case. Accordingly, counsel have not had the opportunity to consider it. However, it is relevant to the present case since it deals with the impact of art 7 on the tariff period of a mandatory life sentence. Scott Baker LJ said:

> '[20] ... Article 7 is concerned with retrospectivity and the word "penalty" is in my view referring to the whole penalty rather than to its constituent elements. The penalty is a life sentence and the fact that some prisoners, perhaps the vast majority, are released during their lifetime does not prevent the sentence from being a life sentence. Even after release the sentence continues for the prisoner is on licence for the rest of his life and liable to recall to prison. If he is recalled to prison he will inevitably serve a greater period in custody than the original tariff.
>
> [21] A sentence of life imprisonment is different from a determinate sentence because it contains separate elements aimed (i) at retribution and deterrence and (ii) at the protection of the public. It is, in my judgment, however, not possible to equate the period to be served for retribution and deterrence (the tariff) with the penalty for the offence. Put slightly differently, art 7 is not concerned with the machinery for carrying out the penalty but rather with the penalty itself ...'

APPLICATION OF THE WELCH CRITERIA.

[22] (i) Measure made following a criminal conviction. Clearly the order can only be made when there is a conviction.

[23] (ii) The nature and purpose of the measure. The statutory criteria for the making of an order are 'the need to protect the public from serious harm from offenders' and 'the desirability of preventing the commission by them of further offences and of securing their rehabilitation'. Although these criteria are expressed in words suggesting a preventive measure and are in the context of a section dealing with the basis for release on parole, it should be noted that the words of the first are the same as one of the pre-conditions for passing a custodial sentence in violent or sexual offences (s 1(2)(b)).

[24] We have set out above our view of the correct way of looking at licence provisions in the context of art 7 generally. Strong support for the proposition that this is the proper view of s 86 is contained in the judgment of this court given by Lord Bingham CJ in R v Hodgeon [1997] 1 Cr App Rep (S) 399 at 403:

> '[Section 44] is a section which gives the authorities additional control over an offender in relation to whom such an order is made. It affects both the period which an offender will continue to serve if recalled to prison after release on licence and the period for which a prisoner will be supervised after release on licence. In making such an order the primary considerations to be borne in mind are the need to protect the public from serious harm from offenders, the desirability of preventing the commission by them of further offences, and the rehabilitation of offenders.'

[25] (iii) Its characterisation under national law. Although the forerunner of s 86 was passed before the incorporation of the Human Rights Act 1998, there is no doubt that Parliament intended that the measure should apply to all offences committed before 30 September 1998 regardless of whether they predated the coming into force of the Criminal Justice Act 1991. It is also true that the section was applied retrospectively after the passing of the 1991 Act both at first instance and in this court. That has continued since the implementation of the 1998 Act and, with the exception of R v T [2003] 4 All ER 877 to which we will return, has not been questioned in this court.

[26] (iv) The procedures involved in the making and implementation of the measure. An order under s 86 can only be made as part of a custodial sentence. The maximum length of that sentence remains unchanged by the 1991 Act. It will only be implemented in the event of a breach by the released prisoner. The licence terminates at the end of the notional sentence and cannot exceed it.

[27] (v) The severity of the measure. There is no doubt that the extended licence in itself involves a restriction of the liberty of the released prisoner even if he does not commit a breach of it. A breach may lead to a penalty of up to six months' imprisonment. That, however, is not conclusive. Breaches of a number of orders held not to be penalties may similarly lead to loss of liberty or other sanction if breached.

[28] (vi) The substance rather than the form. It is the exercise of looking at the substance rather than the form that we have been carrying out in our review of the statutory provisions and relevant case law.

CONCLUSION

[29] In our judgment, the true analysis of the relevant statutory provisions and the way in which they have been interpreted in the domestic and European courts demonstrates that an order for an extended licence is preventive not punitive. Its operation relates to the 'execution of the sentence' (Hogben v UK (1986) 46 DR 231) and is part of 'the machinery for carrying out the penalty' (R (on the application of McFetrich) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2003] All ER (D) 386 (Jun) at [21]). Adding such an order to a sentence of imprisonment for an offence committed before 1 October

1992 is not to impose a heavier penalty than was available when the offence was committed and does not violate art 7.

[30] As we have already indicated, the conclusion to which we have come necessarily involves the further conclusion that R v T was wrongly decided. In concluding that we may properly consider that decision as per incuriam, we have had regard to the guidance given recently by this court in R v Simpson [2003] EWCA Crim 1499, [2003] 3 All ER 531, [2003] 3 WLR 337 in relation to the modern doctrine of per incuriam in criminal cases.

[31] Lord Woolf CJ, giving the judgment of a five-judge court, said (at [34]):

> 'We appreciate that there may be a case for not interpreting the law contrary to a previous authority in a manner that would mean that an offender who otherwise would not have committed an offence would be held to have committed an offence. However, we do not understand why that should apply to a situation where a defendant, as here, wishes to rely upon a wrongly decided case to provide a technical defence. While justice for a defendant is extremely important, justice for the public at large is also important. So is the maintenance of confidence in the criminal justice system.'

[35] Here we prefer the approach indicated in Bennion Statutory Interpretation (4th edn, 2002) p 134 which states:

> 'The basis of the per incuriam doctrine is that a decision given in the absence of relevant information cannot be safely relied on. This applies whenever it is at least probable that if information had been known the decision would have been affected by it.'

[32] There are two significant factors in this case which fall into the category of information referred to in the quotation from Bennion Statutory Interpretation. First, and importantly, R v T was a sentence appeal where only the appellant was represented. The court therefore did not have the benefit of the sort of submissions which have been advanced to us by Mr Owen. Secondly, the court had cited to it only one of the cases to which we have been referred, namely Ibbotson v UK (1999) 27 EHRR CD 332. In particular, neither Hogben v UK (1986) 46 DR 231 nor R v Hodgeon [1997] 1 Cr App Rep (S) 399 was cited and each is, in our judgment, important to the proper consideration of this issue.

[33] Mr Goodman reminds us that we are a two-judge court and the court in R v T was a three-judge court. That is a relevant consideration: see R v Simpson [2003] 3 All ER 531 at [38]. However, that cannot outweigh the other factors to which we have referred. We have come to the clear view that R v T should be regarded as decided per incuriam and not followed. Had the court in that case been provided with the information that we have had, we have no doubt they would have come to the same conclusion as we do.

[34] Accordingly, the appeal is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Sanchia Pereira Barrister.

R (on the application of Uttley) v Secretary of State for the Home Department

[2003] EWCA Civ 1130

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

PILL, LONGMORE LJJ AND MAURICE KAY J

4, 30 JULY 2003

Sentence – Custodial sentence – Licence – Statutory scheme providing for release of offender on licence rather than unconditionally – Whether scheme incompatible with convention prohibition on heavier retrospective penalties when applying to offences committed before scheme's implementation – Criminal Justice Act 1991, ss 33(2), 37, 39 – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 7.

The claimant was sentenced to 12 years' imprisonment for sexual offences committed before the implementation of the Criminal Justice Act 1991. Under the pre-1991 Act regime, an offender in the claimant's position would have been entitled to release without licence after serving two-thirds of his sentence. By virtue, however, of ss 33(2)[a] and 37(1)[b] of the 1991 Act, the claimant was entitled to be released at the two-thirds point on licence only until the completion of three-quarters of the sentence. The terms of such a licence commonly included placing the offender under the supervision of a supervising officer (as provided for by s 37(4A)), and requiring him to keep in touch with the officer and to live where reasonably approved by the officer. There could also be restrictions on travel without obtaining the permission of the officer. Under s 39[c] of the Act, a prisoner on licence was liable to be recalled by the Secretary of State to serve the remainder of his sentence. An offender was also liable to be returned to custody if convicted of a further imprisonable offence while the licence was in force. In judicial review proceedings, the claimant contended that the statutory scheme, as it applied to him, was incompatible with art 7(1)[d] of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998)—the provision which prohibited the imposition of a heavier penalty than the one that had been applicable at the time that the criminal offence had been committed. That contention was rejected by the judge. On the claimant's appeal, the Secretary of State contended that the 12-years' custodial sentence was the penalty with which art 7 of the convention was concerned and that provisions for early release from that sentence of imprisonment did not engage the concept of penalty. In so contending, he submitted that the licence was completely separate from the sentencing process, that it was instead part of the procedure for release and rehabilitation, and that it was preventative rather than punitive.

a Section 33(2) is set out at [3], below
b Section 37, so far as material, is set out at [3], below
c Section 39, so far as material, is set out at [4], below
d Article 7, so far as material, is set out at [6], below

Held – Sections 33(2), 37(4A) and 39 of the 1991 Act were incompatible with an offender's rights under art 7 of the convention in so far as they provided that he would be released at the two-thirds point of his sentence on licence with conditions and would be liable to be recalled to prison (such an offender having committed the index offences before the 1991 Act came into force, and at a time when he would have expected to be released unconditionally at the two-thirds point of any sentence). The licence was plainly part of the sentence originally imposed by the sentencing judge. The sentence comprised a period of detention followed by a period on licence. Although the judge pronounced a sentence of imprisonment for a particular number of years, it was a fiction to the extent that there were detailed provisions as to what, in terms of punishment, it actually meant. Approached in that way, a sentence which included a period of licence, inevitably extending beyond two-thirds of the term imposed, was a heavier penalty than a sentence without that requirement. While conditions on licence varied, conditions would inevitably be imposed which were impediments upon the offender's freedom of action. Moreover, the conditions created a potential liability to serve a further substantial period in custody, as did the provisions dealing with the effects of re-conviction. Arguments that the purpose of the licence procedures was rehabilitative and preventative, as undoubtedly they were in part, did not detract from their onerous nature viewed as part of the sentence. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed, and a declaration of incompatibility granted (see [14], [15], [25]–[27], [39], [40], below).

R (on the application of West) v Parole Board [2003] 1 WLR 705 distinguished.

Notes

For the convention prohibition on heavier retrospective penalties and for release on licence, see respectively 8(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 148 and 36(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 617.

For the Criminal Justice Act 1991, ss 33, 37, 39, see 34 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2001 reissue) 806, 812, 816.

For the Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 7, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 554.

Cases referred to in judgments

B v Chief Constable of Avon and Somerset Constabulary [2001] 1 All ER 562, [2001] 1 WLR 340, DC.

Ezeh v UK (2002) 12 BHRC 589, ECt HR.

Findlay v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1984] 3 All ER 801, [1985] AC 318, [1984] 4 WLR 1159, HL.

Gough v Chief Constable of Derbyshire Constabulary, R (on the application of Miller) v Leeds Magistrates' Court, Lilley v DPP [2001] EWHC Admin 554, [2001] 4 All ER 289, [2002] QB 459, [2001] 3 WLR 1392, DC; affd [2002] EWCA Civ 351, [2002] 2 All ER 985, [2002] QB 1213, [2002] 3 WLR 289.

Hogben v UK (1986) 46 DR 231, E Com HR.

Ibbotson v UK (1999) 27 EHRR CD 332, E Com HR.

Practice Note (custodial sentences: explanation) [1998] 1 All ER 733, [1998] 1 WLR 278, CA.

Practice Note (sentence: early release of prisoners) [1992] 4 All ER 307, [1992] 1 WLR 948, CA.

R v Field, R v Young [2002] EWCA Crim 2913, [2003] 3 All ER 769, [2003] 1 WLR 882.

R (on the application of McCann) v Crown Court at Manchester, Clingham v Kensington and Chelsea Royal London BC [2002] UKHL 39, [2002] 4 All ER 593, [2003] 1 AC 787, [2002] 3 WLR 1313.

R (on the application of West) v Parole Board [2002] EWCA Civ 1641, [2003] 1 WLR 705.

Welch v UK (1995) 20 EHRR 247, [1995] ECHR 17440/90, ECt HR.

Cases also cited or referred to in skeleton arguments

Aldrian v Austria (1990) 65 DR 337, E Com HR.

Brown v UK (1998) 28 EHRR CD 233, E Com HR.

Guzzardi v Italy (1980) 3 EHRR 333, [1980] ECHR 7367/76, ECt HR.

Jamil v France (1995) 21 EHRR 65, [1995] ECHR 15917/89, ECt HR.

M v Italy (1991) 70 DR 59, E Com HR.

Raimondo v Italy (1994) 18 EHRR 237, ECt HR.

Weeks v UK (1987) 10 EHRR 293, [1987] ECHR 9787/82, ECt HR.

Appeal

Brian Uttley appealed with permission of Kay LJ granted on 12 May 2003 from the decision of Moses J on 8 April 2003 ([2003] EWHC 950 (Admin), [2003] All ER (D) 130 (Apr)) dismissing his proceedings for judicial review against the respondent, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, seeking a declaration that certain provisions of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 were incompatible with his rights under art 7 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). The facts are set out in the judgment of Pill LJ.

Anthony Scrivener QC and Sharon Watson (instructed by Rooney & Co, Birkenhead) for the appellant.

Jonathan Crow and Jenni Richards (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the Secretary of State.

Cur adv vult

4 July 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

PILL LJ.

[1] This is an appeal against a judgment of Moses J given in the Administrative Court on 8 April 2003 ([2003] All ER (D) 130 (Apr)) in which he dismissed an application by Mr Brian Uttley (the appellant) whereby the appellant sought declarations in relation to provisions in the Criminal Justice Act 1991. The appellant claimed that provisions under which he will from 24 October 2003 be subject to licence under s 33 of the 1991 Act are contrary to art 7 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998).

[2] On 24 October 1995, the appellant pleaded guilty to serious sexual offences which he had committed many years before the 1991 Act came into force. He was sentenced to a term of 12 years' imprisonment. He is entitled to be released on 24 October 2003 when he has completed two-thirds of that sentence but he will thereafter remain on licence until he has served three-quarters of his sentence.

[3] Section 33(2) of the 1991 Act provides:

> 'As soon as a long-term prisoner [a prisoner serving a sentence of imprisonment for a term of four years or more] has served two-thirds of his sentence, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to release him on licence.'

Section 37(1), in so far as is material, provides:

> '... where a ... long-term prisoner is released on licence, the licence shall ... remain in force until the date on which he would (but for his release) have served three-quarters of his sentence.'

By amendment, the statute now provides (s 37(1A)) that in some circumstances s 37(1) 'shall have effect as if for the reference to three-quarters of his sentence there were substituted a reference to the whole of that sentence'. That provision is not claimed to apply to the appellant.

[4] Section 39 of the Act provides, in so far as is material:

> '(1) If recommended to do so by the Board [the Parole Board] in the case of a ... long-term ... prisoner who has been released on licence under this Part [Pt II, which includes s 33], the Secretary of State may revoke his licence and recall him to prison.
>
> (2) The Secretary of State may revoke the licence of any such person and recall him to prison without a recommendation by the Board, where it appears to him that it is expedient in the public interest to recall that person before such a recommendation is practicable.'

Safeguards are provided in the section for offenders in relation to whom those powers are exercised and sub-s (6) provides:

> 'On the revocation of the licence of any person under this section, he shall be liable to be detained in pursuance of his sentence and, if at large, shall be deemed to be unlawfully at large.'

A recalled prisoner is liable to serve the remainder of the sentence which had been imposed.

[5] It is common ground that the terms of a licence under s 33 will commonly include placing the offender under the supervision of a supervising officer (as provided for by s 37(4A)), will require the offender to keep in touch with the officer and to live where reasonably approved by the officer. There may also be restrictions, for example, upon travel without obtaining the permission of the officer and for attendance for medical treatment. Section 40 of the 1991 Act, (now replaced by s 116 of the Powers of Criminal Courts (Sentencing) Act 2000) provides that the offender is also liable to be returned to custody if convicted of a further imprisonable offence while the licence is in force. The court dealing with the new offence may add all or part of the outstanding period of the original sentence to any new sentence imposed.

[6] The submission on behalf of the appellant is that this statutory scheme is, in his case, in breach of that part of art 7(1) of the convention which provides:

'Nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time the criminal offence was committed.'

[7] It is also common ground that, prior to the 1991 Act, the regime under the Criminal Justice Act 1967, the Prison Act 1952, and orders made thereunder, had the effect that an offender in the appellant's position was entitled to be released without licence having served two-thirds of his sentence. The reduction from the full term imposed by way of sentence was achieved by a system of remissions. Its operation was summarised by the European Court of Human Rights in its statement of the position of the United Kingdom government in a judgment dated 15 July 2002 in Ezeh v UK (2002) 12 BHRC 589 at 606 (para 74):

> 'The government maintained that there was no useful distinction to be drawn, for Convention purposes, between the pre-and post-1991 Act system of remission of sentence or between the previous disciplinary sanction of loss of remission and that of the award of additional days introduced by that Act. Prior to the 1991 Act, remission was, as a technical matter, characterised as a privilege. But the rules for calculating remission were standardised and were invariably applied and, if remission were granted, the prisoner had a legal right to be released before he had served the full term of his sentence on the basis of his legitimate expectation that the remission system would be correctly applied. In the event of the commission of a disciplinary offence a prison governor could order a reduction in the period of remission and such reductions would postpone the date when the prisoner would be released and thereby operate as an award of additional days to be served before release. By the 1991 Act the previous remission system was replaced by a clear statutory code governing remission of sentence. The change in the law [was] affected by the Act, in the interests of accessibility and transparency ...'

Mr Crow did faintly argue that an offender was better off under the new system than the old because he now has a statutory right but the submission cannot survive that clear statement of how the former system operated, one which accords with the experience of members of the court.

[8] Transitional provisions were included in Sch 12 to the 1991 Act the effect of which, as stated by the judge, was that while those whose offences predated 1 October 1992 and began serving a custodial sentence before that date did not come within the new regime, those, such as the appellant, whose offences predated 1 October 1992 and were convicted only after that date, did come within the new regime. As expressed by the parties, the issue is whether the offender's liability to the conditions of a licence, and the possible consequences of that liability, constitute a 'heavier penalty' within the meaning of art 7, no such liability having arisen at the time the criminal offence was committed.

[9] For the appellant, Mr Scrivener QC submits that there can be no logical distinction for convention purposes between persons convicted before and after the relevant date because art 7 is concerned with the date 'a criminal offence was committed' and not with the date of conviction or sentence. It is likely that the draftsman of the 1991 Act did not have art 7 in mind, he submits. To illustrate how the system could work, Mr Scrivener refers to the transitional provisions in Sch 11 to the 2000 Act, in which it is the date of the 'offence' which is identified, and correctly identified, he submits, as the relevant date.

[10] The apparent anomaly in the 1991 Act does not determine the issue but suggests that Parliament may have intended that the 1991 regime should not have retrospective effect but failed, when attempting to give effect to that intention, to recognise the category of offender to which the appellant belongs and failed thereby to identify the relevant date as the date of the offence, as required by art 7, rather than the date of the conviction.

[11] The submissions of Mr Scrivener were expressed, and can be summarised, succinctly. The liability to licence conditions is an integral part of the sentence imposed following conviction for a criminal offence. The sentence as a whole undoubtedly constitutes a penalty within the meaning of art 7. Liability to licence conditions makes that penalty heavier than it would otherwise have been. Conditions imposed with the licence will inevitably impose impediments on the freedom of action of the released prisoner, though it is not suggested that in themselves they involve a breach of art 5. Moreover, the prisoner on licence is liable to be recalled to serve the remainder of the sentence and, secondly, is liable, upon conviction of a further offence during the licence period, to be subject to a court order requiring him to serve the outstanding period of the original sentence.

[12] For the Secretary of State, Mr Crow submits that the penalty with which art 7 is concerned is the 12-year custodial sentence. Provisions for early release from the imposed sentence of 12 years do not engage the concept of penalty. The provisions as to licence introduced by the 1991 Act are not integral to the sentencing process but to the execution of the sentence. The licence is completely separate from the sentencing process and a part of the procedure for release and rehabilitation. It is preventative rather than punitive. The licence has been imposed not by a sentence of the court but by virtue of the statute and is separate from the sentence. Moreover, the fact that a breach of licence conditions may have penal consequences does not make the licence conditions themselves penal.

[13] The court has been referred to cases in which the frequently litigated question was considered as to whether a proceeding was in relation to a 'criminal offence' within the meaning of art 6(2) of the convention, and to cases in which the definition of 'penalty' in art 7(1) has been considered. Propositions enunciated in decisions upon one article of the convention may legitimately be used to test the soundness of propositions advanced under other articles. The questions posed are separate ones but are associated in that the starting point in any assessment in the existence of a penalty is whether the measure in question is imposed following conviction for a 'criminal offence' (see Welch v UK (1995) 20 EHRR 247). If Mr Crow were to be correct in his submission that the licence is separate from the sentencing process, it would be necessary to consider in detail the relevant criteria, set out in Welch's case and other cases, for determining whether a particular provision represents a penalty and as such is covered by art 7. However, the sentence imposed upon the appellant in 1995, whatever it included, was plainly a penalty. If the licence and its conditions are an integral part of that penalty, the complexities of categorisation, which have arisen with respect to distinct procedures such as banning orders (see Gough v Chief Constable of Derbyshire Constabulary, R (on the application of Miller) v Leeds Magistrates' Court, Lilley v DPP [2001] EWHC Admin 554, [2001] 4 All ER 289, [2002] QB 459), sex offender orders (see B v Chief Constable of Avon and Somerset Constabulary [2001] 1 All ER 562, [2001] 1 WLR 340), disqualification orders (see R v Field, R v Young [2002] EWCA Crim 2913, [2003] 3 All ER 769, [2003] 1 WLR 882) and anti-social offender orders (see R (on the application of McCann) v Crown Court at Manchester, Clingham v Kensington and Chelsea Royal London BC [2002] UKHL 39, [2002] 4 All ER 593, [2003] 1 AC 787), do not arise.

[14] In my judgment, the licence is plainly a part of the sentence originally imposed by the sentencing judge. Under s 33(2) of the 1991 Act, the Secretary of State is required on a specific date following the imposition of the sentence not only to release the prisoner but to release him on licence. The sentence imposed by the judge thus comprised a period of detention followed by a period on licence. The statute, and the previous requirements of the Prison Rules 1964, SI 1964/388, specify the effect of the order made by the judge. The judge pronounces a 12-year sentence but, by virtue of the statutory provisions, that is a fiction to the extent that there are detailed provisions as to what, in terms of punishment, it actually means.

[15] Approached in that way, a sentence which includes a period of licence inevitably extending beyond two-thirds of the term imposed is in my judgment a heavier penalty than a sentence without that requirement. The fiction that in each case the penalty is one of 12 years in custody must not be allowed to obscure the reality of the effects of the licence. While licence conditions vary, and in some cases will be more onerous than in others, it is not and cannot be disputed that conditions will inevitably be imposed which are impediments upon the offender's freedom of action. Moreover, the conditions create a potential liability to serve a further substantial period in custody, as do the provisions dealing with the effects of re-conviction. Arguments that the purpose of the licence procedures is rehabilitative and preventative, as undoubtedly in part they are, do not detract from their onerous nature viewed as a part of the sentence. Whatever the purpose, the effect is onerous. In my judgment, the judge fell into error in deciding the case on a consideration of the purpose of a licence as such rather than its effect as a part of the sentence.

[16] The approach I have adopted is supported by the directions relating to the recall of determinate sentence prisoners subject to licence issued by the parole board in 2002. They provide that 'where an offender is subject to a custodial sentence, the licence period is an integral part of the sentence, and compliance with licence conditions is required'.

[17] The cases cited by Mr Crow do not in my judgment support the submission that, in the statutory scheme, the licence is separate from the sentence. In R (on the application of West) v Parole Board [2002] EWCA Civ 1641, [2003] 1 WLR 705, the Secretary of State had exercised his power under s 39(2) of the 1991 Act to revoke the offender's licence and recall him to prison. The Parole Board declined to give the offender an oral hearing when deciding not to order his re-release under s 39(5) of the Act. It was claimed that the board's decision involved the determination of a 'criminal charge' within the meaning of art 6(1) of the convention and the offender was therefore entitled to an oral hearing. By a majority, the court held that, in exercising their powers, the board were not determining a criminal charge and were not seeking to impose punishment.

[18] Those were the issues before the court and on those issues, which are different from the present issue, the fact that the revocation was solely with a view to the prevention of risk and the protection of the public, and not by way of punishment, were important considerations. The nature of the powers exercised by the board were analysed in relation to art 6(1) but that does not determine the question whether the original sentence is more onerous by reason of the presence of the licence condition. The nature of the procedures to be followed upon an alleged breach of licence, and the purposes for which those procedures exist, are not determinative of the question as to what, as a penalty, is included in the original sentence. a

[19] Mr Crow relies on the decision of the Commission in Hogben v UK (1986) 46 DR 231. The applicant had been sentenced to life imprisonment for murder. After 13 years in custody, he was transferred to an open prison and told that he would be recommended for parole. In the event he was transferred back to a closed prison, a new parole policy having been introduced. A breach of art 7 was alleged. In the House of Lords, Lord Scarman stated: b

> 'The sentence of the court is in law the punishment. The disappointment of the expectation which prisoners may have that under the parole system they will not have to serve the whole of a sentence in prison may be distressing but is not a punishment or penalty which goes beyond the sentence of the court.' (See Findlay v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1984] 3 All ER 801 at 829, [1985] AC 318 at 337.) c

[20] The Commission concluded ((1986) 46 DR 231 at 236): d

> '3. The Commission recalls that the applicant was sentenced to life imprisonment in 1969 for committing a murder in the course of a robbery. It is clear that the penalty for this offence at the time it was committed was life imprisonment and thus no issue under article 7 arises in this respect.
>
> 4. Furthermore, in the opinion of the Commission, the "penalty" for purposes of article 7(1), must be considered to be that of life imprisonment. Nevertheless it is true that as a result of the change in parole policy the applicant will not become eligible for release on parole until he has served 20 years' imprisonment. Although this may give rise to the result that his imprisonment is effectively harsher that if he had been eligible for release on parole at an earlier stage, such matters relate to the execution of the sentence as opposed to the "penalty" which remains that of life imprisonment. Accordingly, it cannot be said that the "penalty" imposed is a heavier one that that imposed by the trial judge.' e f

[21] Reliance on the Commission's use of the expression 'the execution of the sentence' is in my judgment misplaced. The Commission held, as had Lord Scarman, that the penalty was that of life imprisonment, that is, the sentence of the court. Subsequent procedures did not impose a heavier penalty than the indeterminate sentence imposed by the trial judge and did not go beyond the sentence of the court. Indeed it is the comprehensiveness of the original sentence which is stressed and that is not affected by increased custody within that sentence. In the present case, the sentence of the court must also be viewed comprehensively. It includes, by statute, a period on licence to which the applicant would not have been subject under the law as it was at the time he committed the offence. g h

[22] Reliance is also placed on the decision of the Commission in Ibbotson v UK (1999) 27 EHRR CD 332. While a sentence of imprisonment for possession of obscene and indecent material was still in force, the Sex Offenders Act 1997, under which the offender was required to register with the police under the reporting provisions in the Act, came into operation. It was argued that the passing of the Act and its impact on the offender involved a 'penalty' within the meaning of art 7. j

[23] The registration requirements applied automatically to an offender in the applicant's position in that case and the judge had no role in the imposition of the Act's requirements. The Commission held (at 334):

> 'Overall the Commission considers that, given in particular the way in which the measures imposed by the Act operate completely separately from the ordinary sentencing procedures, and the fact that the measures do not, ultimately, require more than mere registration, it cannot be said that the measures imposed on the applicant amounted to a "penalty" within the meaning of art 7 of the Convention.'

[24] While the 1997 Act did impose an additional obligation and one which would not have arisen but for the earlier conviction and sentence, it arose 'completely separately from the ordinary sentencing procedures'. That factor may assist in deciding whether an additional and separate obligation should be categorised as a penalty within the meaning of art 7(1). It does not bear upon the effect of an obligation which is integral to the sentence imposed by the court.

[25] In other cases cited, the requirements imposed are in my judgment separate from the original sentence imposed and not a part of it as was the requirement in the present case. At the time the appellant was sentenced, there was a statutory requirement that, upon a sentence for a term of years, the appellant serve a specific period in custody followed by a specific period on licence. That is the 'clear statutory code' to which the government referred in its submission to the Court of Human Rights in Ezeh v UK (2002) 12 BHRC 589. The conditions of sentence are, inevitably, though to a variable degree, onerous. The sentence of 12 years' imprisonment the judge imposed was a penalty within the meaning of art 7(1) of the convention and had a more onerous effect than the same nominal sentence would have had at the time the offence was committed.

[26] The appellant is in my judgment entitled to the declaration sought. The parties have helpfully drafted and agreed a form of declaration (amended when judgment was handed down) appropriate on the basis of the above findings:

> 'A declaration pursuant to s 4(2) of the Human Rights Act 1998 that s 33(2), s 37(4A) and s 39 of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 are incompatible with the claimant's rights under art 7 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms in so far as it provides that he will be released at the two-thirds point of his sentence "on licence with conditions and be liable to be recalled to prison" (he having committed the index offences before the 1991 Act came into force, and at a time when he would have expected (subject to good behaviour) to be released at the two-thirds point of any sentence unconditionally, pursuant to the practice that had developed in implementing r 5 of the Prison Rules 1964, SI 1964/388).'

[27] I would allow this appeal and make that declaration.

LONGMORE LJ.

[28] Before ss 32–40 of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 came into force on 1 October 1992, any convicted defendant who was sentenced to a lengthy determinate sentence and was of good behaviour could legitimately expect that one-third of his sentence would be remitted and that he would be released after he had served two-thirds of his sentence. This was, initially, at any rate, because r 5(1) of the Prison Rules 1964, SI 1964/388 provided:

> 'A prisoner serving a sentence of imprisonment of more than one month may, on the ground of his industry and good conduct, be granted remission in accordance with the provisions of the Rule.'

Although the rule is phrased in discretionary terms, it is accepted that by 1992, remission of one-third of the sentence was a settled expectation: see Ezeh v UK, (2002) 12 BHRC 589, cited by Pill LJ. Section 25(1) of the Prison Act 1952 provided that, on release, the sentence expired.

[29] As from 1 October 1992, ss 32–40 of the 1991 Act made 'radical changes with regard to sentences' as stated by Lord Taylor of Gosforth CJ in his Practice Note (sentence: early release of prisoners) [1992] 4 All ER 307, [1992] 1 WLR 948. Remission was abolished. Parole would only affect criminals sentenced to four or more years of imprisonment (long-term prisoners), but, apart from earlier parole, such prisoners would be entitled to be released after serving two-thirds of their sentence. To that extent, their date of release could be expected to be the same before and after 1 October 1992. But one of the 'radical changes' was that when such prisoners were released they would be released 'on licence' (s 33(2)) which Lord Taylor CJ described as 'in effect ... a continuing suspended sentence'. Section 37(1) then provided that the licence was to remain in force 'until the date on which he would (but for his release) have served three-quarters of his sentence'. This has now been changed by s 104 of and para 17 of Sch 9 to the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 to 'the whole of his sentence'. But this provision is not said to apply to the appellant.

[30] The reason why Lord Taylor CJ described the licence as 'in effect ... a continuing suspended sentence' was that, by virtue of s 39 of the 1991 Act, the Secretary of State was entitled to revoke the licence and recall the convicted defendant to prison on the recommendation of the Parole Board, or, even, without such recommendation 'where it appears to him that it is expedient in the public interest to recall that person before such a recommendation is practicable' (s 39(2)). The recommendation of the Parole Board or the exercise of discretion by the Secretary of State is statutorily unfettered. Moreover if the offender is convicted of a further imprisonable offence while on licence, he is liable to be returned to custody.

[31] The difference between the effect of a sentence of 12 years imposed on the appellant, Uttley, before 1992 from the effect of the sentence actually imposed, as it was in 1995, can be stated in this way. Given a sentence of 12 years before 1992, he could have expected to be released after the passage of eight years without risk of recall. Given the sentence that he was, he must be released after eight years but remains at risk of recall for one further year, as well as being required to comply with whatever licence conditions the Home Secretary may choose to impose for that further one-year period.

[32] The question for the court is whether the post-1992 regime constitutes a 'heavier penalty' than the penalty applicable at the time Uttley committed his offence for the purposes of art 7(1) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) which provides:

> 'No one shall be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence under national or a international law at the time when it was committed. Nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time the criminal offence was committed.'

[33] Mr Crow, counsel for the Home Secretary, submitted that Uttley was sentenced to 12 years; that penalty was applicable both before and after 1992. b Matters of remission or release on licence were irrelevant to the question of penalty since they were not 'imposed' in any rational sense of the word; still less were they imposed on conviction and it was only penalties imposed on conviction that came within the scope of art 7(1).

[34] Mr Scrivener QC for Uttley submitted that that approach was far too formalistic. The convention did not look to the nominal penalty only. Any c informed reader of the convention knows that any convicted prisoner will not serve the whole of the sentence pronounced by the judge on or after conviction. The reality is and has been for many years that he is released well before the end of the sentence pronounced. For that reason judges have been required to inform not merely the defendant but also the public as a whole in the course of their d sentencing reasons how much time the defendant will actually serve in custody (see Practice Note (custodial sentences: explanation) [1998] 1 All ER 733, [1998] 1 WLR 278). If, since 1992, the terms of a prisoner's release are harsher than they were before 1992, a heavier penalty will have been imposed than the one applicable at the time when the offence was committed.

[35] Moses J ([2003] All ER (D) 130 (Apr)) decided that the Home Secretary e was right because the licence was not part of the penalty at all; it is imposed for the benefit of the defendant not to punish him and it is also for the benefit of the community since it is part of the rehabilitation process. He also accepted the argument that the licence is not imposed on conviction. It is merely statutory consequence of the imposition of the penalty.

f [36] Although I have not found this case entirely easy I have come to the conclusion that Mr Crow's submission cannot be accepted. It is tempting to treat the matter as one of form and say that the sentence of 12 years, which remains the same both before and after 1992, is all that the court can look at. But that would be the triumph of form over substance. The reality is that before 1992, in normal circumstances, the sentence expired after two-thirds of it had elapsed. g After 1992 the sentence only expires at the conclusion of three-quarters of that sentence. Indeed, now it only expires at the end of the sentence; meanwhile the prisoner is subject to recall. Any prisoner would regard the penalty of 12 years as harsher after 1992 than before. So, in my view, would the ordinary informed observer.

h [37] The judge is, of course, not incorrect to observe that the licence provisions are a benefit to the defendant and to the community. In that sense they are preventive. But they are also penal in as much as the licence period operates as part of the sentence and the defendant can be recalled during that part. That is different from (and harsher than) the position that operated pre-1992. The j preventive aspect of the licence regime cannot annul the penal aspect.

[38] Moreover if, as the judge observed, the licence is a statutory consequence of the imposition of the penalty, it is part of the penalty. The fact that it does not come into operation until two-thirds of the sentence have elapsed does not mean it is not part of the penalty. It only comes into existence when it does as a result of the pronouncement of the sentence. It is thus different from Ibbotson v UK (1999) 27 EHRR CD 332 relied on by Mr Crow, where a post-conviction statute required the registration of a sex offender. That was not and could not be any part of the penalty imposed on conviction. Here the licence is part of the penalty imposed on conviction. a [39] I have thought it right to express my conclusion in my own words since we are differing from the judge. But they are effectively the same as Pill LJ with whom I entirely agree. I would allow the appeal and make the declaration set out at [26], above. b

MAURICE KAY J

[40] I also agree and would allow the appeal and make the declaration in the agreed form.

Appeal allowed. Permission to appeal granted. c

Stephen Leake Barrister.

Evans v Amicus Healthcare Ltd and others
Hadley v Midland Fertility Services Ltd and others

[2003] EWHC 2161 (Fam)

FAMILY DIVISION

WALL J

30 JUNE, 1–4 JULY, 1 OCTOBER 2003

Medical treatment – Human fertilisation – Embryo – Frozen stored embryos – Consent to treatment together of each of male and female gamete providers in treatment involving in vitro fertilisation, freezing and storage of embryos – Whether consent effective after couple separating – Whether implantation of embryo in female gamete provider 'treatment together' – Whether requirement for consent by both partners contrary to right to respect for private and family life – Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990, Sch 3, para 6(3) – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt 1, art 8.

Under para 6(3) of Sch 3 to the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990, an embryo created by in vitro fertilisation (IVF) could not be used for any purpose unless there was an effective consent by each person whose gametes were used to bring about the creation of the embryo to the use of the embryo for that purpose. Under para 1 , 'effective consent' meant a consent under Sch 3 which had not been withdrawn and para 4 allowed for withdrawal of consent by notice to the person keeping the embryo. The claimants in two separate cases had each had IVF treatment with their respective male partners at fertility clinics. Embryos were created from the gametes of each claimant and her partner. The embryos were frozen and stored. The consents given for the purposes of the 1990 Act by each person in both cases were for use of each person's gametes for IVF in 'the treatment of myself together with a named partner'. Both couples subsequently separated and each claimant later sought to have the stored embryos transferred to her, to enable her to become pregnant. Both men objected, withdrew their consents to the continued storage of the embryos, and expressed the wish that the embryos be allowed to perish. Both claimants sought relief from the court, including declarations allowing the implantation of the embryos. The issues before the court included (i) whether the original consents to 'treatment together' were still effective; (ii) whether the provisions of Sch 3 to the 1990 Act breached the claimants' rights to respect for private and family life provided by art 8 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998); and (iii) whether representations by the male partner in the first case to the effect that any embryos created from his gametes would always be available to be used by the claimant in the first case founded an equitable estoppel sufficient to make it unconscionable for him to be permitted to withdraw his consent to the embryos being transferred to the claimant.

Held – (1) The only consent given by each of the defendant male gamete providers, in the instant cases, had been for treatment 'together' with his partner. Treatment together was a matter of fact. The time to ascertain whether a couple were being treated together was when the process of unfreezing and transfer of the embryos took place. It followed that neither couple was still being treated together. There was therefore no effective consent by the male gamete providers to the continuing treatment of the claimants on their own (see [133], [134], [136], [137], [147], [149], below); Re R (a child) [2003] 2 All ER 131 applied.

(2) The provisions of Sch 3 which permitted the male gamete providers in the instant cases to refuse to allow the claimants access to the embryos for the purpose of transfer into them was an interference by the state with both the rights of both the female and the male gamete providers to respect for their private lives. However, the right to respect for family life was not engaged. The four adults lived separate lives and an embryo was not a person or an individual with rights under the convention. The state's interference with their art 8 rights was necessary for the protection of the rights of all four and proportionate in its effect. The foundation for the legislation was a treatment regime based on the twin pillars of consent and the interests of the unborn child. The requirement that couples embarking on IVF treatment were in agreement about the treatment, and that it should be possible for either party to withdraw from it at any time before the created embryo was transferred into the female gamete provider was entirely appropriate (see [175], [181]–[183], [248]–[250], [255], [259], below).

(3) The wider public interest of the proper operation of the scheme of licensed treatment operated under the 1990 Act did not allow the giving of an unequivocal consent to the use of embryos irrespective of any change of circumstances. The estoppel argued for in the instant case could therefore not take effect. Accordingly, the claims in both cases would be dismissed (see [295], [297], [310], [315], below).

Notes

For consents, see 30 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 65.

For the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990, Sch 3, para 6, see 28 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2001 reissue) 335.

Cases referred to in judgment

Abdulaziz v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 471, [1985] ECHR 9214/80, ECt HR.
Airey v Ireland (1979) 2 EHRR 305, [1979] ECHR 6289/73, ECt HR.
AZ v BZ (2000) 725 NE 2d 1051, Mass SC.
B (minors) (parentage), Re [1996] 3 FCR 697.
Baker v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] EWHC Admin 381.
Botta v Italy (1998) 4 BHRC 81, ECt HR.
Central London Property Trust Ltd v High Trees House Ltd [1956] 1 All ER 256n, [1947] KB 130.
Centre for Reproductive Medicine v U [2002] EWCA Civ 565, [2002] All ER (D) 213 (Apr).
Chassagnou v France (2000) 7 BHRC 151, ECt HR.
Combe v Combe [1951] 1 All ER 767, [1951] 2 KB 215, CA.
Cossey v UK [1993] 2 FCR 97, (1990) 13 EHRR 622, ECt HR.
Davis v Davis (1992) 842 SW 2d 588, Tenn SC.
F (in utero), Re [1988] 2 All ER 193, [1988] Fam 122, [1988] 2 WLR 1288, CA.
Gaskin v UK (1989) 12 EHRR 36, [1989] ECHR 10454/83, ECt HR.
Goodwin v UK [2002] 2 FCR 577, ECt HR.
Greenfield v Irwin (a firm) [2001] EWCA Civ 113, [2001] 1 WLR 1279.
Hughes v Metropolitan Rly Co (1877) 2 App Cas 439, [1874–80] All ER Rep 187, HL.

Jabari v Turkey (2000) 9 BHRC 1, ECt HR.
Jennings v Rice [2002] EWCA Civ 159, [2003] 1 FCR 501.
Johnson v Moreton [1978] 3 All ER 37, [1980] AC 37, [1978] 3 WLR 538, HL.
Kass v Kass (1998) 673 NYS 2d 350, NY SC.
Kok Hoong v Leong Cheong Kweng Mines Ltd [1964] 1 All ER 300, [1964] AC 993, [1964] 2 WLR 150, PC.
Leeds Teaching Hospital NHS Trust v A [2003] 1 FLR 412.
Marckx v Belgium (1979) 2 EHRR 330, [1979] ECHR 6833/74, ECt HR.
MB (an adult: medical treatment), Re [1997] 2 FCR 541, CA.
Paton v Trustees of BPAS [1978] 2 All ER 987, [1979] QB 276, [1978] 3 WLR 687.
Paton v UK (1980) 3 EHRR 408, E Com HR.
Petrovic v Austria (1998) 4 BHRC 232, ECt HR.
Q (a minor) (parental order), Re [1996] 2 FCR 345.
R v A [2001] UKHL 25, [2002] 1 AC 45, [2001] 3 All ER 1, [2001] 2 WLR 1546.
R v DPP, ex p Kebeline, R v DPP, ex p Rechachi [1999] 4 All ER 801, [2000] 2 AC 326, [1999] 3 WLR 972, HL.
R v Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority, ex p Blood [1997] 2 All ER 687, [1999] Fam 151, [1997] 2 WLR 806, CA.
R v Lichniak, R v Pyrah [2002] UKHL 47, [2002] 4 All ER 1122, [2003] 1 AC 903, [2002] 3 WLR 1834.
R v North West Lancashire Health Authority, ex p A [2000] 2 FCR 525, [2000] 1 WLR 977, CA.
R (a child), Re [2003] EWCA Civ 182, [2003] 2 All ER 131, [2003] 2 WLR 1485.
R (on the application of Assisted Reproduction and Gynaecology Centre) v Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority [2002] EWCA Civ 20, [2003] 1 FCR 266.
R (on the application of CD) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2003] EWHC 155 (Admin), [2003] 1 FLR 979.
R (on the application of Hooper) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2003] EWCA Civ 813, [2003] 3 All ER 673.
R (on the application of Mellor) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] EWCA Civ 472, [2002] QB 13, [2001] 3 WLR 533.
R (on the application of Quintavalle) v Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority (Secretary of State for Health intervening) [2003] EWCA Civ 667, [2003] 3 All ER 257, [2003] 3 WLR 878.
R (on the application of Quintavalle) v Secretary of State for Health [2003] UKHL 13, [2003] 2 All ER 113, [2003] 2 WLR 692.
R (P) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, R (Q) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] EWCA Civ 1151, [2001] 1 WLR 2002.
Rasmussen v Denmark (1985) 7 EHRR 371, [1984] ECHR 8777/79, ECt HR.
U v W (A-G intervening) [1998] 1 FCR 526, [1998] Fam 29, [1997] 3 WLR 739.
Wandsworth London BC v Michalak [2002] EWCA Civ 271, [2002] 4 All ER 1136, [2003] 1 WLR 617.
X v Netherlands (1985) 8 EHRR 235, [1985] ECHR 8978/80, ECt HR.
Yaxley v Gotts [2000] 1 All ER 711, [2000] Ch 162, [1999] 3 WLR 1217, CA.

Claims

Evans v Amicus Healthcare Ltd and others

The claimant, Natallie Evans, claimed declaratory and injunctive relief against the defendants, Amicus Healthcare Ltd, Howard Roy Johnston and the Royal United Hospital Bath NHS Trust. By order of Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss P on 19 September 2002 the Secretary of State for Health and the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority were joined to the proceedings. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Hadley v Midland Fertility Services Ltd and others

The claimant, Lorraine Hadley, claimed declaratory relief against the defendants, Midland Fertility Services Ltd and Wayne Hadley. By order of Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss P on 19 September 2002 the Secretary of State for Health and the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority were joined to the proceedings. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Robin Tolson QC and Susan Freeborn (instructed by Withy King) for the claimants.
Dr Kristina Stern (instructed by Bevan Ashford) for Amicus Healthcare Ltd and the Royal United Hospital Bath NHS Trust.
Dr Kristina Stern (instructed by Young & Lee) for Midland Fertility Services Ltd.
Kambiz Moradifar and Vanessa McKinlay (instructed by Davey Son & Jones) for Mr Johnston.
Stefano Nuvoloni (instructed by Baches) for Mr Hadley.
Jason Coppel (instructed by the Department of Health) for the Secretary of State.
Dinah Rose (instructed by Morgan Cole) for the authority.

Cur adv vult

1 October 2003. The following judgment was delivered.

WALL J.

GLOSSARY AND INDEX

[1] Throughout this judgment, I propose to use the following abbreviations. (1) 'The Act' means the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990. (2) 'AID' means artificial insemination by donor. (3) 'The authority' means the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority. (4) 'The clinic' in the case of Ms Evans and Mr Johnston means Bath Assisted Conception Clinic and in the case of Mr and Mrs Hadley means Midland Fertility Services Ltd. 'The clinics' means both. (5) 'The convention' means the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 as incorporated into English law by the Human Rights Act 1998. (6) 'HRA 1998' means the Human Rights Act 1998. (7) 'ICSI' means Intra Cytoplasmic Sperm Injection. (8) 'IVF' means in vitro, fertilisation. (9) PGD means Pre-Implantation Genetic Diagnosis. (10) 'The Secretary of State' means the Secretary of State for Health. (11) 'Warnock' means the Report of the Committee of Inquiry into Human Fertilisation and Embryology (July 1984) (Cmnd 9314) chaired by Dame Mary Warnock DBE. (12) 'The White Paper' means Human Fertilisation and Embryology: A Framework for Legislation (Cm 259) (November 1987).

[2] The arguments in these two cases were detailed and ranged over a wide area. I was told that this was the first major example of litigation between parties to IVF treatment in the United Kingdom, and the first time that the consent provisions of the Act had been subject to a full-blown HRA 1998 challenge. Given the importance of the issues involved, therefore, I have decided to set out both the facts and the arguments addressed to me in some detail. The result is a judgment of greater length than I had anticipated, and no doubt longer than is strictly necessary for the resolution of the issues, on which I have formed clear views. In order to help those reading the judgment, or wishing to identify a particular issue, I have prepared the following index.

| Subject matter | Paragraph numbers |
|---|---|
| Introduction: the cases in broad outline and as pleaded | [3]–[5] |
| The history of the Act | [16]–[17] |
| Statutory interpretation as applied to the Act | [18]–[19] |
| The relevant provisions of the Act | [20]–[29] |
| Sch 3 to the Act | [30]–[36] |
| The two most important principles underlying the Act | [37] |
| The facts in the case of Ms Evans and Mr Johnston | [38]–[43] |
| The events of 10 October 2001 | [44]–[56] |
| My findings of fact in relation to the events of 10 October 2001 | [57]–[67] |
| The consents which Ms Evans and Mr Johnston signed on 10 October 2001 | [68]–[83] |
| Events after 10 October 2001 | [84]–[93] |
| The facts in the Hadley case | [94]–[103] |
| The first point of law: Are the consents given in this case capable operating so as to enable clinics to treat Ms Evans and Mrs Radley on their own? | |
| The argument | [104]–[131] |
| Discussion and analysis | [132]–[149] |
| The second point of law: Have the remaining embryos in Mrs Hadley's case been 'used' in the provision of treatment services, so that Mrs Hadley's consent to their use cannot be varied or withdrawn? | |
| The argument | [150]–[154] |
| Discussion and analysis | [155]–[165] |
| The claims under the Human Rights Act 1998 | |

| | |
|---|---|
| Introduction | [166]–[173] |
| Article 2: the right to life | [174]–[179] |
| Article 8: the right to respect for private and family life | |
| Is art 8 engaged? | [180]–[182] |
| Is there an interference with the right to respect for private life in this case? | [183]–[185] |
| The evidence filed on behalf of the Secretary of State | [186]–[188] |
| The case for Ms Evans and Mrs Hadley under art 8 | [189]–[228] |
| The argument for the Secretary of State | [229]–[244] |
| The case for Mr Johnston and Mr Hadley under art 8 | [245]–[247] |
| Conclusions on art 8 | [248]–[260] |
| Article 12: the right to marry | [261]–[265] |
| Article 14: prohibition of discrimination | [266]–[277] |
| Conclusions under HRA 1998 and the convention | [278] |
| Estoppel | |
| Can an estoppel exist in the face of the Act? | [279]–[297] |
| The ingredients and parameters of promissory estoppel | [298]–[304] |
| Application of the principles of estoppel to the present case | [305]–[311] |
| Information from other jurisdictions | [312]–[314] |
| The result | [315] |
| Footnote | [316]–[320] |

INTRODUCTION: THE CASES IN BROAD OUTLINE AND AS PLEADED

[3] With some exceptions, these two cases raise the same issues, and have been heard together. The two claimants are Ms Natallie Evans and Mrs Lorraine Hadley. Each underwent IVF treatment with a partner (respectively the second defendants in each of the actions, Mr Howard Johnston and Mr Wayne Hadley) from whom each subsequently separated, and with who neither has any continuing relationship. In each case there remain in existence embryos, currently frozen and in storage, created from the gametes of each claimant and her former partner. Each claimant now wishes to remove the embryos created with her gametes from storage in order to have them transferred into her with a view to becoming pregnant.

[4] As pleaded in the amended particulars of claim by Mr Robin Tolson QC and Miss Susan Freeborn, who appear for both claimants, the relief sought in Ms Evans' case is as follows. (a) A declaration that (Mr Johnston) has not and may not in the future vary or withdraw his consent given on 10 October 2001 to the storage or use of the embryos. (b) An injunction requiring Mr Johnston to restore his consent to the storage and use of the embryos. (c) A declaration that the embryos may lawfully be stored until 9 October 2011 (the expiry of the ten-year storage period for which consent was originally given). (d) A declaration that the claimant may lawfully be treated with the embryos during the storage period. (e) If necessary, a declaration of incompatibility pursuant to s 4(4) of the HRA 1998 to the effect that s 12 and paras 6(3), 8(2) and 4(1) of Sch 3 to the Act (i) constitute an unnecessary interference with (Ms Evans') right to respect for her private and/or family life under art 8 of the convention; (ii) fail to secure (Ms Evans') right to found a family under art 12 of the convention; (iii) permit discrimination against (Ms Evans) as a result of her infertility and/or disability, contrary to art 14; and (iv) fail to accord the embryo with any protection for such rights under arts 2 and 8 as its status may justify; further or alternatively fail to protect any proprietary/possessory interest (Ms Evans') may enjoy in respect of the embryo pursuant to art 1 of the First Protocol of the convention. (f) Such interim orders preserving the embryos as may be necessary in the event that the clinic alters its present position where it has agreed to continue to store the embryos.

[5] The relief sought by Mrs Hadley is the same, except that in her case there is no application for an injunction. In her case, however, because three of the embryos created from the gametes provided by herself and Mr Hadley had, on a previous occasion, been unsuccessfully transferred into her (and thus used), it was argued that the remaining two embryos in storage had also been used. Accordingly, since para 4(2)(a) of Sch 3 to the Act prevents any withdrawal of consent to treatment once an embryo has been used in providing treatment services, it was argued that Mr Hadley was prevented by the Act from withdrawing his consent. The argument was initially limited to Mrs Hadley's case, but in their closing submissions Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn sought to include Ms Evans within it. I will deal with the argument under the heading 'The Second Point of Law' in [150]–[165], below.

[6] Neither Mr Johnston nor Mr Hadley consents to the embryos being unfrozen in order for them to be transferred into the claimants. Both have withdrawn their consent to the continued storage of the embryos, and both wish the embryos to be allowed to perish. Both say, quite simply, that the Act gives them (and the claimants) an unequivocal and unconditional right to withdraw their consent to treatment and to continued storage of the embryos up until the moment the embryo is used. The stored embryos, they say, have not been 'used', since in the context of this case, 'use' means the transfer of the embryo into a woman. In so far as convention rights under the HRA 1998 are concerned, both men say they are either not engaged, or, if engaged, are not breached. Article 8 in particular, they say, gives each of the four adults the right to respect for their private lives, and the state's 'interference' under art 8(2) with those rights, by allowing them to withdraw their consent and thus prevent the transfer of the embryos into the claimants is, they say, necessary to prevent a breach of their art 8 rights, and thus both justified and proportionate.

[7] The clinics which treated the couples are parties to the proceedings, although, in the event, no relief was sought against them, and in each case the clinics took a neutral stance in relation to the relief sought by each claimant. I was, however, materially assisted by the evidence called on behalf of the clinics and by argument from Dr Kristina Stern, who appeared on their behalf. I was particularly impressed by the evidence of Dr Nicholas Sharp, consultant obstetrician and gynaecologist specialising in reproductive medicine at the Royal United Hospital Bath NHS Trust, who was responsible for Ms Evans' treatment; and by the evidence of Dr Gillian Lockwood, obstetrician/gynaecologist at the clinic attended by Mrs Hadley. I also heard from Mrs Pamela Spearman, a fertility sister at Ms Evans' clinic, and from Ms Susan Lowbridge, a fertility nursing sister at the clinic attended by Mrs Hadley. I was generally impressed by the overall quality of the care which each of the claimants had received; and it was in my judgment quite appropriate in each case for Mr Tolson to preface his cross-examination of the clinics' witnesses by stressing how grateful each of the claimants was for the treatment they had received.

[8] In addition, and because of the importance of the issues raised by the case, both the authority itself and the Secretary of State were joined to the proceedings by order of Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss P made on 19 September 2002. I thus had the advantage of argument from counsel instructed on behalf of each. Both took a neutral stance on the facts, but each argued that the terms of the Act itself precluded the court granting the relief the claimants sought.

[9] The first point taken by both the Secretary of State and the authority was that the original consents which each couple gave to IVF treatment were no longer effective. Both couples had consented, exclusively, to being 'treated together' with their respective partners. Given the fact that both couples had separated, the argument was that it was simply not open to the clinics to treat the claimants by transferring the embryos into them.

[10] Secondly, and in the alternative, both the Secretary of State and the authority submitted that the provisions of the Act were unambiguous and gave both Mr Johnston and Mr Hadley (as well as both claimants) an unqualified right to withdraw their consent to the continued storage and use of the embryos.

[11] Both the Secretary of State and the authority argued further that, in so far as the claimants' convention rights were engaged, the terms of the Act do not breach them, with the result that no question of a declaration of incompatibility under s 4 of the HRA 1998 arose.

[12] In the case of Ms Evans, a further point arose. She relied on representations which she says Mr Johnston made to her prior to the initiation of the IVF treatment. She argued that these representations, on which she says she acted to her detriment, create an equitable estoppel sufficient to make it unconscionable for Mr Johnston now to be permitted to withdraw his consent to the embryos being transferred into her.

[13] In the amended particulars of claim, the matter is pleaded in the following way:

> '5. Before undergoing IVF treatment (Ms Evans), realising that the eggs to be harvested from her represented her last chance of bearing a child, discussed with (Mr Johnston) what should happen if their relationship were to end. In particular, on a date presently unknown to (Ms Evans) she suggested to (Mr Johnston) in the presence of a member of the nursing staff at the clinic known to (Ms Evans) only as "Pam" (Mrs Spearman) that she should have some of her eggs frozen, as opposed to be fertilised so that if necessary they might later be fertilised by sperm from a donor other than (Mr Johnston) and be available for her use.

6. By his words and actions (Mr Johnston) gave (Ms Evans) to understand that any embryos created from his sperm would always be available for her to use and that there was no need to consider other options. Amongst other things, he told the claimant that he loved her, wanted to share his life with her, would never leave her and was anxious to be a father ((Ms Evans) gives the gist of the words used). The couple discussed the position generally and agreed that sperm from (Mr Johnston) would be used to attempt to fertilise all the eggs which were harvested

7. When agreeing to fertilise all the eggs, (Mr Johnston) knew that these eggs would represent (Ms Evans') last chance to bear a child naturally. He knew, further, that (Ms Evans) would, but for his assurances, have sought advice about and investigated in discussions with the clinic the possibilities of "insuring" against the breakdown of their relationship, whether by freezing unfertilised eggs (which Ms Evans understands to be a problematic procedure) or by storing eggs fertilised by a donor other than (Mr Johnston).'

[14] On this basis, the creation of a promissory estoppel is pleaded as follows:

'34. If and to the extent that (Mr Johnston) had a legal right, whether contractual or arising under the Act, to vary or withdraw his consent, then he represented by the words and conduct set out above that his consent would be irrevocable or that it would not be withdrawn in the present circumstances.

35. (Ms Evans) relied on the representation in deciding not to seek further advice on the storage of unfertilised eggs or embryos created using sperm from another donor. It is (Ms Evans') case that in the absence of the assurances she received from (Mr Johnston) she would have taken every opportunity to maximise her prospects of having children in the future including specifically the storage of unfertilised eggs or eggs fertilised by another donor or by investigating other treatments for her cancer than the removal of her ovaries.

36. In the circumstances, (Mr Johnston) is estopped from relying on any legal right to vary or withdraw his consent.'

[15] Mr Johnston denies inducing the belief in Ms Evans that any embryos created from his sperm would always be available for her to use, and asserts that no estoppel arises on the facts. He also submits, however, that even on the case made by Ms Evans the elements necessary for an equitable estoppel do not arise. In this latter context, he adopts an argument put forward by the Secretary of State that an estoppel is inconsistent with and excluded by the policy considerations underlying the terms of the Act.

THE HISTORY OF THE ACT

[16] The background to the Act, and the manner in which the Act regulates certain forms of fertility treatment, including of course IVF, the storage of gametes, and the creation, storage and use of human embryos outside the body for treatment services or research, are all authoritatively set out in the speech of Lord Bingham of Cornhill in R (on the application of Quintavalle) v Secretary of State for Health [2003] UKHL 13, [2003] 2 All ER 113, [2003] 2 WLR 692 hereinafter called Quintavalle CNR (cell nuclear replacement) in order to distinguish it from a second case involving Mrs Quintavalle, R (on the application of Quintavalle) v Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority (Secretary of State for Health intervening) [2003] EWCA Civ 667, [2003] 3 All ER 257, [2003] 3 WLR 878 (which I shall call Quintavalle (tissue typing) and in which there is also a detailed discussion of Warnock, the White Paper, the proceedings in Parliament leading to the passing of the Act and of the Act itself—see the judgment of Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR, and in particular at [27]–[36].

[17] It is, I think, helpful to repeat what Lord Bingham of Cornhill said both about the background to the Act, and the approach to its interpretation. He said ([2003] 2 All ER 113, [2003] 2 WLR 692):

> '[11] The birth of the first child resulting from in vitro fertilisation in July 1978 prompted much ethical and scientific debate which in turn led to the appointment in July 1982 of a Committee of Inquiry under the chairmanship of Dame Mary Warnock DBE to—
>
> "consider recent and potential developments in medicine and science related to human fertilisation and embryology; to consider what policies and safeguards should be applied, including consideration of the social, ethical and legal implications of these developments; and to make recommendations."
>
> The committee reported in July 1984 (Report of the Committee of Inquiry into Human Fertilisation and Embryology (Cmnd 9314) (the Warnock Report)). A White Paper was published in November 1987 Human Fertilisation and Embryology: A Framework for Legislation (Cm 259) when the Department of Health and Social Security recognised (para 6) "the particular difficulties of framing legislation on these sensitive issues against a background of fast-moving medical and scientific development".
>
> [12] There is no doubting the sensitivity of the issues. There were those who considered the creation of embryos, and thus of life, in vitro to be either sacrilegious or ethically repugnant and wished to ban such activities altogether. There were others who considered that these new techniques, by offering means of enabling the infertile to have children and increasing knowledge of congenital disease, had the potential to improve the human condition, and this view also did not lack religious and moral arguments to support it. Nor can one doubt the difficulty of legislating against a background of fast-moving medical and scientific development. It is not often that Parliament has to frame legislation apt to apply to developments at the advanced cutting edge of science.
>
> [13] The solution recommended and embodied in the 1990 Act was not to ban all creation and subsequent use of live human embryos produced in vitro but instead, and subject to certain express prohibitions of which some have been noted above, to permit such creation and use subject to specified conditions, restrictions and time limits and subject to the regimes of control briefly described in [4], above. The merits of this solution are not a matter for the House in its judicial capacity. It is, however, plain that while Parliament outlawed certain grotesque possibilities (such as placing a live animal embryo in a woman or a live human embryo in an animal), it otherwise opted for a strict regime of control. No activity within this field was left unregulated. There was to be no free for all.'

STATUTORY INTERPRETATION AS APPLIED TO THE ACT

[18] For present purposes, one paragraph from Lord Bingham's speech in Quintavalle CNR on the subject of statutory interpretation will, suffice. He said ([2003] 2 All ER 113 at [8], [2003] 2 WLR 692 at [8]):

> 'The basic task of the court is to ascertain and give effect to the true meaning of what Parliament has said in the enactment to be construed. But that is not to say that attention should be confined and a literal interpretation given to the particular provisions which give rise to difficulty. Such an approach not only encourages immense prolixity in drafting, since the draftsman will feel obliged to provide expressly for every contingency which may possibly arise. It may also (under the banner of loyalty to the will of Parliament) lead to the frustration of that will, because undue concentration on the minutiae of the enactment may lead the court to neglect the purpose which Parliament intended to achieve when it enacted the statute. Every statute other than a pure consolidating statute is, after all, enacted to make some change, or address some problem, or remove some blemish, or effect some improvement in the national life. The court's task, within the permissible bounds of interpretation, is to give effect to Parliament's purpose. So the controversial provisions should be read in the context of the statute as a whole, and the statute as a whole should be read in the historical context of the situation which led to its enactment.'

[19] The history of the legislation, and the policy issues to which the Act gives expression are of considerable importance. They come to the fore when considering whether or not there are any breaches of Ms Evans' and Mrs Hadley's convention rights, and in particular whether any interference with their private and family lives is justified under art 8(2) of the convention. I will therefore deal with questions of policy when considering the convention aspects of the claims.

THE RELEVANT PROVISIONS OF THE ACT

[20] Before turning to the facts, it is necessary to set out the provisions of the Act which are relevant to the two cases. I do so by reference to the helpful synopsis provided by Ms Dinah Rose, counsel for the authority.

[21] The long title of the Act describes it as:

> 'An Act to make provision in connection with human embryos and any subsequent development of such embryos; to prohibit certain practices in connection with embryos and gametes; to establish a Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority; to make provision about the persons who in certain circumstances are to be treated in law as the parents of a child; and to amend the Surrogacy Arrangements Act 1985.'

[22] At para [4] of his speech in Quintavalle CNR, Lord Bingham identifies the three levels of control which the Act imposes, namely: (1) that contained within the Act itself; (2) that provided by the Secretary of State through regulations; and (3) that exercised by the authority. The instant cases fall within the category (3). As Lord Bingham points out in the extract from his speech which I have cited at [17], above, the Act occupies a field of great ethical sensitivity and controversy, in which the science is rapidly advancing.

[23] Sections 1 and 2 of the Act define a number of the terms used in the Act. In particular: (1) by s 1(1)(a), an embryo is defined as 'a live human embryo where fertilisation is complete, and by s 1(1)(b) 'references to an embryo include an egg in the process of fertilisation; (2) s 1(2) of the Act provides that in so far as it governs bringing about the creation of an embryo, the Act applies only to bringing about the creation of an embryo outside the human body; (3) by s 1(3), in so far as it governs the keeping or use of an embryo, the Act applies only to keeping or using an embryo outside the human body; (4) by s 2(1), 'treatment services' are defined as 'medical, surgical or obstetric services provided to the public or a section of the public for the purpose of assisting women to carry children'; and (5) by s 2(2), references in the Act to keeping, in relation to embryos or gametes, include keeping while preserved (whether by cryopreservation or in any other way). Embryos so kept are referred to in the Act as 'stored'.

[24] Section 3 deals with activities governed by the Act. By s 3(1), no person shall bring about the creation of an embryo, or keep or use an embryo except in pursuance of a licence. The storage or use of an embryo can only take place lawfully in accordance with the requirements of the licence in question. The contravention of s 3(1) is an offence, pursuant to s 41(2)(a) of the Act: see R v Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority, ex p Blood [1997] 2 All ER 687 at 695, [1999] Fam 151 at 178.

[25] Sections 11–13 of the Act deal with the scope of licences granted by the authority and licence conditions. The authority is empowered by s 11(1) to grant only three licences. The first of these is a licence for treatment under paras 1 and 2 of Sch 2 and which authorises the following (amongst others) in the course of providing treatment services '(a) bringing about the creation of embryos in vitro, (b) keeping embryos, (c) using gametes, (d) practices designed to secure that embryos are in a suitable condition to be placed in a woman or to determine whether embryos are suitable for that purpose, (e) placing any embryo in a woman'.

[26] The second type of licences provided for in para 2 of Sch 2 are those authorising the storage of gametes and embryos; and the third are those authorising activities for the purposes of research (ibid para 3). In the instant case we are, of course, only concerned with the first two types of licence.

[27] By s 12(c) of the Act, it is a condition of every licence granted that the provisions of Sch 3 to the Act shall be complied with. Before turning to Sch 3, however, it is necessary to identify one of the mandatory, and in my judgment very important conditions of licences for treatment identified in s 13(5) of the Act namely the following:

> 'A woman shall not be provided with treatment services unless account has been taken of the welfare of any child who may be born as a result of the treatment (including the need of that child for a father), and of any other child who may be affected by the birth.'

[28] The means whereby the statutory obligation contained in s 13(5) of the Act is implemented is the code of practice which the authority is required to maintain by s 25(1) of the Act. Section 25(2) provides that the guidance given by the code shall include guidance for those providing treatment services about the matters contained within s 13(5).

[29] The current code of practice sets out in paras 3.8–3.21 the approach which centres should adopt and the matters which should be taken into account. It is not necessary for the purposes of this judgment to reproduce these paragraphs. It is, I think, sufficient to say that they cover, comprehensively (and to a much greater extent than, for example, is contained in the so-called welfare check list in s 1(3) of the Children Act 1989) every possible aspect of the unborn child's physical and emotional welfare in the context of being born as a result of IVF treatment, and every aspect of the capacity of those seeking the treatment to care for the child. It is an impressive document.

SCHEDULE 3 TO THE ACT

[30] Schedule 3 to the Act is at the heart of this case. It governs consents to the use of gametes or embryos. By para 1, a consent under Sch 3 must be given in writing, and an effective consent means a consent under Sch 3 which has not been withdrawn.

[31] By para 2 of Sch 3, a consent to the use of any embryo must specify one or more of the following purposes: (1) 'use in providing treatment services to the person giving consent, or that person and another specified person together'; (2) 'use in providing treatment services to persons not including the person giving consent'; (3) 'use for the purposes of any project of research'. A consent may specify conditions subject to which the embryo may be so used.

[32] By para 3, a consent to the storage of any gametes or embryo must specify the maximum period of storage (if less than the statutory maximum); and must state what is to happen to the gametes or embryo if the person giving the consent dies or is unable because of incapacity to vary the terms of the consent or revoke it. Such a consent may also specify conditions subject to which the gametes or embryo may remain in storage.

[33] Paragraph 3 in Sch 3 deals with the procedure for giving consent. A person must be given a suitable opportunity to receive proper counselling about the implications of taking the proposed steps, and must be provided with such information as is proper, before giving consent under Sch 3. In particular, by para 3(2): 'Before a person gives consent under this Schedule, he must be informed of the effect of paragraph 4 below.'

[34] Paragraph 4, which is the critical paragraph provides:

> '(1) The terms of any consent under this Schedule may from time to time be varied, and the consent may be withdrawn, by notice given by the person who gave the consent to the person keeping the gametes or embryo to which the consent is relevant.
>
> (2) The terms of any consent to the use of any embryo cannot be varied, and such consent cannot be withdrawn, once the embryo has been used—(a) in providing treatment services, or (b) for the purposes of any project of research.'

[35] By para 6(3) of Sch 3, an embryo the creation of which was brought about in vitro must not be used for any purpose unless there is an effective consent by each person whose gametes were used to bring about the creation of the embryo to the use for that purpose of the embryo, and the embryo is used in accordance with those consents.

[36] By para 8(2) of Sch 3, an embryo the creation of which was brought about in vitro must not be kept in storage unless there is an effective consent, by each person whose gametes were used to bring about the creation of the embryo, to the storage of the embryo and the embryo is stored in accordance with those consents.

THE TWO MOST IMPORTANT PRINCIPLES UNDERLYING THE ACT

[37] These are the relevant statutory provisions for my purposes. Before moving on, however, a reading of the Act and the Code of Practice seems to me amply to justify the submission made by Miss Rose that the two most important principles to be found in the Act are (1) the welfare of any children born by treatment under its provisions, and (2) the requirements of consent from those participating in the treatment. For these propositions she relied upon Leeds Teaching Hospital NHS Trust v A [2003] 1 FLR 412 at [20] per Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss P, approving and quoting a passage from the judgment of Hale LJ in Centre for Reproductive Medicine v U [2002] EWCA Civ 565 at [24], [2002] All ER (D) 213 (Apr) at [24]. Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss P said:

> 'The two most important principles to be found in the Act are the welfare of any children born by treatment under the provisions: see for instance s 13(5) and the requirements of consent (see Sch 3(5), s 28(2) and the statutory consent forms, and Annex C to the Code of Practice. Hale LJ said in Centre for Reproductive Medicine v U (at [24]):
>
> > "The whole scheme of the 1990 Act lays great emphasis upon consent. The new scientific techniques which have developed since the birth of the first IVF baby in 1978 open up the possibility of creating human life in ways and circumstances quite different from anything experienced before then. These possibilities bring with them huge practical and ethical difficulties. These have to be balanced against the strength and depth of the feelings of people who desperately long for the children which only these techniques can give them, as well as the natural desire of clinicians and scientists to use their skills to fulfil those wishes. Parliament has devised a legislative scheme and a statutory authority for regulating assisted reproduction in a way which tries to strike a fair balance between the various interests and concerns. Centres, the HFEA and the courts have to respect that scheme, however great their sympathy for the plight of particular individuals caught up in it."'

THE FACTS IN THE CASE OF MS EVANS AND MR JOHNSTON

[38] Against that background, I now turn to examine the facts of the two cases. I am conscious that both have been heard in public, and that my judgment will be handed down in public. I will therefore provide only such details of both claimants' medical conditions and histories as are necessary for the purposes of my decision. Furthermore, although I heard factual evidence about a number of aspects of the personal lives of Ms Evans and Mr Johnston in particular, and formed my impression of them both on all the evidence I heard, I propose only to make findings of fact in relation to those issues which are strictly necessary for my decision.

[39] Ms Evans was born on 23 October 1971. She is thus now 31. Mr Johnston was born on 2 November 1976, and is now 26. In October 2001, when the critical events with which I am concerned occurred, she was rising 30 and he was rising 25. Mr Johnston has never been married.

[40] On 30 August 1995, when she was married to another man, Ms Evans was referred by her general practitioner with her husband to the clinic. At that point, she and her husband had been trying to achieve a pregnancy for two years without success. Ms Evans had an irregular menstrual cycle with borderline serum progesterone suggestive of defective ovulation. She was prescribed Clomid, a drug used to stimulate ovulation.

[41] I do not need to chronicle Ms Evans' treatment thereafter, which is set out in the statement from Dr Sharp. According to his statement in the proceedings, he suggested IVF treatment to Ms Evans and her then husband on 2 July 1997. This did not occur due to the subsequent breakdown of her marriage, and the clinic did not see Ms Evans again until 12 July 2000, when she attended with Mr Johnston. However, I accept Ms Evans' evidence that she had always wanted to conceive a child, and was bitterly disappointed when all her attempts at doing so failed.

[42] Between July 2000 and March 2001, Ms Evans was again treated with Clomid. She did not, however, become pregnant. In April 2001 she had a hysterosalpingogram, an examination of the uterus and fallopian tubes, which demonstrated that both fallopian tubes were clear. She was, however, recommended for a laparoscopy, which took place on 13 September 2001. That examination gave rise to concern over the condition of her ovaries, and on 27 September 2001, she underwent a laparatomy, or surgical incision into the peritoneal cavity. The findings were, in summary, of serious borderline tumours present in both ovaries.

[43] On 9 October 2001 there was a meeting of the doctors at the clinic, the conclusions of which were that Ms Evans would require an oophorectomy (the removal of her ovaries) but that because the ovarian tumours were growing slowly Ms Evans could have IVF and embryo freezing followed by a formal oophorectomy with what is described as a 'staging procedure' as soon as convenient but not before the IVF services were content that they had retrieved the eggs they needed.

THE EVENTS OF 10 OCTOBER 2001

[44] The news that she was going to need an oophorectomy was conveyed to Ms Evans on 10 October 2001 when she attended the clinic with Mr Johnston. Since this was the day on which both Ms Evans and Mr Johnson signed their consents to IVF treatment, and since what Mr Johnson is alleged to have said to Ms Evans during a meeting with Mrs Spearman forms the basis of the promissory estoppel upon which she seeks to rely, I need to look at the events of the day in some detail.

[45] I preface my description of what happened on 10 October 2001 by recording my sympathy for Ms Evans both in relation both to her medical condition and to the events of that day. Events moved very swiftly. It was within minutes of receiving the terrible news that she had a life-threatening condition and would need the removal of her ovaries that she was discussing the details of IVF with Mrs Spearman and Mr Johnston. In her oral evidence to me, she described the meeting with Mrs Spearman as like being in a room full of water. It felt, she said, as if everybody was under water and she could not hear what he or she were saying. It was a graphic description.

[46] In her statement made for the purposes of the proceedings on 29 October 2002, Ms Evans describes what happened on 10 October 2001 in the following terms:

> '14. On 10 October 2001, Howard (Mr Johnston) and I went to see Nick Johnson (a consultant in gynaecological oncology who had carried out the formal laparotomy and ovarian cystectomy with Mr Jaaback on 27 September) at the RUH. He told me that I would need a laparotomy procedure to remove my ovaries and my fallopian tubes. It was a complete shock and I was devastated.

15. He told me that because I needed to have my ovaries and fallopian tubes removed I had to consider whether I wanted to try IVF now before it was too late. He took Howard and I over to see Mr Nick Sharp at the clinic to discuss this.

16. Twenty minutes after being told that I had ovarian cancer, Howard and I were sitting down with Mr Sharp who explained what our options were. He told us that we could have one cycle of IVF' treatment to attempt to harvest some eggs. Howard and I agreed with Mr Sharp that before I underwent surgery to have my ovaries and fallopian tubes removed I would have some eggs harvested, which Howard would then fertilise. The embryos that resulted could then be frozen for use after my surgery so we could still have a family ...

18. We saw Mr Sharp and then went into another room where we saw Pam Spearman, one of the nurses. We signed the consent forms that we were asked to sign and I was shown what I needed to do in terms of injections and using a nasal spray.

19. I would say that our whole visit to the clinic took no more than about an hour. I know that during this visit we discussed a lot of things about the IVF treatment and what it would involve. It was a bit overwhelming. I was very anxious about my cancer, the surgery I needed and the whole IVF process. It was difficult to take in everything that we were told, and I have no clear recollection of what was or was not discussed.'

[47] Ms Evans then identifies the consents which were signed, and in her statement that concludes her narration of the events of that day. The statement then continues as follows:

'22. Howard and I then attended the clinic on a regular basis. I recall one specific occasion, prior to the eggs being harvested, when we were with Pam Spearman. I cannot be certain of the date. I believe it was while we were in the process of having treatment. I cannot remember how the conversation started, but I asked Pam whether we had to have all the eggs that were harvested fertilised and then frozen. I asked whether it was possible simply to have my eggs frozen. Pam replied that they did not carry out that procedure at the clinic and that if I wanted to have my eggs frozen prior to them being fertilised I would need to go to another IVF clinic.

23. At this point Howard told me not to be stupid and that there was no need for that. He told me that he loved me, that we would be getting married and having a family together. I said, "But what if we split up?" Howard told me that we were not going to and that I should not be such a negative person.

24. I suggested that perhaps we freeze some of the eggs and that if we were still together in a couple of years' time and wanted to use them he would always fertilise them then. He told me again that we would not be splitting up, that our future was together and that he loved me. He told me that he loved me, that he wanted to have a family and that I was the woman he wanted to share his life with. He told me that he would never leave me, and that he wanted to be the father of my children. I told him that I loved him and trusted him.

25. Pam Spearman was present throughout this conversation. She said that we would need to really think about what we wanted and to make up our minds what we wanted to do. Howard continued to reassure me and in the end I simply accepted what he said and we just carried on. It was not mentioned again.'

[48] It is now clear, and Ms Evans in her oral evidence accepted, that she is wrong in ascribing the conversation which she describes in paras 22 to 25 of her statement to a date after 10 October 2001. The conversation, whatever its precise terms, took place on 10 October 2001.

[49] Mr Johnston, in his statement for the proceedings dated 17 January 2003, deals with the meeting with Mrs Spearman on 10 October 2001 in the following way:

'9. I recall that the claimant and I then attended a further consultation with Pamela Spearman. Mrs Spearman explained, in further detail, IVF treatment. It had already been made clear to us that the Clinic would not be able to store any unfertilised eggs and that if this was to be considered, we would have to attend an alternative clinic.

10. Eventually, (Ms Evans) and I signed consent forms for the IVF treatment at the Clinic. The contents of the consent forms were explained to us. Indeed, we were taken through the consent forms on a paragraph by paragraph basis. It was obviously made clear to us that the consent of both myself and (Ms Evans) would be required before anything could be done. It was also explained to us that the continued storage of the embryos would be considered on an annual basis so as to ensure that both myself and (Ms Evans) wanted the storage to continue. In addition, it was clear that upon the termination of our relationship the storage and use of the embryos would need to be reviewed. It was therefore clear that we would still maintain freedom to choose either whether we wanted to start a family together or when we would start a family together. I suppose I was reassured by the fact that I would still maintain the same control regarding this decision as I would had these unfortunate events not occurred. Having said that, I would estimate that the entire consultation lasted approximately 90 minutes. This was from the diagnosis being given to (Ms Evans) and us embarking on a course of IVF treatment. As outlined above, the circumstances were far from ideal. (Ms Evans) and I certainly had no opportunity to discuss matters in details privately. In fact, the only time we had time to discuss matters alone was when we talked in whispers for about 60 seconds whilst staff went to obtain an IVF kit.

11. I obviously wanted to reassure (Ms Evans) during this difficult time. I was concerned for her welfare. I cannot recall providing her with any specific reassurances at this time. As outlined above, save for about 60 seconds or so, (Ms Evans) and I were not alone. However, it is highly likely that I would have been trying to reassure and support (Ms Evans). I could hardly have done anything else in the circumstances. Certainly, I did not enter into any form of legally binding agreement with (Ms Evans). I would have only provided (Ms Evans) with assurances, the nature of which are frequently given on a daily basis in any relationship. As far as I am concerned, both myself and (Ms Evans) were fully aware of the basis upon which the embryos would be stored and used, namely in accordance with the consent forms which were fully explained to us, and which were signed by both of us.'

[50] Mrs Spearman gives her account in her statement made on 29 October 2002. She first met Ms Evans and Mr Johnston on 10 October 2001. She states she has a clear recollection of them, not least because of the very tragic circumstances in which they found themselves attending the clinic. She says that in view of those circumstances, and the fact that she was seeing the couple immediately after their consultation with Mr Sharp:

'... the couple required particularly careful and detailed information and support to ensure that they were in full possession of all the physical, emotional and legal elements of the IVF treatment in order to understand its full implications.'

[51] Mrs Spearman exhibits to her statement the checklist which she used to ensure that all the relevant points had been covered. In particular she states in para 13 that she sought confirmation that Ms Evans and Mr Johnston had received the clinic's information pack, a copy of which she annexes to her statement. She says she checked carefully that the couple had read and understood a leaflet included in the pack entitled 'IVF and ICSI Treatment'.

[52] Mrs Spearman also states:

'16. I made it clear to the couple that the Clinic would not take any action to dispose of the embryos in storage without contacting both parties. Likewise, I conformed that nothing would be done with the embryos without the consent of both partners. I also explained that the Clinic would write to them on an annual basis to check that both partners wanted their embryos to remain in storage.

17. Clause two of para 4 (of the consent form) states that: "Upon the cessation of our domestic relationship by divorce or legal separation we understand that the storage and use of the embryos must be reviewed." I explained to Ms Evans and Mr Johnston that this applied equally to unmarried couples. I also explained that they should notify the clinic of any change or breakdown in their relationship.

18. I also elaborated upon what was meant by "reviewing" the storage and use of embryos. I explained that, in the event of the breakdown of their relationship, it would not be possible for them to attend with a new partner and expect the Clinic to treat them using the same embryos.'

[53] Mrs Spearman then describes the process of taking Ms Evans and Mr Johnston through the authority's forms. She then states:

'23. I recall that Ms Evans seemed quite tense during our meeting and she was very naturally upset about the operation she was going to have. However, I had no concerns about her relationship with Mr Johnston: they appeared to be very happy together and he came across as being very supportive of Ms Evans. He did mention that his mother had expressed some concerns about him pursuing this course of treatment with Ms Evans, but Mr Johnston himself seemed committed to his partner.

24. I do not recall Ms Evans asking me about alternative treatments available although I am aware that she has suggested she asked me about the possibility of oocyte freezing. The question of oocyte freezing is frequently raised by couples who, at initial consultation, may not be aware of or understand the difference between oocytes and embryos. Had such a query arisen regarding treatment, I would have referred the couple back to Mr Sharp and the wider team for further discussion and consultation. This is because if oocyte freezing had been raised, it would have suggested to me that there was some doubt about them seeking treatment as a couple. This would have changed both my and the team's perception of the suitability and appropriateness of IVF treatment for the couple since the welfare of any potential child or children from such treatment is always our paramount concern.'

[54] Having had the opportunity to consider Mr Johnston's statement, Ms Evans saw no reason to disagree with him that information about the clinic's inability to store unfertilised eggs was provided on 10 October 2001 and not on any later date, as she had initially thought. Her recollection was that Mrs Spearman took Mr Johnson and herself through the forms very briefly, and that they had to be signed then and there.

[55] Ms Evans is also very clear that neither she nor Mr Johnston had been sent a copy of the clinic's Information Pack, and that Mrs Spearman is simply wrong in para 13 of her statement (see [51], above) when she says she sought confirmation that they had received it, and when she says she checked carefully to ensure that they had read the particular leaflet contained within it. Ms Evans says that the first time she saw this document was when it was annexed to Mrs Spearman's statement I accept her evidence on this point, which was supported by that of Mr Johnston.

[56] Mrs Spearman also filed a supplementary statement on 25 June 2003 which, for the most part maintains her original position. However, she accepts:

'9. With regard to egg freezing, it is possible that Ms Evans asked me whether or not the Clinic offered egg freezing as a service to patients. Many patients have read or heard about egg freezing, and many confuse embryos and eggs. It was relatively common for patients to ask about egg freezing and I would not have found such a query remarkable if it had come from Ms Evans. I would simply have explained that the Clinic did not offer it as a service to patients.

10. In contrast, if Ms Evans had indicated that she wished to pursue egg freezing as an option, this would have raised concerns about her and Mr Johnston receiving treatment as a couple. I would therefore have referred them back to Mr Sharp and am sure that I would recall such a conversation if it had occurred in the manner described by Ms Evans.'

MY FINDINGS OF FACT IN RELATION TO THE EVENTS OF 10 OCTOBER 2001

[57] I heard oral evidence from Ms Evans, Mr Johnston and Mrs Spearman. I also heard from Dr Sharp, although he could give no direct evidence as to what was said at the meeting between Ms Evans, Mr Johnston and Mrs Spearman. I thought all three were trying their best to assist me. As I have already made clear, Ms Evans frankly told me that she felt numb with shock on 10 October 2001 when given the results of the laparotomy and on being told that she would have to have surgery to remove her ovaries. No doubt it was this which caused her to place the critical conversation on the wrong date.

[58] Ms Evans' oral evidence to me was very much along the lines of her statement. She was being told that the only option was to fertilise her eggs with Mr Johnston's sperm. She therefore asked Mrs Spearman about egg freezing. She was trying to safeguard having a child—this was the real issue; she was concerned that Mr Johnston would leave her. She told me that Mrs Spearman said words to the effect of 'we don't do egg freezing at this clinic—you will have to go to an alternative clinic', and that it was at this point that Mr Johnston told her not to be a negative person: they did not need to have egg freezing. She said he told her he was not going to leave her. She put all her trust in him. He was trying to reassure her and he was going to be the father of her children. Had he not given her those assurances she would have looked for alternative treatment—either a different clinic or donor sperm.

[59] When cross-examined by Mr Moradifar for Mr Johnston the areas of dispute between Ms Evans and Mr Johnston seemed to diminish. Ms Evans accepted that Mr Johnston was not telling her in terms that she could always use the embryos but seeking to reassure her that they were not going to split up. Equally, when Mrs Spearman gave evidence, the slightly defensive dogmatism of her statements softened. She was clear that there had not been a discussion with her about freezing eggs, but she accepted that it had quite possibly arisen as a question which was not followed up. She would have told Ms Evans that it was something the clinic did not do, and that Ms Evans would have to discuss it with Mr Sharp.

[60] Mr Sharp, when he gave evidence, had no recollection of any discussions with him about egg freezing. However, he regarded single person egg freezing as very much in its infancy and far removed from standard medical practice. The clinic did not have a licence for it, and as far as he was aware, there were no reported pregnancies in the United Kingdom resulting from it.

[61] Mr Johnston's evidence seemed to me to confirm the narrowing of the issue. It had been a very emotional meeting. He had not given an unequivocal assurance about the embryos, but he had done his best to be supportive. In a skilful cross-examination by Mr Robin Tolson QC for Ms Evans he said that he was very much in love with Ms Evans. It had not crossed his mind that they might want to go their separate ways, although he knew the relationship would have ended if he had told her that he was not going to give her the child she so desperately wanted. He could not remember what he had said but he accepted that she had said words to the effect of 'what if we split up' and that he had replied 'we are not going to split up'. He saw no reason at that point why they should.

[62] Although I have spent a great deal of time setting out the evidence, the result, having seen the three principal witnesses on this point in the witness box, is reasonably clear. Despite errors in her initial statement (notably, of course, the date of the conversation) and despite the fact that—as Dr Stern for the clinics pointed out—Ms Evans was at points unable to recall important aspects of her treatment—I am satisfied, on the balance of probabilities, that during the session with Mrs Spearman Ms Evans did raise, as a general inquiry, the possibility of freezing her eggs as opposed to freezing fertilised embryos. I am satisfied that Mrs Spearman told her simply and shortly that this was something which the clinic did not do. I also find, on the balance of probabilities, that she added that if Ms Evans wished to pursue this aspect, she would have to go back to Mr Sharp.

[63] I am equally satisfied on the balance of probabilities that when Mrs Spearman had answered the inquiry about freezing eggs, Mr Johnston gave Ms Evans the assurances I have set out in [58], above. They were not going to split up. She did not need to go in for egg freezing. She should not be negative. He wanted to be the father of her children.

[64] I find further on the balance of probabilities that Mrs Spearman did hear Mr Johnston give these assurances, but that she did not absorb them. As time has passed, and Mrs Spearman having seen many couples since, the assurances have become simply part of her perception of him as a reassuring and supportive presence.

[65] It is, I think, quite clear, and accepted by Ms Evans that Mr Johnston did not give her any categorical assurance, in terms, that whatever happened between them she could use the embryos in order to become pregnant. That, however, she says is the irresistible inference from what he did say.

[66] I am equally clear that, at the time he gave Ms Evans the assurances I have identified, Mr Johnston meant what he said. In other words, he gave the assurances in good faith. He was in love with Ms Evans: he intended at that time to stay with her indefinitely. Despite some reservations about it, he entered into the treatment process with Ms Evans on the basis that if it was successful he would be the father of the resulting child, and that he and Ms Evans would in due course marry.

[67] I shall need to discuss, later, whether the assurances which I have found Mr Johnston gave Ms Evans are capable of providing the basis for a promissory estoppel. I shall also need to consider the extent to which it can properly be said that Ms Evans relied on them to her detriment.

THE CONSENTS WHICH MS EVANS AND MR JOHNSTON SIGNED ON 10 OCTOBER 2001

[68] The documents which both Ms Evans and Mr Johnston signed on 10 October 2001 fall into two categories. The first comprises those provided by the clinic: the second category comprises those provided by the authority which the clinic needed in order to observe the terms of its licence. Several of the forms (notably those not signed on 10 October 2001) deal with the release of information by and to the couple's general practitioner. Nothing turns on these forms, and I will not reproduce them.

[69] The most important form for my purposes is that in which Ms Evans and Mr Johnston give their consent to treatment involving egg retrieval and embryo replacement. It is in two parts. Part 1, which is signed by Ms Evans, reads as follows:

> '1. I consent to [delete / complete as applicable]
> (i) be prepared for egg retrieval;
> (ii) the removal of eggs from my ovaries with the aid of ultrasound;
> (iii) the administration of any drugs and anaesthetics which may be found necessary in the course of the procedure(s)
> (iv) the mixing of the following: [tick each column as required]; my egg(s) with the sperm of my partner/ husband ("husband" is deleted)
> 2. I understand that if the donor has given effective consent under (the Act), the donor will not be the legal parent of any resulting child.
> 3. I have discussed with Mr Sharp/Pam Spearman the procedures outlined above. I have been given information orally and in writing about them.
> 4. I have been given a suitable opportunity to take part in counselling about the implications of the proposed treatment (using donated sperm or eggs, or any IVF treatment).'

[70] I have set out Part 1 of the clinic's consent form in full, even though several parts of it are inapplicable (this was not, of course, an AID case). The relevance of this information, however, is that on the form itself, two columns are provided for the answer to question 1(iv) with three boxes in each column. Ms Evans has ticked the first box in each column. Thus her consent is to the mixing of her eggs with the sperm of her partner/husband. The second box in the left hand column is designated 'eggs donated by' with a blank left for the name. The third box in the column is designated 'an anonymous donor's egg(s)'. The second box in the right hand column is designated 'with sperm donated by' and a gap for the name. The third box in the right hand column is designated 'with an anonymous donor's sperm'.

[71] It is thus clear from Pt 1 of the clinic's consent form that the treatment to which Ms Evans was giving her consent on this form was to the mixing of her eggs with Mr Johnston's sperm. She did not give her consent to the mixing of her eggs with the sperm of any other named person than Mr Johnston, and she was not consenting to AID.

[72] Part H of the form is signed by both Ms Evans and Mr Johnston. It deals with the creation of embryos, the transfer of embryos, the fertilisation of surplus eggs and the storage of excess embryos. The phrase on the form: 'We authorise/do not authorise the medical practitioner to store excess embryo(s)' is left untouched. The form does, however, contain the provision that if authorisation is given for the storage of excess embryo(s) such storage will cease upon the following occurring: (a) upon their joint request for their use in a future treatment cycle; (b) upon jointly signed written request by them to discontinue storage; and (c) at the expiration of an agreed period of time but in any event no longer than ten years from the date of the commencement of storage.

[73] The form also provides that upon cessation of their domestic relationship by divorce or legal separation they understand that the storage and use of the embryos must be reviewed (see Mrs Spearman's statement as recorded at [52], above). There is provision for an annual review, a medical disclaimer and both agree they have discussed the procedures with Mr Sharp and Mrs Spearman and have been given information orally and in writing about them.

[74] Mr Johnston signed the clinic's 'Male Partner's Acknowledgement'. This reads: 'I am not married to Natallie Evans, but I acknowledge that she and I are being treated together, and that I will become the legal father of any resulting child.'

[75] The next relevant form is the authority's Form for Consent to Storage and Use of Eggs and Embryos, which begins with the following warning in bold type:

> 'NB Do not sign this form unless you have received information about these matters and have been offered counselling. You may vary the terms of this consent or withdraw this consent at any time except in relation to eggs or embryos which have already been used.'

[76] There follows a warning about the risks of storing eggs. This is in the following terms:

> 'Patients wishing to store their eggs should note that egg freezing and the use of frozen eggs in treatment are experimental techniques. Not all eggs will survive the freezing and thawing process, and sometimes no embryo will be created using frozen eggs. There have not yet been enough treatments to be able accurately to predict the chance of a baby being born using frozen eggs. You are strongly advised to read the HFEA information leaflet on egg freezing before giving your consent.'

[77] The form is then divided into two parts: use and storage. Ms Evans was given three options in relation to the use of her eggs. They were (i) in her own treatment (ii) in treating others and (iii) in any project of research. The form is completed by ticking 'Yes' and 'No' boxes. Ms Evans ticked the 'Yes' box in relation to her own treatment and the 'No' box in relation to treating others and research.

[78] The second question under use (as completed) reads as follows:

> '(b) I hereby consent to my egg(s) being fertilised in vitro to develop embryo(s) and to the use of those embryo(s) for the following purposes:—
> (i) In the treatment of myself Yes > in the treatment of myself with a named partner Yes
> Full name of partner Howard Roy Johnston
> (ii) in treating others No
> (iii) in any project of research No ...'

[79] As with the first question under 'use', the answers in relation to the questions (b)(i)–(iii) are given by ticking boxes marked 'Yes' and 'No'. Consistent with her answers to the first question, Ms Evans is, accordingly, consenting once again to IVF treatment with Mr Johnston.

[80] In relation to storage, Ms Evans consented to the storage of her eggs for a maximum period of ten years, and to the storage of embryos developed in vitro from her eggs for ten years. If she died or became mentally incapacitated she elected that neither her eggs nor her embryos should be allowed to perish; that they should continue in storage for the purposes specified in the answers to questions relating to use and storage, but should not continue in storage for any other purposes.

[81] The authority's form for consent to storage and use of sperm and Embryos signed by Mr Johnston is structured identically to that signed by Ms Evans with, of course, the necessary substitution of 'sperm' for eggs. The form has the same warning at the top in relation to the right to vary or withdraw consent. Mr Johnston consented to the following:

> 'I hereby consent to the use of my sperm to fertilise egg(s) in vitro and to the use of embryo(s) developed from these egg(s) for the following purposes:
> i. in the treatment of myself together with a named partner Yes > Full name of partner: Miss Natallie Evans
> ii. In treating others No
> iii. in any project of research No ...'

[82] Mr Johnston's instructions in relation to storage and to what should happen in the event of his death or incapacity are identical to those of Ms Evans, save that he did not tick any other boxes relating to the eggs/embryos continuing in storage for any other purposes.

[83] Before leaving the forms, it is, I think, unfortunate that Part II of the clinic's consent to treatment form, which I have summarised at [72], [73], above, does not fully reflect the terms of paras 4(1) and 6 of Sch 3 to the Act. In this context the word 'review' seems to me ambiguous, and inconsistent with the accurate statement (which I have set out in [75], above) which heads up the authority's form of consent to storage and use of eggs and embryos. No doubt this is something the clinic may wish to consider further in the light of this judgment.

EVENTS AFTER 10 OCTOBER 2001

[84] Ms Evans duly began the course of treatment, part of which involved the injection of hormones. On 16 October 2001 Ms Evans and Mr Johnston signed the 'Welfare of the Child: Consent to Release of Information about Me' form consenting to their general practitioner, Dr Slack, providing information about them to the clinic. They declared that they had read and understood the contents of the authority's leaflet on the welfare of the child. On 17 October 2001 Dr Slack completed the welfare of the child information and declaration for GPs declaring that she knew of no reason why treatment should not proceed.

[85] From the evidence both Ms Evans and Mr Johnston gave, it was plainly a tense and difficult time. On the morning of 12 November 2001, the day they were to attend the clinic together for Ms Evans' eggs to be harvested and fertilised, there was an argument between them. Ms Evans says Mr Johnston told her he was not going through with the treatment. Mr Johnston says that Ms Evans initially refused to have her last injection, and told him that the whole thing was a waste of time, although she changed her mind shortly afterwards.

[86] I am reluctant to make findings of fact except in relation to issues of direct relevance unless I need to, and I am conscious of the fact that during the hearing, I discouraged cross-examination on the personal aspects of the relationship between Ms Evans and Mr Johnston. On this point, however, having heard both of them, I accept Mr Johnston's version of this argument. I do not think for a moment that Ms Evans meant it when she said that the whole thing was a waste of time. It is, however, an indication of the tension under which both she and Mr Johnston were operating, and may have some relevance in relation to the issue of estoppel.

[87] In any event, however, later on 12 November 2001, Ms Evans and Mr Johnston both attended the clinic. Eleven eggs were harvested and fertilised. From these, six embryos were created and on the following day these were duly placed in storage by the clinic. On 26 November 2001, Ms Evans underwent a successful bilateral oophorectomy for high-grade multiple tumours of borderline malignant potential. The positive news is that, although Ms Evans cannot now conceive a child spontaneously, the latest ultrasound scans were normal, and she has been given the 'all clear'. Since the cancer did not spread to her uterus, it is the opinion of Professor Ledger, the independent expert brought in to advise pursuant to the order of the President of 19 September 2002 that Ms Evans should be able to carry a pregnancy normally, although if she is unable to use the six frozen embryos fertilised on 12 November 2001, there is no prospect of her bearing a child which is genetically hers.

[88] On 19 December 2001, Ms Evans was advised that she ought to wait for two years before an embryo transfer should be attempted, although it could be done earlier. However, on 27 May 2002 the relationship between Ms Evans and Mr Johnston came to an end. The causes of the breakdown of the relationship are irrelevant for my purposes.

[89] Ms Evans says that subsequent to their separation there was an agreement between them that she could use the embryos provided he was not named on the birth certificate as the father and would not be financially liable for any maintenance. Mr Johnson denies that any such agreement was reached. The furthest it went, he said, was her suggestion that she should set up a meeting with a solicitor to enable an agreement to be discussed and drawn up. He accepts that he agreed to attend such a meeting to discuss the possibilities, but Ms Evans did not arrange it. She agreed that this was the case, and attributed her failure to progress the matter by the serious emotional effect which the breakdown of the relationship had on her.

[90] On this part of the case, having seen them both in the witness box, I prefer Mr Johnston's evidence, and I am quite satisfied that no such agreement was reached. But even if it had been it would not, in my judgment, have been effective to achieve the objective Ms Evans desired. I will return to this point later—see [253], below.

[91] On 4 July 2002 Mr Johnston wrote to the clinic, informing it that his relationship with Ms Evans had come to an end, and explaining that as far as he was concerned the embryos could be destroyed. The clinic then advised Ms Evans that Mr Johnston had withdrawn his consent to their further storage. On 11 September 2002 Ms Evans instituted proceedings, and at a directions hearing before Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss P on 19 September 2002 the clinic undertook not to make any arrangements for the embryos to perish or be otherwise altered or destroyed until agreement between the parties or the final determination of these proceedings.

[92] All I need to add in relation to this part of the case is that whilst it was unfortunate that on 10 October 2001 the meeting with Mrs Spearman had to take place immediately after Ms Evans had received the terrible news that she required radical surgery to remove her ovaries, and whilst Mrs Spearman was, as I indicated in [59], above somewhat defensive in her original statement, I accept Dr Stern's submission that no criticism of the clinic can be made either in relation to Ms Evans' treatment or in relation to the information which was given to Ms Evans and Mr Johnston on 10 October 2001. Ms Evans does not seek to say—nor could she—that the consents she signed were invalid or that she did not know what she was signing.

[93] Mrs Spearman, whom I thought a pleasant, decent professional, and one who no doubt has, over the years, fielded the distress of many an IVF patient, fell into the trap—no doubt triggered by the fact of litigation—of turning her description of what she usually did into a narrative of what she actually did—and did so with more certainty than was perhaps warranted. For example, I have already accepted Ms Evans' and Mr Johnston's evidence that they were not sent an information pack prior to 10 October 2001. Mr Sharp agreed that this sometimes happened. Mrs Spearman should not have been so unequivocal about it.

THE FACTS IN THE HADLEY CASE

[94] These can be taken much more shortly. Mrs Hadley was born on 31 December 1964. She is thus now 38. Mr Hadley was born on 1 April 1971 and is now 32. They married on 2 June 1995. Mrs Hadley has a daughter from a previous relationship who is now 18.

[95] In June 1999, following upon previous preliminary assessments and investigations of the couple at the clinic, Mr and Mrs Hadley commenced IVF treatment. The consents which they signed in August 1999 in relation to both treatment and storage are in no material respects different from those signed by Ms Evans and Mr Johnston.

[96] On 20 September 1999, 11 eggs were harvested from Mrs Hadley. Of these, ten were successfully fertilised, of which seven had potential to develop. On 22 September 1999, three of seven embryos were transferred into Mrs Hadley. Of the remainder, two were placed in storage and two did not develop.

[97] In May 2000, Mr and Mrs Hadley separated. They were divorced on 3 December 2001. In the intervening period, there were discussions between them about Mrs Hadley being able to have the remaining embryos transferred into her on the basis that a resulting pregnancy would have no financial or other consequences for Mr Hadley. Mrs Hadley's case is that Mr Hadley agreed to this. Mr Hadley denies it. Mrs Hadley then suggests that Mr Hadley agreed she could use the embryos provided that Mr Hadley was registered as a semen donor and thus avoided financial responsibility for any subsequently born child. Mr Hadley's case is that the agreement between them was that the embryos should be allowed to perish at the end of the storage period (five years in their case).

[98] As in the case of Ms Evans and Mr Johnston, I am satisfied that no post-separation agreement was reached between Mr and Mrs Hadley in relation to the two stored embryos; but as in the case of Ms Evans and Mr Johnston, no such agreement would, in my judgment, have been binding.

[99] Mrs Hadley says she contacted the clinic in 2002 in the light of the agreement which she says she had reached with Mr Hadley, but that the clinic said that if she wanted to have the embryos transferred into her both Mr Hadley and his new partner would need to come into the clinic for a meeting and to give their consent. Mrs Hadley says that she was very unhappy about the prospect of having to sit down with Mr Hadley's new partner, who was pregnant by him, to ask for her permission to use the embryos. She therefore let matters lie.

[100] Mrs Hadley says that later in 2002, Mr Hadley told her he was no longer content that she should use the embryos. By this time his new partner had given birth to their child. The clinic then contacted Mrs Hadley to tell her that it had no alternative but to allow the embryos to perish at the end of the five-year period. However, in August 2002 Mrs Hadley read about Ms Evans' case in the newspaper. She contacted the newspaper, which ran a story about her on its front page. Mr Hadley's reaction, she says, was to contact the clinic and to inform them in writing that he wished the embryos destroyed. After taking legal advice, Mrs Hadley instituted proceedings on 11 September 2002. Similar directions were given in her case as in the case of Ms Evans and Mr Johnston.

[101] Mrs Hadley's position, as she readily recognises, has none of the poignancy of Ms Evans' case. Mrs Hadley suffers from polycystic ovary syndrome, a condition which does not preclude normal conception. In addition, she has, of course, already given birth to a healthy child, who is now adult, and who attended the final day of the hearing.

[102] Mrs Hadley's position, set out in her statement and repeated several times in oral evidence before me was that she and Mr Hadley had begun a process; they had created two lives—two embryos; and that the embryos should not be allowed to perish. She wanted the opportunity to complete that which she and her former husband had begun. Life had already been started, she said, and she wanted to finish the job.

[103] Mr Hadley, in his oral evidence, made it clear that he wished to be a father to any child in the full sense. He said he already had three children: his current partner had a child by a previous relationship: he was step-father to Mrs Hadley's child, and he now had a child by his current partner. 'If I have a child on this planet I would be a father to it' he said, in answer to Mr Tolson in cross- examination, explaining why nothing would now suffice to make him change his mind in relation to the two remaining frozen embryos.

THE FIRST POINT OF LAW: ARE THE CONSENTS GIVEN IN THIS CASE CAPABLE OF OPERATING TO ENABLE THE CLINICS TO TREAT MS EVANS AND MRS HADLEY ON THEIR OWN?

The argument

[104] Both the authority and the Secretary of State take the point that Mr Johnston and Mr Hadley each gave consent only to the use of embryos fertilised with his sperm for the treatment of himself, together with his named partner. As the consent forms make clear, each was given the opportunity, but specifically declined, to consent to such embryos being used in the treatment of any other person, including, for example, Ms Evans and Mrs Hadley being treated alone, or with a different partner.

[105] In these circumstances both the authority and the Secretary of State argue that (irrespective of whether or not the original consents have been subsequently varied or withdrawn), Sch 3, para 6(3) of the 1990 Act prohibits the use of the embryos in either case for any purpose other than for the treatment of Mr Johnston or Mr Hadley together with their respective partners. Since both couples have separated, the consents are no longer effective. If either claimant approached either clinic on her own, there would be no operative consent upon which either clinic could treat her.

[106] For ease of reference, I will set out the terms of para 6(3) of Sch 3. It reads:

> 'An embryo the creation of which was brought about in vitro must not be used for any purpose unless there is an effective consent by each person whose gametes were used to bring about the creation of the embryo to the use for that purpose and the embryo is used in accordance with those consents ...'

[107] If the phrase 'in the treatment of myself together with a named partner' (the form of each of the consents in this case) is to be decided as a simple issue of fact, it is difficult to see how, given the separation of the two couples, either Ms Evans or Mrs Hadley presenting on their own at the respective clinics for treatment by transfer into them of the stored embryos could constitute treatment together with their named partner.

[108] Ms Rose, for the authority, accepted that the term 'treatment together' is both used in a variety of contexts in the Act, and is not defined (see, for example, ss 4(1)(b) and 28(3)(a)). She argued, however, that the various uses of the phrase in a single statute ought to be consistently interpreted, and that the interpretation to be given to the phrase in para 6(3) of Sch 3 was entirely consistent with that given to it the decided cases under s 28(3) of the Act, where the issue under consideration was that of the paternity of subsequently born children.

[109] It therefore becomes necessary to look at the cases in which the phrase 'treatment together' has been considered by the courts. They are, in chronological sequence, Re B (minors) (parentage) [1996] 3 FCR 697, a decision of Bracewell J; U v W (A-G intervening) [1998] 1 FCR 526, [1998] Fam 29, a decision of Wilson J; and Re R (a child) [2003] EWCA Civ 182, [2003] 2 All ER 131, [2003] 2 WLR 1485, a decision of the Court of Appeal (Sir Andrew Morritt V-C, Hale and Dyson LJJ) in which the judgment of the court was given by Hale LJ.

[110] In Re B, the couple separated between the man's donation of sperm in July 1991 and insemination of the woman, which took place in December 1991, although the judge found that sexual intercourse took place between them as late as November 1991. The donation of sperm took place before (whilst the insemination took place after) the relevant provisions of the Act had come into force. There was therefore no statutory consent, and the case is complicated by consideration of the transitional provisions.

[111] In essence, however, what happened was that following the birth of twins in August 1992, of whom the man accepted that he was the biological father, the mother sought financial provision for the children. In the absence of an express consent to treatment, the transitional provisions of the Act provided that he would be deemed to have consented, and would be treated as the father of the twins if he and the mother were receiving treatment together, including AID, and the man had not subsequently withdrawn his deemed consent. Since there had been no such deemed withdrawal of consent, the critical question was whether or not the treatment had been received jointly.

[112] Inevitably, Re B turns very largely on its facts. Bracewell J comprehensively rejected the man's assertions that the donation of sperm had been a casual favour and that there had been no joint enterprise to conceive a child. The man's case before the judge, it must be said, appears singularly unmeritorious, given that following the birth of the twins he had in September 1992 made a statutory declaration that he was the children's father, was named on their birth certificates as their father, and was continuing to have sexual intercourse with the woman up until a short time before insemination.

[113] An indication of the nature of Bracewell J's findings is given by the following extract ([1996] 3 FCR 697 at 701–702):

> 'I find the respondent knew of the hospital consultations, that the information relayed by the applicant was a truthful account of their common intentions and attempts to conceive despite the geographical constraints occasioned by work commitments. The respondent knew what was involved and after some initial hesitation he consented to the giving of sperm as part of a joint enterprise and he made a journey involving an air flight in order to do so. His version that there was no sex after 1989, possibly not even a meeting in 1990, and then an agreement merely as a casual favour to give sperm in the summer of 1991, makes no sense at all and I reject it. I do not find he donated as though he was an anonymous donor doing a favour which could have no repercussions for him. On the contrary, he was playing his essential role in aiding the applicant to achieve what both had been trying for, namely a pregnancy.'

[114] U v W is another case under s 28(3) of the Act, this time involving the use of donor sperm. The facts are unusual. The couple had undergone IVF treatment, unsuccessfully, in England. The man's sperm was weak. They went to Rome, where a particular doctor had developed a particular technique for implanting embryos into the uterus with a laser. The couple wanted to use the man's sperm, but when it came to the point of insertion, the doctor told them that he had fertilised 12 of the woman's eggs but that only one of them had been fertilised with the man's sperm. The couple were told that the chances of the single embryo developing successfully if implanted on its own were negligible. The couple asked for time to reflect overnight, and on the following morning agreed that the treatment should proceed using six of the embryos, one of which, of course, was from the man. The man signed a form acknowledging paternity of the unborn child. Insertion then occurred.

[115] The woman was subsequently told that the embryo which the man had fertilised had died. Three of the remaining embryos developed. However, the woman was advised that for the safety of the foetuses, the third embryo should be the subject of termination. This operation took place in England.

[116] The couple's relationship did not survive the woman's return to England. Following the birth of the twins, the mother sought financial provision for them. Two questions arose, the first of which was whether or not the couple had received treatment services together within s 23(3) of the Act.

[117] Wilson J found that they had. Having referred to Re B, the decision of the Court of Appeal in R v Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority, ex p Blood [1997] 2 All ER 687, [1999] Fam 151 the decision of Johnson J in Re Q (a minor) (parental order) [1996] 2 FCR 345 and the authority's Code of Practice, he stated ([1998] 1 FCR 526 at 539, [1998] Fam 29 at 39):

> 'I have no doubt that there is a mental element inherent in the notion of "treatment ... together" and that, if the respondent had believed at all material times that the treatment which was being provided was treatment in which his sperm alone was to be used, Dr A's treatment of the applicant with donor sperm would not have amounted to services provided for them together.'

That hypothesis, however, does not fit the facts of this case.

[118] Having then analysed the facts, he continued ([1998] 1 FCR 526 at 539–540, [1998] Fam 29 at 40):

> 'The test in s 28(3)(a) is not whether the man consented either to be deemed in law to be the father of the prospective child or to become legally responsible for him: it is whether the relevant treatment services were provided for the woman and him together. It stretches the requisite mental element in the man too far to require either form of such consent. In my view, what has to be demonstrated is that, in the provision of treatment services with donor sperm, the doctor was responding to a request for that form of treatment made by the woman and the man as a couple, notwithstanding the absence in the man of any physical role in such treatment.'

[119] Re R was also a donor insemination case. The woman had signed a consent form for IVF treatment involving egg removal, donor insemination and embryo replacement. The man countersigned the consent form acknowledging that they were being treated together and that he would become the legal father of any resulting child, pursuant to s 28(3) of the Act. Initial treatment did not result in a successful pregnancy, and the couple then separated. The woman began a relationship with a new partner. She became pregnant as a result of further treatment, carried out without the first man's knowledge, but about which he found out a few months later. After the birth of the child he applied for parental responsibility and contact orders under the Children Act 1989.

[120] Before the judge, both the Official Solicitor, who had been appointed to act for the child, and the woman conceded that the man was the child's legal father. The judge ordered indirect contact and adjourned the application for parental responsibility generally. The man was refused permission to appeal against that decision, but on the hearing of the application for permission, the court expressed concern that jurisdiction had been assumed on the basis of a concession made without proper exploration of the facts.

[121] The man then sought to clarify the situation by reinstating his application for parental responsibility and asking for consideration of his status under s 28(3) as a preliminary issue. The judge granted the respondent a declaration of paternity. The mother appealed, contending that the embryos which had resulted in the successful pregnancy had not been placed in her 'in the course of treatment services provided for her and a man together' for the purposes of s 28(3) if at the time when they had been so placed the parties had separated and the respondent had taken no part in the treatment she had then received.

[122] That argument succeeded in the Court of Appeal. It rejected the judge's analysis, which bears some resemblance to the argument advanced on this point by (Ms Evans) in the instant case. The judge had said:

> 'I am satisfied that "a course of treatment" is for the purpose of s 28(3) that which is spelled out in the consent form of the mother which her partner joins in by acknowledging the legal consequences to him. It seems to me that if circumstances change not only can either party withdraw if they so choose but that under the current Code of Practice the hospital, if informed, should bring that course of treatment to an end. If however that is not done then in my judgment the original course of treatment continues as treatment services provided to both of them together and, if a child is conceived in the course of that, the man will be the father.'

[123] The Court of Appeal rejected that interpretation, which it regarded as an unwarranted gloss on the simple words of the statute. In its view:

> 'Section 28(3) cannot mean that the man is to be treated as the legal father if at some time during the provision of treatment services for the woman they were provided for them together. Gametes and embryos can be stored for up to ten years or even longer in some circumstances. There must be a point when the question has to be judged. The simple answer is that the embryo must be placed in the mother at a time when treatment services are being provided for the woman and the man together.'

[124] The court likewise warned against treating Wilson J's statement in U v W (which I have cited at [118], above, and which it regarded as clearly correct as part of his explanation of the decision in his case) as laying down a test to be applied to all cases, since to do so would also be to add a gloss to the clear words of the section. The simple and correct approach was to rely on the clear words of the Act.

[125] In the light of these authorities, and in particular the approach of the Court of Appeal in Re R, Miss Rose puts forward a very simple argument. Neither Mr Johnston nor Mr Hadley has ever given consent to the treatment of Ms Evans or Mrs Hadley alone or with another partner. The embryos therefore cannot be used in circumstances in which both men are separated from their partners and are taking no part in any treatment services. Thus the embryos cannot be used to treat either woman within the terms of the original consents, regardless of whether such consents have been or can be varied or withdrawn. Effective consent must mean consent effective at the point at which the embryos are transferred into Ms Evans and Mrs Hadley. That consent cannot be effective if the couples are no longer being treated together.

[126] The authority's argument is supported on this point by the Secretary of State and by counsel for both Mr Johnston and Mr Hadley.

[127] In their initial skeleton argument, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn sought to meet this point by submitting that the argument of the authority and the Secretary of State gave an unwarranted meaning to the word 'together'. The Act, they argued, did not require two persons presenting for treatment together to be a 'couple'. There is merely the person giving consent and 'another specified person' (Sch 3, para 1(2)(a)). It is the fact that the one consents which means that they are treated 'together'.

[128] To test this submission, they posited the example of a person whose sole purpose is to provide a friend with sperm to fertilise her eggs. He attends the clinic, receives his medical treatment (the collection of his sperm and their use in fertilising the woman's eggs) provides moral support during this phase and perhaps during a first cycle of treatment and then, as originally intended, plays no further part. It was submitted the clinic would not look to obtain a para 2(1)(b) 'donor' consent to implantation and would not have to do so. The man's continuing consent would constitute the only but vital element to create treatment together.

[129] Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn also submitted that if Mr Hadley had separated from Mrs Hadley but maintained his existing consent, the effect of the authority's argument would be that Mrs Hadley would not be able to use the embryos despite the continued existence of the original consent: they would not be treated together during implantation. Worse, she would not be able to obtain any necessary variation of the consent if the embryos had already been 'used', whether in a selection process or in, say, tissue typing.

[130] Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn also submitted that a purposive construction of the relevant provisions produced a similar result. Necessarily, they argued, a withdrawal of consent will often attend a separation. As a consequence it was important to make the consent, not the physical separation, the decisive factor in determining whether or not two people were being treated together.

[131] In reply, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn sought to argue that even a superficial reading of Re R demonstrated that there were material differences between s 28 and Sch 3 and a potential need to interpret them differently, a point which the Court of Appeal did not have to decide: see [2003] 2 All ER 131 at [24], [2003] 2 WLR 1485 at [24] per Hale LJ. Schedule 3 provided a 'bright line' non-fact-sensitive approach, designed to protect the treating clinic. Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn sought to argue that the danger of the authority's approach was that in every case the clinic would have to ask 'are this couple together?'. The test would be utterly fact-specific, potentially requiring an investigation into the state of the relationship of every IVF couple, throughout treatment services.

Discussion and analysis

[132] I agree with Miss Rose that the various uses of the phrase 'treatment/treated together' should be consistently interpreted within the same statute, unless the statute itself makes it clear that the phrase is to be interpreted differently in differing circumstances. Moreover, I have no difficulty in applying the straightforward interpretation of the phrase given by the Court of Appeal in Re R to the system of consents required pursuant to Sch 3. In each case, it seems to me, it is a simple question of fact.

[133] In cases involving disputes as to paternity, where, by definition, embryos have been successfully transferred, the question is whether, at the moment the embryo was placed in the woman, treatment services were being provided for the woman and the man together. Where, as in the case of Ms Evans and Mr Johnston, we are concerned with embryos which have been created and are now stored, the question is whether, if Ms Evans sought to have the embryos transferred to her, that would still constitute treatment together with Mr Johnston.

[134] In my judgment, there can be only one answer to this proposition, and it is 'No'. Ms Evans and Mr Johnston were undoubtedly being treated together on 12 November 2001 when Ms Evans' eggs were harvested and fertilised by Mr Johnston's sperm. In my judgment, they remained in treatment together, notwithstanding that nothing happened, until their relationship broke down. From that point onwards it seems to me impossible to say that the couple are being treated together, or that if Ms Evans went to the clinic and asked to have the embryos inserted into her, this would be treatment of the couple together.

[135] There are, of course, elements of artificiality about the argument because, in conventional terms, the only 'treatment' undergone by Mr Johnston was the provision of his sperm. Furthermore, in the instant case, it is very difficult to divorce the fact of separation from the accompanying fact that Mr Johnston is no longer willing to give his consent to Ms Evans having the embryos transferred to her. If 'treatment together' is an issue fact, the mental element identified by Wilson J in U v W cannot be ignored.

[136] However, in the same way as the cases under s 28(3) of the Act make the critical moment for treatment together the moment when the embryos are transferred into the woman, the terms of para 6(3) of Sch 3 are equally clear and have the same underlying purpose. The latter provide that an embryo must not be used for any purpose unless both gamete providers consent to the use of the embryo for that purpose and the embryo is used in accordance with those consents. Both the cases decided under s 28(3) and the terms of para 6(3) of Sch 3 have the same underlying reality.

[137] The purpose of the treatment is the creation of a pregnancy. That pregnancy begins when the embryos are successfully transferred and implanted. It is at that moment that one looks to see if the couple are being treated together for the purposes of s 28(3). In the instant case the only material difference is that the embryos in question have been frozen. The claimants now wish to have them unfrozen and transferred into them. The question is whether or not that process would constitute treatment together. In this analysis, I see no material difference in the approach to or use of the phrase 'treatment together'. In both cases, it is an issue of fact.

[138] Furthermore, Miss Rose points out, the Act requires consideration to be given to the welfare of any unborn child, and that counselling should be offered to prospective parents. If the circumstances which were taken into account when the couple were together change dramatically, it would plainly better serve the purposes of the Act if the matter had to be reconsidered and fresh counselling offered before a further attempt at implantation was offered.

[139] I agree with that submission. It also seems to me that Miss Rose's analysis generally not only fits the scheme of the Act, but also reflects the reality. As an ongoing series of events over time, treatment together must be something which can change and, in particular, come to an end in different ways. Thus, I have no doubt that on 22 September 1999, when three fertilised embryos were placed in Mrs Hadley, that constituted treatment together within the terms of Mr Hadley's consent. They were together as a couple and were so treated. Even if they had separated after the transfer of the embryos into Mrs Hadley and before the birth of the child. Mr Hadley would have been the father of the child.

[140] However, the breakdown in the relationship between Mr and Mrs Hadley before the transfer of the remaining embryos followed by the couple's physical separation and divorce means not only that they are no longer physically together, but that the treatment which they were receiving together has come to an end, and the consent which Mr Hadley gave to being treated together with Mrs Hadley no longer applies.

[141] In my judgment, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn's argument falls into the trap identified by the Court of Appeal in Re R of providing a sophisticated gloss to essentially very simple words and an equally straightforward concept. It equally gives too little weight to the fact that treatment designed to enable a woman to give birth to a child can only be provided in accordance with the strict terms of a clinic's licence, and requires the clinic to take account of the welfare of the unborn child. The need for the clinic to have an effective, continuing consent of both gamete providers pursuant to para 6(3) of Sch 3 at all times up to the transfer of the embryo into the woman is thus critical. It is not a matter of the clinic being protected by a bright line, non-fact sensitive approach. Without effective consents, the clinic cannot lawfully use the embryos.

[142] I am reinforced in this view by the evidence of the two doctors from the respective clinics, particularly that of Dr Lockwood, who had been treating Mrs Hadley. Dr Lockwood told me that what was required was, as she put it, 'the ongoing valid consent of both parties'. In the instant case what she had was consent for treatment with a named partner. Treatment of Mrs Hadley without Mr Hadley's effective, ongoing consent would render her in breach of her licence.

[143] When cross-examined by Mr Tolson, Dr Lockwood told me that this was the first case in her experience in which there had been resistance to ongoing treatment by one of the gamete contributors. She had experience of couples separating during the course of treatment, since treatment was stressful, and could both drive couples apart as well as bring them closer together. However, she only had one or two separations every year out of some 1,500 treatments.

[144] Dr Lockwood also told me that there was nothing to stop a separating couple reaching an amicable agreement about the woman having access to the embryos, although this would not relieve the clinic of its obligations to consider the unborn child and to offer counselling. Dr Lockwood could not imagine a married couple wanting this. She would have very real concerns about asking a couple what would happen if they separated: if they wanted to discuss that option she would want to counsel them and they would have to come back for further discussion if separation occurred. In such a situation she would have to go to the authority for guidance, as it would require a whole new process: it was not possible to build it in as a contingency.

[145] Relating her evidence specifically to the situation in the case of Mr and Mrs Hadley, Dr Lockwood was clear that the situation now appertaining was not envisaged when the consents were given, and that she would not consider treatment of Mrs Hadley alone to fall within the terms of the original consent. It was for these reasons that she considered the clinic would be in breach of its licence if it treated Mrs Hadley in these circumstances.

[146] I accept the argument advanced by Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn that it would be open to a clinic to treat a separated couple where the man maintained his consent to treatment (and, presumably, his willingness to acknowledge paternity of any child born as a result of the treatment) although such a situation would be highly unusual, and I bear in mind the evidence of Dr Lockwood on the point, set out above. To treat in those circumstances, however, the clinic, in my judgment, would not only have to be positively satisfied of the man's continuing consent to the treatment, but would have to give particular attention to s 13(5). This, however, is not the situation with which I am faced.

[147] I also accept that, as a matter of reality, and as Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn submitted, separation and the withdrawal of consent to continuing treatment will usually go hand in hand. That is what has happened in the instant case. They are thus entitled to argue (because the point is being considered irrespective of whether or not the consents have in reality been withdrawn) that we are positing a consent which has not been withdrawn, and which therefore remains in existence. The point, however, remains whether or not the consent is still effective. This is, essentially, an issue of fact. The facts here are that both couples have separated, and no longer have any form of relationship with each other. In these circumstances, in my judgment, it cannot be said, as a matter of fact, that either couple in this case is still being treated together.

[148] The licensing provisions of the Act are very strict. As I have already stated, for there to be continuing 'treatment together' in circumstances in which a couple have separated, the clinic, in my judgment, would need to be satisfied that the man's consent remained effective. I accept that this places a burden on clinics, but it is one, in my judgment, which it is appropriate for them to bear. I did not get the impression that either Dr Sharp or Dr Lockwood thought such a burden inappropriate. Indeed, their evidence seemed to me to be entirely consistent with the argument being advanced by the authority and the Secretary of State. The twin pillars of the Act are effective consent to treatment and the welfare of the unborn child. Schedule 3 is critical to the operation of the Act and the process of regulation. Mr Tolson's and Miss Freeborn's interpretation of para 6(3) of Sch 3 to the Act would, I think, undermine its operation.

[149] I am very conscious of the dangers of importing an unnecessary gloss onto the simple terms of the Act. On the facts of this case, however, it is clear to me that there is no effective consent by Mr Johnston and Mr Hadley to the continuing treatment of either Ms Evans or Mrs Hadley on their own. The only consent is for treatment together, and for the reasons I have attempted to give, I do not think either couple can now be said to being treated together. I am therefore satisfied that, on this point, the argument of the authority and the Secretary of State is correct, and that the claim in each case falls at this hurdle.

THE SECOND POINT OF LAW: HAVE THE REMAINING EMBRYOS IN MRS HADLEY'S CASE BEEN 'USED' IN THE PROVISION OF TREATMENT SERVICES, SO THAT MR HADLEY'S CONSENT TO THEIR USE CANNOT BE VARIED OR WITHDRAWN?

The argument

[150] My decision on the first issue is, subject to arguments of incompatibility with and breaches of convention rights and the HRA 1998, sufficient to dispose of the case. However, I am conscious that I may be wrong on the first point, and accordingly I propose to deal with each of the points of law argued, including the question of promissory estoppel.

[151] The argument on the second point arises from the terms of paras 4(1) and (2) to Sch 3 of the Act which, again for case of reference, I will repeat:

'(1) The terms of any consent under this Schedule may from time to time be varied, and the consent may be withdrawn, by notice given by the person who gave the consent to the person keeping the gametes or embryo to which the consent is relevant.

(2) The terms of any consent to the use of any embryo cannot be varied, and such consent cannot be withdrawn, once the embryo has been used—(a) in providing treatment services, or (b) for the purposes of any project of research.'

[152] Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn devoted a considerable proportion of their opening skeleton argument to this point, and conducted an extensive analysis of the Act in an attempt to demonstrate that the term 'use' in the Act in relation to an embryo did not equate either with transfer of the embryo into the woman or with some act which changed the nature of the embryo. The essence of the argument, however, was that the stored embryos in Mrs Hadley's case were likely to have been the subject of a selection process by which they were rejected from the first attempt at implantation. It was on this selection process that counsel relied to establish the proposition that the stored embryos had been 'used in providing treatment services'.

[153] Initially, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn restricted this argument to Mrs Hadley's case, on the grounds that in her case there had been a selection process which had resulted in the selection for transfer of three of the embryos, and the storage of the remaining two. However, in their closing position statement, they submitted that the argument applied to the cases of both claimants.

[154] For the authority, Miss Rose did not submit that the 'use' of an embryo necessarily equated with its transfer into a woman. However, she once again submitted that 'use' of an embryo was a straightforward issue of fact. In the instant case, what had happened in the case of both women was that embryos had been created and then examined to ensure that they had fertilised. In Ms Evans' case they had then been stored, and in Mrs Hadley's case, three had been selected and then used: the remainder had been stored. Creation, selection, freezing and storage were not use: they were acts which were preparatory to, and necessary for use. The stored embryos had accordingly not been used.

Discussion and analysis

[155] In my judgment Miss Rose's argument on this point represents both a compelling and a common sense analysis, which clearly fits the structure and purpose of the Act. As Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn readily acknowledged, if they are right, every embryo which has been created, examined and then frozen will have been 'used' with the result that para 4(1) and (2) of Sch 3 would be redundant. It would simply not be possible for a gamete provider to withdraw consent. Such a construction runs so counter to the consent provisions of the Act that I would only be able to contemplate it if the statutory language drove me to it. For the reasons I have already given, it does not.

[156] The only case cited to me in which the question of the 'use' of an embryo as anything other than placing the embryo is a woman was the decision of the Court of Appeal in Quintavalle (tissue typing) [2003] 3 All ER 257, [2003] 3 WLR 878. This is an extremely important case, although it is on a quite different point from that with which I am concerned. The question in Quintavalle (tissue typing) was whether or not tissue typing of an embryo to exclude the hereditary disease beta thalassaemia major (the disease) came within the definition of treatment services in s 2(1) of the Act as being 'for the purpose of assisting women to carry children'. a

[157] The facts can be shortly summarised. Mr and Mrs Hashmi had a child (Zain) with the disease. Mrs Hashmi had a genetic predisposition to producing children with the disease. Mr and Mrs Hashmi wanted to have another child, but wanted also to be certain that not only did that child not carry the disease, but b that the child would have tissue which matched Zain's, thereby enabling Zain's condition to be cured by a transplant of stem cells.

[158] As described by Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR (at [4]) this process involved the following stages:

> '(i) The fertilisation "in vitro" (IVF) of a number of eggs taken from Mrs c Hashmi with sperm taken from her husband to form embryos. (ii) The removal from the developing embryo of a single cell by a biopsy. (iii) The examination of that cell using molecular genetics to see whether the embryo carried the beta thalassaemia disease. This process is commonly described as "Pre-implantation Genetic Diagnosis" (PGD). (iv) Use simultaneously of d the same process to identify whether the embryo had the same tissue type as Zain. Because this process involves examination of proteins known as human leukocyte antigens (HLA), this form of PGD is described as "HLA typing". I shall refer to it by the more popular phrase of "tissue typing". (v) Jettison of embryos found by this analysis to be either disease bearing or of a different HLA type to Zain and the implantation in the womb of Mrs e Hashmi of an embryo shown to be disease free and of the same HLA as Zain.'

[159] The authority granted a licence for the process described in the preceding paragraph. The lawfulness of the licence was then challenged by judicial review. Before the judge, the question identified in the final sentence of f para [156] was broken down into two parts, namely (1) did genetic analysis of a cell taken from an embryo involve the 'use' of an embryo, and (2) was genetic analysis for the purpose of tissue typing necessary or desirable for the purpose of providing treatment services?

[160] The first question arose because the authority submitted before the judge that tissue typing did not require a licence since it was performed on a cell g extracted from an embryo rather than the embryo itself. The authority accepted that the removal from the developing embryo of a single cell by a biopsy (stage (ii) as set out at [158], above) was 'use', but submitted that testing the cell thereafter did not constitute such use. The case for the applicant before the judge was that tissue typing did constitute use of an embryo and therefore required a h licence. The judge found against the authority on this point.

[161] In the Court of Appeal the focus of the argument shifted. It became common ground that the removal from the developing embryo of a single cell by a biopsy constituted use of the embryo, and the authority did not pursue its argument that tissue typing did not require a licence. The question became j whether the process was treatment 'for the purpose of assisting a woman to carry a child'. The Court of Appeal held that it was.

[162] In his judgment, Mance LJ (at [110]–[111]) expressly distinguished between the biopsy and the subsequent examination of the embryonic cell material. He took the view that the judge had been wrong to hold the latter to be 'use' of the embryo. However, what mattered was that the entire process required a licence, and the question was, accordingly, whether the process complied with the terms of the Act.

[163] The relevance of Quintavalle (tissue typing) for my purposes is that the authority accepts that the 'use' of an embryo is not limited to its transfer into a woman. Miss Rose did not resile from the authority's acceptance in Quintavalle (tissue typing) that the removal from the developing embryo of a single cell by biopsy constituted 'use'. She maintained her position, however, that in the instant case there had been no such biopsy, and no 'use' of the embryos. All that had happened in the cases of both Ms Evans and Mrs Hadley was that the embryos had been created, examined and stored. Three of Mrs Hadley's embryos had been used (transferred into her) the remaining two had been examined and stored. The latter had not been used. On the same basis, none of Ms Evans' embryos had been used.

[164] Consequent upon their extensive review of the legislation, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn submitted that the concept of using embryos must be found in the other activities there listed, including Sch 2, para 1(d) 'practices designed to secure that embryos are in a suitable condition to be placed in a woman or to determine whether embryos are suitable for that purpose'. With respect, I do not think this advances the argument. Paragraph 1(d) of Sch 2 is equally apt to describe the process of examination and selection prior to use. Indeed, in my judgment, this is what, in the context of this case, it is describing.

[165] In my judgment, this is a simple point, and another issue of fact. The language of the Act is clear, and in the context of this case, 'use' can only mean the transfer into either claimant. In my judgment, therefore, none of the frozen embryos in this case has been 'used in providing treatment services' within Sch 3, para 4(2) and there is no impediment to Mr Johnston and Mr Hadley withdrawing their consent on this ground.

THE CLAIMS UNDER THE HUMAN RIGHTS ACT 1998

Introduction

[166] My conclusions so far mean that both claims must fail unless in some material respects the claimants' rights under the convention are engaged and breached or, in Ms Evans' case that the doctrine of promissory estoppel prevents Mr Johnston withdrawing his consent to treatment. I will deal with the arguments under the convention first, as the existence or otherwise of breaches of convention rights and the compliance or otherwise of the Act with the convention may well be material factors in the estoppel argument.

[167] I regard this part of the case as being the most important, since, as my decisions on 'use' and 'treatment together' demonstrate, both the language and the purpose of the legislation itself seem to me very clear. The structure of regulation and licensing contained in the Act; the definition of treatment services and the clear terms of Sch 3 relating to consent do not seem to me capable of more than one interpretation. The question therefore is whether they breach the claimants' convention rights.

[168] The proper approach to this question, as identified by Lord Steyn in R v A [2001] UKHL 25 at [37], [2001] 3 All ER 1 at [37], [2002] 1 AC 45 is, firstly, to consider whether the legislation interferes with a convention right: if it does, then it is at the stage of justification that legislative purpose or intent becomes relevant, and the principle of proportionality will be applied.

[169] The bulk of the argument under the convention has, unsurprisingly, centred on art 8, although the claimants assert that arts 2, 12 (Ms Evans only) and 14 are also engaged. The argument on art 8 ranged very widely, principally, I think, because Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn sought to set up a positive obligation on the state to allow Ms Evans to have the embryos created by her and Mr Johnston released from storage and transferred into her. This led Mr Coppel, for the Secretary of State to set out in considerable detail the law on positive and negative obligations, as well as providing, with the assistance of Mr Webb (an official in the Department of Health whose evidence I record at [186]–[188], below) a comprehensive rationale of the policy considerations underlying the Act. Inevitably, in dealing with these arguments I will be selective of the points which most impressed me. I will, however, need to set out the material in some detail.

[170] I am assuming for this part of the argument that the case is proceeding on the basis that the consents given by Mr Johnston and Mr Hadley have been withdrawn, not that the consents originally given no longer have any effect because neither couple is any longer being treated together.

[171] In their opening skeleton argument, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn formulated the human rights issues in the following way. (1) Would it be unlawful in terms of the convention for the court to bar implantation and/or continued storage of the embryos? (2) If it would, does the Act require that the court bar implantation and/or storage; or can the Act be read and given effect to in a way which is compatible with the convention (ss 3(1) and 6(2) of the HRA 1998)?

[172] Counsel went on to argue that if the Act could not be read as convention compatible, a declaration of incompatibility should be made. For this purpose, the relevant provisions of the Act which they sought to have declared incompatible were: s 12(c) (the condition of any licence granted under the Act that Sch 3 shall be complied with); and paras 6(3) (no use of embryos without effective consent of both parties); 8(2) (consent by both parties to storage) and 4(1) (power to vary or withdraw terms of any consent) of Sch 3.

[173] I propose to deal with the articles of the convention relied upon in numerical order.

Article 2: the right to life

[174] I can, I think, deal with this submission quite shortly. The first nine words of art 2 read: 'Everyone's right to life shall be protected by law.' Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn accepted that an embryo is not a human life. They submitted, however, that it has a sufficiently 'special' status to attract what they describe as a 'qualified' right to life. Two aspects of that limited, qualified right were: (1) to continue in being whilst one or other of the gamete providers wished; and (2) to be available for implantation if its mother wished.

[175] Although the argument was developed with considerable ingenuity over several pages of Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn's skeleton argument, I am quite unable to accept that art 2 is engaged in this case. Counsel's proper concession that an embryo is not a human life seems to me fatal to the engagement of art 2. There is no direct authority on the point in relation to embryos, but there is abundant domestic authority, binding on me, that a foetus, at whatever stage of its development, has no existence independent of its mother. If a foetus has no right to life under art 2, it is difficult to see how an embryo can have such a right.

[176] Two citations will suffice. In Re F (in utero) [1988] 2 All ER 193, [1988] Fam 122 a local authority tried to make foetus a ward of court, in order to protect it against its mother's damaging lifestyle. The attempt failed. Counsel for the local authority sought to rely on art 2, although it was not of course at that point incorporated into English law. Balcombe LJ dealt with art 2 in the following way ([1988] 2 All ER 193 at 199, [1988] Fam 122 at 142):

> '(Counsel for the local authority) also sought to rely on art 2(1) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Rome, 4 November 1950; TS 71(1953); Cmd 8969): "Everyone's right to life shall be protected by law." However, in Paton v UK (1980) 3 EHRR 408, on a complaint by the unsuccessful plaintiff in Paton v Trustees of BPAS the European Commission of Human Rights ruled that on its true construction art 2 is apt only to apply to persons already born and cannot apply to a foetus (at 413 (para 8)). They continued (at 415):
>
> "The 'life' of the foetus is intimately connected with, and cannot be regarded in isolation from, the life of the pregnant woman. If article 2 were held to cover the foetus and its protection under this article were, in the absence of any express limitation, seen as absolute, an abortion would have to be considered as prohibited even where the continuance of the pregnancy would involve a serious risk to the life of the pregnant woman. This would mean that the 'unborn life' of the foetus would be regarded as being of a higher value than the life of the pregnant woman. The 'right to life' of a person already born would thus be considered as subject not only to the express limitations mentioned in para. 8 above but also to a further, implied, limitation."
>
> Thus, far from assisting (counsel's) submission, art 2 of the convention, as interpreted by the European Commission, is in my judgment against him.'

[177] Balcombe LJ added a warning, recently reinforced by Butler-Sloss LJ (as she then was) in one of the cases dealing with the autonomy over her body of a woman in labour who refused a caesarean section. In Re MB (an adult: medical treatment) [1997] 2 FCR 541 at 561 she said:

> 'The law is, in our judgment, clear that a competent woman who has the capacity to decide may, for religious reasons, other reasons, or for no reasons at all, choose not to have medical intervention, even though, as we have already stated, the consequence may be the death or serious handicap of the child she bears or her own death. She may refuse to consent to the anaesthesia injection in the full knowledge that her decision may significantly reduce the chance of her unborn child being born alive. The foetus up to the moment of birth does not have any separate interests capable of being taken into account when a court has to consider an application for a declaration in respect of a Caesarian section operation.'

We respectfully agree with Balcombe LJ in Re F who also considered the possibility of the court being asked to order delivery of the baby by caesarean section. He said ([1988] 2 All ER 193 at 200–201, [1988] Fam 122 at 144):

> 'If Parliament were to think it appropriate that a pregnant woman should be subject to controls for the benefit of her unborn child, then doubtless it will stipulate the circumstances in which such controls may be applied and the safeguards appropriate for mother's protection. In such a sensitive field, affecting as it does the liberty of the individual, it is not for the judiciary to extend the law.'

[178] A foetus, of course, exists only within the womb of its mother. She has autonomy over her body and over the foetus. An embryo created by IVF exists initially outside the womb, and so far as the Act governs the creation of an embryo, it applies only to embryos created outside the human body—see s 1(2). There is no property in an embryo, but in contrast to a foetus, both gamete donors have an interest in, and rights over, the embryos they have created. Those rights are governed by the Act. The embryo, however, cannot be considered a person, or to have a 'qualified' right to life. The introduction of art 2 into the argument is, in my judgment, an unhelpful diversion from the important issues raised in the case.

[179] I would not, however, want it to be thought by my rejection of the argument that art 2 is engaged that I regard the fate of embryos created by IVF as an insignificant question. To the contrary, it is one of the most important questions posed by the Act. It is simply that art 2 is the wrong medium to address it. Embryos created through IVF self-evidently contain life in an embryonic form. The questions are how those embryos should be treated; when and in what circumstances they can be stored; when for what purposes they can be used; and when they should be allowed to perish. The fact that they have no independent right to life does not either diminish the importance of these questions or mean that they are not fully addressed by the Act.

ARTICLE 8: THE RIGHT TO RESPECT FOR PRIVATE AND FAMILY LIFE

Is art 8 engaged?

[180] The next article upon which reliance is placed is art 8. As is well known, this provides:

> '1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.
>
> 2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.'

[181] The first question which arises on the facts is whether or not art 8 is engaged at all. There is, in my judgment no 'family' life engaged here. The four adults are living separate lives, and—for reasons which are, I hope clear from my discussion of art 2—an embryo is not a person or an individual with rights under the convention.

[182] However, each of the four protagonists has a right to respect for his or her private life, and although the private and the family elements of life are conjoined in the article, each, plainly, can reflect a distinct area of life. In my judgment, therefore, the wishes of Ms Evans and Mrs Hadley to continue with IVF treatment and to have the embryos released from storage and transferred into them engage their right to respect for their private lives under art 8, which is also engaged by Mr Johnson's and Mr Hadley's opposition to that course.

Is there an interference with the right to respect for private life in this case?

[183] I do not regard this as an altogether straightforward question, but in the end I am persuaded that, having engaged in the consensual process of IVF treatment, including the consensual creation and storage of the embryos, it is open to Ms Evans and Mrs Hadley to argue that the provisions of Sch 3 which permit their former partners to refuse to allow them access to the embryos for the purpose of transfer into them can properly be said to be an interference by the state with their right to respect for their private lives.

[184] Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn describe this as the 'male veto', which they argue is both unwarranted and disproportionate. It is, however, I think worth bearing in mind at the outset of the argument that the right to respect for private life applies equally to both Mr Johnston and Mr Hadley. An unfettered right on the claimants' part to have the embryos transferred into them would, by parity of reasoning, constitute an interference with respect of the men's art 8 rights, in the same way that any attempt on their part to insist that the claimants have the embryos transferred into them against their will would undoubtedly constitute an interference both with the claimants' right to autonomy over their own bodies, and with respect for their private lives.

[185] As, following R v A, the issue of legislative policy is now raised, and as the question of the Act's compliance with the convention seems to me a matter of general public importance, I propose to approach it by setting out, firstly, a summary of the evidence filed by the Secretary of State on the issue; secondly by setting out in some detail the way in which the case was advanced for the claimants, and then by examining the arguments of the Secretary of State before turning to the defences of Mr Johnston and Mr Hadley.

The evidence filed on behalf of the Secretary of State

[186] Evidence on behalf of the Secretary of State was filed by Mr Edward Webb, head of the section in the Department of Health that has responsibility for policy on assisted conception and embryology. Mr Webb set out the legislative history of the Act in some detail, with particular reference to the White Paper and the parliamentary progress of the Bill. He then identified a number of particular policy considerations underlying the consent regime contained in Sch 3 to the Act. I summarise them as: (1) the female right of self-determination in relation to a pregnancy; (2) the primacy of consent accorded in the modern age to the need for freely given and informed consent to medical interventions; (3) the period over which IVF takes place; (4) the special significance of parenthood; (5) the interests of the child; (6) equality of treatment between the parties; (7) the promotion of the efficacy and use of IVF and related techniques; and (8) clarity and certainty in the relations between partners.

[187] Having briefly discussed each of these policy issues, Mr Webb adds:

> 'Once it was decided in principle that it would be appropriate to legislate in this field, and to enshrine within legislation the principle of consent to treatment services, it was, in the Secretary of State's view, entirely legitimate, and consistent with the underlying objective, to favour clear or 'bright line' rules which serve to produce certainty in all cases, and do not depend upon the circumstances of individual cases. Therefore, it was considered appropriate to permit male partners to withdraw their consent to treatment services prior to the use of an embryo in all cases, rather than to make that permission dependent upon the facts of the individual case: the circumstances, financial and otherwise, of the male, and of his partner or ex-partner, whether she was already a mother, whether she would be able to have recourse to IVF in the future, etc. A fact-sensitive rule would, in this situation, give rise only to uncertainty and to litigation. The fact that the present cases are perhaps the first major example of litigation between parties to IVF treatment (in contrast to the US, where there are several examples) demonstrates the success of the Act in regulating this very sensitive area. The position of the claimants is undoubtedly deserving of sympathy, but the consequences of Sch 3 in an individual case cannot, in the Secretary of State's view, negate the legitimacy and the legality of the policy of adopting clear rules which can govern all cases.'

[188] In construing the Act, I not only have regard, of course, to the HRA 1998, s 3(1) which requires me, so far as it is possible to do so, to read and give effect to the Act in a way which is compatible with convention rights; I also respectfully adopt the approach set out in the speech of Lord Bingham of Cornhill in Quintavalle CNR [2003] 2 All ER 113 at [8], [2003] 2 WLR 692 at [8], which I have already set out at [18], above.

The case for Ms Evans and Mrs Hadley under art 8

[189] In relation to 'interference', Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn argued that the interference begins when the state permits treatment by the clinics only on terms that a withdrawal of consent by the male partner in the future is conclusive and continues during any effective prohibition on treatment as a result of the terms of the licensing regime. In the alternative, they argued that until the point at which the partners withdraw consent, the state has permitted both claimants to develop their private and family lives as they, and their partners, saw fit. The state had licensed (and not banned) an assisted conception regime which met the claimants' needs. Accordingly, there had been no interference. However, interference occurred when the state require the clinics not to treat on the withdrawal of consent by the male partners.

[190] Strict rules of interpretation applied to the phrase 'necessary in a democratic society for the protection of ... morals, or ... the rights and freedoms of others'. The criteria must be understood in such a way that the language is not extended beyond its ordinary meaning. Furthermore, the phrase 'necessary in a democratic society' meant that there had to be a 'pressing social need' for the restriction in question; the restriction had to correspond to that need; as a response the restriction had to be proportionate (ie do no more than is necessary); and the reasons advanced by the state had to be relevant and sufficient. It was, moreover, for the state to establish the pressing social need and the proportionality of the response.

[191] Applying these principles, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn summarised the argument by submitting that it was not necessary to impose a power of veto, applicable in all circumstances, over an embryo to the male gamete provider so as to prevent implantation. To do so excluded all consideration of the female's interest and investment in the embryo, the interests of the embryo and the interests of what counsel described as the 'pro-life' argument. Most importantly, they argued, it did not recognise the possibility of hard cases in an area in which there are bound to be such.

[192] So far as storage was concerned, there was no significant disadvantage to continuing storage whilst one of the gamete providers wished it and respect for the embryo and the gamete provider's 'investment', wishes and feelings required it.

[193] Whilst inviting the court to note that there are a number of states which do not legislate at all in this area (which, it was submitted, should prompt a cautious approach to any plea by the United Kingdom to 'necessity'), Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn accepted that in licensing human fertilisation and embryology there would be a generous margin of appreciation as to the means permitted to a state which seeks to balance public and private interests (and competing private interests) in this area by a legislative regime. They acknowledged that no one licensing scheme would be required by the European jurisprudence. What amounts to a 'pressing social need' domestically was, within the margin of appreciation, for the state to judge—as was the choice of means to address that need.

[194] Consequently, the claimants could and did concede that it was legitimate for a state to conclude (as the United Kingdom had concluded) that there were necessary interferences in this general area. The first was that a state permitted assisted conception. Having taken that step, a state might legitimately conclude that a number of matters required restrictions—for example, ensuring standards of treatment and record-keeping; limiting research; prohibiting cloning; and limiting the numbers of children born to any one gamete provider. The state might also choose to limit the 'age' of the embryo—both 'fresh' (in the United Kingdom by the 14-day primitive streak period) and 'frozen' (in the United Kingdom by the ten-year storage period). All these were areas in which the state might interfere.

[195] Narrowing the focus, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn submitted that the state might legitimately identify a need to balance the freedom to procreate against the freedom not to procreate. For example, the state should no more require a male to provide sperm to father a child than it should require a female to provide the egg, or to become pregnant. The consent of the gamete provider must be required, no matter how deserving the partner.

[196] However, they submitted, the issue central to Ms Evans' case had a still narrower compass. It did not concern the lawfulness of a licensing scheme in general; or even the lawfulness of requiring consent. It concerned the circumstances in which consent already given could be withdrawn to the use of embryos lawfully created for the purposes of having a child. It was in this context, and not in any wider area, that the necessity for a particular set of rules must be examined. Thus, it was submitted, respect for both (i) the couple's private rights; and, (ii) the embryo, produce very different requirements once an embryo has been created.

[197] Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn argued that before reaching this area of 'state interference', a couple will have moved through many of the areas in which they acknowledged the state had a legitimate reason to balance public and private interests (and a wide margin of appreciation as to means) to an area which they described as 'more personal' and in which they submitted there was a lesser public interest. They will have attended a state-licensed clinic which complies with treatment standards, they will have provided relevant consents and produced no more than the maximum number of embryos.

[198] What all couples will in fact have done is to take a personal decision to have their children in a particular way—a decision made all the more personal because it will have been forced upon them in what will always be difficult circumstances. Their personal circumstances will vary, as would (absent state control) the arrangements made between them as to precisely how (ie on what terms) they wished to be treated. Properly characterised, whilst there may be a public interest in balancing the private interests in the embryo, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn submitted that there was no public interest as such in embryos created in these circumstances being permitted to perish.

[199] In whatever other areas there may be 'huge practical and ethical difficulties' (see, for example, Centre for Reproductive Medicine v U [2002] All ER (D) 213 (Apr) at [24]) Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn submitted there were none here which required state interference to resolve in favour of a veto for the male gamete provider—recalling that it is not enough for the state to say that there is another point of view; it must demonstrate that its existing rules are necessary.

[200] Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn then addressed Mr Webb's evidence. The first point was 'the female right of self-determination in pregnancy'. They agreed that the biological and social reality which lies behind the science, or which the science attempts to mimic, was important as a guide to the nature of the public interest and any balance. However, it pointed, they argued, to a different conclusion. During sexual intercourse, the male will have a role in fertilising the egg (and a free choice as to whether to attempt to do so or not), and a role in raising any child born. But in between, the fate of the embryo lies with the female. Before IVF, no male had ever been able by lawful means to prevent a female from developing and in due course giving birth to her embryo if she wished to do so. In any event, the Act did not promote 'the right of the male to withdraw consent ... at the point of transfer' as Mr Webb claimed: moreover 'use' of an embryo in providing treatment services could occur well before this point, as Quintavalle (tissue typing) demonstrated.

[201] As to the primacy of consent, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn submitted that if the primacy of consent means anything it was that the parties should be free to consent on the terms that they wished, not those imposed upon them by the state. This was not a question of a consent to medical intervention: Mr Johnston had consented to all the treatment which he needed to receive and he had received that treatment.

[202] As to the length of time over which IVF treatment can be given, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn accepted that because of this it was important for the law to offer the power to a male to change his mind. But it was important not to refuse him the power to do anything else. If a man wished to reassure a woman whom he loved that her embryos would always be available for her then why should he not be free to do so because of the 'primacy of consent'? Mr Webb argued that it would be undesirable and unfair to insist on holding a male to his consent. Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn submitted that fairness pointed in a quite different direction in Ms Evans' case.

[203] As to the special significance of parenthood, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn argued that it was a commonplace for a child to be born against its father's wishes. As to the welfare of the child, the interests of any child to be born—or the interests of the embryo if any—pointed in only one direction—birth. Whilst it could be argued that a child may have a right not to be born (for example a severely congenitally disabled embryo) no such argument applied here. The state was permitted to interfere in situations which were 'potentially damaging' for the living child only in strictly defined circumstances—see Pt IV of the Children Act 1989. Was it to be suggested that the state has a policy to prevent a child being born because its father did not wish it where there is no suggestion that that child is likely to suffer (at least) significant harm?

[204] Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn submitted there was no legitimate public interest in whether a given male fathers a child or not, other than the public financial interest in who will provide for the child born. The power of the clinic to consider the welfare of the child under s 13(5) of the Act (which counsel described as itself of dubious validity) is more than enough protection for that public interest which, in the modern United Kingdom ought in any event to count for little.

[205] As to equality of treatment between the parties, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn submitted that it did not follow that because a woman could not be compelled to be impregnated with an embryo, a man should not be held to his consent to permit her to be impregnated. The more important argument, they submitted, was the following. A man should be free to withdraw his consent if he wished for the reasons advanced by Mr Webb. But if he, at least, can give an irrevocable consent he should be free to do so. It will always be apparent to the man that in doing so, there could be no quid pro quo from the woman because it will be impossible to require her to submit to the medical treatment necessary for implantation. There is a natural imbalance here which it would be artificial for the law to try to correct.

[206] As to clarity and certainty in relations between partners, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn submitted that there was a great danger in 'bright line' rules in the area of private and family life. It was an area in which individual circumstances will vary greatly and where any policy in the law should, at the very least, be capable of admitting of exceptions. In any event a number of points in particular should be made. First, a freedom to agree an irrevocable consent is clear and 'bright line' enough. Secondly (to anticipate the argument on 'storage') a rule which provided that there should be continued storage of embryos already created with consent unless both gamete providers determined otherwise was every bit as 'bright line' as the present law. Thirdly, however 'bright line' a law may be, if it contravenes any individual's human rights then it cannot be maintained. Fourthly, certainty did not make a bad law better.

[207] As a guide to how arbitrary the Sch 3 requirement was, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn submitted that it drew no relevant distinction between the sperm of a partner and the sperm of an anonymous donor. It permitted the sperm donor to act on a whim by withdrawing his consent before 'use', no matter what the circumstances of the woman whose eggs had been fertilised. It appeared to make no allowance for irrevocable consent even in this context. This was the case notwithstanding that, if the donor maintained his consent he was not as a matter of law the father of the child (s 28(6) of the Act).

[208] Counsel submitted that Ms Evans' case was stark enough, but if the sperm used had been donor sperm the position would raise other different and in their own way starker points. Assuming that all young victims of ovarian or similar cancers would at least be offered the opportunity to store fertilised eggs, the present position on the consent of the male gamete provider left them very vulnerable indeed. Counsel submitted that it was a bad law which would permit a donor to deprive a young cancer victim from bearing a child from an embryo fertilised with his sperm when he might do so for no good reason, or no reason at all and perhaps years after he had made the donation (for which he might have been paid).

[209] There were, however, two more fundamental objections to the policy arguments advanced on behalf of the Secretary of State. First, assuming there was some merit in the policies identified, none addressed the question of proportionality. An interference, even on permitted grounds, must be proportionate in art 8 terms. In present circumstances, counsel submitted this requires, at least, that cases such as Ms Evans are recognised. More may be required, but what proportionality outlawed was the absolute nature of the present structure in Sch 3.

[210] To adopt the narrowest submission of all which would still permit Ms Evans to succeed, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn argued that if the state adopted any policy making continuing consent necessary, it must also admit of exceptions in cases such as hers. Whilst certainty and clarity in public policy terms were acceptable in the area of issues where the state is legitimately involved, such policies must permit/include a consideration of the specific features of any given case so that it can be determined whether an exception should be made.

[211] Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn accepted that polices had been upheld where sufficient regard was paid to the individual facts of the case. They cited the challenge in R (on the application of Mellor) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] EWCA Civ 472, [2001] 2 FCR 153, [2002] QB 13. The Prison Service policy on not granting artificial insemination facilities to prisoners unless there were exceptional circumstances was upheld as each request was considered on its merits and a highly subjective assessment was undertaken.

[212] By contrast, they submitted that successful challenges had been made in respect of prison policies of separating mothers and babies in prison in R (on the application of CD) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2003] EWHC 155 (Admin), [2003] 1 FLR 979 and R (P) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, R (Q) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] EWCA Civ 1151, [2001] 3 FCR 416, [2001] 1 WLR 2002. In the latter the Court of Appeal had emphasised (at [78]) that convention law required of a general rule that its application to a particular case must be considered to determine whether in that particular case the interference is proportionate to the particular legitimate aim being pursued.

[213] The same considerations, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn submitted, had been applied in relation to the treatment of transsexuals in R v North West Lancashire Health Authority, ex p A [2000] 2 FCR 525, [2000] 1 WLR 977, where a policy was not enforceable which failed to take account of individual assessment with due recognition of exceptional circumstances capable of constituting an overriding clinical need. They also relied upon the successful challenge to policy re transsexuals in Goodwin v UK [2002] 2 FCR 577, where the Department of Social Security's policy in relation to the marking of records and the issue of only one National Insurance number was held to be a breach of art 8. Likewise, the issuing of certificates by the Secretary of State for the Home Department in relation to disclosure of information held by the Security Services was held in Baker v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] EWHC Admin 381 to be an interference with art 8 that was too all encompassing to be proportionate.

[214] Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn also pointed out that the European Court of Human Rights was equally concerned to ensure that any policy applied to asylum seekers, for example, was applied with sufficient regard for the individual facts and not inflexibly—see Jabari v Turkey (2000) 9 BHRC 1.

[215] Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn accordingly submitted that any policy in relation to assisted conception and consent must have the same regard for exceptional, individual circumstances to comply with the convention as interwoven with domestic jurisprudence.

[216] The second objection to the argument advanced on behalf of the Secretary of State was that it did not address the wording or particular requirements of art 8. The state must show necessity on the specific grounds set out in art 8(2). In present circumstances the interference must be necessary for 'the protection of ... morals or ... the rights and freedoms of others'.

[217] Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn argued that in the case of Ms Evans (and depending, of course, on the facts found by the court) there was no protection for 'morals' in denying her the chance of motherhood. Mr Johnston's 'freedom' not to procreate was so restricted by his decision to permit Ms Evans to use his sperm (and further by his reassurance in whatever terms it was given) that it would be offensive for the state to protect it. This was his (not the state's or the public's) freedom and he, effectively, chose to exercise it in a particular way. Furthermore, there was no pressing social need to prevent Ms Evans attempting to have a child. Just because there may be a pressing social need in other cases to prevent implantation without consent did not mean that Ms Evans' human rights have not been infringed. Consequently, it was not necessary, counsel submitted, for the state to prevent the clinic treating Ms Evans by implanting the embryos.

[218] Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn acknowledged that in Mrs Hadley's case there was much more of a balance to be made. The court would recognise her lesser 'interest' and 'investment' in the embryos. There was no estoppel argument in her case. However, for so long as the clinic is or may be willing to treat, then if the 'veto' is not a necessary state interference Mrs Hadley should be entitled to rely on the clinic's discretion.

[219] As to the storage of the embryos, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn submitted that the focus for 'necessity' was narrower still in this area and the issue very different from implantation. Embryos were on any view 'special' and deserved special protection under the law. That was the rationale of the Act. They are different from mere property. 'Specialness' alone would be a good reason not to give a veto over continued storage to one gamete provider alone. There were, however, other reasons. Mr Johnston and Mr Hadley had already changed their mind once. They may do so again. If the status quo is continued they would be able to do so. If the embryos have been permitted to perish, they will not.

[220] Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn submitted that none of Mr Webb's comments concerning prejudice to the male gamete provider, or the welfare of the child to be born applied to this part of the argument. The embryos could continue in storage without affecting the position of the male gamete providers at all (provided the women agreed to pay the cost of storage). The emotions of the party against storage on contemplating the continued existence of the embryos, though valid, must be weighed against the emotions of the party who did not want to see the demise of the embryos. Permitting the embryos to perish was offensive to the claimants, as it would no doubt be offensive to the pro-life lobby.

[221] So far as the public interest in this area is concerned, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn submitted there was a clear interest in the law being fair and being seen to be fair. It was submitted that in present circumstances fairness between the parties (ignoring the embryos for this purpose) pointed to Ms Evans being treated and to Mrs Hadley at least being able to secure the continued storage of her embryos. To risk a blunt submission, it was difficult to think of examples in domestic law in which the law permitted the destruction even of mere property on the whim of one of two co-owners. It would not do so in the case of a family pet.

[222] Accordingly, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn submitted that the law should not grant a veto to the male gamete provider to prevent continued storage. However, the claimants did not have to put their case so high: the submission was simply that there is no necessity for such an interference in the claimants' private lives.

[223] As to the history of the legislation, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn submitted that the veto on continued storage was not suggested by Warnock nor the subsequent Green Paper, nor the White Paper. It simply appeared in the Bill. It also appeared to be contrary to the eighth principle set out in the Report of the Ad Hoc Committee of Experts on Progress in the Biomedical Sciences as relied on by Mr Webb 'the destination of embryos stored for the use of a couple for procreation but not used by them may be decided upon only with the consent of both members of the couple' (my emphasis). In other words, absent agreement the status quo continued.

[224] The defendants' case, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn argued, was that the regime 'strikes a reasonable and proportionate balance between the interests of each of the parties to a disagreement as to the future of an embryo, and of any child who may be born as a result of the use of that embryo'. In short, the regime was said to be within the margin of appreciation. Counsel submitted that in fact the Sch 3 scheme on consents was not a balance of the interests of the parties in the embryos at all. If the male gamete provider did not consent, there would be no treatment. As to the interests of the child who may be born, no child will ever be born.

[225] On positive obligations, the need for the state to take positive action in this area sprang from the concept of 'effective' respect for private and family life: see Marckx v Belgium (1979) 2 EHRR 330 at 342 (para 31): 'When the State determines in its domestic legal system the regime applicable to certain family ties such as those between an unmarried mother and her child it must act in a manner calculated to allow those concerned to lead a normal family life.' Reference was also made to Airey v Ireland (1979) 2 EHRR 305 at paras 32 and 33.

[226] Here, counsel submitted, the state had implemented a licensing regime which restricted the freedom of medical professionals and individuals to treat and be treated. It did so in an area in which the principal effect will be upon private and family life. It was therefore incumbent upon the state in doing so to act in such a way that its restrictions—whatever they may be—continued to provide effective respect for that private and family life. There could be no effective respect unless (i) it was possible for Ms Evans to be implanted with her embryos in the circumstances in which she found herself; and/or (ii) both women could secure the continued storage of their embryos.

[227] As to implantation, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn submitted that it was an essential feature of private and family life that personal circumstances may vary greatly. It was an area in which choice and freedom of action are to be maintained where possible, precisely because a dogmatic inflexible approach by the state may produce great hardship. Therefore, at the very least in Ms Evans' case the policy of the law must admit of exceptions. If it did not, there was no effective respect for the difficult situations and hard cases which may arise.

[228] As to storage, the disadvantages of continued storage were so few and the arguments for respect of the embryo so great that it was submitted there could be no effective respect for private or family life in a system which permits unilateral decisions to permit to perish at all, still less unilateral decisions to permit to perish without regard to the circumstances.

The argument for the Secretary of State

[229] Mr Coppel began by identifying the well-established distinction in the Strasbourg case law between the negative obligations of the state not to take action which restricts convention rights, and positive obligations, which may require the state to take positive action so as to promote convention rights. He gave as examples Gaskin v UK (1989) 12 EHRR 36 and X v Netherlands (1985) 8 EHRR 235. He argued that the distinction between positive and negative obligations under art 8 was important for two reasons. Firstly, positive obligations arose under art 8(1), and if they had been breached, there was no question of justification under art 8(2) although the factors enumerated in relation to justification under art 8(2) would be relevant to the question of whether any positive obligations arise at all.

[230] Secondly, he argued, contracting states were accorded a particularly broad margin of appreciation when assessing the extent to which art 8 creates positive obligations on the state to take action. For this proposition he cited Abdulaziz v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 471 at 497 (para 67); and Botta v Italy (1998) 4 BHRC 81 at 88 (para 34).

[231] Mr Coppel argued that the issues raised by the Act were a classic example of an area of controversy where the courts would be reluctant to question the approach adopted by the legislature. Hence, in Quintavalle CNR, Lord Bingham of Cornhill had noted the strong views on both sides of the debate surrounding IVF and held that the merits of the approach adopted by Parliament in the Act were not a matter for the House of Lords in its judicial capacity: see [2003] 2 All ER 113 at [12], [13], [2003] 2 WLR 692 at [12], [13], which I have set out at [17], above. Similarly, he argued, in R (on the application of Assisted Reproduction and Gynaecology Centre) v Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority [2002] EWCA Civ 20, [2003] 1 FCR 266, a case in which both common law and convention claims were made, the Court of Appeal was concerned only to ensure that the authority had made a rational decision and would not trespass any further into the merits of that decision (see, in particular, para [65] of the judgment of the court).

[232] Mr Coppel submitted that the position is no different under the HRA 1998. He relied on the classic statement of principle regarding the discretionary area of judgment—the domestic equivalent of the margin of appreciation—in the speech of Lord Hope of Craighead in R v DPP, ex p Kebeline, R v DPP, ex p Rechachi [1999] 4 All ER 801 at 844, [2000] 2 AC 326 at 381:

> 'In this area difficult choices may have to be made by the executive or the legislature between the rights of the individual and the needs of society. In some circumstances it will be appropriate for the courts to recognise that there is an area of judgment within which the judiciary will defer, on democratic grounds, to the considered opinion of the elected body or person whose act or decision is said to be incompatible with the convention. This point is well made in Human Rights Law and Practice (1999) p 74, para 3.21, of which Lord Lester of Herne Hill QC and Mr David Pannick QC are the general editors, where the area in which these choices may arise is conveniently and appropriately described as the "discretionary even of judgment". It will be easier for such an area of judgment to be recognised where the convention itself requires a balance to be struck, much less so where the right is stated in terms which are unqualified. It will be easier for it to be recognised where the issues involve questions of social or economic policy, much less so where the rights are of high constitutional importance or are of a kind where the courts are especially well placed to assess the need for protection.' a

[233] Mr Coppel submitted that the Act in general, including the issue of consent under it and, in particular, the circumstances in which it may be withdrawn, was clearly within an area where the state will be accorded a broad b discretion. There were, he argued, four reasons for this. (1) It is within the area of social policy (see also Greenfield v Irwin (a firm) [2001] EWCA Civ 113 at [36], [2001] 1 WLR 1279 at [36] where there is a wide margin of discretion for the state in the area of family life). (2) The issue of consent requires a balance to be struck between competing rights and interests (and see Chassagnou v France (2000) 7 BHRC 151 at 184–185 (paras 112–113) where the Strasbourg court held that the c margin of appreciation would be particularly broad where it was necessary to strike a balance between competing convention rights—here the rights of the women and of their respective former partners). (3) A high degree of respect is to be accorded to the balance struck by the Act precisely because it is embodied in an Act of Parliament, passed by the democratic legislature (as compared with, d say, an act of administrative discretion): see R v Lichniak, R v Pyrah [2002] UKHL 47 at [14], [2002] 4 All ER 1122 at [14], [2003] 1 AC 903. (4) A further factor which militates in favour of a particularly broad margin of discretion in this case is that there is no European consensus in favour of the position advocated by the claimants (and therefore, it is more difficult for them to say that the approach of the Act is not 'necessary'). Indeed, the position is to the contrary: to the extent e that there is consensus, it is strongly against the idea that an embryo should be available for the use of a female participant in IVF treatment in circumstances where her former partner, whose gametes were used in the creation of the embryo, does not consent.. It is well-established that the Strasbourg court will have regard to the existence or otherwise of a consensus amongst contracting f states when determining the breadth of the margin of appreciation in a particular case: see Rasmussen v Denmark (1984) 7 EHRR 371 at 380 (para 40); and Petrovic v Austria (1998) 4 BHRC 232 at 238–239 (paras 38–43).

[234] The case for the Secretary of State, accordingly was that, given the broad margin of discretion which must be accorded in the present case, the state may legitimately say that if there are a range of reasonable views on a particular issue, g it cannot be criticised for having opted for one reasonable view over another.

[235] Turning to the grounds of justification, Mr Coppel submitted that there was no breach of positive obligations, alternatively that any breach of art 8(1) was justified under art 8(2), on the grounds of the policy objectives set out in the statement of Mr Webb which I have set out at [186]–[188], above. Mr Coppel h argued that the overall beneficial effects of Sch 3 to the Act were not outweighed by the particular facts of the claimants' cases.

[236] Mr Coppel addressed the arguments advanced on the claimants' behalf by reference to the policy issues Mr Webb had identified. Thus, he submitted, the female right of self-determination in pregnancy dictated that the point at j which an embryo is implanted in a woman (which will be the point of 'use' in the vast majority of cases) is, in practice, the last possible moment at which consent to transfer could be withdrawn. No later point could be chosen. The claimants, he noted, did not dispute that but argued that the same rule should be applied to a frozen embryo stored outside the womb. However, that argument did not address the fundamental point that a woman who becomes pregnant following IVF treatment is in the same position as a woman who becomes pregnant following sexual intercourse only once she is pregnant.

[237] Furthermore, Mr Coppel argued, it was indisputable that prior to the point of transfer of an embryo consent may be withdrawn without the need for a distressing medical intervention. The claimants' use in argument of the female personal pronoun ('her embryo') was, he submitted, instructive, and ran contrary to the whole scheme of the Act, which gave gamete providers equal rights and did not treat an embryo as belonging to one party or the other.

[238] As to the primacy of consent, the approach of Sch 3 was that participants in IVF treatment should be able to give and withhold consent to the greatest extent possible, having regard to the potentially very lengthy period of time over which treatment might run and the special significance of parenthood which was the intended result of the process. Schedule 3 recognised the reality that people's situations can change over the course of a period of years, perhaps quite unexpectedly; and, in the Secretary of State's view, it would be undesirable and unfair to hold people (both men and women, since the rules apply equally to both) to consents which they may have given several years earlier.

[239] As to the interests of any child who would be born as a result of IVF treatment, Mr Coppel did not disagree with the proposition advanced by the claimants that it was commonplace for a child to be born against its father's wishes. That, however, did not establish that it was impermissible to consider this to be undesirable state of affairs. Further, the Secretary of State simply did not agree with the claimants that the only public interest in whether or not a father consented to the birth of a child was a financial one; nor, patently, did Parliament.

[240] Mr Coppel submitted that equality of treatment between the parties to IVF treatment was an important point. Nobody, he suggested would argue that a male progenitor should be able to compel the use of an embryo by transfer into an unwilling female, but the claimants were arguing for a position whereby transfer can be enforced against an unwilling male. The claimants' argument that this was merely an imbalance which was created by nature which the law should not seek to correct did not meet the point. The law must strive to avoid sex discrimination in the enjoyment of convention rights (art 14 of the convention) regardless of its underlying cause. The regime contended for by the claimants, whereby a frozen embryo would be treated as belonging to a woman who would have the sole power to determine its future would, he submitted, amount to a very serious form of sex discrimination, which it would not be open to the court to countenance as result of its own duties under the HRA 1998, s 6(1).

[241] Mr Coppel also relied on the promotion of clarity and certainty by putting in place a 'bright line' rule governing the withdrawal of consent rather than a fact-sensitive rule. He accepted that this was not an argument for fixing the 'point of no return' in any particular place, but rather for making it a firm line wherever it is fixed, and which did not depend upon the facts of individual cases. As already noted, it was fundamental to the intention of Parliament when passing the Act to instigate a system of firm and clear statutory regulation in preference to a 'free for all' governed only by the common law and equitable rules. The instant cases were, he submitted, very good examples of the difficulties which could arise both for the parties to IVF treatment and for licence holders providing treatment, if the fate of frozen embryos had to be decided on grounds of fairness in the particular case. The need for certainty in this particular context answered the submission made by the claimants that a policy is per se disproportionate if it does not admit of exceptions. Everything depended upon the context: there may be a very good reason in a particular case for a 'bright line' rule.

[242] Thus, Mr Coppel submitted, the need for certainty in the law was the main reason why the policy objectives identified by Mr Webb were not outweighed by the facts of these particular cases. In each case there was an unwilling male former partner who did not want the interference with his right to respect for private life which use of the embryos would entail. Moreover, the effect of Sch 3 was not to deny parenthood to the claimants. In Ms Evans' case, a prohibition on the use of the embryos deprived her of a less than 30% chance of conception, and a possibly lower chance of a live birth. However, she also had the possibility of becoming a parent in other ways, by conception using donor eggs, and/or by adoption. In Mrs Hadley's case, the claimant was already a parent, and had a far greater prospect of conceiving another child of her own through the use of other techniques not involving the disputed embryos.

[243] Mr Coppel submitted that the same essential arguments applied to the question of continued storage of frozen embryos, which the claimants treated as a separate point. If the parties did not consent to continued storage of embryos created with their gametes, then, in the Secretary of State's view, that should not be imposed upon them. There were considerable benefits for a non-consenting party in resolving the situation once and for all, by removing the embryos from storage. This would put an end to any lingering doubts as to their fate, and obviate the possibility of pressure to change his/her mind being brought to bear upon the non-consenting party during the remainder of the storage period (for example, as had occurred in this case, through the media).

[244] For all these reasons, the Secretary of State submitted, in summary, that the provisions of Sch 3 were justified in the public interest and did not amount to an unlawful interference with the claimants' art 8 rights.

The case for Mr Johnston and Mr Hadley on art 8

[245] Unsurprisingly, counsel for both Mr Johnston and Mr Hadley adopted the arguments of the Secretary of State. Each pointed out that the two men also had a right to respect for their private lives, and that if Ms Evans' and Mrs Hadley's rights were engaged, so were theirs. There needed, accordingly, to be a balance of the competing rights. The interference by the state in the rights of Ms Evans and Mrs Hadley was, they submitted, justified on the basis that it sought to protect the rights and freedoms of the male gamete holders.

[246] Both took issue with Mr Tolson's and Miss Freeborn's proposition that Sch 3 of the Act breached art 8 of the convention by providing the male gamete providers with a veto against removal from storage and use of the embryos. The true position was that the Act was based on the fundamental policy of informed consent to treatment. It treated all four gamete providers equally, and provided each of them with a veto. All four had an equal right to withdraw from treatment at any point up to transfer/implantation.

[247] Neither Mr Johnston nor Mr Hadley wished to father a child by a partner with whom neither now had anything in common, and in circumstances in which neither could play a full or proper part in the life of the child. The withdrawal of their consent to treatment and/or the continued storage of the embryos was, accordingly, a reasonable exercise of their rights to respect for their private lives.

Conclusions on art 8

[248] I am in no doubt that on this part of the case, I prefer the arguments of the Secretary of State and of Mr Johnston and Mr Hadley. I am satisfied the interference in the private lives of the parties contained in Sch 3 of the Act is both necessary for the protection of the rights of all four gamete providers and proportionate.

[249] In my judgment, this is pre-eminently an area in which it is for Parliament to legislate, and in relation to which a generous margin of appreciation is appropriate. I am satisfied that a regime of treatment based on the twin pillars of consent and the interests of the unborn child is an entirely rational and appropriate foundation for the legislation, the more so when the Act itself is the product of a report of the quality of Warnock, followed by extensive consultation, a White Paper and careful parliamentary scrutiny.

[250] It is, in my judgment, entirely appropriate for the state to require that couples embarking on IVF treatment are in agreement about the treatment, and that it should be possible for either party to withdraw from it at any time before the created embryos are 'used'—which, on the facts of these cases I have found plainly means transferred into the female gamete provider.

[251] Consistent with the need for consent to treatment is, of course, the principle of equality between the gamete donors. Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn frequently referred to the 'male veto'. In my judgment, as I pointed out in [184], above, that is an incomplete analysis. As Mr Johnson and Mr Hadley pointed out, each of the four parties has a veto. I have no doubt—indeed Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn accept that were there a provision in the Act which permitted either of the men to insist that either of the women had the embryos transferred into them against their will, both Ms Evans and Mrs Hadley would regard that as a gross interference with their right to respect for their private lives, and that they would be correct to so to regard it. By like token, it seems to me that a regime which permitted the women to override the men's withdrawal of consent (which is what the claimants seek) would be a clear interference with the men's right to respect for their private lives.

[252] Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn are dismissive of s 13(5) of the Act. But the policy behind it is surely sound—or, to put the matter at its lowest, one which the state is entitled to promote. Since the object of consensual IVF treatment is to produce a child for a couple, it is in my judgment not unreasonable, where the couple has separated prior to the transfer of the embryos, for each to be able to say that they wish the treatment to be discontinued because any child born as a result of the treatment will not be brought up by the couple. To put the matter another way, it is not unreasonable for either Mr Johnston or Mr Hadley to say, given the break-up of their respective relationships, that they do not wish to be the father of a child by a woman with whom they no longer have anything in common; by whom they would not wish now to have a child; and in circumstances in which, once any such child was born, they would not be in a position to play a full or proper paternal role, whilst at the same time remaining financially liable to maintain the child.

[253] I note in passing that any agreement between separated spouses or former spouses who have a child that the non-resident or absent parent will not be financially responsible for the child's support is void under s 34 of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973. I also agree with Mr Coppel that it is not open to parents—whether married or not—to contract out of the Child Support Act 1991. Mr Johnston and Mr Hadley would be the fathers of any children born consequent upon the transfer of embryos in this case, and under s 1(1) of the 1991 Act each would be responsible for maintaining his child. Were either of the claimants to be in receipt of benefit, the Secretary of State would be entitled to require her to authorise him to take action to recover child support maintenance from the child's father—see s 6 of the 1991 Act—irrespective of any agreement between the parents. It is for these reasons that I stated in [90], [98], above, that any agreement between the parties in this case would not be binding.

[254] In my judgment, in this sensitive area of the law, it is for Parliament to legislate. It is an area in which the courts have only a limited role to play. Parliament has chosen a carefully structured system of regulation, with clear rules based on mutual consent and the interests of the unborn child. The approach to statutory construction set out by Lord Bingham of Cornhill in Quintavalle CNR (set out at [18], above) and Lord Hope of Craighead in Ex p Kebeline (set out in [232], above) applies. If any changes in the law are appropriate, it is for Parliament to make them.

[255] It follows, in my judgment, that the scheme chosen by Parliament is legitimate and does not breach any of the parties' convention rights. Consistent with the scheme, the consent provisions appropriately provide that if either of the parties wishes to terminate what has begun as consensual treatment prior to use of the embryo, he or she should be entitled to do so. In these circumstances it is, once again, entirely appropriate, in my judgment, that the licensing system created by Parliament should provide clear and non-fact specific rules for any clinic which the authority licences, which stand to lose its licence if it breaches its terms.

[256] In this context, I do not derive any assistance from the authorities cited by Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn which I have identified in [211]–[214], above. Whilst they address art 8 in the context of the administration of policies adopted by the state, they do not address the fundamental issue raised in the two preceding paragraphs.

[257] This is not a case of IVF using donor sperm. The careful argument advanced by Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn, which I have endeavoured to set out in full, accepts that the state has the right to regulate fertility treatment and that a generous margin of appreciation must be given to the means permitted to the state in doing so. They do not challenge the lawfulness of a scheme of treatment which requires consent. Their argument, it seems to me, boils down to the proposition that it should be possible for the male gamete provider, if he wishes, to give an irrevocable consent to the use of the embryos created with his gametes, and that there is no legitimate public interest in permitting embryos created in these circumstances to be allowed to perish. For the policy reasons set out by Mr Webb and elaborated by Mr Coppel I am unable to accept this approach.

[258] I find myself also unable to accept the analogy with the threshold criteria under s 31 of the 1989 Act, which is designed to protect a child from significant harm. That, in my judgment, is quite different from a gamete provider withdrawing his or her consent to the use of embryos created from those gametes. The question which counsel pose at the conclusion of [203], above, seems to me the wrong one. The correct question, in my view, is whether or not it is legitimate for the state to allow gamete providers to withdraw their consent to the use/continued storage of subsequently created embryos In a regime based on mutual consent and s 13(5) the answer to this question must be Yes.

[259] In my judgment, therefore, the interference from the state identified in art 8 is necessary for the protection of the freedom of others, and entirely proportionate to the policy objectives identified. There is, accordingly, no breach of art 8 on the facts of this case.

[260] I recognise, of course, that from her perspective, and because the Act cannot admit of exceptions, Ms Evans is what her counsel described as a 'hard' case. Ms Evans is the victim of her physical condition and has had the misfortunate to suffer relationship breakdowns both with her former husband and Mr Johnston. She was also obliged to enter into IVF in dramatic and hurried circumstances. It has to be said, however, that nobody can legislate for relationship breakdown, only for its consequences. In the field of IVF treatment, as the quotation from Hale LJ's judgment in Centre for Reproductive Medicine v U (set out at [37], above) makes clear, I cannot allow my sympathy for Ms Evans' position to outweigh my respect for the scheme which Parliament has put in place.

ARTICLE 12: THE RIGHT TO MARRY

[261] Article 12 provides that 'Men and women of marriageable age have the right to marry and to found a family, according to the national laws governing the exercise of this right'.

[262] I can take this shortly. Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn accepted the proposition that any interference with private and family which is justified under art 8(2) cannot at the same time constitute a violation of art 12: see the review of the European jurisprudence carried out by Lord Phillips MR in R (on the application of Mellor) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] 2 FCR 153 at [22]–[38] and the first conclusion derived from that jurisprudence namely that 'the qualifications on the right to respect for family life that are recognised by art 8(2) of the Convention apply equally to the art 12 rights'.

[263] As their principal allegation was that Ms Evans' convention rights under art 8 were breached by the denial of access to the embryos because of the provisions of Sch 3 to the Act, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn very properly accepted there was no separate argument under art 12.

[264] The two rights identified in art 12 are expressed conjunctively. However, even if I were able to read them disjunctively, as Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn invited me to, and assume that the right to found a family can exist independently of the right to marry (which is plainly not engaged) it does not seem to me that they benefit either claimant in the instant case. The right to found a family through IVF can only, put at its highest, amount to the right to have access to IVF treatment. Self-evidently, it cannot be a right to be treated successfully. Furthermore, it is a right which is qualified by availability, suitability for treatment and cost. Once it is clear, as in my judgment it is, that the consensual scheme for IVF treatment contained in the Act (and to which both claimants have had access) is lawful and does not breach art 8 of the convention, it must follow that there is no breach of art 12.

[265] In these circumstances I need not deal with the arguments addressed to me on Goodwin v UK [2002] 2 FCR 577, and Cossey v UK [1993] 2 FCR 97. In my judgment, art 12 is not engaged on the facts of this case; alternatively, it is not breached for the reasons which I have given in relation to art 8.

ARTICLE 14: PROHIBITION OF DISCRIMINATION

[266] Article 14 provides:

> 'The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status.' a

[267] The discrimination alleged is not addressed to any disproportionate enjoyment by men (as against women) of their rights and freedoms set out in the convention, but seeks to compare the position of the claimants with that of healthy women conceiving naturally who enjoy convention rights which protect their embryos and themselves. The rights identified are those under arts 3, 5, 8 and 12. These articles, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn argue, serve to give healthy women effective control over their embryos, subject to the laws on abortion. I have, of course, already found that there is no breach of arts 8 and 12. b

[268] The claimants, counsel argue, have both undergone assisted conception procedures as a result of a disability relating to their health. Such disability, they argued, was a relevant status for the purposes of art 14. If the claimants had not had the relevant disability, they would not have had the treatment. c

[269] Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn argued that there are many similarities between women who conceive naturally and women who conceive artificially, in particular in this case through IVF. Both are attempting to have a child, both are having their eggs fertilised and so on. There are also differences. Moreover, these differences (the creation and existence of an embryo outside as opposed to inside the womb) justify differences in treatment in terms of convention rights. A woman if only as a matter of practicality cannot have the same exclusive control over her embryos outside her body as inside her body. d

[270] But, counsel argued, there is no justification for the particular difference in treatment of which complaint is made in this case, namely the conferring on the male partner of the power to withdraw consent to implantation after fertilisation. They submitted that this was not a proportionate response to the (real) differences between the naturally conceiving woman and the woman receiving IVF treatment, or to the differences between an embryo in the woman's body and an embryo outside the body. Permitting a unilateral withdrawal of consent without regard to the circumstances not only failed to reflect nature and the 'veto' which the female has, but did not attempt to address any balance of interest in the embryos. e f

[271] Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn argued that all young victims of ovarian or similar cancers who can no longer conceive naturally are very vulnerable under the United Kingdom system as it is at present, and submitted that the present imbalance was a breach of their art 14 rights. g

[272] For the Secretary of State, Mr Coppel identified the correct approach to art 14 challenges as being that set out in the judgment of the Court of Appeal in R (on the application of Hooper) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2003] EWCA Civ 813 at [85], [2003] 3 All ER 673 at [85]: h

'In the leading judgment in Wandsworth London BC v Michalak [2002] EWCA Civ 271, [2002] 4 All ER 1136 Brooke LJ recommended the following structured approach to consideration of an art 14 claim. The court should ask, sequentially, four questions. If any one is answered in the negative it will normally follow that the claim is ill-founded. The questions (at [20]) are: j

"(i) Do the facts fall within the ambit of one or more of the substantive Convention provisions (for the relevant Convention rights see s 1(1) of the 1998 Act)? (ii) If so, was there different treatment as respects that right between the complainant on the one hand and other persons put forward for comparison ("the chosen comparators") on the other? (iii) Were the chosen comparators in an analogous situation to the complainant's situation? (iv) If so, did the difference in treatment have an objective and reasonable justification: in other words, did it pursue a legitimate aim and did the differential treatment bear a reasonable relationship of proportionality to the aim sought to be achieved?"

We agree with Brooke LJ that this structured approach is helpful.'

[273] Mr Coppel submitted that quite apart from the fact that the claim must fail at the stage of justification (stage (iv)) for essentially the same reasons as the claim under art 8, there were also, as in the case of art 12, threshold objections (at stages ii and iii) which operated to dispose of the claim before the stage of justification was reached.

[274] Mr Coppel accepted that the facts of the claims fell within the ambit of art 8. Problems, however, arose at stage (ii). The first difficulty with the claimants' argument that 'healthy women conceiving naturally [have] effective control over their embryos, subject to the laws on abortion whereas disabled women who undergo assisted conception procedures do not' was that there is no relevant difference in treatment between women who become pregnant through sexual intercourse, and women who become pregnant following assisted conception procedures. Once pregnant—that is, once an embryo is implanted in the womb, all women have a right of self-determination, subject to the criminal law, no matter what techniques have been used in order to assist in conception.

[275] Mr Coppel argued that the second difficulty at stage (ii) was that Sch 3 to the 1990 Act which contains the provisions about which the claimants complain, does not distinguish between women on the grounds of whether or not they are disabled. It distinguishes between men and women whose partners have changed their minds about undergoing IVF treatment based on whether or not that change occurred before or after the relevant use of an embryo. That, however was not the burden of the complaint under art 14. The fact that a woman who is disabled may suffer adversely as a result of the provisions of the Act (and not all women undergoing IVF treatment are disabled—see, for example, Quintavalle (tissue typing)) did not mean that they have been discriminated against on grounds of their disability.

[276] As for stage (iii), Mr Coppel argued that a woman whose gametes have been used in the creation of a frozen embryo and who hopes that it will be implanted in due course is simply not in the same position as a woman who has become pregnant through sexual intercourse. Quite simply, the latter is pregnant and the former is not. If the former becomes pregnant, she will be treated in exactly the same way.

[277] I accept the arguments advanced by the Secretary of State as set out above. In my judgment the claimants' arguments on this point cannot stand in the light of my conclusions under art 8. In my judgment the Act does not discriminate against women undergoing IVF treatment.

CONCLUSIONS UNDER THE HRA 1998 AND THE CONVENTION

[278] In my judgment, the Act breaches none of the claimants' convention rights which are engaged. It follows that the Act is HRA 1998 compliant, and no question of a declaration under the HRA 1998, s 4(2) arises.

ESTOPPEL

Can an estoppel exist in the face of the Act?

[279] In my judgment, the estoppel argument faces a number of insuperable obstacles. The first is the point taken by the Secretary of State that, regardless of the facts underlying the plea of estoppel, and regardless of whether the usual requirements for a promissory estoppel are made out, the Act itself excludes the operation of any estoppel which would prevent Mr Johnston from withdrawing his consent prior to the use of the embryos.

[280] Mr Coppel submitted, firstly that promissory estoppel is dependent upon there being some pre-existing legal relationship between the party allegedly estopped, and the party for whose benefit the estoppel is said to operate. He submitted that the Act prevented any such relationship from arising. In particular, of course, there was no 'property' in the embryos created and as Mr Webb explained, the Act embodied a conscious decision by Parliament to impose statutory regulation in this area, in preference to leaving matters to be determined by the terms of contracts between individuals—see s 29 of the Act.

[281] So far as the issue of consent was concerned, Mr Coppel submitted that the legal framework superimposed by the Act posited a legal relationship between participants in IVF treatment and the licence holder providing treatment services to them (in addition to the contractual relationship which may exist between patients and clinic, depending upon whether treatment was private or NHS), and between the licence holder and the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority, rather than between the participants themselves.

[282] The correct analysis, accordingly, was not that Mr Johnston had, under Sch 3, a right as against Ms Evans to withdraw his consent to the use of the embryos. It was, rather, that the clinic was only permitted to store and use the embryos if Mr Johnston consented, which consent was contingent up until the point at which the embryos were used in the material sense. It should be noted, Mr Coppel argued, that in this context consent must be given to the licence holder, and could only be withdrawn by notice to the licence holder, regardless of what had passed between the participants themselves. The scheme of the Act therefore removed one of the essential pre-requisites for promissory estoppel.

[283] Secondly, Mr Coppel submitted that just as a contract which is contrary to public policy is void and/or unenforceable, so equity would not recognise an estoppel which would operate contrary to public policy as set out in a statute. The contradiction here was created by para 4(1) of Sch 3, which permitted consent to be withdrawn merely by giving notice to the person providing treatment services, regardless of anything which may have passed beforehand between male and female partners.

[284] Mr Coppel accepted that that not every apparently contradictory statutory provision barred an estoppel, and relied on the proposition contained in the judgment of Beldam LJ in Yaxley v Gotts [2000] 1 All ER 711 at 734, [2000] Ch 162 at 191:

> 'The general principle that a party cannot rely on an estoppel in the face of a statute depends upon the nature of the enactment, the purpose of the provision and the social policy behind it.'

[285] The relevant test, he submitted was formulated in Kok Hoong v Leong Cheong Kweng Mines Ltd [1964] 1 All ER 300 at 308, [1964] AC 993 at 1016, in the following terms namely 'whether the law that confronts an estoppel can be seen to represent a social policy to which the court must give effect in the interests of the public'.

[286] The point, Mr Coppel argued, was that the benefit of statutory provisions may be waived by an individual where they were intended by Parliament to operate solely for the benefit of that individual and others in his position, but not where there is any wider interest at stake. If there is a wider interest in upholding the statutory provisions, estoppel cannot operate. There was, he argued, as might perhaps be expected, a strong identity between this rule, and the rule which applied to the issue of whether a party may waive statutory rights by contract (as opposed to conduct). The question in that context is whether the right conferred is exclusively personal (in which case waiver will be permitted) or is designed to serve other, broader public purposes and so, compendiously, whether to permit a waiver would undermine or frustrate the purposes of the statute: see Johnson v Moreton [1978] 3 All ER 37 at 42, 47, 55, [1980] AC 37 at 51, 58, 68.

[287] Mr Coppel argued that the claimants were wrong to contend that the consent provisions of the Act were not underpinned by any public policy. In so arguing, they ignored the evidence of Mr Webb who identified a number of such policies. The most relevant in the present context was that of promoting clarity and certainty in relations between parties in this field: see [186], above. Against the background that IVF and other techniques were being practised in this country before the Act, the enactment of the Act constituted in itself a recognition that common law and equitable rules were inadequate to regulate this field.

[288] Furthermore, Mr Coppel argued, para 4 of Sch 3 contained a clear or 'bright line' rule to the effect that consent may be withdrawn up to the point of use, in contrast to a fact-sensitive rule which would give rise to uncertainty and litigation. Certainty was an important policy in the general public interest. The effect of the claimants' estoppel argument would be to superimpose a fact-sensitive rule, the operation of which would depend upon the contents of unminuted discussions between participants in IVF treatment, occurring perhaps at a time of great stress, and upon the whole range of factors which affect whether the courts will recognise an 'equity' (fairness, clean hands etc).

[289] It was also important, Mr Coppel submitted, to consider the position of licence holders, who faced revocation of their licence and possible criminal prosecution if embryos were used in circumstances where Sch 3 had not been complied with. The bright line rule obviously enabled licence holders to be sure about what they could and could not do. If estoppel could operate so as to overlay the provisions of para 4 of Sch 3, licence holders would be placed in the invidious position of having to investigate and make findings of fact in relation to what was said between male and female partners, and whether it was equitable to permit consent to be withdrawn. The livelihood of those working on behalf of licence holders would be at risk if their judgment of the facts was found by the courts to have been incorrect.

[290] There were, in short, substantial reasons of social policy underpinning the provisions of Sch 3 to the Act, which militated strongly against the operation of any estoppel in this case.

[291] Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn's response to this argument was that there was no threat to the 'bright line' policy. Schedule 3 created a regime, the core aim of which was to protect the clinics. It was accepted that an estoppel could not bind the clinic, but this did not affect the position as between the patients themselves. Estoppels were not therefore prevented by any form of policy considerations.

[292] There was, however, a second point. The clinics were protected from patient/clinic estoppels by the consent regime itself; clinics obtained effective consent, relied on it and maintained it until written notice of withdrawal. They were not bound by any equities purely between third parties on the usual principles. Thus if the notice of withdrawal may be avoided as a result of undue influence, duress or estoppel between the gamete providers, that did not affect the clinics in any way. They could carry on regardless unless and until they received notice. At that point they did not have to do anything other than continue to store the embryos.

[293] The remedy sought in this case was an injunction requiring Mr Johnston to maintain his consent and a declaration as to lawful treatment. The remedy affects the effective consent, and there could, Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn argued be no public policy bar to such a remedy.

[294] Once again, I find the argument of the Secretary of State on this point compelling. I am particularly impressed by the consequences of Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn's argument for the clinics. Neither the gamete providers nor the clinics can opt out of the statutory scheme. The clinics depend both for their livelihoods and their reputations on strict compliance with the terms of the licences granted to them. The importance of fulfilling the terms of the licence was at the forefront of the evidence of both Dr Sharp and Dr Lockwood and, in my judgment, rightly so.

[295] Thus any agreement or understanding between those receiving IVF treatment must be unenforceable unless it complies fully with the scheme. The Act gives Mr Johnston an unequivocal right to vary or withdraw his consent both to treatment and the storage of the embryos at any point prior to their use. That right must be seen in its context, namely the structure of the scheme of licensed treatment operated under the Act, and as part of the policy of mutual consent discussed earlier under art 8 of the convention. The statutory scheme is clear and, as I have found, convention compliant. It exists for the benefit of all gamete providers. In such circumstances it seems to me that Mr Coppel must be right to submit that there is a wider interest in upholding the provisions of Sch 3, and that they cannot be waived for the benefit of an individual. These include, of course, the welfare of the unborn child.

[296] To put the matter another way, Mr Johnston cannot give an unequivocal consent to the use of the embryos irrespective of any change of circumstances. In the wider public interest of the proper operation of the scheme under the Act, Parliament does not permit him to give such a promise.

[297] I therefore agree with Mr Coppel that the estoppel for which Ms Evans argues cannot take effect on the face of the Act, even if the representations made to Ms Evans were in explicit terms. However, in case I am wrong on that point, I propose to examine the question in the overall context of the law relating to promissory estoppel as I perceive it to be.

The ingredients and parameters of promissory estoppel

[298] One of the difficulties I have in this area is in defining the parameters of equitable or promissory estoppel, and distinguishing it (where it is necessary to do so) from proprietary and other forms of estoppel. Thus, for example, although the legal rights between the person making the representation and the person who acts on it frequently arise out of a contract between them, in some circumstances it does not seem to be fatal to the existence of an estoppel for there to be no legal relationship between representor and representee.

[299] Thus in Jennings v Rice [2002] EWCA Civ 159, [2003] 1 FCR 501, a case of proprietary estoppel the claimant did odd jobs for the deceased, latterly without payment, provided her with personal care out of compassion for her, and stayed in her house overnight to provide her with security. She had also promised him that she would 'see him right'. The judge decided that the claimant had believed he was going to receive all or part of the deceased's property on her death; that he acted to his detriment in caring for her unpaid; and that it would be unconscionable for the deceased to go back on her assurances to him. The judge awarded him £200,000 out of a net estate of £1·285m. The case in the Court of Appeal was concerned with the extent of the relief to which the claimant was entitled having established the estoppel. There was no appeal against the judge's finding that the claimant had established a claim.

[300] Although the case is concerned with proprietary estoppel, it seems to me that the judgments are helpful in the instant case. The Court of Appeal was referred to an article by Dr Simon Gardner 'Remedial Discretion in Proprietary Estoppel' (1999) 115 LQR 438. In his judgment in the case, Robert Walker LJ (as he then was) said:

> '[43] It cannot be doubted that in this as in every other area of the law, the court must take a principled approach, and cannot exercise a completely unfettered discretion according to the individual judge's notion of what is fair in any particular case. Dr Gardner's fourth hypothesis ('the approach is for the court to adopt whatever style and measure of relief it thinks fit, for whatever reason it thinks fit') cannot be right. I do not think that the judgment of Hobhouse LJ in Sledmore v Dalby (to which I shall return) can possibly be regarded as adopting or advocating an unfettered judicial discretion.
>
> [44] The need to search for the right principles cannot be avoided. But it is unlikely to be a short or simple search, because (as appears from both the English and the Australian authorities) proprietary estoppel can apply in a wide variety of factual situations, and any summary formula is likely to prove to be an over-simplification. The cases show a wide range of variation in both of the main elements, that is the quality of the assurances which give rise to the claimant's expectations and the extent of the claimant's detrimental reliance on the assurances. The doctrine applies only if these elements, in combination, make it unconscionable for the person giving the assurances (whom I will call the benefactor, although that may not always be an appropriate label) to go back on them.'

[301] I find that an extremely helpful passage. It helps to explain why, when one looks back at the cases to which I was referred, it is not always possible to find a formula which fits the facts of this particular case. The first classic expression of the concept is in the speech of Lord Cairns LC in Hughes v Metropolitan Rly Co (1877) 2 App Cas 439 at 448, [1874–80] All ER Rep 187 at 191. The question in that case was whether a lessor could obtain an order of ejectment against a lessee when work under a notice of repair to leasehold premises was suspended following the lessee instituting negotiations for the lessor to purchase the lessee's interest in the premises. Lord Cairns, giving the leading speech said:

'It was not argued at your Lordships' Bar, and it could not be argued, that there was any right of a Court of Equity, or any practice of a Court of Equity, to give relief in cases of this kind, by way of mercy, or by way merely of saving property from forfeiture, but it is the first principle upon which all Courts of Equity proceed, that if parties who have entered into definite and distinct terms involving certain legal results—certain penalties or legal forfeiture—afterwards by their own act or with their own consent enter upon a course of negotiation which has the effect of leading one of the parties to suppose that the strict rights arising under the contract will not be enforced, or will be kept in suspense, or held in abeyance, the person who otherwise might have enforced those rights will not be allowed to enforce them where it would be inequitable having regard to the dealings which have thus taken place between the parties.'

[302] Following the decision of Denning J (as he then was) in Central London Property Trust Ltd v High Trees House Ltd [1956] 1 All ER 256n, [1947] KB 130, Denning LJ (as he had by then become) articulated the concept in Combe v Combe [1951] 1 All ER 767, [1951] 2 KB 215. In that case, a divorced wife relied on a promise by her former husband to pay her maintenance of £100 a year. He did not pay. She did not apply for maintenance in the divorce proceedings, but issued a writ several years later relying on her former husband's promise to pay, and arguing (inter alia) that it would be inequitable for the court to relieve him of his obligations. Having referred to a series of cases in which promissory estoppel had arisen, Denning LJ said ([1951] 1 All ER 767 at 770, [1951] 2 KB 215 at 220–221):

'In none of these cases was the defendant sued on the promise, assurance, or assertion as a cause of action in itself. He was sued for some other cause, for example, a pension or a breach of contract, or possession, and the promise, assurance, or assertion only played a supplementary role, though, no doubt, an important one. That is, I think, its true function. It may be part of a cause of action, but not a cause of action in itself. The principle, as I understand it, is that where one party has, by his words or conduct, made to the other a promise or assurance which was intended to affect the legal relations between them and to be acted on accordingly, then, once the other party has taken him at his word and acted on it, the one who gave the promise or assurance cannot afterwards be allowed to revert to the previous legal relations as if no such promise or assurance had been made by him, but he must accept their legal relations subject to the qualification which he himself has so introduced, even though it is not supported in point of law by any consideration, but only by his word. Seeing that the principle never stands alone as giving a cause of action in itself, it can never do away with the necessity of consideration when that is an essential part of the cause of action. The doctrine of consideration is too firmly fixed to be overthrown by a side-wind. Its ill effects have been largely mitigated of late, but it still remains a cardinal necessity of the formation of a contract, although not of its modification or discharge. I fear that it was my failure to make this clear in Central London Property Trust Ltd v High Trees House Ltd which misled Byrne J in the present case. He held that the wife could sue on the husband's promise as a separate and independent cause of action by itself, although, as he held, there was no consideration for it. That is not correct. The wife can only enforce the promise if there was consideration for it. That is, therefore, a the real question in the case: Was there sufficient consideration to support the promise?'

[303] From these cases, a number of conditions appear to be necessary for the concept of promissory estoppel to operate. Firstly, there must be a legal relationship between the parties. Secondly, the estoppel is not, of itself, the cause b of action, although it may be an element in it. Thirdly, there must be a clear and unequivocal promise or representation which is designed to affect the legal relationship between the parties. Fourthly, there must be reliance on that promise or representation by the other party and, fifthly, it must be unconscionable for the person making the representation to be allowed to resile from it.

c [304] In the instant case, the first three elements identified in [303], above, are undoubtedly missing and the final two depend, essentially, on my findings of fact. That said, however, it does not seem to me that the absence of any one or more of these elements is necessarily fatal to an equitable estoppel. The essence of the doctrine, as Robert Walker LJ comments in Jennings v Rice [2003] 1 FCR 501 at [54] d is to do what it necessary to avoid an unconscionable result. However, it does seem to me that in the instant case, the three critical elements which must be present are: (1) a clear representation by Mr Johnston; (2) reliance on that representation by Ms Evans to her detriment; and (3) a finding that it would be unconscionable to allow Mr Johnston to allow Mr Johnston to go back on the e representation.

Application of the principles of estoppel to the present case

[305] In my judgment the estoppel undoubtedly fails on the first and the third of the three essential ingredients I have identified in [304], above, there was, of course, no contractual, or other legal relationship between Ms Evans and Mr f Johnston. However, for the reasons I have given I do not think this fatal to the argument. In Jennings v Rice there was no contractual or other legal relationship between the claimant and the deceased, and the claimant succeeded in establishing a proprietary estoppel.

[306] I do not, however, agree with Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn that the g assurances Mr Johnston gave Ms Evans amounted to a clear and unequivocal representation as to the use of the embryos and a promise that he would never withdraw his consent to their use. On 10 October 2001, Mr Johnston was doing his best to reassure Ms Evans that he loved her and that he wanted to be the father of her children. He was giving what I have no doubt was a truthful h expression of his feelings at the time. He was not—nor could he be—committing himself for all time. In the field of personal relationships endearments and reassurances of this kind are commonplace, but they do not—nor can they—have any permanent, legal effect. They certainly cannot bind Mr Johnston in what were totally changed circumstances, namely his separation from Ms Evans.

j [307] Equally, for the reasons I have set out when dealing with the claims under the convention, I cannot take the view that it would be unconscionable to allow Mr Johnston to go back on the assurances he gave. What he is now saying simply reflects the reality. He and Ms Evans have separated. He no longer loves her, and she no longer loves him. In these changed circumstances, he no longer wishes to have a child by her. Were it not for the existence of the embryos, Ms Evans would not choose to have a child by him.

[308] I find the question of Ms Evans' reliance on the assurances difficult, although the point may be academic in the light of my other findings. Ms Evans had very little time. She was given the news on 10 October 2001. Harvesting of her eggs and fertilisation of them took place on 12 November 2001. Ms Evans underwent an oophorectomy on 26 November 2001. The reality was that egg freezing was not a option, nor, I think, was the use of donor sperm. The clinic would not undertake the former. I think it highly unlikely, in the light of the evidence of Dr Sharp and Dr Lockwood that Ms Evans would have found a clinic which undertook it, even if she had had more time, and been able to afford it. Furthermore, both egg freezing and AID would have opened up the question of the durability of her relationship with Mr Johnston. The alternative clinic would have been bound to inquire into why Ms Evans wanted egg freezing or to use donor sperm; and, despite her personal circumstances, might have felt unable to provide either when Ms Evans had a partner who was capable of providing the gametes to fertilise her embryos.

[309] My acceptance of Mr Johnston's account of what occurred on 12 November 2001, combined with Ms Evans' initial difficulty about remembering the date of the conversation with Mr Johnston (she initially put it after 10 October 2001) make it difficult for me to find in terms that she relied on Mr Johnston's assurances to the extent that she now believes. She was naturally in a highly anxious state of mind. She was, I think, by undergoing IVF with Mr Johnston taking the only realistic course which was open to her. She was, I think, both aware that it was the only course, and it was one she was content to adopt. No doubt Mr Johnston's assurances played a part in what she did, but I do not think they were critical. Had Mr Johnston not given her the assurances I have found he did give her, I think she would have gone ahead with the treatment in any event. However, even if I am wrong about that, and even if an estoppel is capable of existing in the face of the Act, I do not, for the reasons I have given, think it would be unconscionable to allow Mr Johnston to withdraw his consent. It is a right which the statute gives him within the clear scheme operated by Parliament. It was the basis upon which he gave his consent on 10 October 2001. It is perfectly reasonable for him, in the changed circumstances which appertain, not to want to father a child by Ms Evans.

[310] In my judgment, therefore, there is no effective estoppel in this case. The reality, as I find it to be, is that both Ms Evans and Mr Johnston embarked on the treatment in good faith on the basis that their relationship would endure. However, it did not. In the changed circumstances of separation, it would in my judgment be quite inequitable not to allow either party to change their mind and withdraw their consent to treatment.

INFORMATION FROM OTHER JURISDICTIONS

[311] I was provided with a great deal of information, including a substantial document which Mr Webb had downloaded from the Internet prepared by the Council of Europe and entitled Medically Assisted Procreation and the Protection of the Human Embryo Comparative Study on the Situation in 39 States. Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn were highly critical of the suggestion that this document should be adduced in evidence, and agreement was reached that it was to provide background information only. Apart from critical references to it in the claimants' opening, nobody sought to rely on it and I did not take it into account in reaching any of my conclusions.

[312] As Mr Tolson and Miss Freeborn readily and rightly acknowledged, the legitimate differences between practice in different jurisdictions inevitably meant that, in the absence of a powerful consensus elsewhere, the claimants' arguments stood or fell on my construction of the Act and its compliance with convention rights.

[313] I was shown four cases (one Israeli and three American) in which divorced couples had argued over the fate of frozen embryos created from their gametes. One was a decision of a specially convened sitting of 11 judges of the Israeli Supreme Court in the case of Nachmani decided in 1996. Unfortunately, the judgments are only, I was told, available in Hebrew, and the only discussion of the case in English is in the Texas International Journal for Winter 2000 in an article by one of the judges involved, Dalia Domer J. The others were a decision of the Supreme Court of Tennessee at Knoxville called Davis v Davis (1992) 842 SW 2d 588; Kass v Kass (1998) 673 NYS 2d 350; and AZ v BZ (2000) 725 NE 2d 1051, a decision of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts decided in March 2000 and provided to me in the Massachusetts Lawyers Weekly.

[314] In a judgment which is already overlong, I do not think it would assist if I set out the facts of these four cases and attempted to analyse the judicial reasoning behind them. Indeed, I doubt whether it would be a permissible exercise in the circumstances of this case. My task has been to find facts, to analyse the Act and to decide whether its terms contravene the terms of the convention. I have also had to examine the English doctrine of estoppel. None of the four cases identified in [313], above, was based on the construction of a statute, let alone a statute in the same terms as the Act. Accordingly, whilst I found the decisions interesting, they do not assist me one way or the other in deciding this case.

THE RESULT

[315] The claims of both Ms Evans and Mrs Hadley must be dismissed. No doubt counsel, to whom this judgment will be circulated in advance, will be able to draw up the appropriate form of order to enable the clinics to remove the embryos from storage and allow them to perish.

FOOTNOTE

[316] I cannot leave the case without adding two comments. The first is my appreciation for the manner in which the case was conducted in court by both the lawyers and the parties. The hearing was dignified and calm, despite the highly emotive nature of the issues. Each of the claimants and the male defendants gave evidence with dignity and courtesy. I was very impressed with the professionalism and the dedication of the two medical specialists from whom I heard. All the witnesses were of a high quality.

[317] The second is my wish to repeat my sympathy for all four of the main protagonists. All four struck me as perfectly decent people locked into a dispute not of their choosing but deriving from the incapacity of the two claimants to conceive a child. In human terms, the greatest sympathy must, of course, be extended to Ms Evans, who, as a result of this case, now lacks the capacity to give birth to a child which is genetically hers.

[318] The Family Division, unfortunately, is only too used to the fact that nature often makes most fecund those least able properly to exercise parental responsibility, whilst at the same time denying parenthood to those who would undertake it conscientiously.

[319] It would be easy to criticise men in the position of Mr Johnston and Mr Hadley in this case. But such criticisms would, in my judgment, be facile and unfair. As I have found, a man in the position of these men is entitled to say that he does not want to become a father by a woman from whom he has separated, and with whom he no longer has anything in common apart from the frozen embryos created from their gametes. The Act places great emphasis on considerations relating to the position of the unborn child. As I make clear in the substance of the judgment, Mr Johnston and Mr Hadley would be the biological fathers of children for whom they would be financially responsible, but with whom they could not enjoy any form of natural paternal relationship.

[320] Furthermore, as Miss Rose pointed out, it is not difficult to reverse the dilemma. If a man has testicular cancer and his sperm, preserved prior to radical surgery which renders him permanently infertile, is used to create embryos with his partner; and if the couple have separated before the embryos are transferred into the woman, nobody would suggest that she could not withdraw her consent to treatment and refuse to have the embryos transferred into her. The statutory provisions, like convention rights, apply to men and to women equally.

Claims dismissed.

Celia Fox Barrister.

Wainwright and another v Home Office

[2003] UKHL 53

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL, LORD HOFFMANN, LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD, LORD HUTTON AND LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE

30 JUNE, 1, 2 JULY, 16 OCTOBER 2003

Tort – Cause of action – Invasion of privacy – Emotional distress – Whether there was a general common law tort of invasion of privacy – Whether damages were recoverable for intentionally causing emotional distress which did not constitute psychiatric injury – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 8.

In 1997 the claimants, a mother and son, paid a visit to another son who was in prison on remand. The prison authorities suspected that the prisoner was dealing in drugs while awaiting trial, but did not know how he obtained his supplies. The governor therefore gave instructions that anyone who wished to visit the prisoner had first to allow himself to be strip-searched. In accordance with those instructions, the claimants were, with their reluctant consent, strip-searched separately by prison officers before being allowed to visit the prisoner. Although the prison officers conducted the searches in good faith, they failed to comply fully with the prescribed procedure and for that reason the searches were not protected by statutory authority. When searching the son, one of the prison officers touched his penis. There was no other physical contact and there had been no intention to humiliate, but both claimants found the experience upsetting. A psychiatrist subsequently concluded that the son, who had physical and learning difficulties, had been so severely affected by his experience as to suffer post-traumatic stress disorder. He also concluded that the mother had suffered emotional distress, but not any recognised psychiatric illness. Both mother and son brought an action for damages against the Home Office. At trial, the Home Office accepted that touching the son's penis was a tortious battery constituting a trespass to the person. The judge concluded, however, that requiring the claimants to take off their clothes was also a form of trespass to the person. In doing so, he held, inter alia, that the law of tort should give a remedy for any kind of distress caused by an infringement of the right of privacy protected by art 8[a] of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as now set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). The judge therefore awarded damages to both claimants. The Court of Appeal disagreed with the judge's extension of the notion of trespass to the person, and accordingly set aside the judgments in favour of the claimants with the exception of the portion of the son's award that was attributable to the battery. On their appeal to the House of Lords, the claimants did not seek to apply the 1998 Act retrospectively, but contended that, in order to enable the United Kingdom to conform to its obligations under the convention, their Lordships should declare that there was (and in theory always had been) a tort of invasion of privacy under which the searches of both claimants were actionable a Article 8, so far as material, provides: '1. Everyone has the right to respect for his private ... life ... 2. There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society ...'

and damages for emotional distress recoverable. Alternatively, the claimants submitted that damages for distress falling short of psychiatric injury could be recovered if there was an intention to cause it; that the prison officers had performed acts calculated to cause distress to the claimants; and that they should therefore be liable on the basis of imputed intention. In support of their alternative submission, the claimants relied on a nineteenth century authority.

Held – There was no general common law tort of invasion of privacy. There was a great difference between identifying privacy as a value that underlay the existence of the rule of law (and might point the direction in which the law should develop) and privacy as a principle of law itself. Nor was there anything in the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights which suggested that the adoption of some high level principle of privacy was necessary to comply with art 8 of the convention. Moreover, the nineteenth century authority provided no remedy for distress which did not amount to recognised psychiatric injury, and, so far as there might be a tort of intention under which such damage was recoverable, the necessary intention had not been established in the instant case. If a principled distinction were to be drawn which justified abandoning the rule that damages for mere distress were not recoverable, imputed intention would not do. The defendant had actually to have acted in a way which he knew to be unjustifiable and intended to cause harm or at least to have acted without caring whether he caused harm or not. Even on the basis of a genuine intention to cause distress, opinion would be reserved on whether compensation should be recoverable, but in any event the facts of the instant case supported no claim on that basis. Accordingly, the appeal would be dismissed (see [1], [31], [32], [35], [45]–[47], [53]–[56], [64], below); Wilkinson v Downton [1895–9] All ER Rep 267 explained and distinguished; dicta of Sedley LJ in Douglas v Hello! Ltd [2001] 2 All ER 289 at 320 explained.

Per curiam. Where the 1998 Act applies, art 8 of the convention may justify a monetary remedy for an intentional invasion of privacy by a public authority, even if no damage is suffered other than distress for which damages are not ordinarily recoverable. It does not follow, however, that a merely negligent act should, contrary to general principles, give rise to a claim for damages for distress because it affects privacy rather than some other interest like bodily safety (see [1], [51], [54]–[56], below).

Decision of the Court of Appeal [2003] 3 All ER 943 affirmed.

Notes

For personal privacy under the common law and the convention right to privacy, see 8(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 110, 149–150, and for intentionally causing physical harm, see 45(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 456.

For the Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 8, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 555.

Cases referred to in opinions

Campbell v MGN Ltd [2002] EWCA Civ 1373, [2003] 1 All ER 224, [2003] QB 633, [2003] 2 WLR 80.

Collins v Wilcock [1984] 3 All ER 374, [1984] 1 WLR 1172, DC.

Derbyshire CC v Times Newspapers Ltd [1993] 1 All ER 1011, [1993] AC 534, [1993] 2 WLR 449, HL.

Douglas v Hello! Ltd [2001] 2 All ER 289, [2001] QB 967, [2001] 2 WLR 992, CA.

Dulieu v White & Sons [1901] 2 KB 669, [1900–3] All ER Rep 353, DC.
Hicks v Chief Constable of the South Yorkshire Police [1992] 2 All ER 65, HL.
Hunter v Canary Wharf Ltd, Hunter v London Docklands Development Corp [1997] 2 All ER 426, [1997] AC 655, [1997] 2 WLR 684, HL.
Iwanczuk v Poland [2001] ECHR 25196/94, ECt HR.
Janvier v Sweeney [1919] 2 KB 316, [1918–19] All ER Rep 1056, CA.
Kaye v Robertson [1991] FSR 62, CA.
Khan v UK (2000) 8 BHRC 310, ECt HR.
Khorasandjian v Bush [1993] 3 All ER 669, [1993] QB 727, [1993] 3 WLR 476, CA.
Letang v Cooper [1964] 2 All ER 929, [1965] 1 QB 232, [1964] 3 WLR 573, CA.
Lorsé v Netherlands [2003] ECHR 52750/99, ECt HR.
Malone v Comr of Police of the Metropolis [1979] 2 All ER 620, sub nom Malone v Metropolitan Police Comr [1979] Ch 344, [1979] 2 WLR 700.
Malone v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 14, [1984] 8691/79, ECt HR.
Peck v UK (2003) 13 BHRC 669, ECt HR.
R v Khan (Sultan) [1996] 3 All ER 289, [1997] AC 558, [1996] 3 WLR 162, HL.
Spencer (Earl) v UK (1998) 25 EHRR CD 105, E Com HR.
Valasinas v Lithuania [2001] ECHR 44558/98, ECt HR.
Victorian Railways Comrs v Coultas (1888) 13 App Cas 222, PC.
Wilkinson v Downton [1897] 2 QB 57, [1895–9] All ER Rep 267.
Wilson v Pringle [1986] 2 All ER 440, [1987] QB 237, [1986] 3 WLR 1, CA.
Wong v Parkside Health NHS Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 1721, [2003] 3 All ER 932.

Cases referred to in list of authorities

A v B (a company) [2002] EWCA Civ 337, [2002] 2 All ER 545, [2002] 3 WLR 542.
A-G v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1988] 3 All ER 545, [1990] 1 AC 109, [1988] 3 WLR 776, HL.
Alcock v Chief Constable of the South Yorkshire Police [1991] 4 All ER 907, [1992] 1 AC 310, [1991] 3 WLR 1057, HL.
Alcorn v Anbro Engineering Inc (1970) 468 P 2d 216, Cal SC.
Australian Broadcasting Corp v Lenah Game Meats Pty Ltd (2001) 185 ALR 1, Aust HC.
Bradley v Wingnut Films Ltd [1993] 1 NZLR 415, NZ HC.
Brind v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1991] 1 All ER 720, sub nom R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Brind [1991] 1 AC 696, [1991] 2 WLR 588, HL.
Chatterton v Gerson [1981] 1 All ER 257, [1981] QB 432, [1980] 3 WLR 1003.
Douglas v Hello! Ltd [2003] EWHC 786 (Ch), [2003] 3 All ER 996.
Freeman v Home Office [1984] 1 All ER 1036, [1984] QB 524, [1984] 2 WLR 802, CA.
Hellewell v Chief Constable of Derbyshire [1995] 4 All ER 473, [1995] 1 WLR 804.
Latter v Braddell (1881) 44 LT 369, CA.
Maclaine Watson & Co Ltd v Dept of Trade and Industry, Maclaine Watson & Co Ltd v International Tin Council [1989] 3 All ER 523, sub nom Rayner (JH) (Mincing Lane) Ltd v Dept of Trade and Industry [1990] 2 AC 418, [1989] 3 WLR 969, HL.
McLoughlin v O'Brian [1982] 2 All ER 298, [1983] 1 AC 410, [1982] 2 WLR 982, HL.
Morris v Beardmore [1980] 2 All ER 753, [1981] AC 446, [1980] 3 WLR 283, HL.
P v D [2000] 2 NZLR 591, NZ HC.
Page v Smith [1995] 2 All ER 736, [1996] AC 155, [1995] 2 WLR 644, HL.
R v Benjafield [2002] UKHL 2, [2002] 1 All ER 815, [2003] 1 AC 1099, [2002] 2 WLR 235.
R v Kansal (No 2) [2001] UKHL 62, [2002] 1 All ER 257, [2002] 2 AC 69, [2001] 3 WLR 1562.

R v Lambert [2001] UKHL 37, [2001] 3 All ER 577, [2002] 2 AC 545, [2001] 3 WLR 206.

R v Linekar [1995] 3 All ER 69, [1995] QB 250, [1995] 2 WLR 237, CA.

R v Lyons [2002] UKHL 44, [2002] 4 All ER 1028, [2003] 1 AC 976, [2002] 3 WLR 1562.

R v Richardson [1999] QB 444, [1998] 3 WLR 1292, CA.

Rookes v Barnard [1964] 1 All ER 367, [1964] AC 1129, [1964] 2 WLR 269, HL.

Sidaway v Bethlem Royal Hospital Governors [1985] 1 All ER 643, [1985] AC 871, [1985] 2 WLR 480, HL.

Stevenson v Basham [1922] NZLR 225, NZ SC.

Tucker v News Media Ownership Ltd [1986] 2 NZLR 716, NZ HC.

Venables v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2001] 1 All ER 908, [2001] Fam 430, [2001] 2 WLR 1038.

White v Chief Constable of the South Yorkshire Police [1999] 1 All ER 1, sub nom Frost v Chief Constable of the South Yorkshire Police [1999] 2 AC 455, [1998] 3 WLR 1509, HL.

Appeal

The claimants, Mary Jane Wainwright and her son Alan Joseph Wainwright (a patient suing by his mother as litigation friend), appealed with permission of the Court of Appeal (Lord Woolf CJ, Mummery and Buxton LJJ) from its decision on 20 December 2001 ([2001] EWCA Civ 2081, [2003] 3 All ER 943, [2002] QB 1334) whereby it (i) allowed an appeal by the defendant, the Home Office, from the order of Judge McGonigal in the Leeds County Court on 23 April 2001 giving judgment to Mrs Wainwright for damages of £2,600, and (ii) allowed the Home Office's appeal from that part of the order giving judgment to Mr Wainwright for damages of £4,500, and substituted instead an award of damages of £3,750 for battery. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Hoffmann.

David Wilby QC, Iain Christie and Ashley Serr (instructed by Restons, York) for the Wainwrights.

Ian Burnett QC, Robin Tam and Anna Kotzeva (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the Home Office.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

16 October 2003. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL.

[1] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann. I agree with it, and for the reasons which he gives I would dismiss this appeal.

LORD HOFFMANN.

[2] My Lords, on 15 August 1996 Patrick O'Neill was taken into custody on a charge of murder and held at Armley Prison, Leeds. The prison authorities suspected that while awaiting trial he was dealing in drugs. They did not know how he obtained his supplies but people who visit prisoners are a common source of drugs and other contraband. So the governor gave instructions that anyone who wanted an open visit with Patrick O'Neill had first to allow himself (or herself) to be strip-searched. Rule 86(1) of the Prison Rules 1964, SI 1964/388

(consolidated 1998) confers a power in general terms to search any person entering a prison.

[3] Strip-searching is controversial because having to take off your clothes in front of a couple of prison officers is not to everyone's taste. Leeds Prison has internal rules designed to reduce the embarrassment as far as possible. They are modelled on the code of practice issued to the police. The search must take place in a completely private room in the presence of two officers of the same sex as the visitor. The visitor is required to expose first the upper half of his body and then the lower but not to stand completely naked. His body (apart from hair, ears and mouth) is not to be touched. Before the search begins, the visitor is asked to sign a consent form which outlines the procedure to be followed.

[4] On 2 January 1997 Patrick O'Neill's mother Mrs Wainwright, together with her son Alan (Patrick's half-brother) went to visit him. A prison officer told them that they would have to be strip-searched. They reluctantly agreed and prison officers took them to separate rooms where they were asked to undress. They did as they were asked but both found the experience upsetting. Some time afterwards (it is unclear when) they went to a solicitor who had them examined by a psychiatrist. He concluded that Alan (who had physical and learning difficulties) had been so severely affected by his experience as to suffer post-traumatic stress disorder. Mrs Wainwright had suffered emotional distress but no recognised psychiatric illness.

[5] Mrs Wainwright and Alan commenced an action against the Home Office on 23 December 1999, just before the expiry of the limitation period. By the time the case came to trial in April 2001, none of the prison officers could remember searching the Wainwrights. They, on the other hand, gave evidence, which the judge accepted, that the search had not been conducted in accordance with the rules. Both had been asked to uncover all or virtually all of their bodies at the same time, both were not given the consent form until after the search had been completed, the room used to search Mrs Wainwright was not private because it had an uncurtained window from which someone across the street could have seen her and one prison officer had touched Alan's penis to lift his foreskin.

[6] Judge McGonigal, who heard the action in the Leeds County Court, said that the searches could not be justified as a proper use of the statutory power conferred by r 86(1). He gave two reasons. The first was that the strip-searching of the Wainwrights was an invasion of their privacy which exceeded what was necessary and proportionate to deal with the drug smuggling problem. Although the prison officers honestly believed that they had a right under the rules to search the Wainwrights, they should not have done so because it would have been sufficient to search Patrick O'Neill after they left. The second reason was that the prison authorities had not adhered to their own rules. The Court of Appeal ([2001] EWCA Civ 2081, [2003] 3 All ER 943, [2002] QB 1334) agreed with the second reason but not the first. Lord Woolf CJ, who has considerable experience of the administration of prisons, said (at [54]) that a search of Patrick O'Neill would have been inadequate. It followed that '[o]n the findings of the judge, searching, if it had been properly conducted, was perfectly appropriate'. On the other hand, Lord Woolf CJ agreed that if there were clearly laid down restrictions on how the search was to be conducted, conduct which did not observe those restrictions could not (if otherwise actionable) be justified.

[7] The conclusion of both the judge and the Court of Appeal was therefore that the searches were not protected by statutory authority. But that is not enough to give the Wainwrights a claim to compensation. The acts of the prison officers needed statutory authority only if they would otherwise have been wrongful, that is to say, tortious or in breach of a statutory duty. People do all kinds of things without statutory authority. So the question is whether the searches themselves or the manner in which they were conducted gave the Wainwrights a cause of action.

[8] The judge found two causes of action, both of which he derived from the action for trespass. As Diplock LJ pointed out in Letang v Cooper [1964] 2 All ER 929 at 934–935, [1965] 1 QB 232 at 243, trespass is strictly speaking not a cause of action but a form of action. It was the form anciently used for a variety of different kinds of claim which had as their common element the fact that the damage was caused directly rather than indirectly; if the damage was indirect, the appropriate form of action was the action on the case. After the abolition of the forms of action trespass is no more than a convenient label for certain causes of action which derive historically from the old action for trespass vi et armis. One group of such causes of action is trespass to the person, which includes the torts of assault, battery and false imprisonment, each with its own conditions of liability.

[9] Battery involves a touching of the person with what is sometimes called hostile intent (as opposed to a friendly pat on the back) but which Robert Goff LJ in Collins v Wilcock [1984] 3 All ER 374 at 378, [1984] 1 WLR 1172 at 1177 redefined as meaning any intentional physical contact which was not 'generally acceptable in the ordinary conduct of daily life': see also Wilson v Pringle [1986] 2 All ER 440, [1987] QB 237. Counsel for the Home Office conceded that touching Alan's penis was not acceptable and was therefore a battery.

[10] That, however, was the only physical contact which had occurred. The judge nevertheless held that requiring the Wainwrights to take off their clothes was also a form of trespass to the person. He arrived at this conclusion by the use of two strands of reasoning. First, he said that a line of authority starting with Wilkinson v Downton [1897] 2 QB 57, [1895–9] All ER Rep 267, which I shall have to examine later in some detail, had extended the conduct which could constitute trespass to the utterance of words which were 'calculated' to cause physical (including psychiatric) harm. There was in his view little distinction between words which directly caused such harm and words which induced someone to act in a way which caused himself harm, like taking his own clothes off. So inducing Alan to take off his clothes and thereby suffer post-traumatic stress disorder was actionable.

[11] The judge recognised, however, that in the cases upon which he relied the claimant had suffered a recognised psychiatric injury. Mrs Wainwright had not. It seemed to him illogical to deny her a remedy for distress because her constitution was sufficiently robust to protect her from psychiatric injury. So the second strand of his reasoning was that the law of tort should give a remedy for any kind of distress caused by an infringement of the right of privacy protected by art 8 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as now set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights 1998). At the time of the incident the 1998 Act had not yet come into force but the judge considered that he was justified in adapting the common law to the convention by analogy with the principle by which, even before the 1998 Act, the courts interpreted statutes so as to conform, if possible, to the convention.

[12] The judge therefore found in favour of both Wainwrights. He awarded Mrs Wainwright damages of £2,600, divided into £1,600 'basic' and £1,000 aggravated damages, and Alan £4,500, divided into £3,500 basic and £1,000 aggravated. The award to Alan did not distinguish between the damages for the battery and the injury caused by having to strip.

[13] The Court of Appeal did not agree with the judge's extensions of the notion of trespass to the person and did not consider that (apart from the battery, which was unchallenged) the prison officers had committed any other wrongful act. So they set aside the judgments in favour of the Wainwrights with the exception of the damages for battery, to which they attributed £3,750 of the £4,500 awarded by the judge.

[14] The Wainwrights appeal to your Lordships' House. Their counsel (Mr Wilby QC and Mr Christie) put the case in two ways. The first was that, in order to enable the United Kingdom to conform to its international obligations under the convention, the House should declare that there is (and in theory always has been) a tort of invasion of privacy under which the searches of both Wainwrights were actionable and damages for emotional distress recoverable. This does not give retrospective effect to the 1998 Act. It accepts that the convention, at the relevant time, operated only at the level of international law. Indeed, the argument (if valid) would have been equally valid at any time since the United Kingdom acceded to the convention. Alternatively, counsel proposed that if a general tort of invasion of privacy seemed too bold an undertaking, the House could comply with the convention in respect of this particular invasion by an extension of the principle in Wilkinson v Downton [1897] 2 QB 57, [1895–9] All ER Rep 267.

[15] My Lords, let us first consider the proposed tort of invasion of privacy. Since the famous article by Warren and Brandeis ('The Right to Privacy' (1890) 4 Harv LR 193) the question of whether such a tort exists, or should exist, has been much debated in common law jurisdictions. Warren and Brandeis suggested that one could generalise certain cases on defamation, breach of copyright in unpublished letters, trade secrets and breach of confidence as all based upon the protection of a common value which they called privacy or, following Judge Cooley (Cooley on Torts (2nd edn, 1888) p 29) 'the right to be let alone'. They said that identifying this common element should enable the courts to declare the existence of a general principle which protected a person's appearance, sayings, acts and personal relations from being exposed in public.

[16] Courts in the United States were receptive to this proposal and a jurisprudence of privacy began to develop. It became apparent, however, that the developments could not be contained within a single principle; not, at any rate, one with greater explanatory power than the proposition that it was based upon the protection of a value which could be described as privacy. Dean Prosser, in his work on The Law of Torts (4th edn, 1971) p 804, said:

> 'What has emerged is no very simple matter ... it is not one tort, but a complex of four. To date the law of privacy comprises four distinct kinds of invasion of four different interests of the plaintiff, which are tied together by the common name, but otherwise have almost nothing in common except that each represents an interference with the right of the plaintiff "to be let alone".'

[17] Dean Prosser's taxonomy divided the subject into: (1) intrusion upon the plaintiff's physical solitude or seclusion (including unlawful searches, telephone tapping, long-distance photography and telephone harassment); (2) public disclosure of private facts; and (3) publicity putting the plaintiff in a false light; and (4) appropriation, for the defendant's advantage, of the plaintiff's name or likeness. These, he said, had different elements and were subject to different defences (p 814).

[18] The need in the United States to break down the concept of 'invasion of privacy' into a number of loosely-linked torts must cast doubt upon the value of any high-level generalisation which can perform a useful function in enabling one to deduce the rule to be applied in a concrete case. English law has so far been unwilling, perhaps unable, to formulate any such high-level principle. There are a number of common law and statutory remedies of which it may be said that one at least of the underlying values they protect is a right of privacy. Sir Brian Neill's well-known article 'Privacy: a challenge for the next century' in Protecting Privacy (ed B Markesinis) (1999) contains a survey. Common law torts include trespass, nuisance, defamation and malicious falsehood; there is the equitable action for breach of confidence and statutory remedies under the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 and the Data Protection Act 1998. There are also extra-legal remedies under codes of practice applicable to broadcasters and newspapers. But there are gaps; cases in which the courts have considered that an invasion of privacy deserves a remedy which the existing law does not offer. Sometimes the perceived gap can be filled by judicious development of an existing principle. The law of breach of confidence has in recent years undergone such a process: see in particular the judgment of Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR in Campbell v MGN Ltd [2002] EWCA Civ 1373, [2003] 1 All ER 224, [2003] QB 633. On the other hand, an attempt to create a tort of telephone harassment by a radical change in the basis of the action for private nuisance in Khorasandjian v Bush [1993] 3 All ER 669, [1993] QB 727 was held by the House of Lords in Hunter v Canary Wharf Ltd, Hunter v London Docklands Development Corp [1997] 2 All ER 426, [1997] AC 655 to be a step too far. The gap was filled by the 1997 Act.

[19] What the courts have so far refused to do is to formulate a general principle of 'invasion of privacy' (I use the quotation marks to signify doubt about what in such a context the expression would mean) from which the conditions of liability in the particular case can be deduced. The reasons were discussed by Megarry V-C in Malone v Comr of Police of the Metropolis [1979] 2 All ER 620 at 642–649, [1979] Ch 344 at 372–381. I shall be sparing in citation but the whole of Megarry V-C's treatment of the subject deserves careful reading. The question was whether the plaintiff had a cause of action for having his telephone tapped by the police without any trespass upon his land. This was (as the European Court of Justice subsequently held in Malone v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 14) an infringement by a public authority of his right to privacy under art 8 of the convention, but because there had been no trespass, it gave rise to no identifiable cause of action in English law. Megarry V-C was invited to declare that invasion of privacy, at any rate in respect of telephone conversations, was in itself a cause of action. He said ([1979] 2 All ER 620 at 642, [1979] Ch 344 at 372):

> '... I am not unduly troubled by the absence of English authority: there has to be a first time for everything, and, if the principles of English law, and not least analogies from the existing rules, together with the requirements of justice and common sense, pointed firmly to such a right existing, then I think the court should not be deterred from recognising the right. On the other hand, it is no function of the courts to legislate in a new field. The extension of the existing laws and principles is one thing, the creation of an altogether new right is another.'

[20] As for the analogy of construing statutes in accordance with the convention, which appealed to the judge in the present case, Sir Robert said ([1979] 2 All ER 620 at 647–648, [1979] Ch 344 at 379):

> 'I readily accept that if the question before me were one of construing a statute enacted with the purpose of giving effect to obligations imposed by the convention, the court would readily seek to construe the legislation in a way that would effectuate the convention rather than frustrate it. However, no relevant legislation of that sort is in existence. It seems to me that where Parliament has abstained from legislating on a point that is plainly suitable for legislation, it is indeed difficult for the court to lay down new rules of common law or equity that will carry out the Crown's treaty obligations, or to discover for the first time that such rules have always existed.'

[21] Megarry V-C pointed out ([1979] 2 All ER 620 at 649, [1979] Ch 344 at 380) that the problem about telephone tapping was not in formulating the generalisation that the state should not ordinarily listen to one's telephone calls but in specifying the circumstances under which it should be allowed to do so. This required detailed rules and not broad common law principles:

> 'Give full rein to the convention, and it is clear that when the object of the surveillance is the detection of crime, the question is not whether there ought to be a general prohibition of all surveillance, but in what circumstances, and subject to what conditions and restrictions, it ought to be permitted. It is those circumstances, conditions and restrictions which are at the centre of this case; and yet it is they which are the least suitable for determination by judicial decision.'

[22] Once again, Parliament provided a remedy, subject to a detailed code of exceptions, in the Interception of Communications Act 1985. A similar problem arose in R v Khan (Sultan) [1996] 3 All ER 289, [1997] AC 558, in which the defendant in criminal proceedings complained that the police had invaded his privacy by using a listening device fixed to the outside of a house. There was some discussion of whether the law should recognise a right to privacy which had been prima facie infringed, but no concluded view was expressed because all their Lordships thought that any such right must be subject to exceptions, particularly in connection with the detection of crime, and that the accused's privacy had been sufficiently taken into account by the judge when he exercised his discretion under s 78 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 to admit the evidence obtained by the device at the criminal trial. The European Court of Human Rights subsequently held (Khan v UK (2000) 8 BHRC 310) that the invasion of privacy could not be justified under art 8 because, in the absence of any statutory regulation, the actions of the police had not been 'in accordance with law'. By that time, however, Parliament had intervened in the Police Act 1997 to put the use of surveillance devices on a statutory basis.

[23] The absence of any general cause of action for invasion of privacy was again acknowledged by the Court of Appeal in Kaye v Robertson [1991] FSR 62, in which a newspaper reporter and photographer invaded the plaintiff's hospital bedroom, purported to interview him and took photographs. The law of trespass provided no remedy because the plaintiff was not owner or occupier of the room and his body had not been touched. Publication of the interview was restrained by interlocutory injunction on the ground that it was arguably a malicious falsehood to represent that the plaintiff had consented to it. But no other remedy was available. At the time of the judgment (16 March 1990) a committee under the chairmanship of Sir David Calcutt QC (the Calcutt Committee) was considering whether individual privacy required statutory protection against intrusion by the press. Glidewell LJ said (at 66):

> 'The facts of the present case are a graphic illustration of the desirability of Parliament considering whether and in what circumstances statutory provision can be made to protect the privacy of individuals.'

[24] Bingham LJ likewise said (at 70):

> 'The problems of defining and limiting a tort of privacy are formidable, but the present case strengthens my hope that the review now in progress may prove fruitful.'

[25] Leggatt LJ (at 71) referred to Dean Prosser's analysis of the development of the law of privacy in the United States and said that similar rights could be created in England only by statute: '... it is to be hoped that the making good of this signal shortcoming in our law will not be long delayed.'

[26] All three judgments are flat against a judicial power to declare the existence of a high-level right to privacy and I do not think that they suggest that the courts should do so. The members of the Court of Appeal certainly thought that it would be desirable if there was legislation to confer a right to protect the privacy of a person in the position of Mr Kaye against the kind of intrusion which he suffered, but they did not advocate any wider principle. And when the Calcutt Committee reported in June 1990, they did indeed recommend that 'entering private property, without the consent of the lawful occupant, with intent to obtain personal information with a view to its publication' should be made a criminal offence: see Report of the Committee on Privacy and Related Matters (Cm 1102) para 6.33. The Calcutt Committee also recommended that certain other forms of intrusion, like the use of surveillance devices on private property and long-distance photography and sound recording, should be made offences.

[27] But the Calcutt Committee did not recommend, even within their terms of reference (which were confined to press intrusion) the creation of a generalised tort of infringement of privacy (para 12.5). This was not because they thought that the definitional problems were insuperable. They said that if one confined the tort to 'publication of personal information to the world at large' (para 12.12) it should be possible to produce an adequate definition and they made some suggestions about how such a statutory tort might be defined and what the defences should be. But they considered that the problem could be tackled more effectively by a combination of the more sharply-focused remedies which they recommended (para 12.32). As for a 'general wrong of infringement of privacy', they accepted (para 12.12) that it would, even in statutory form, give rise to 'an unacceptable degree of uncertainty'. There is nothing in the opinions of the judges in Kaye's case which suggests that the members of the court would have held any view, one way or the other, about a general tort of privacy.

[28] The claimants placed particular reliance upon the judgment of Sedley LJ in Douglas v Hello! Ltd [2001] 2 All ER 289, [2001] QB 967. Sedley LJ drew attention to the way in which the development of the law of confidence had attenuated the need for a relationship of confidence between the recipient of the confidential information and the person from whom it was obtained—a development which enabled the United Kingdom government to persuade the European Commission of Human Rights in Earl Spencer v UK (1998) 25 EHRR CD

105 that English law of confidence provided an adequate remedy to restrain the publication of private information about the applicants' marriage and medical condition and photographs taken with a telephoto lens. These developments showed that the basic value protected by the law in such cases was privacy. Sedley LJ said ([2001] 2 All ER 289 at 320, [2001] QB 967 at 1001 (para 126)):

> 'What a concept of privacy does, however, is accord recognition to the fact that the law has to protect not only those people whose trust has been abused but those who simply find themselves subjected to an unwanted intrusion into their personal lives. The law no longer needs to construct an artificial relationship of confidentiality between intruder and victim: it can recognise privacy itself as a legal principle drawn from the fundamental value of personal autonomy.'

[29] I read these remarks as suggesting that, in relation to the publication of personal information obtained by intrusion, the common law of breach of confidence has reached the point at which a confidential relationship has become unnecessary. As the underlying value protected is privacy, the action might as well be renamed invasion of privacy. 'To say this' said Sedley LJ ([2001] 2 All ER 289 at 320, [2001] QB 967 at 1001 (para 125)), 'is in my belief to say little, save by way of a label, that our courts have not said already over the years'.

[30] I do not understand Sedley LJ to have been advocating the creation of a high-level principle of invasion of privacy. His observations are in my opinion no more (although certainly no less) than a plea for the extension and possibly renaming of the old action for breach of confidence. As Buxton LJ pointed out in this case in the Court of Appeal ([2003] 3 All ER 943 at [96]–[99], [2002] QB 1334 at [96]–[99]), such an extension would go further than any English court has yet gone and would be contrary to some cases (such as Kaye v Robertson [1991] FSR 62) in which it positively declined to do so. The question must wait for another day. But Sedley LJ's dictum does not support a principle of privacy so abstract as to include the circumstances of the present case.

[31] There seems to me a great difference between identifying privacy as a value which underlies the existence of a rule of law (and may point the direction in which the law should develop) and privacy as a principle of law in itself. The English common law is familiar with the notion of underlying values—principles only in the broadest sense—which direct its development. A famous example is Derbyshire CC v Times Newspapers Ltd [1993] 1 All ER 1011, [1993] AC 534, in which freedom of speech was the underlying value which supported the decision to lay down the specific rule that a local authority could not sue for libel. But no one has suggested that freedom of speech is in itself a legal principle which is capable of sufficient definition to enable one to deduce specific rules to be applied in concrete cases. That is not the way the common law works.

[32] Nor is there anything in the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights which suggests that the adoption of some high level principle of privacy is necessary to comply with art 8 of the convention. The European Court is concerned only with whether English law provides an adequate remedy in a specific case in which it considers that there has been an invasion of privacy contrary to art 8(1) and not justifiable under art 8(2). So in Earl Spencer's case it was satisfied that the action for breach of confidence provided an adequate remedy for the Spencers' complaint and looked no further into the rest of the armoury of remedies available to the victims of other invasions of privacy. Likewise, in Peck v UK (2003) 13 BHRC 669 at 692 (para 103) the court expressed some impatience at being given a tour d'horizon of the remedies provided and to be provided by English law to deal with every imaginable kind of invasion of privacy. It was concerned with whether Mr Peck (who had been filmed in embarrassing circumstances by a CCTV camera) had an adequate remedy when the film was widely published by the media. It came to the conclusion that he did not.

[33] Counsel for the Wainwrights relied upon Peck's case as demonstrating the need for a general tort of invasion of privacy. But in my opinion it shows no more than the need, in English law, for a system of control of the use of film from CCTV cameras which shows greater sensitivity to the feelings of people who happen to have been caught by the lens. For the reasons so cogently explained by Megarry V-C in Malone v Comr of Police of the Metropolis [1979] 2 All ER 620, [1979] Ch 344, this is an area which requires a detailed approach which can be achieved only by legislation rather than the broad brush of common law principle.

[34] Furthermore, the coming into force of the 1998 Act weakens the argument for saying that a general tort of invasion of privacy is needed to fill gaps in the existing remedies. Sections 6 and 7 of the Act are in themselves substantial gap fillers; if it is indeed the case that a person's rights under art 8 have been infringed by a public authority, he will have a statutory remedy. The creation of a general tort will, as Buxton LJ pointed out in the Court of Appeal ([2003] 3 All ER 943 at [92], [2003] QB 1334 at [92]) pre-empt the controversial question of the extent, if any, to which the convention requires the state to provide remedies for invasions of privacy by persons who are not public authorities.

[35] For these reasons I would reject the invitation to declare that since at the latest 1950 there has been a previously unknown tort of invasion of privacy.

[36] I turn next to the alternative argument based upon Wilkinson v Downton [1897] 2 QB 57, [1895–9] All ER Rep 267. This is a case which has been far more often discussed than applied. Thomas Wilkinson, landlord of the Albion public house in Limehouse, went by train to the races at Harlow, leaving his wife Lavinia behind the bar. Downton was a customer who decided to play what he would no doubt have described as a practical joke on Mrs Wilkinson. He went into the Albion and told her that her husband had decided to return in a horse-drawn vehicle which had been involved in an accident in which he had been seriously injured. The story was completely false and Mr Wilkinson returned safely by train later that evening. But the effect on Mrs Wilkinson was dramatic. Her hair turned white and she became so ill that for some time her life was thought in danger. The jury awarded her £100 for nervous shock and the question for the judge on further consideration was whether she had a cause of action.

[37] The difficulty in the judge's way was the decision of the Privy Council in Victorian Railways Comrs v Coultas (1888) 13 App Cas 222, in which it had been said that nervous shock was too remote a consequence of a negligent act (in that case, putting the plaintiff in imminent fear of being run down by a train) to be a recoverable head of damages. Wright J distinguished the case on the ground that Downton was not merely negligent but had intended to cause injury. Quite what the judge meant by this is not altogether clear; Downton obviously did not intend to cause any kind of injury but merely to give Mrs Wilkinson a fright. The judge said, however ([1897] 2 QB 57 at 59, [1895–9] All ER Rep 267 at 269) that as what he said could not fail to produce grave effects 'upon any but an exceptionally indifferent person', an intention to cause such effects should be 'imputed' to him.

[38] The outcome of the case was approved and the reasoning commented upon by the Court of Appeal in Janvier v Sweeney [1919] 2 KB 316, [1918–19] All ER Rep 1056. During the First World War Mlle Janvier lived as a paid companion in a house in Mayfair and corresponded with her German lover who was interned as an enemy alien on the Isle of Man. Sweeney was a private detective who wanted secretly to obtain some of her employer's documents and sent his assistant to induce her to co-operate by pretending to be from Scotland Yard and saying that the authorities wanted her because she was corresponding with a German spy. Mlle Janvier suffered severe nervous shock from which she took a long time to recover. The jury awarded her £250.

[39] By this time, no one was troubled by the Victorian Railways Comrs case. In Dulieu v White & Sons [1901] 2 KB 669, [1900–3] All ER Rep 353 the Divisional Court had declined to follow it; Phillimore J said ([1901] 2 KB 669 at 683, [1900–3] All ER Rep 353 at 361) that in principle 'terror wrongfully induced and inducing physical mischief gives a cause of action'. So on that basis Mlle Janvier was entitled to succeed whether the detectives intended to cause her injury or were merely negligent as to the consequences of their threats. Duke LJ observed ([1919] 2 KB 316 at 326, [1918–19] All ER Rep 1056 at 1061) that the case was stronger than Wilkinson v Downton because Downton had intended merely to play a practical joke and not to commit a wrongful act. The detectives, on the other hand, intended to blackmail the plaintiff to attain an unlawful object.

[40] By the time of Janvier's case, therefore, the law was able comfortably to accommodate the facts of Wilkinson v Downton in the law of nervous shock caused by negligence. It was unnecessary to fashion a tort of intention or to discuss what the requisite intention, actual or imputed, should be. Indeed, the remark of Duke LJ to which I have referred suggests that he did not take seriously the idea that Downton had in any sense intended to cause injury.

[41] Commentators and counsel have nevertheless been unwilling to allow Wilkinson v Downton to disappear beneath the surface of the law of negligence. Although, in cases of actual psychiatric injury, there is no point in arguing about whether the injury was in some sense intentional if negligence will do just as well, it has been suggested (as the claimants submit in this case) that damages for distress falling short of psychiatric injury can be recovered if there was an intention to cause it. This submission was squarely put to the Court of Appeal in Wong v Parkside Health NHS Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 1721, [2003] 3 All ER 932 and rejected. Hale LJ said that before the passing of the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 there was no tort of intentional harassment which gave a remedy for anything less than physical or psychiatric injury. That leaves Wilkinson v Downton with no leading role in the modern law.

[42] In Khorasandjian v Bush [1993] 3 All ER 669, [1993] QB 727 the Court of Appeal, faced with the absence of a tort of causing distress by harassment, tried to press into service the action for private nuisance. In Hunter v Canary Wharf Ltd, Hunter v London Docklands Development Corp [1997] 2 All ER 426, [1997] AC 655, as I have already mentioned, the House of Lords regarded this as illegitimate and, in view of the passing of the 1997 Act, unnecessary. I did however observe ([1997] 2 All ER 426 at 452, [1997] AC 655 at 707) that:

> 'The law of harassment has now been put on a statutory basis ... and it is unnecessary to consider how the common law might have developed. But as at present advised, I see no reason why a tort of intention should be subject to the rule which excludes compensation for mere distress, inconvenience or > discomfort in actions based on negligence ... The policy considerations are quite different.'

[43] Mr Wilby said that the Court of Appeal in Wong's case should have adopted this remark and awarded Ms Wong damages for distress caused by intentional harassment before the 1997 Act came into force. Likewise, the prison officers in this case did acts calculated to cause distress to the Wainwrights and therefore should be liable on the basis of imputed intention as in Wilkinson v Downton.

[44] I do not resile from the proposition that the policy considerations which limit the heads of recoverable damage in negligence do not apply equally to torts of intention. If someone actually intends to cause harm by a wrongful act and does so, there is ordinarily no reason why he should not have to pay compensation. But I think that if you adopt such a principle, you have to be very careful about what you mean by intend. In Wilkinson v Downton Wright J wanted to water down the concept of intention as much as possible. He clearly thought, as the Court of Appeal did afterwards in Janvier's case, that the plaintiff should succeed whether the conduct of the defendant was intentional or negligent. But the Victorian Railway Comrs case prevented him from saying so. So he devised a concept of imputed intention which sailed as close to negligence as he felt he could go.

[45] If, on the other hand, one is going to draw a principled distinction which justifies abandoning the rule that damages for mere distress are not recoverable, imputed intention will not do. The defendant must actually have acted in a way which he knew to be unjustifiable and either intended to cause harm or at least acted without caring whether he caused harm or not. Lord Woolf CJ, as I read his judgment ([2003] 3 All ER 943 at [50]–[51], [2002] QB 1334 at [50]–[51]), might have been inclined to accept such a principle. But the facts did not support a claim on this basis. The judge made no finding that the prison officers intended to cause distress or realised that they were acting without justification in asking the Wainwrights to strip. He said that they had acted in good faith and that—

> 'The deviations from the procedure laid down for strip searches were, in my judgment, not intended to increase the humiliation necessarily involved but merely sloppiness.'

[46] Even on the basis of a genuine intention to cause distress, I would wish, as in Hunter v Canary Wharf Ltd, to reserve my opinion on whether compensation should be recoverable. In institutions and workplaces all over the country, people constantly do and say things with the intention of causing distress and humiliation to others. This shows lack of consideration and appalling manners but I am not sure that the right way to deal with it is always by litigation. The Protection from Harassment Act 1997 defines harassment in s 1(1) as a 'course of conduct' amounting to harassment and provides by s 7(3) that a course of conduct must involve conduct on at least two occasions. If these requirements are satisfied, the claimant may pursue a civil remedy for damages for anxiety: see s 3(2). The requirement of a course of conduct shows that Parliament was conscious that it might not be in the public interest to allow the law to be set in motion for one boorish incident. It may be that any development of the common law should show similar caution.

[47] In my opinion, therefore, the claimants can build nothing on Wilkinson v Downton [1897] 2 QB 57, [1895–9] All ER Rep 267. It does not provide a remedy for distress which does not amount to recognised psychiatric injury and so far as there may be a tort of intention under which such damage is recoverable, the necessary intention was not established. I am also in complete agreement with Buxton LJ ([2003] 3 All ER 943 at [67]–[72], [2002] QB 1334 at [67]–[72]) that Wilkinson v Downton has nothing to do with trespass to the person.

[48] Counsel for the Wainwrights submit that unless the law is extended to create a tort which covers the facts of the present case, it is inevitable that the European Court of Human Rights will find that the United Kingdom was in breach of its convention obligation to provide a remedy for infringements of convention rights. In addition to a breach of art 8, they say that the prison officers infringed their convention right under art 3 not to be subjected to degrading treatment.

[49] I have no doubt that there was no infringement of art 3. The conduct of the searches came nowhere near the degree of humiliation which has been held by the European Court of Human Rights to be degrading treatment in the cases on prison searches to which we were referred: see Valasinas v Lithuania [2001] ECHR 44558/98 (applicant made to strip naked and have his sexual organs touched in front of a woman); Iwanczuk v Poland [2001] ECHR 25196/94 (applicant ordered to strip naked and subjected to humiliating abuse by guards when he tried to exercise his right to vote in facilities provided in prison); Lorsé v Netherlands [2003] ECHR 52750/99 (applicant strip searched weekly over six years in high security wing without sufficient security justification).

[50] In the present case, the judge found that the prison officers acted in good faith and that there had been no more than 'sloppiness' in the failures to comply with the rules. The prison officers did not wish to humiliate the claimants; the evidence of Mrs Wainwright was that they carried out the search in a matter-of-fact way and were speaking to each other about unrelated matters. The Wainwrights were upset about having to be searched but made no complaint about the manner of the search; Mrs Wainwright did not ask for the blind to be drawn over the window or to be allowed to take off her clothes in any particular order and both of them afterwards signed the consent form without reading it but also without protest. The only inexplicable act was the search of Alan's penis, which the prison officers were unable to explain because they could not remember having done it. But this has been fully compensated.

[51] Article 8 is more difficult. Buxton LJ thought ([2003] 3 All ER 943 at [62], [2002] QB 1334 at [62]), that the Wainwrights would have had a strong case for relief under s 7 if the 1998 Act had been in force. Speaking for myself, I am not so sure. Although art 8 guarantees a right of privacy, I do not think that it treats that right as having been invaded and requiring a remedy in damages, irrespective of whether the defendant acted intentionally, negligently or accidentally. It is one thing to wander carelessly into the wrong hotel bedroom and another to hide in the wardrobe to take photographs. Article 8 may justify a monetary remedy for an intentional invasion of privacy by a public authority, even if no damage is suffered other than distress for which damages are not ordinarily recoverable. It does not follow that a merely negligent act should, contrary to general principle, give rise to a claim for damages for distress because it affects privacy rather than some other interest like bodily safety: compare Hicks v Chief Constable of the South Yorkshire Police [1992] 2 All ER 65.

[52] Be that as it may, a finding that there was a breach of art 8 will only demonstrate that there was a gap in the English remedies for invasion of privacy which has since been filled by ss 6 and 7 of the 1998 Act. It does not require that the courts should provide an alternative remedy which distorts the principles of the common law. a [53] I would therefore dismiss the appeal.

LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD.

[54] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann. I agree with it, and for the reasons which he gives I too would dismiss this appeal. b

LORD HUTTON.

[55] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann. I agree with it, and for the reasons which he gives I too would dismiss this appeal. c

LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE.

[56] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in advance the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Hoffmann and am in full agreement with his analysis and exposition of the principles of law applicable to this case. d

[57] The essence of the complaint of each claimant is that he or she was subjected to conduct by the prison officers at Armley Prison, Leeds, that was calculated to, and did, cause humiliation and distress. The main issue is whether this conduct was tortious. In the case of each the strip search was carried out in a manner that, in a number of respects, was in breach of the procedures prescribed for strip searches by the internal rules of Armley Prison. And whether or not it was the intention of the prison officers to humiliate and cause distress to Mrs Wainwright and to Alan, it must, in my opinion, be accepted that the manner in which the strip searches were carried out was calculated (in an objective sense) to produce and did in fact, in relation to each of them, produce that result. I need not rehearse the relevant core facts. They are set out in [5], above. e f

[58] But there is an important difference between the case of Alan Wainwright and that of Mrs Wainwright. In the course of, and as part of, the strip search of Alan, one of the prison officers poked a finger into Alan's armpits, handled his penis and pulled back his foreskin. It is conceded by the defendant that this touching of Alan constituted battery. The commission of the battery, being part of the conduct of the strip search, was inextricably associated with the overall humiliation and distress caused to Alan by the strip search. No justification for the handling of Alan's penis in the way described, or indeed for any of the touching of him, was offered by the prison officers. They said they had no recollection of the strip searching of Alan but that they would, when carrying out a strip search, have followed the prescribed procedure and avoided any touching of the person being searched. But the trial judge accepted Alan's evidence to the contrary of what they had done to him. Counsel for the defendant, the Secretary of State, did not suggest that there could ever be circumstances in which a strip search with a view to discovering the presence of drugs on the person being searched would require the foreskin of the penis to be pulled back, or indeed the penis to be touched at all. For my part I am unable to understand how in any circumstances the pulling back of the foreskin could be a necessary part of a search for drugs. g h j

[59] The pulling back of Alan Wainwright's foreskin by the prison officers constituted as gross an indignity as can be imagined. It undeniably warranted an award of aggravated damages. The judge awarded Alan £3,500 ordinary damages and £1,000 aggravated damages. He did so on the footing that even without the touching, ie without the battery, the conduct of the strip search would have been tortious. The Court of Appeal disagreed with that conclusion. They held that if there had been no touching the prison officers' conduct would not have been tortious and they, therefore, reduced Alan's damages by £750.

[60] My Lords I am doubtful whether this reduction was justified. I agree with the Court of Appeal, and with your Lordships, that if there had been no touching, as there was not in Mrs Wainwright's case, no tort would have been committed. The unjustified infliction of humiliation and distress does not, without more, suffice at common law to constitute a tort. But the touching of Alan, in his armpits and on his penis, and the humiliation and distress thereby caused to him, cannot in my opinion be separated out from the strip search as a whole and the humiliation and distress caused by the strip search as a whole. The touching was an integral part of the strip search, neither minor nor incidental. Accordingly, I would have been receptive to an argument that, whatever view be taken about the existence at common law of a tort based on the infliction of humiliation and distress, the judge's award to Alan of £4,500 should have been left untouched.

[61] Moreover, the award to Alan of £1,000 aggravated damages was, in my opinion, distinctly on the low side. It was the same amount as that awarded to Mrs Wainwright who did not suffer the humiliation of having her sexual parts handled. And the absence of any possible justification for the handling of Alan's penis allows the inference to be drawn that it was a form of bullying, done with the intention to humiliate. However, no argument on these lines was addressed to your Lordships. The claimants have not sought to distinguish their respective cases. They have concentrated on the issue of principle.

[62] The important issue of principle is not, in my opinion, whether English common law recognises a tort of invasion of privacy. As Lord Hoffmann has demonstrated, whatever remedies may have been developed for misuse of confidential information, for certain types of trespass, for certain types of nuisance and for various other situations in which claimants may find themselves aggrieved by an invasion of what they conceive to be their privacy, the common law has not developed an overall remedy for the invasion of privacy. The issue of importance in the present case is whether the infliction of humiliation and distress by conduct calculated to humiliate and cause distress, is without more, tortious at common law. I am in full agreement with the reasons that have been given by Lord Hoffmann for concluding that it is not. Nor, in my opinion, should it be. Some institutions, schools, university colleges, regiments and the like (often bad ones) have initiation ceremonies and rites which newcomers are expected to undergo. Ritual humiliation is often a part of this. The authorities in charge of these institutions usually object to these practices and seek to put an end to any excesses. But why, absent any of the traditional nominate torts such as assault, battery, negligent causing of harm etc, should the law of tort intrude? If a shop assistant or a bouncer or barman at a club is publicly offensive to a customer, the customer may well be humiliated and distressed. But that is no sufficient reason why the law of tort should be fashioned and developed with a view to providing compensation in money to the victim. a

[63] Whether today, the Human Rights Act 1998 having come into effect, conduct similar to that inflicted on Mrs Wainwright and Alan Wainwright, but without any element of battery and without crossing the line into the territory of misfeasance in public office, should be categorised as tortious must be left to be decided when such a case arises. It is not necessary to decide now whether such conduct would constitute a breach of art 8 or of art 3 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as now set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). b

[64] I, too, would dismiss these appeals.

Appeal dismissed.

Celia Fox Barrister.

Rees v Darlington Memorial Hospital NHS Trust

[2003] UKHL 52

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL, LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD, LORD STEYN, LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD, LORD HUTTON, LORD MILLETT AND LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE

11, 12 JUNE, 16 OCTOBER 2003

Damages – Unwanted pregnancy – Negligence – Disabled woman wishing to be sterilised because of her disability – Surgeon aware of reason for sterilisation but performing operation negligently – Woman becoming pregnant and giving birth to healthy child – Whether disabled woman entitled to recover costs of bringing up healthy child attributable to her disability where child conceived as a result of negligently-performed sterilisation.

The claimant, a woman with a genetic condition which left her severely visually disabled, wished to be sterilised. The consultant to whom she was referred knew that her reasons for wanting the operation included her belief that her eyesight would prevent her from looking after children properly. He carried out a sterilisation operation, but did so negligently, and the claimant later gave birth to a normal healthy child. In proceedings for negligence against the defendant hospital trust the claimant sought damages for the full costs of bringing up her child. The judge ruled against the claimant on the determination as a preliminary issue of whether she was in principle entitled to recover any part of the cost of bringing up her child in the light of a previous decision of the House of Lords that able-bodied parents could not recover damages for the costs of bringing up a healthy child born after negligent sterilisation advice, although a mother in such circumstances was entitled to damages for the pain, inconvenience and expense of pregnancy and childbirth. On the claimant's appeal the Court of Appeal held that she was entitled to recover the 'extra' costs of bringing up her child which she would incur as a result of her disability. The hospital trust appealed, submitting that the case was governed by the overriding principle established in the previous decision. The claimant invited the House of Lords to depart from that previous decision as wrongly decided.

Held – (1) The previous decision that parents could not recover as damages the cost of bringing up a healthy and normal child born as a result of medical negligence was not to be departed from (see [7], [16], [32], [50], [86], [103], [143], below); McFarlane v Tayside Health Board [1999] 4 All ER 961considered.

(2) (Lord Steyn, Lord Hope and Lord Hutton dissenting) The legal policy considerations underpinning the previous decision, which were an unwillingness to regard a child as a financial liability and nothing else; a recognition that the rewards which parenthood, even if involuntary, might or might not bring could not be quantified; and a sense that to award potentially very large sums of damages to the parents of a normal, healthy child against a National Health Service always in need of funds to meet pressing demands would rightly offend the community's sense of how public resources should be allocated, applied equally to the circumstances of the instant case. However, the parent of a child born following a negligently-performed vasectomy or sterilisation, or negligent advice on the effect of such a procedure, was the victim of a legal wrong. There should, accordingly, in all such cases be a conventional award of £15,000 to mark the injury and loss, added to the award for pregnancy and birth. Such an award would not be compensatory, but would afford some measure of recognition of the wrong done. Accordingly, subject to the award of £15,000, the appeal would be allowed (see [6]–[8], [10], [15]–[17], [19], [104], [105], [109], [112], [123], [126], [143], [148], below); McFarlane v Tayside Health Board [1999] 4 All ER 961 followed; Parkinson v St James and Seacroft University Hospital NHS Trust [2001] 3 All ER 97 distinguished.

Decision of the Court of Appeal [2002] 2 All ER 177 reversed.

Notes

For failed sterilisation, see 12(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 896.

Cases referred to in judgment

Benarr v Kettering Health Authority (1988) 138 NLJ 179.

Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568, [1990] 2 AC 605, [1990] 2 WLR 358, HL.

Cattanach v Melchior [2003] HCA 38, Aust HC; affg [2001] QCA 246, Queensland CA.

Clark v Novacold Ltd [1999] ICR 951.

Donoghue (or M'Alister) v Stevenson [1932] AC 562, [1932] All ER Rep 1, HL.

Dutton v Bognor Regis United Building Co Ltd [1972] 1 All ER 462, [1972] 1 QB 373, [1972] 2 WLR 299.

Emeh v Kensington and Chelsea and Westminster Area Health Authority [1984] 3 All ER 1044, [1985] QB 1012, [1985] 2 WLR 233, CA.

Farley v Skinner [2001] UKHL 49, [2001] 4 All ER 801, [2002] 2 AC 732, [2001] 3 WLR 899.

Fitzleet Estates Ltd v Cherry (Inspector of Taxes) [1977] 3 All ER 996, [1977] 1 WLR 1345, HL.

Goodwin v Patent Office [1999] ICR 302, [1999] IRLR 4.

Hadley v Baxendale (1854) 9 Exch 341, [1843–60] All ER Rep 461, 156 ER 145.

Home Office v Dorset Yacht Co Ltd [1970] 2 All ER 294, [1970] AC 1004, [1970] 2 WLR 1140, HL.

Knuller (Publishing, Printing and Promotions) Ltd v DPP [1972] 2 All ER 898, [1973] AC 435, [1972] 3 WLR 143, HL.

Kuwait Airways Corp v Iraqi Airways Co [2002] UKHL 19, [2002] 3 All ER 209, [2002] 2 AC 883, [2002] 2 WLR 1353.

Lim Poh Choo v Camden and Islington Area Health Authority [1979] 2 All ER 910, [1980] AC 174, [1979] 3 WLR 44, HL.

Livingstone v Rawyards Coal Co (1880) 5 App Cas 25, HL.

McFarlane v Tayside Health Board [1999] 4 All ER 961, [2000] 2 AC 59, [1999] 3 WLR 1301, HL.

McLoughlin v O'Brian [1982] 2 All ER 298, [1983] 1 AC 410, [1992] 2 WLR 982, HL.

Miliangos v George Frank (Textiles) Ltd [1975] 3 All ER 801, [1976] AC 443, [1975] 3 WLR 758, HL.

Morgans v Launchbury [1972] 2 All ER 606, [1973] AC 127, [1972] 2 WLR 1217, HL.

Murphy v Brentwood DC [1990] 2 All ER 908, [1991] 1 AC 398, [1990] 3 WLR 414, HL.

Parkinson v St James and Seacroft University Hospital NHS Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 530, [2001] 3 All ER 97, [2002] QB 266, [2001] 3 WLR 376.

Rondel v Worsley [1967] 3 All ER 993, [1969] 1 AC 191, [1967] WLR 1666, HL.
SCM (UK) Ltd v WJ Whittall & Son Ltd [1970] 3 All ER 245, [1971] 1 QB 337, [1970] 3 WLR 694, CA.
Shaher v British Aerospace Flying College Ltd 2003 SLT 791.
Shaw v DPP [1961] 2 All ER 446, [1962] AC 220, [1961] 2 WLR 897, HL.
South Australia Asset Management Corp v York Montague Ltd, United Bank of Kuwait plc v Prudential Property Services Ltd, Nykredit Mortgage Bank plc v Edward Erdman Group plc [1996] 3 All ER 365, [1997] AC 191, [1996] 3 WLR 87, HL.
Sutherland Shire Council v Heyman (1985) 157 CLR 424, Aust HC.
Thake v Maurice [1986] 1 All ER 497, [1986] 1 QB 644, [1986] 2 WLR 337, CA.
Ward v James [1965] 1 All ER 563, [1966] 1 QB 273, [1965] 2 WLR 455, CA.
White v Jones [1995] 1 All ER 691, [1995] 2 AC 207, [1995] 2 WLR 187, HL.
Wright v British Railways Board [1983] 2 All ER 698, [1983] 2 AC 773, [1983] 3 WLR 211, HL.

Cases referred to in list of authorities

AD v East Kent Community NHS Trust [2002] EWCA Civ 1872, [2003] 3 All ER 1167.
Allen v Bloomsbury Health Authority [1993] 1 All ER 651.
Bank of Credit and Commerce International (Overseas) Ltd (in liq) v Price Waterhouse (No 2) [1998] PNLR 564, CA.
Dolling-Baker v Merrett [1991] 2 All ER 890, [1990] 1 WLR 1205, CA.
Eaton v Brant County Board of Education [1997] 1 SCR 241, Can SC.
Greenfield v Irwin (a firm) [2001] EWCA Civ 113, [2001] 1 WLR 1279.
Groom v Selby [2001] EWCA Civ 1522, (2001) 64 BMLR 47.
Hardman v Amin (2000) 59 BMLR 58.
Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v Heller & Partners Ltd [1963] 2 All ER 575, [1964] AC 465, [1963] 3 WLR 101, HL.
Lee v Taunton and Somerset NHS Trust [2001] 1 FLR 419.
McKay v Essex Area Health Authority [1982] 2 All ER 771, [1982] QB 1166, [1982] 2 WLR 890, CA.
McKernan v Aasheim (1984) 687 P 2d 850, Wash SC.
McLelland v Greater Glasgow Health Board [2002] SLT 446.
Quebec v Montreal (City) [2000] 1 SCR 665, Can SC.
Rand v East Dorset Health Authority (2000) 56 BMLR 39.
Rodriguez v A-G of British Columbia (1993) 50 BMLR 1, Can SC.
Smith v Eric S Bush (a firm), Harris v Wyre Forest DC [1989] 2 All ER 514, [1990] 1 AC 831, [1989] 2 WLR 790, HL.
White v Chief Constable of the South Yorkshire Police [1999] 1 All ER 1, sub nom Frost v Chief Constable of South Yorkshire Police [1999] 2 AC 455, [1998] 3 WLR 1509, HL.

Appeal

The defendant, County Durham and Darlington Acute Hospitals NHS Ttrust (formerly Darlington Memorial NHS Trust), appealed with permission of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords given on 17 July 2002 from the judgment of the Court of Appeal (Robert Walker and Hale LJJ, Waller LJ dissenting) on 14 February 2002 ([2002] EWCA Civ 88, [2002] 2 All ER 177) allowing in part the appeal of the claimant, Karina Rees, from the decision of Stuart Brown QC, sitting as a deputy judge of the High Court on 16 May 2001, whereby, on the determination of a preliminary issue, he held that she was not entitled to recover as damages any of the costs of bringing up her son who was born as a result of the negligence of the defendant. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Bingham of Cornhill.

Jeremy Stuart-Smith QC (instructed by Eversheds, Newcastle) for the defendant.
Robin de Wilde QC and Joseph O'Brien (instructed by Blackett Hart & Pratt, Newcastle) for the claimant.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

16 October 2003. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL.

[1] My Lords, in McFarlane v Tayside Health Board [1999] 4 All ER 961, [2000] 2 AC 59 a husband and wife, themselves healthy and normal, sought to recover as damages the cost of bringing up a healthy and normal child born to the wife, following allegedly negligent advice on the effect of a vasectomy performed on the husband. Differing from the Inner House of the Court of Session (1998 SLT 307), the House unanimously rejected this claim. A factual variant of that case reached the Court of Appeal in Parkinson v St James and Seacroft University Hospital NHS Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 530, [2001] 3 All ER 97, [2002] QB 266: the mother, who had undergone a negligently-performed sterilisation operation, conceived and bore a child who was born with severe disabilities. Following McFarlane's case, the Court of Appeal held that the mother could not recover the whole cost of bringing up the child; but it held that she could recover the additional costs she would incur so far as they would be attributable to the child's disabilities. There was no appeal from that decision. The present case raises a further factual variant of McFarlane's case. The claimant in these proceedings (Ms Rees) suffers a severe and progressive visual disability, such that she felt unable to discharge the ordinary duties of a mother, and for that reason wished to be sterilised. She made her wishes known to a consultant employed by the appellant NHS Trust, who carried out a sterilisation operation but did so negligently, and the claimant conceived and bore a son. The child is normal and healthy but the claimant's disability remains. She claimed as damages the cost of rearing the child. The Court of Appeal (Robert Walker and Hale LJJ, Waller LJ dissenting) held that she was entitled to recover the additional costs she would incur so far as they would be attributable to her disability: [2002] EWCA Civ 88, [2002] 2 All ER 177, [2003] QB 20. The appellant NHS Trust now challenges that decision as inconsistent with McFarlane's case. The claimant seeks to uphold the decision, but also claims the whole cost of bringing up the child, inviting the House to reconsider its decision in McFarlane's case.

[2] Since the argument in this appeal the High Court of Australia has given judgment in Cattanach v Melchior [2003] HCA 38. That case arose from negligent advice following an incompletely-performed sterilisation operation and one of the issues (the only issue litigated in the High Court) was whether the parents could recover as damages the cost of rearing the child, both parents and child being normal and healthy. The trial judge upheld that claim and her decision was affirmed by a majority of the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of Queensland ([2001] QCA 246) and by a bare majority of the High Court. I have found the judgments of the High Court of particular value since, although most of the arguments deployed are not novel (as they could scarcely be, given the volume of litigation on this subject in many different countries), the division of opinion among the members of the court gives the competing arguments a notable sharpness and clarity.

[3] It is convenient to begin by considering McFarlane's case. In that case there were, as it seems to me, broadly three solutions which the House could have adopted to the problem then before it. (I can, for present purposes, omit two of the solutions which Kirby J listed in para 138 of his judgment in Melchior's case but gratefully adopt his formulation of the remaining three, while altering their order). They were the following. (1) That full damages against the tortfeasor for the cost of rearing the child may be allowed, subject to the ordinary limitations of reasonable foreseeability and remoteness, with no discount for joys, benefits and support, leaving restrictions upon such recovery to such limitations as may be enacted by a Parliament with authority to do so. (2) That damages may be recovered in full for the reasonable costs of rearing an unplanned child to the age when that child might be expected to be economically self-reliant, whether the child is 'healthy' or 'disabled' or 'impaired' but with a deduction from the amount of such damages for the joy and benefits received, and the potential economic support derived, from the child. (3) That no damages may be recovered where the child is born healthy and without disability or impairment.

[4] An orthodox application of familiar and conventional principles of the law of tort would, I think, have pointed towards acceptance of the first of these solutions. The surgeon whose allegedly negligent advice gave rise to the action was exercising his professional skill for the benefit of the McFarlanes who relied on it. The foreseeable result of negligent advice would be the birth of a child, the very thing they wished to avoid. No one can be unaware that bringing up a child has a financial cost. All members of the House accepted that the surgeon owed a duty of care to the McFarlanes, and the foreseeable result was that which occurred. Thus the proven violation of a legal right would lead to a compensatory remedy. I do not find it surprising that this solution has been supported by the line of English authority which preceded McFarlane's case (Emeh v Kensington and Chelsea and Westminster Area Health Authority [1984] 3 All ER 1044, [1985] QB 1012, Thake v Maurice [1986] 1 All ER 497, [1986] 1 QB 644, Benarr v Kettering Health Authority (1988) 138 NLJ 179), by the Inner House in McFarlane's case itself (1998 SLT 307), by decisions of the Hoge Raad in the Netherlands and the Bundesverfassungsgericht in Germany (see Keuleneer, Androulidakis-Dimitriadis and Pozzo European Review of Private Law (1999) 2:241–256) and now by a majority of the High Court of Australia. Faithful adherence to the precepts articulated by Lord Scarman in McLoughlin v O'Brian [1982] 2 All ER 298 at 309, [1983] 1 AC 410 at 429–430 would have pointed towards adoption of this first solution.

[5] The second solution has been adopted in 6 state courts in the United States (see La Croix and Martin 'Damages in Wrongful Pregnancy Tort Actions', in Ireland and Ward Assessing Damages in Injuries and Deaths of Minor Children (2002) pp 93, 97–98, quoted by Callinan J in his judgment in Melchior's case at para 287). But this solution did not commend itself to any member of the House in McFarlane's case or any member of the High Court in Melchior's case, it was not supported by counsel in the present appeal and the objections to it are in my opinion insuperable. While it would be possible to assess with some show of plausibility the likely discounted cost of rearing a child until the age when the child might reasonably be expected to become self-supporting, any attempt to quantify in money terms the value of the joys and benefits which the parents might receive from the unintended child, or any economic benefit they might derive from it, would, made when the child is no more than an infant, be an exercise in pure speculation to which no court of law should lend itself. I need say no more of this possible solution.

[6] The five members of the House who gave judgment in McFarlane's case adopted different approaches and gave different reasons for adopting the third solution listed in [3], above. But it seems to me clear that all of them were moved to adopt it for reasons of policy (legal, not public, policy). This is not a criticism. As Lord Denning MR said in Dutton v Bognor Regis United Building Co Ltd [1972] 1 All ER 462 at 475, [1972] 1 QB 373 at 397–398:

> 'This case is entirely novel. Never before has a claim been made against a council or its surveyor for negligence in passing a house. The case itself can be brought within the words of Lord Atkin in Donoghue v Stevenson [1932] AC 562 at 580, [1932] All ER Rep 1 at 11: but it is a question whether we should apply them here. In Home Office v Dorset Yacht Co Ltd [1970] AC 1004 at 1023, [1970] 2 All ER 294 at 297, Lord Reid said that the words of Lord Atkin expressed a principle which ought to apply in general "unless there is some justification or valid explanation for its exclusion". So did Lord Pearson ([1970] 2 All ER 294 at 321, [1970] AC 1004 at 1054). But Lord Diplock spoke differently. He said it was a guide but not a principle of universal application ([1970] 2 All ER 294 at 325–326, [1970] AC 1004 at 1060). It seems to me that it is a question of policy which we, as judges, have to decide. The time has come when, in cases of new import, we should decide them according to the reason of the thing. In previous times, when faced with a new problem, the judges have not openly asked themselves the question: what is the best policy for the law to adopt? But the question has always been there in the background. It has been concealed behind such questions as: Was the defendant under any duty to the plaintiff? Was the relationship between them sufficiently proximate? Was the injury direct or indirect? Was it foreseeable, or not? Was it too remote? And so forth. Nowadays we direct ourselves to considerations of policy. In Rondel v Worsley ([1967] 3 All ER 993, [1969] 1 AC 191), we thought that if advocates were liable to be sued for negligence they would be hampered in carrying out their duties. In Home Office v Dorset Yacht Co Ltd [1970] 2 All ER 294, [1970] AC 1004, we thought that the Home Office ought to pay for damage done by escaping Borstal boys, if the staff was negligent, but we confined it to damage done in the immediate vicinity. In SCM (UK) Ltd v WJ Whittall & Son Ltd ([1970] 3 All ER 245, [1971] 1 QB 337), some of us thought that economic loss ought not to be put on one pair of shoulders, but spread among all the sufferers. In Launchbury v Morgans, we thought that as the owner of the family car was insured she should bear the loss. In short, we look at the relationship of the parties: and then say, as matter of policy, on whom the loss should fall.'

The policy considerations underpinning the judgments of the House were, as I read them, an unwillingness to regard a child (even if unwanted) as a financial liability and nothing else, a recognition that the rewards which parenthood (even if involuntary) may or may not bring cannot be quantified and a sense that to award potentially very large sums of damages to the parents of a normal and healthy child against a National Health Service always in need of funds to meet pressing demands would rightly offend the community's sense of how public resources should be allocated. Kirby J was surely right to suggest (in his judgment in Cattanach v Melchior [2003] HCA 38 (at para 178)) that:

> 'Concern to protect the viability of the National Health Service at a time of multiple demands upon it might indeed help to explain the invocation in the House of Lords in McFarlane of the notion of "distributive justice".'

It is indeed hard to think that, if the House had adopted the first solution discussed above, its decision would have long survived the first award to well-to-do parents of the estimated cost of providing private education, presents, clothing and foreign holidays for an unwanted child (even if at no more expensive a level than the parents had provided for earlier, wanted, children) against a National Health Service found to be responsible, by its negligence, for the birth of the child. In favouring the third solution, holding the damages claimed to be irrecoverable, the House allied itself with the great majority of state courts in the United States and relied on arguments now strongly supported by the dissenting judgments of Gleeson CJ, Hayne and Heydon JJ in Melchior's case.

[7] I am of the clear opinion, for reasons more fully given by my noble and learned friends, that it would be wholly contrary to the practice of the House to disturb its unanimous decision in McFarlane's case given as recently as four years ago, even if a differently-constituted committee were to conclude that a different solution should have been adopted. It would reflect no credit on the administration of the law if a line of English authority were to be disapproved in 1999 and reinstated in 2003 with no reason for the change beyond a change in the balance of judicial opinion. I am not in any event persuaded that the arguments which the House rejected in 1999 should now be accepted, or that the policy considerations which (as I think) drove the decision have lost their potency. Subject to one gloss, therefore, which I regard as important, I would affirm and adhere to the decision in McFarlane's case.

[8] My concern is this. Even accepting that an unwanted child cannot be regarded as a financial liability and nothing else and that any attempt to weigh the costs of bringing up a child against the intangible rewards of parenthood is unacceptably speculative, the fact remains that the parent of a child born following a negligently-performed vasectomy or sterilisation, or negligent advice on the effect of such a procedure, is the victim of a legal wrong. The members of the House who gave judgment in McFarlane's case recognised this by holding, in each case, that some award should be made to Mrs McFarlane (although Lord Millett based this on a ground which differed from that of the other members and he would have made a joint award to Mr and Mrs McFarlane). I can accept and support a rule of legal policy which precludes recovery of the full cost of bringing up a child in the situation postulated, but I question the fairness of a rule which denies the victim of a legal wrong any recompense at all beyond an award immediately related to the unwanted pregnancy and birth. The spectre of well-to-do parents plundering the National Health Service should not blind one to other realities: that of the single mother with young children, struggling to make ends meet and counting the days until her children are of an age to enable her to work more hours and so enable the family to live a less straitened existence; the mother whose burning ambition is to put domestic chores so far as possible behind her and embark on a new career or resume an old one. Examples can be multiplied. To speak of losing the freedom to limit the size of one's family is to mask the real loss suffered in a situation of this kind. This is that a parent, particularly (even today) the mother, has been denied, through the negligence of another, the opportunity to live her life in the way that she wished and planned. I do not think that an award immediately relating to the unwanted pregnancy and birth gives adequate recognition of or does justice to that loss. I would accordingly support the suggestion favoured by Lord Millett in McFarlane's case ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 158, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 114) that in all cases such as these there be a conventional award to mark the injury and loss, although I would favour a greater figure than the £5,000 he suggested (I have in mind a conventional figure of £15,000) and I would add this to the award for the pregnancy and birth. This solution is in my opinion consistent with the ruling and rationale of McFarlane's case. The conventional award would not be, and would not be intended to be, compensatory. It would not be the product of calculation. But it would not be a nominal, let alone a derisory, award. It would afford some measure of recognition of the wrong done. And it would afford a more ample measure of justice than the pure McFarlane's case rule.

[9] I would for my part apply this rule also, without differentiation, to cases in which either the child or the parent is (or claims to be) disabled. (1) While I have every sympathy with the Court of Appeal's view that Mrs Parkinson should be compensated, it is arguably anomalous that the defendant's liability should be related to a disability which the doctor's negligence did not cause and not to the birth which it did. (2) The rule favoured by the Court of Appeal majority in the present case inevitably gives rise to anomalies such as those highlighted by Waller LJ in paras [53]–[54] of his dissenting judgment. (3) It is undesirable that parents, in order to recover compensation, should be encouraged to portray either their children or themselves as disabled. There is force in the points made by Kirby J in paras 163–166 of his judgment in Melchior's case. (4) In a state such as ours, which seeks to make public provision for the consequences of disability, the quantification of additional costs attributable to disability, whether of the parent or the child, is a task of acute difficulty. This is highlighted by the inability of the claimant in this appeal to give any realistic indication of the additional costs she seeks to recover.

[10] I would accordingly allow the appeal, set aside the orders of the Court of Appeal and of the deputy judge, and order that judgment be entered for the claimant for £15,000. I would invite the parties to make written submissions on costs within 14 days.

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD.

[11] My Lords, in this appeal, as in the recent case of McFarlane v Tayside Health Board [1999] 4 All ER 961, [2000] 2 AC 59, your Lordships' House has to make a decision concerning the development of the law in a field which is highly controversial and, therefore, exceedingly difficult. What should be the policy of the law on the award of damages when an unwanted pregnancy occurs, and an unintended child is born, following professionally negligent medical procedures or advice? Should the doctor or the hospital be required to pay the cost of bringing up the child to an age when he will be self-supporting?

[12] The parent's claim in this type of case can be stated simply. The negligent doctor committed a legal wrong towards the parent, and the precise event the parent sought to avoid then happened: the birth of a child. On ordinary legal principles the foreseeable adverse financial consequences of a legal wrong may expect to be borne by him who committed the wrong. Here the cost of bringing up the child was foreseeable and, indeed, may have been one of the very reasons why the parent sought to avoid pregnancy.

[13] This argument is forceful. But it is important to keep in mind that the law's evaluation of the damages recoverable for a legal wrong is not an automatic, mechanical exercise. Recoverability of damages is always bounded by considerations of fairness and reasonableness: see Kuwait Airways Corp v Iraqi Airways Co [2002] UKHL 19 at [69]–[70], [2002] 3 All ER 209 at [69]–[70], [2002] 2 AC 883. So the answers to the questions I have stated calls for an assessment of what is fair and reasonable in cases of this nature.

[14] Judges of course do not have, and do not claim to have, any special insight into what contemporary society regards as fair and reasonable, although their legal expertise enables them to promote a desirable degree of consistency from one case or type of case to the next, and to avoid other pitfalls. But, however controversial and difficult the subject matter, judges are required to decide the cases brought before the courts. Where necessary, therefore, they must form a view on what are the requirements of fairness and reasonableness in a novel type of case.

[15] In McFarlane's case, your Lordships' House held unanimously that a negligent doctor is not required to meet the cost of bringing up a healthy child born in these circumstances. The language, and to some extent the legal reasoning, employed by each of their Lordships differed. But, however expressed, the underlying perception of all their Lordships was that fairness and reasonableness do not require that the damages payable by a negligent doctor should extend so far. The approach usually adopted in measuring recoverable financial loss is not appropriate when the subject of the legal wrong is the birth of an unintended healthy child and the head of claim is the cost of the whole of the child's upbringing.

[16] I have heard nothing in the submissions advanced on the present appeal to persuade me that this decision by the House was wrong and ought to be revisited. On the contrary, that the negligent doctor or, in most cases, the National Health Service should pay all the costs of bringing up the child seems to me a disproportionate response to the doctor's wrong. It would accord ill with the values society attaches to human life and to parenthood. The birth of a child should not be treated as comparable to a parent suffering a personal injury, with the cost of rearing the child being treated as special damages akin to the financially adverse consequences flowing from the onset of a chronic medical condition.

[17] But this is not to say it is fair and reasonable there should be no award at all except in respect of stress and trauma and costs associated with the pregnancy and the birth itself. An award of some amount should be made to recognise that in respect of birth of the child the parent has suffered a legal wrong, a legal wrong having a far-reaching effect on the lives of the parent and any family she may already have. The amount of such an award will inevitably have an arbitrary character. I do not dissent from the sum of £15,000 suggested by my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill in this regard. To this limited extent I agree that your Lordships' House should add a gloss to the decision in McFarlane's case.

[18] Once it is decided that damages do not include the cost of bringing up a healthy child, anomalies such as those noted by Waller LJ in the Court of Appeal in the present case become inescapable if an exception is made when either the child or the mother is disabled. The personal circumstances where this problem arises will vary so widely that what is fair and reasonable in one set of family circumstances, including the financial means of the family, may not seem so in another. But awards of damages of this nature cannot sensibly be made by courts on a discretionary or means-tested basis. The preferable approach is an award of a lump sum of modest amount in all circumstances.

[19] For these reasons, and also the reasons given by Lord Bingham of Cornhill, I would allow this appeal, and set aside the orders of the Court of Appeal and of Stuart Brown QC sitting as a deputy High Court judge. In response to the preliminary issue I would declare that the claimant is not entitled to recover any of the costs of bringing up the child Anthony, but she is entitled to payment of £15,000.

LORD STEYN.

I. A DISABLED MOTHER AND A FAILED STERILISATION

[20] My Lords, Ms Karina Rees is now 31 years of age. She suffers from a genetic condition known as retinitis pigmentosa. Since the age of two she has been blind in one eye and has limited vision (6/36) in the other. She is severely visually handicapped.

[21] In 1995 Ms Rees consulted her general medical practitioner with a view to undergoing a sterilisation procedure. The GP referred her to a consultant gynaecologist at the Darlington Memorial Hospital. The referral letter to the consultant explained that: (a) Ms Rees was registered partially sighted; (b) her vision had deteriorated over the last few years and she had recently given up work; (c) she had great difficulty in finding a suitable method of contraception and at times had requested the morning after pill; (d) she was single and had been advised that the sterilisation would be irreversible but she was adamant that she did not want and would never want children; (e) she felt that her eyesight would prevent her from looking after children properly; (f) she was anxious about health matters and scared at the thought of labour and delivery. When Ms Rees saw the consultant, she told him that she did not want to have children. She told him that her very poor eyesight would make it very difficult for her to look after a baby.

[22] On 18 July 1995 the consultant performed the sterilisation operation. He did not adequately occlude the fallopian tubes. Ms Rees was unaware that the sterilisation operation had failed.

[23] In July 1996 Ms Rees became pregnant. On 28 April 1997 she gave birth to a son, Anthony. His father has no desire to be involved with him. There is a risk that Anthony has inherited retinitis pigmentosa but it is low. Anthony is a healthy and normal child. Very little is known about the impact of Ms Rees' disability on the way in which she cares for Anthony. The Court of Appeal was, however, told that she is bringing up Anthony herself with the help of her mother and other relatives who live nearby. The Court of Appeal was also told that Ms Rees does not cook because she feels it to be too dangerous but that she does try to dress the child.

II. THE PROCEEDINGS BELOW

[24] On 21 September 1999 Ms Rees issued proceedings in the Darlington County Court claiming damages for negligence arising out of the failure of the sterilisation operation. By her amended particulars of claim she claimed the cost of bringing up Anthony to his majority which costs would include expenses that would be common to the upbringing of Anthony by a mother who was healthy and expenses that would be incurred by her as a result of her visual handicap. By its defence the NHS Hospital Trust admitted that the sterilisation operation was performed negligently but it denied liability for any part of the cost of bringing up Anthony. The case was transferred to the High Court. On 1 May 2001 Mr Stuart Brown QC, sitting as a deputy judge of the High Court, heard a preliminary issue. The purpose of the preliminary issue was to determine whether Ms Rees was in principle entitled to recover any part of the cost of bringing up Anthony in the light of the decision of the House of Lords in McFarlane v Tayside Health Board [1999] 4 All ER 961, [2000] 2 AC 59. In McFarlane's case this House had decided that parents of a healthy child, born after negligent sterilisation advice, could not recover in tort the cost of bringing up the child. At the same time the House held that a modest solatium in respect of the pain and suffering associated with pregnancy and childbirth may be awarded. On 16 May 2001, the judge held that Ms Rees was not entitled to recover any part of the costs of bringing up Anthony.

[25] When the matter came before the Court of Appeal it had before it not only the decision of the House in McFarlane's case but also the subsequent decision of the Court of Appeal in Parkinson v St James and Seacroft University Hospital NHS Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 530, [2001] 3 All ER 97, [2002] QB 266 where it was held that in a failed sterilisation case the extra costs of discharging parental responsibility towards a disabled child is unaffected by McFarlane's case and can in principle be recovered. There was no appeal against this decision. On 14 February 2002 by a majority the Court of Appeal (Hale and Robert Walker LJJ, with Waller LJ dissenting) allowed the appeal of the claimant and held that a disabled parent is entitled to recover those 'extra' costs involved in discharging his or her responsibility to bring up a healthy child which are attributable to and incurred as a result of the fact of the parent's disability: Rees v Darlington Memorial Hospital NHS Trust [2002] EWCA Civ 88, [2002] 2 All ER 177, [2003] QB 20. Unfortunately, there was no information before the Court of Appeal as how, if at all, it is more costly for the claimant to look after Anthony than it would be for a mother who does not have her disability.

III. THE ISSUES BEFORE THE HOUSE

[26] The agreed issue before the House reads as follows:

> 'In the light of the decision of the House of Lords in McFarlane v Tayside Health Board where a person who suffers from a physical disability undergoes a negligently performed sterilisation operation, conceives, gives birth to a healthy child and, as a consequence of the birth of the child incurs: (a) costs of bringing up the healthy child which would be incurred by a healthy parent; and (b) additional costs of bringing up the healthy child which would not be incurred by a healthy parent and which are incurred because of the particular parent's physical disability; which of those costs of bringing up the healthy child (if any) may be recovered by the parent in an action in negligence brought against the person responsible for the performance of the sterilisation.'

Despite this formulation of the issue, the case for the claimant at the hearing before the House appeared to be restricted to seeking to recover the extra cost involved in discharging her responsibility for bringing up a healthy child which are incurred as a result of her disability. The House has the same meagre information before it as the Court of Appeal had. There is in particular no information before the House as to how, if at all, it is more costly for the claimant to look after Anthony than it would be for a mother who does not have the disability. In what has been a complex case this has proved to be a difficulty.

[27] It is necessary to explain the framework of the appeal in more detail. First it was submitted on behalf of the claimant that the House wrongly decided McFarlane's case. If this challenge succeeds, it is common ground that the claimant is entitled to succeed and the appeal of the NHS Trust Hospital must be dismissed. If it fails, other issues arise. The second issue, relevant by analogy and not direct application, is whether the decision in Parkinson's case, which laid down that the case of a disabled child falls outside the scope of the principle laid down in McFarlane's case, was correct. The answer to this question has some bearing on the ultimate decision in the instant case. The third question is then whether the majority in the Court of Appeal in the present case correctly held that the decision in McFarlane's case does not preclude recovery by a disabled parent of a healthy child of the extra cost of caring for the child.

IV. THE CHALLENGE TO THE DECISION IN McFARLANE

[28] I do not propose to undertake the gruesome task of discussing the judgments in McFarlane's case. But it is necessary to explain briefly what was decided in McFarlane's case. It was held that the cost of parents caring for a healthy and normal child, born as a result of negligent sterilisation advice, was not recoverable in tort. There was undoubtedly divergence between the reasoning in the speeches. Subject to Lord Millett's view that a modest conventional sum—he mentioned £5,000 ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 1005, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 114)—could be awarded there was unanimity on the outcome of the principal claim for the cost of bringing up the child. There is a clear ratio. Moreover, despite differences in reasoning, two features were crucial. First, in monetary terms it is impossible to calculate the benefits of avoiding a birth and having a healthy child. In Parkinson's case Hale LJ sought to rationalise the decision in McFarlane's case by saying that it depended on a deemed equilibrium theory: [2001] 3 All ER 97 at [87]–[91]. That is not a correct interpretation of McFarlane's case. Instead the emphasis was squarely on the impossibility of undertaking a process of weighing the advantages and disadvantages. The second feature was explained by Lord Millett as follows ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 1005, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 113–114):

> 'In my opinion the law must take the birth of a normal, healthy baby to be a blessing, not a detriment. In truth it is a mixed blessing. It brings joy and sorrow, blessing and responsibility. The advantages and the disadvantages are inseparable. Individuals may choose to regard the balance as unfavourable and take steps to forgo the pleasures as well as the responsibilities of parenthood. They are entitled to decide for themselves where their own interests lie. But society itself must regard the balance as beneficial. It would be repugnant to its own sense of values to do otherwise. It is morally offensive to regard a normal, healthy baby as more trouble and expense than it is worth.' (My emphasis.)

These I believe to be themes which led the Law Lords sitting in the case to reject the claim for the cost of bringing up the healthy child: see [1999] 4 All ER 961 at 971, 972, 978, 990, 996, 1002, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 75, 76, 83, 97, 103 and 111 per Lord Slynn of Hadley, my judgment, Lord Hope of Craighead, Lord Clyde and Lord Millett respectively.

[29] That brings me to the question what the foundation of this reasoning was. For my part the answer is clear. The House did not rest its decision on public policy in a conventional sense: Lord Slynn of Hadley ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 972, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 76); my judgment ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 978, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 83); Lord Hope of Craighead ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 988, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 95); Lord Clyde ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 993, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 100); and Lord Millett ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 1000, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 108). Instead the Law Lords relied on legal policy. In considering this question the House was bound, in the circumstances of the case, to consider what in their view the ordinary citizen would regard as morally acceptable. Invoking the moral theory of distributive justice, and the requirements of being just, fair and reasonable, culled from case law, are in context simply routes to establishing the legal policy.

[30] Now I turn to the question whether this conclusion was reached on the basis that there was absence of a duty of care in respect of the cost of bringing up a healthy and normal child or whether the decision was made on the basis that this head of loss is not recoverable. This question arises because there was undoubtedly a duty of care to the extent that the mother was allowed to recover for pain and suffering associated with the pregnancy and childbirth. Some Law Lords thought that an absence of a duty of care was the correct analysis and others thought it was a matter of irrecoverability of a head of loss. In my opinion the former view is entirely orthodox: see Lord Hope of Craighead ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 989, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 95–96): see also Lord Slynn of Hadley ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 972, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 76); and my judgment ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 978, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 83). On the other hand, the latter is an equally valid explanation: Lord Clyde ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 998, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 105); and Lord Millett ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 1005, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 113–114). One is perhaps in the area of conceptualistic thinking—what some overseas writers have impolitely called professors' law. Provided that one is clear about the foundation and reach of the legal policy involved, the difference in method is not of great importance. In this case the two concepts yield the same results.

[31] It is now necessary to consider how an invitation to depart from a decision of the House should be approached. Practice Statement (Judicial Precedent) [1966] 3 All ER 77, [1966] 1 WLR 1234, which announced that such a course was possible, was in no sense an open sesame for a differently-constituted committee to prefer their views to those of the committee which determined the decision unanimously or by a majority. That would be a licence not appropriate to final decision-making by a supreme court. In Knuller (Publishing, Printing and Promotions) Ltd v DPP [1972] 2 All ER 898, [1973] AC 435 Lord Reid considered the point. He observed ([1972] 2 All ER 898 at 902–903, [1973] AC 435 at 455):

> 'It was decided by this House in Shaw v DPP ([1961] 2 All ER 446, [1962] AC 220) that conspiracy to corrupt public morals is a crime known to the law of England. So if the appellants are to succeed on this count, either this House must reverse that decision or there must be sufficient grounds for distinguishing this case. The appellants' main argument is that we should reconsider that decision; alternatively they submit that it can and should be distinguished.
>
> I dissented in Shaw's case. On reconsideration I still think that the decision was wrong and I see no reason to alter anything which I said in my speech. But it does not follow that I should now support a motion to reconsider the decision. I have said more than once in recent cases that our change of practice in no longer regarding previous decisions of this House as absolutely binding does not mean that whenever we think that a previous decision was wrong we should reverse it. In the general interest of certainty in the law we must be sure that there is some very good reason before we so act ... I think that however wrong or anomalous the decision may be it must stand and apply to cases reasonably analogous unless or until it is altered by Parliament.'

This led the House to refuse to depart from a decision given 11 years earlier even if it had been wrong. In Fitzleet Estates Ltd v Cherry (Inspector of Taxes) [1977] 3 All ER 996, [1977] 1 WLR 1345 the House returned to the point. There was an invitation to the House to depart from a majority decision (by 3:2) in a previous case decided 11 years before. Lord Wilberforce observed (with the express agreement of Lord Salmon and Lord Keith) ([1977] 3 All ER 996 at 999, [1977] 1 WLR 1345 at 1349):

'There is therefore nothing left to the taxpayer but to contend, as it frankly does, that the 1966 decision is wrong. This contention means, when interpreted, that three or more of your Lordships ought to take the view which appealed then to the minority.

My Lords, in my firm opinion, the 1966 Practice Statement ([1966] 3 All ER 77, [1966] 1 WLR 1234) was never intended to allow and should not be considered to allow such a course. Nothing could be more undesirable, in fact, than to permit litigants, after a decision has been given by this House with all appearance of finality, to return to this House in the hope that a differently constituted committee might be persuaded to take the view, which its predecessors rejected. True that the earlier decision was by majority: I say nothing as to its correctness or as to the validity of the reasoning by which it was supported. That there were two eminently possible views is shown by the support for each by at any rate, two members of the House. But doubtful issues have to be resolved and the law knows no better way of resolving them than by the considered majority opinion of the ultimate tribunal. It requires much more than doubts as to the correctness of such opinion to justify departing from it.'

Viscount Dilhorne and Lord Edmund-Davies gave speeches along the same lines. None of this detracts from the power of the House to depart from a previous decision where there are cogent reasons to do so. Without trying to be exhaustive, I would mention that a fundamental change in circumstances such as was before the House in Miliangos v George Frank (Textiles) Ltd [1975] 3 All ER 801, [1976] AC 443, or experience showing that a decision of the House results in unforeseen serious injustice, may permit such a departure.

[32] The issue in McFarlane's case was a profoundly controversial one. Ultimately, there was a choice to be made between eminently reasonable competing arguments. The House carefully examined the earlier domestic case law. The House embarked on an extensive review of the comparative jurisprudence. It is not suggested that this examination did not reveal the range of feasible solutions. The subsequent decision in Cattanach v Melchior [2003] HCA 38 (16 July 2003) where by a 4:3 majority the High Court of Australia decided in favour of recovery merely underlines the controversiality of the problem and the range of views on the subject. In McFarlane's case the House examined the applicable principles and relevant analogies in great depth. It is not argued that the House overlooked any arguments of substance. Rather counsel for the claimant invites the House to say that the Law Lords in McFarlane's case made the wrong choice. For my part it would be entirely wrong for the House, differently constituted today, to depart from McFarlane's case even if some Law Lords had been persuaded that they would have decided the case differently.

[33] Having listened to the argument of counsel for the claimant that McFarlane's case was wrongly decided—an argument somewhat less detailed and rigorous than was before the House in McFarlane's case—I have to say I am satisfied that the House came to the correct conclusion four years ago. The comparative review before the House showed that, although the subject is controversial and that the solutions vary, the decision in McFarlane's case is probably that followed in a majority of jurisdictions. There has been academic criticism of McFarlane's case. There is disagreement among writers about the correctness of the outcome: see, for example, Tony Weir A Casebook on Tort (9th edn, 2000) p 131; Joe Thomson 'Abandoning the Law of Delict? McFarlane v Tayside Health Board in the Lords' 2000 SLT 43; Laura CH Hoyano 'Misconceptions about Wrongful Conception' (2002) 65 MLR 883. Accepting that the subject is a highly controversial one, the decision of the House, rooted as it was in morality, justice and legal policy, represented the least bad choice. For my part the decision in McFarlane's case was a sound one.

V. PARKINSON: A DISABLED CHILD

[34] Throughout the speeches in McFarlane's case runs the strong emphasis on the birth of a healthy and normal child. The opinions show that the House was fully alive to the different considerations which arise if the child is seriously disabled. But the case then before the House did not require a decision on such a case.

[35] When the issue involving a disabled child came before the Court of Appeal in Parkinson's case the ruling was unanimous that such a case is not affected by McFarlane's case. While not wishing to endorse everything said in the detailed judgments of Brooke and Hale LJJ, I agree with the decision. The legal policy on which McFarlane's case was based is critically dependent on the birth of a healthy and normal child. That policy does not apply where the child is seriously disabled physically and/or mentally. In such cases normal principles of corrective justice permit recovery of compensation for the costs of providing for the child's needs and care relating to his disability but not for the basic costs of his maintenance.

VI. REES: THE DISABLED MOTHER

[36] The position of a disabled mother who gives birth to a healthy and normal child was not considered in McFarlane's case. And to the best of my knowledge the Law Lords did not have it in mind at all. What the House would have said if in McFarlane's case the claim was by a seriously disabled mother, who had told the surgeon that due to her incapacities she would be unable to look after a child, is a matter of speculation. But the House must now grapple with this difficult case.

[37] Unlike the position of the disabled child, it is not possible to regard the disabled mother of a healthy and normal child as unaffected by the principle in McFarlane's case. On the contrary, an award of damages in the present case is only possible if an exception is created. That this is so becomes even clearer if one considers the grounds of legal policy which underpin McFarlane's case as I have explained them.

[38] In a powerful dissenting judgment in Rees' case, Waller LJ explained why he regarded such an exception as unacceptable I set out the core of his reasoning. He observed ([2002] 2 All ER 177 at [52]–[55]):

> '[52] Where the court is concerned with the birth of a healthy child, it seems to me that before contemplating the making of an exception to the general rule established by McFarlane's case one must examine with even greater care (if that is possible) whether any exception is justified, because (as I have stressed) the House of Lords were concerned with the award of damages in relation to the birth of a healthy child. In that context one must take into consideration how such an exception would be perceived by others who, as already stated, would have recovered damages on normal principles but will not recover because of the McFarlane decision, or, perhaps more accurately, one must take into account how the ordinary person would perceive the fairness of the exception.
>
> [53] Let me address some examples, I hope not too extreme. If one takes the facts to be that a woman already has four children and wishes not to have a fifth; and if one assumes that having the fifth will create a crisis in health terms, unless help in caring for the child was available. She cannot recover the costs of caring for the child which might alleviate the crisis, as I understand McFarlane's case. I would have thought that her need to avoid a breakdown in her health was no different from the need of someone already with a disability, and indeed her need might be greater depending on the degree of disability. Does she, or ordinary people, look favourably on the law not allowing her to recover but allowing someone who is disabled to recover?
>
> [54] If one were to add that the lady with four children was poor, but the lady with a disability was rich—what then? It would simply emphasise the perception that the rule was not operating fairly. One can add to the example by making comparisons between possible family circumstances of the different mothers. Assume the mother with four children had no support from husband, mother or siblings, and then compare her with the person who is disabled, but who has a husband, siblings and a mother all willing to help. I think ordinary people would feel uncomfortable about the thought that it was simply the disability which made a difference.
>
> [55] If a disabled person has a healthy child, and finds that she can, contrary to her anxieties, cope with that child with the help of family and others, I would have thought that in Lord Hope's words the benefits of having that child would be incalculable. It is the fact that such benefits of having that healthy child are incalculable which it seems to me leads to the result that the court simply should not give damages for the birth of that child. It is because the court is simply not prepared to go into a calculation which involves weighing one aspect against the other which in my view should bring about the conclusion that it is not fair, just, and reasonable that a disabled person should recover when other mothers in as great a need cannot. On the basis of distributive justice I believe that ordinary people would think that it was not fair that a disabled person should recover when mothers who may in effect become disabled by ill-health through having a healthy child would not.'

The examples given by Waller LJ at [53], [54] are telling. I would accept that there is an element of arbitrariness involved in holding that only the disabled mother of a healthy and normal child can claim damages. Since it is of prime importance that the law must avoid arbitrariness this creates a serious difficulty.

[39] On the other hand, there is great force in the observations of Robert Walker LJ. He held (at [41]):

> 'But these difficulties should not in my view deter this court from allowing the possibility of recovery (which is all it is, on the preliminary issue) in circumstances which, as I see it, are not covered by McFarlane's case and are a legitimate extension of Parkinson's case. Disabled persons are a category of the public whom the law increasingly recognises as requiring special consideration (the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 is an important landmark) and the developing law as to disability should (as Hale LJ explained in Parkinson's case [2001] 3 All ER 97 at [91]) avoid the sort of definitional problems which Lord Hoffmann referred to in White v Chief Constable of the South Yorkshire Police [1999] 1 All ER 1 at 47, [1999] 2 AC 455 at 510.'

How is this tension between cogent arguments pulling in opposite directions to be resolved? In jurisprudential and positive law terms this is a truly hard case. It is unrealistic to say that there is only one right answer. But a decision must be made, and that decision must represent the best available choice and hopefully a decision defensible as delivering justice. For reasons which are apparent from this opinion it is logically not straightforward to treat the present case as simply an extension of Parkinson's case. On the other hand, I consider (like Hale and Walker LJJ) that the law should give special consideration to the serious disability of a mother who had wanted to avoid having a child by undergoing a sterilisation operation. I am persuaded that the injustice of denying to such a seriously disabled mother the limited remedy of the extra costs caused by her disability outweighs the considerations emphasised by Waller LJ.

VII. A CONVENTIONAL AWARD

[40] Lord Bingham has explained why he favours a conventional award of £15,000 in the present case. His opinion makes clear that to this extent he would depart from McFarlane's case in the case of a healthy and normal child. He has further observed that he would apply this rule, without differentiation, to cases in which either the child or the parent is (or claims to be) disabled. This involves overruling the majority of the Court of Appeal in the present case. It also involves overruling the Court of Appeal decision in Parkinson's case against which there was no appeal. The other opinions in the present case speak for themselves.

[41] As Lord Bingham has said the suggestion was first made by Lord Millett in McFarlane's case ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 1005, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 114). It is true that none of the members of the majority in McFarlane's case discussed the point. It was, of course, not an issue at all in McFarlane's case. But it would be wrong to assume that the majority did not consider it. Like Lord Hope I considered it but found it unacceptable. And without doubt that was also the position of Lord Slynn and Lord Clyde. The proposal for a conventional award therefore runs counter to the views of the majority in McFarlane's case. Now the idea appeals to a narrow majority of a differently-constituted Appellate Committee. This does not mean that the point cannot be re-examined but it certainly suggests that the matter should be examined with great care and due observance of the usual procedures.

[42] In Parkinson's case the idea of a conventional award was not raised at all. It could, of course, have been raised as an alternative. The reason was no doubt that after McFarlane's case it was thought that this avenue was no longer open.

[43] In the present case the idea of a conventional award was not raised at first instance or in the Court of Appeal. For my part it is a great disadvantage for the House to consider such a point without the benefit of the views of the Court of Appeal. And the disadvantage cannot be removed by calling the new rule a 'gloss'. It is a radical and most important development which should only be embarked on after rigorous examination of competing arguments.

[44] It is clear from the agreed statement of facts and issues, as well as the printed case of the parties, that the idea of a conventional award was not an issue in the present case until the oral hearing. It is true that questions along these lines were put in oral argument but the examination of the issue was cursory and unaccompanied by research.

[45] No United Kingdom authority is cited for the proposition that judges have the power to create a remedy of awarding a conventional sum in cases such as the present. There is none. It is also noteworthy that in none of the decisions from many foreign jurisdictions, with varying results, is there any support for such a solution. This underlines the heterodox nature of the solution adopted.

[46] Like Lord Hope I regard the idea of a conventional award in the present case as contrary to principle. It is a novel procedure for judges to create such a remedy. There are limits to permissible creativity for judges. In my view the majority have strayed into forbidden territory. It is also a backdoor evasion of the legal policy enunciated in McFarlane's case. If such a rule is to be created it must be done by Parliament. The fact is, however, that it would be a hugely controversial legislative measure. It may well be that the Law Commissions and Parliament ought in any event, to consider the impact of the creation of a power to make a conventional award in the cases under consideration for the coherence of the tort system.

[47] I cannot support the proposal for creating such a new rule.

VIII. THE CONCLUSION AND DISPOSAL

[48] While I am troubled by the wholly unparticularised nature of the claim I would allow the claim of Ms Rees to be pursued. For avoidance of doubt I add that the cases mentioned by Waller LJ, at [53], [54] of his judgment are on the wrong side of the line drawn in McFarlane's case and I would not extend the exception to such cases.

[49] I would dismiss the appeal of the NHS Hospital Trust.

LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD.

[50] My Lords, my noble and learned friend Lord Steyn has summarised the facts of this case, and I gratefully adopt his account of them. I cannot improve upon his masterly analysis of the decision of this House in McFarlane v Tayside Health Board [1999] 4 All ER 961, [2000] 2 AC 59 that the costs of rearing a normal and healthy child were not recoverable. I also agree with him, for all the reasons that he has given, that it would be wrong for the House now to depart from McFarlane's case even if some of your Lordships had been persuaded that they would have decided the case differently.

[51] When I was giving my reasons for the decision in McFarlane's case I said that the value which was to be attached to the benefits which would have to be set off against the costs of rearing the child were incalculable: [1999] 4 All ER 961 at 991, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 97. I did not base my decision on a belief that it was morally repugnant to award damages for the birth of a healthy child. As Gleeson CJ observed in Cattanach v Melchior [2003] HCA 38 (at para 6), the fundamental value which is attached to human life is an ethical, not an economic, concept and the problem which had to be addressed was legal, not theological. It was the insuperable problem of calculation that was the critical point in the decision so far as I was concerned. If, as I believe, it is impossible to measure the benefits, it must follow that no value can properly be arrived at for the balance that would need to be struck between the costs and the benefits to arrive at a figure which could be awarded as damages. The conclusion which I drew was that, for this reason, these costs must be held to fall outside the ambit of the duty of care which was owed to the pursuers by the persons who carried out the procedures in the hospital and the laboratory.

[52] In expressing myself in that way I was adopting the approach to economic loss which was indicated by Lord Oliver of Aylmerton in Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568 at 599, [1990] 2 AC 605 at 651 and in Murphy v Brentwood DC [1990] 2 All ER 908 at 934, [1991] 1 AC 398 at 486–487. I share the view which Gleeson CJ expressed in Melchior's case [2003] HCA 38 (at para 30), that the claim was one for the recovery of pure economic loss arising out of a relationship, liability for which has to be justified by showing that there was a duty of care to protect the claimants from that kind of harm. It has been suggested that it would be more accurate to say simply that it was for a head of loss which was not recoverable. There may indeed be other ways of expressing the point. I continue to think that Lord Oliver's formulation of the principle is acceptable in this context. But, as Lord Steyn has explained, the decision was at its heart founded in legal policy. This means that we are dealing with an area of the law where the responsibility for making choices about its development lies with the judges.

[53] The question which has been raised in this case is whether McFarlane's case can be distinguished because the claimant is a seriously disabled person. The facts are different, of course, because the parents in that case were both free from disability, as was the child who had been born as a result of the board's negligence. But the ratio of that decision needs to be examined as well, in order to discover whether this difference in the facts allows the conclusion to be drawn that in her case the extra costs of rearing a normal, healthy child which are due to her disability are recoverable.

THE DISABLED CHILD

[54 ]It has already been held in Parkinson v St James and Seacroft University Hospital NHS Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 530, [2001] 3 All ER 97, [2002] QB 266 that the case of a seriously disabled child can be distinguished and that, although the ordinary costs of rearing the child are not recoverable, the decision in McFarlane's case does not preclude recovery of the extra costs which are attributable to the child's disability. This point did not require to be examined in McFarlane's case. The Lord Ordinary, Lord Gill, emphasised at the outset of his opinion that the debate in that case was conducted on the basis that the child was a normal, healthy child: 1997 SLT 211 at 212. The position was unchanged when the case reached your Lordships' House, as can be seen from all the speeches.

[55] I agree with the Court of Appeal that the question whether the extra costs of raising a seriously disabled child are recoverable raises a separate issue. In principle, these costs constitute an extra and distinct burden on the parent who has suffered damage as result of the tortfeasor's negligence. The task of identifying and setting off against each other all the many and various costs and benefits, both tangible and intangible, of raising a normal, healthy child throughout its childhood is an impossible one. As my noble and learned friend Lord Millett said in McFarlane's case, the advantages and disadvantages are inseparable.

[56] But the scene changes if, following upon a wrongful or uncovenanted pregnancy (as to the use of these expressions, see JK Mason Wrongful Pregnancy, Wrongful Birth and Wrongful Terminology (2002) 6 Edin LR 46 at 47 and 65, note 77), the mother gives birth to a child who is seriously disabled and is likely to remain so throughout its childhood. Here too there is the inevitable mixture of costs and benefits, of blessings and detriments, that cannot be separated. One cannot begin to disentangle the complex emotions of joy and sorrow and the intangible burdens and rewards that will result from having to assume responsibility for the child's upbringing. But there is no getting away from the fact that the parent of a seriously disabled child is likely to face extra costs in her endeavour to make the child's upbringing as normal as possible.

[57] A disabled child is likely to need extra care, and the provision of this care is likely to mean extra expenditure. As Professor Mason has observed in his helpful contribution to the debate on this subject, (2000) 6 Edin LR 46 at 58 and 64, love in the context of disability has to be backed by corresponding supportive resources. These resources cost money. The more disabled the child is, the more difficult it is to fulfil these obligations. I consider that, as a matter of legal policy, the Court of Appeal were right to hold that in principle these extra costs are recoverable. In Melchior's case [2003] HCA 38 (at para 166), Kirby J said that to award these extra costs would reinforce views about disability and attitudes towards parents and children with physical or mental impairments that were contrary to contemporary Australian values reinforced by the law. The law in this country is just as alert to the need to eliminate discrimination on the ground of disability. But I do not, for my part, see any conflict between the policy which the law in that area has adopted and awarding damages for the extra costs that have to be incurred to enable a disabled child who has special needs to lead as normal a life as possible.

THE DISABLED MOTHER

[58] Now we are faced with the difficult question whether the extra costs which will be incurred by a seriously disabled parent in rearing a normal, healthy child are recoverable. The issue did not arise in McFarlane's case. But I think that it can be taken to have been the unspoken assumption at all levels in that case that the child-rearing costs which the parents were seeking to recover were the costs which normal, healthy parents would incur when they were providing for their child's upbringing.

[59] It has to be made clear that McFarlane's case was not decided on the basis that, if the child too was a normal and healthy one, there was a deemed equilibrium, as Hale LJ in Parkinson's case suggested: [2001] 3 All ER 97 at [87]–[91]. By this metaphor she meant that the benefits brought by the child were deemed sufficient to negative the claim for the costs of its upbringing: [2002] 2 All ER 177 at [10]. This suggests that there was assumed to be an equal distribution on either side of benefits and disadvantages. With respect, however, that reads too much into the decision. No calculation of that kind was attempted or even contemplated. It was considered that a calculation aimed at achieving a fair result, taking everything into account, was impossible.

[60] Nevertheless it is true to say that, if one assumes that the child and the parent are normal and healthy when one is contemplating the advantages and disadvantages that will flow from the child's birth, an element of symmetry is inherent in the exercise. The symmetry lies in the assumption that the parent and the child are both normal and healthy. It is disturbed if one is driven to assume that either the parent or the child is affected by a serious disability. Once one accepts, as I would do, that the extra costs of rearing a seriously disabled child are recoverable it may thought that to deny the recovery of extra costs by the seriously disabled parent would be to introduce a distinction between these two cases which was arbitrary and unreasonable.

[61] But the risks of a decision which is arbitrary and unreasonable are not all one way. It may indeed be difficult, as Lord Millett points out, to isolate the extra costs which are due to the parent's disability from the financial benefits which, over time, will result from bringing up the child within the disabled person's family. How, it may be asked, can these extra costs be identified if the benefits and disadvantages of rearing a normal and healthy child are incalculable? It has also been suggested that it is difficult to justify making an exception in favour of the seriously disabled parent when others such as the exhausted and depressed mother who already has more children than she can cope with cannot recover the extra costs of rearing which are attributable to her special circumstances. These were the points which troubled Waller LJ in the Court of Appeal. It led him, in a careful and helpful opinion, to dissent from the decision that in principle these extra costs were recoverable: which is all that is being asked for by way of a preliminary issue at this stage: [2002] 2 All ER 177 at [52]–[55].

[62] It seems to me that the first of these difficulties raises a question of fact rather than a question of principle. Great care must be taken to avoid passing on to the tortfeasor costs which are attributable simply to the fact of the parent's disability. It is the extra out-of-pocket expenses which the seriously disabled parent has to incur when she is confronted by the ordinary tasks of child-rearing after making due allowance for any anticipated financial benefits, and those costs only, that are in issue here. Her situation has to be compared with that of the normal, healthy parent. One can say, as in the case of a seriously disabled child, that a seriously disabled parent who has special needs is likely to require help if her child is to have a normal upbringing and that this is likely to lead to extra expenditure. Here again I do not see any conflict between the policy which the law has adopted about discrimination on the ground of disability and awarding damages for the extra costs that have to be incurred to enable a parent who has special needs to provide her child with as normal a life as possible. I agree with Robert Walker LJ that the care that may be needed in sorting out what costs are and are not so attributable should not deter us from allowing the possibility of recovery, which is all that is being asked for by way of a preliminary issue at this stage: [2002] 2 All ER 177 at [41].

[63] The second point, however, is more troublesome and I confess that I have not found it easy to find a clear answer to it. I agree with Lord Millett that as a general rule the parent's motive for not wanting any, or any more, children is irrelevant. On balance however I have come to the view that the fact that the child's parent is a seriously disabled person does provide a ground for distinguishing McFarlane's case and that it would be fair, just and reasonable to hold that such extra costs as can be attributed to the disability are within the scope of the tortfeasor's duty of care and are recoverable.

[64] It is suggested that to make an exception in favour of the seriously disabled parent would undermine the basis of the decision in McFarlane's case to such an extent that it would open the door to claims for extra child-rearing costs by disadvantaged parents generally. The question then is, are there sound reasons for making an exception only in the case of serious disability?

[65] Disadvantages which are the result of the parent's choice of lifestyle prior to the unwanted conception can be said, without hesitation, to fall into an entirely different category. So too, although this is a harder case, are disadvantages that flow from circumstances beyond the parent's control such as social deprivation, racial discrimination or family breakdown. The decision in McFarlane's case applies across the board, to every healthy and normal parent, in whatever social or family condition they may find themselves. The seriously disabled parent is in a different category. It is the inescapable fact of her disability which marks the case of the seriously disabled parent out from these cases. The fact that this category too must be applied across the board, irrespective of the social or family situation in which the parent finds herself, indicates the fundamental nature of the characteristic that gives rise to it. Her social or family circumstances may, of course, affect the amount of the costs that can be considered to be recoverable. But it is the inescapable fact that the seriously disabled parent cannot, however hard she tries, do all the things that a normal, healthy parent can do when carrying out the ordinary tasks involved in a child's upbringing that place this parent's case into distinct category.

[66] I would also take into account this further factor. In the Court of Appeal Robert Walker LJ referred to the developing law as to disability: which is all that is being asked for by way of a preliminary issue at this stage: [2002] 2 All ER 177 at [41]. He suggested that this should help to overcome the problems in defining what is and what is not a disability. I would prefer to regard the developing law on this subject as a guide to the general direction the common law should take when it is considering what it should do in cases of serious disability as a matter of legal policy.

[67] There has been a good deal of activity in the field of employment law and in the law relating to discrimination generally. Discrimination in the employment field on grounds of disability presents unique challenges to legislators, as Mummery LJ pointed out in Clark v Novacold Ltd [1999] ICR 951 at 954. Section 1(1) of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 provides that a person has a disability for the purposes of that Act if he has a physical or mental impairment which has a substantial and long-term adverse effect on his ability to carry out normal day-to-day activities. But this is subject to various qualifications and exceptions in Sch 1. Guidance under s 3 of that Act has been issued by the Secretary of State and there is also a Code of Practice. The decision of the Employment Appeal Tribunal in Goodwin v Patent Office [1999] ICR 302 illustrates the complex exercise that may have to be undertaken when the statutory definition is applied to the facts with the assistance of this additional material. Further legislation will be needed to give effect by 2 December 2006 to that part of Council Directive 2000/78/EC (OJ, L303/16, 2 December 2000) which, in laying down a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation, deals with discrimination on grounds of age and disability: see the second paragraph of art 18.

[68] It is the main thrust of this legislation rather than the detailed definitions that I would look to for guidance. The respect and value which the law places on every life extends to everybody irrespective of whether they are born with or without disabilities. But, as the legislation shows, the law also faces up to the fact of disability and to the risk of discrimination and disadvantage that it gives rise to. Its aim is to provide civil rights for disabled people whose impairment affects their ability to carry out normal day-to-day activities. By allowing the seriously disabled parent to recover the extra costs of child-rearing which are due to her disability the law will be doing its best to enable her to perform this task on equal terms with those who are not affected by her impairment.

[69] What then does one mean, in this context, when one refers to serious disability? I would prefer to rely on the flexibility of the common law. Each case must be taken on its own facts. The temptation to find a handicap where there is none must be resisted. I have referred to the parent in whose favour the exception exists as 'seriously disabled'. The word 'serious' is important. The normal incidents of an otherwise healthy life must be held to be covered by the McFarlane principle. As for the word 'disability', I would take the requirement of need as the guiding principle. Is the mental or physical characteristic which distinguishes the case from that of the normal, healthy parent of such a kind that extra costs will need to be incurred if the child is to receive a normal and proper upbringing? In the present case the genetic condition from which the claimant suffers suggests that, when the facts are examined, the answer to this question will be in the affirmative.

A CONVENTIONAL SUM?

[70] I should like to add that I have not overlooked Lord Millett's suggestion that the proper outcome in all these cases would be to award the parents a modest conventional sum for the denial of their right to limit the size of their family—or, as he now puts it, to compensate them for the injury to their autonomy. I was not attracted by this suggestion when he made it in McFarlane's case, and I have to confess, with respect, that I am not attracted by it in this case either. I agree with Gleeson CJ's observation in Melchior's case [2003] HCA 38 (at para 23) that it would be more accurate to say that parents have the freedom to choose, and therefore to limit, the size of their family. To describe this freedom as a right—or, as Lord Millett now suggests, as the loss of an opportunity which is the proper subject of compensation by way of damages—seems to me beg many questions which are not answered in his analysis. But that is not the only reason for the difficulty which I have in accepting this suggestion.

[71] The award of a conventional sum is familiar in the field of damages for personal injury. Conventional sums are awarded as general damages for typical injuries such as the loss of a limb or an eye or for the bereavement that results from the loss of a child or parent in the case of a fatal accident. This is the means by which the court arrives, as best it can, at a figure for the damage suffered which is incapable of being calculated arithmetically: Kemp and Kemp The Quantum of Damages, vol 1, para 1-003. The sum which it awards has been described by Lord Denning MR in Ward v James [1965] 1 All ER 563 at 576, [1966] 1 QB 273 at 303 as 'basically a conventional figure derived from experience and from awards in comparable cases': see also Wright v British Railways Board [1983] 2 All ER 698 at 699, [1983] 2 AC 773 at 777 per Lord Diplock. The award is conventional in the sense that there is no pecuniary guideline which can point the way to a correct assessment: Lim Poh Choo v Camden and Islington Area Health Authority [1979] 2 All ER 910 at 919, [1980] AC 174 at 189 per Lord Scarman. But financial loss does not present the same problem. It is capable of assessment in money. So it has never been the practice to resort to a conventional sum as a means of compensating the claimant for that part of the loss that falls under the head of special damages.

[72] To take just one example, the distinction between these two heads of loss has been recognised by s 1 of the Damages (Scotland) Act 1976, as amended by s 1 of the Damages (Scotland) Act 1993, which defines the rights of relatives of a deceased person in Scots law. The relatives' claims for loss of support and funeral expenses are dealt with in s 1(3). Members of the deceased's immediate family may then be awarded under s 1(4), without prejudice to any claim under s 1(3), such sum as the court thinks just by way of compensation for distress and anxiety, grief and sorrow and the loss of such non-patrimonial benefit as the relative might have been expected to derive from the deceased's society and guidance if the deceased had not died. This is the equivalent of an award of damages for bereavement under s 1A of the Fatal Accidents Act 1976, which was inserted by s 3(1) of the Administration of Justice Act 1982, except that the amount of the award is left to the court and not fixed, as it is in England and Wales, by statutory instrument.

[73] The award of a conventional sum to parents for the loss of the right, or the opportunity, to limit the size of their family would perform a similar function to the award of a conventional sum under s 1(4). It would deal with that part of the parents' claim that fell into the category of general damages. But it would not deal—nor, as Lord Millett has explained, would it be designed to deal—with that part of the claim resulting from the loss of the right that fell into the category of special damages. The splitting up of a claim of damages into these two parts in order to allow recovery of one part and deny recovery of the other part is a novel concept and it seems to me, with respect, to be contrary to principle. If damages are to be awarded at all, the aim must be to put the injured parties into the same position as far as money will allow as if they had not sustained the wrong for which they are being compensated: Livingstone v Rawyards Coal Co (1880) 5 App Cas 25 at 39 per Lord Blackburn. That rule would be broken if we were to assume that the loss of the right to limit one's family was capable of being compensated for by an award of damages and then to say that the parents' award was to be restricted by law to a conventional sum to compensate them only for their general damages. It would also be broken if we were to say—contrary to my assumption—that the conventional sum was intended to give them something for their financial loss also. It would deny them the opportunity of attempting to establish the true value of that part of their claim according to the compensatory principle.

[74] Lord Bingham of Cornhill seeks to escape from this problem by asserting that the conventional award which he favours would not be, and would not be intended to be, compensatory. It would not be the product of calculation nor would it be nominal, but would afford some measure of recognition of the wrong done. This approach seems to me to depart from the principle which has always guided the common law in its approach to the assessment of damages. He does not suggest that the award is intended to be punitive. If it is not, and the case is not one for an award that is purely nominal, what basis can there be for it other than the compensatory principle? Both Lord Millett and Lord Scott use language which suggests that they are seeking to arrive at a figure which would compensate the parents for being deprived of the loss of opportunity or of the benefits which they were entitled to expect. Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead does not use the same language, but his brief treatment of the issue leaves me in doubt as to the basis for it. The lack of any consistent or coherent ratio in support of the proposition in the speeches of the majority is disturbing. It underlines Lord Steyn's point that the examination of the issue at the oral hearing was cursory and unaccompanied by research. Like him, I cannot agree with the description of the new rule by Lord Bingham and Lord Nicholls as a 'gloss' on the decision in McFarlane's case.

[75] Then there is the problem of arriving at an appropriate figure for a conventional sum which was not at risk of being seen by the parents as derisory. The figure which Lord Millett suggested in McFarlane's case seems to me to invite that criticism. I doubt whether the larger figure that is now being suggested removes this difficulty. We are in uncharted waters, as there are no previous awards for the loss of this right to which we can look in order to discover the parameters. But it would be wrong to ignore the current level of awards in actions of damages for personal injury. To take just one recent example, the Inner House of the Court of Session has held, having regard to the recent level of jury awards for bereavement (jury awards are still competent in Scotland in actions of damages for personal injuries: Court of Session Act 1988, s 11(a)), that the parents of an adult son who was killed in a flying accident should be awarded £20,000 each under s 1(4) of the Damages (Scotland) Act 1976 for their bereavement: Shaher v British Aerospace Flying College Ltd 2003 SLT 791. How is one to measure the loss of the right to limit the size of one's family against an award of that kind, bearing in mind the far-reaching and long-lasting effect that the birth of the uncovenanted child will have on the life of the parent? It seems to me that a much closer examination of the general level of awards in these and other similar cases would be needed before one could come up with a figure that one could even begin to regard as appropriate. In my respectful opinion it would not be right for your Lordships, without guidance from judges sitting at first instance, to attempt to carry out that exercise.

[76] Lord Bingham has given, as one of his reasons for applying the new rule without differentiation to cases whether either the child or the parent is, or claims to be, disabled the acute difficulty of the task of quantifying the additional costs attributable to disability. As I have already said, I agree with Robert Walker LJ that care would be needed in sorting out what costs are and are not so attributable. But to describe the task as one of acute difficulty seems to me to be an overstatement. Lord Bingham then says that the difficulty is highlighted by the inability of the respondent to give any realistic indication of the additional costs she seeks to recover. But I think that this may be unfair to the respondent, as all that was being asked for at this stage was an answer to the preliminary issue whether the recovery of costs was a possibility. We have no means of knowing whether the additional costs in her case can or cannot readily be identified, as this question was not explored at first instance or in the Court of Appeal nor was it focused as an issue in this appeal.

[77] I am left with the uneasy feeling that the figure which is to be established by the new rule will in many cases, and especially in this one, fall well short of what would be needed to satisfy Lord Millett's aim, which Lord Scott of Foscote adopts, of compensating the parents for the wrong that has been done to them. The issue is, as Lord Steyn says, hugely controversial and I agree with him that its creation—which would surely then have been the product of much more study and research than has been given to its creation in this case by the majority—ought to have been left, preferably with the benefit of a report by the Law Commissions, to Parliament.

CONCLUSION

[78] I would allow the respondent's claim to proceed. I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD HUTTON.

[79] My Lords, the claimant, Ms Karina Rees, is a young woman in her early thirties who suffers from the genetic condition of retinitis pigmentosa. Since the age of two she has been blind in one eye and has limited vision in the other eye; she is severely visually handicapped. In recent years her vision had deteriorated and she had given up work. She felt that her eyesight would bar her from properly looking after a child and she was anxious about health matters and frightened by the thought of labour and delivery. She had great difficulty in finding a suitable method of contraception and she came to a very definite decision that she did not want and would never want to give birth to a child. She was referred by her general practitioner to a consultant gynaecologist at Darlington Memorial Hospital and when she saw the consultant she told him of her visual handicap and of the concerns and fears which had led her to the decision that she would never want to give birth to a child. With this knowledge of her concerns and of her decision the consultant performed a sterilisation operation on the claimant on 18 July 1995. The appellant hospital trust admits that the operation was performed negligently and that the right fallopian tube was not adequately occluded. In July 1996 the claimant's son Anthony was conceived and he was born on 28 April 1997. His father had no desire to be involved with him and the claimant is a single mother who is bringing up Anthony alone. It is accepted for the purposes of this appeal that Anthony is a healthy child.

[80] In September 1999 the claimant commenced proceedings against the hospital trust claiming damages for negligence in respect of the sterilisation operation and she sought to recover the costs of bringing up Anthony to his majority. The costs which she claimed included the costs which would be incurred by a mother who was not disabled in the bringing up of a child and she also claimed the extra costs that would be incurred by her as a result of her severe visual disability.

[81] At the trial of a preliminary issue Mr Stuart Brown QC, sitting as a deputy judge of the High Court, held that he was bound by the decision of this House in McFarlane v Tayside Health Board [1999] 4 All ER 961, [2000] 2 AC 59 to hold that the claimant was not entitled to recover damages for any of the costs of bringing up her son. On appeal the Court of Appeal (Robert Walker and Hale LJJ, Waller LJ dissenting) held that the claimant was entitled to damages to compensate her for the extra costs incurred by her in bringing up her son attributable to her disability, and the hospital trust now appeals to the House against that decision.

McFARLANE v TAYSIDE HEALTH BOARD

[82] In McFarlane's case a married couple with four children decided that they did not want any more children and that the husband should undergo a vasectomy. A vasectomy operation was performed by a surgeon employed by the defendant health board and five months later the surgeon informed the husband that his sperm counts were negative and that contraceptive measures were no longer necessary. The parents acted on that advice and subsequently the wife became pregnant and after a normal pregnancy and labour gave birth to a healthy child whom the parents loved and cared for as an integral part of their family. Both parents were also in good health. Both parents sued the health board for negligence, the mother claiming damages for the physical discomfort suffered by her in her pregnancy, confinement and delivery and both parents also sued for the financial costs of caring for and bringing up the child. The Outer House of the Court of Session dismissed the pursuers' action on the ground that a normal pregnancy and labour could not constitute personal injuries for which damages were recoverable and that the benefits of parenthood transcended any financial loss incurred by the parents in looking after and bringing up their child. The Second Division of the Inner House of the Court of Session reversed that decision and held that the wife was entitled, if negligence were established, to damages for the physical effects of pregnancy and childbirth. The Second Division further held that in accordance with the conventional principles of delict law the parents would be entitled to recover the costs of bringing up the child and that there were no public policy grounds to disentitle the parents from recovering such costs.

[83] The House decided, Lord Millett dissenting, that the wife was entitled to general damages for the pain suffering and inconvenience of pregnancy and childbirth and, Lord Clyde dissenting, to special damages for extra medical expenses, clothing and loss of earnings associated with the pregnancy and birth. The House further held that the parents were not entitled to recover damages for the costs of bringing up the child. Each member of the Appellate Committee delivered a speech and there was some degree of difference in the reasons given for the decision. Lord Slynn of Hadley ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 972, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 76) and Lord Hope of Craighead ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 990, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 97) held that it would not be fair, just or reasonable to impose a duty of care on the employees of the health board giving rise to liability for the cost of bringing up the child. Lord Steyn ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 978, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 83) held in reliance on principles of distributive justice that the tort law of Scotland and England does not permit parents of a healthy unwanted child to claim the costs of bringing up the child from a health authority or a doctor. He further observed that if it were necessary to do so, he would say that the claim did not satisfy the requirement of being fair, just and reasonable. Lord Clyde held ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 998, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 105) that to award damages for the cost of bringing up the child would not constitute reasonable restitution as it would not take into account the benefit to the parents of having a loved and healthy child. Lord Millett stated ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 1000, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 108) that the court is engaged in a search for justice, and that this demands that the dispute be resolved in a way which is fair and reasonable and accords with ordinary notions of what is fit and proper, and he held ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 1005, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 114) that society itself must regard the balance of advantages and disadvantages in having a normal, healthy baby as beneficial. It would be repugnant to its own sense of values to do otherwise, and it is morally offensive to regard a normal, healthy baby as more trouble and expense than it was worth.

[84] In holding that it would not be fair, just or reasonable to impose a duty of care giving rise to liability for the cost of bringing up the child, Lord Slynn and Lord Hope were applying the principle stated by Lord Oliver of Aylmerton in Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568 at 583, [1990] 2 AC 605 at 633 that before imposing a duty of care the law requires 'that the attachment of liability for harm which has occurred be "just and reasonable"', and the related principle stated by Lord Hoffmann in South Australia Asset Management Corp v York Montague Ltd, United Bank of Kuwait plc v Prudential Property Services Ltd, Nykredit Mortgage Bank plc v Edward Erdman Group plc [1996] 3 All ER 365 at 370, [1997] AC 191 at 211 (Banque Bruxelles) that the plaintiff must show 'that the duty was owed to him and that it was a duty in respect of the kind of loss which he has suffered'.

[85] Both the Caparo and Banque Bruxelles cases were cases where no physical harm caused by the alleged breach of duty intervened between it and the financial loss which had been suffered, and in the Banque Bruxelles case Lord Hoffmann stated ([1996] 3 All ER 365 at 371, [1997] AC 191 at 213): 'Normally the law limits liability to those consequences which are attributable to that which made the act wrongful', and it would appear to be clear that the costs of bringing up the child were, in accordance with conventional principles, attributable to the wrongdoing of the hospital staff. I think it was for this reason that Lord Clyde stated ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 995, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 102):

> '... the issue raised in the appeal is not properly one of the existence or non-existence of a duty of care ... The present case is concerned with the extent of the losses which may properly be claimed in the circumstances of the case, rather than with the existence or non-existence of a liability to make reparation.'

However, as my noble and learned friend Lord Steyn observes in his speech, this is a point in the area of conceptualist thinking. What is important is that the two concepts, the one stated by Lord Slynn and Lord Hope, the other by Lord Clyde, yield the same result, and in my opinion the fundamental principle underlying the speeches in McFarlane's case is that it would not be fair, just or reasonable to award damages for the cost of bringing up a healthy child.

THE ISSUES ON THIS APPEAL

[86] Two principal issues arise on this appeal. The first issue is whether the House should depart from the decision in McFarlane's case. Mr de Wilde QC, for the respondent, submits that the House is entitled to depart from the decision pursuant to Practice Statement (Judicial Precedent) [1966] 3 All ER 77, [1966] 1 WLR 1234 and that the House should do so because the decision was contrary to well-established principles of tort law. My Lords, I reject that submission. I consider that the decision was right. Even if I considered that the decision was erroneous, I would be of opinion for the reasons given by the House in Fitzleet Estates Ltd v Cherry (Inspector of Taxes) [1977] 3 All ER 996, [1977] 1 WLR 1345 that the House should not depart from the decision.

[87] The second issue is, if the decision in McFarlane's case stands as good law, does it require a court to hold, as did the deputy High Court judge, that damages cannot be recovered in the present case where the single mother, unlike the mother in McFarlane's case, is seriously disabled. This is the issue which I now turn to consider, but before doing so I think it is relevant to make a further observation. I think it is clear, as stated by Hale LJ in Parkinson v St James and Seacroft University Hospital NHS Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 530 at [75], [2001] 3 All ER 97 at [75], [2002] QB 266 and Waller LJ in the Court of Appeal in the present case [2002] EWCA Civ 88 at [44], [2002] 2 All ER 177 at [44], [2003] QB 20 that in McFarlane's case the House recognised that on normal principles of tort law the claim for the cost of bringing up the child would succeed. Lord Millett stated ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 999, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 107):

'The defenders do not deny that they are responsible for having supplied the information in question, that Mr and Mrs McFarlane were entitled to rely on it, that it was incorrect, and that they were under a duty to take reasonable care to ensure that it was correct. Nor do they deny that, if they failed to do so, then they would normally be liable for all the foreseeable consequences of its being wrong: see South Australia Asset Management Corp v York Montague Ltd, United Bank of Kuwait plc v Prudential Property Services Ltd, Nykredit Mortgage Bank plc v Edward Erdman Group Ltd [1996] 3 All ER 365 at 372–373, [1997] AC 191 at 214 per Lord Hoffmann.'

And ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 1001, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 109):

'Catherine's conception and birth are the very things that the defenders' professional services were called upon to prevent. In principle any losses occasioned thereby are recoverable however they may be characterised.'

See also Lord Slynn ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 967, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 70) and Lord Hope ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 984, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 90).

THE DECISION OF THE COURT OF APPEAL IN PARKINSON

[88] In deciding the second issue a further point which has to be considered is whether Parkinson's case was correctly decided. In that case the sterilisation operation was negligently carried out and the claimant later conceived and gave birth to a child who was born with severe disabilities. Longmore J held that the claimant was entitled to recover damages for the costs of providing for her child's special needs relating to his disabilities but not for the basic costs of his maintenance, and this decision was upheld by the Court of Appeal.

[89] In his judgment Brooke LJ based his decision that the appeal of the health trust should be dismissed on the ground that it was fair, just and reasonable to award the claimant compensation for the extra expenses associated with bringing up a child with significant disabilities. He cited the judgment of the Supreme Court of Florida in Fassoulas v Ramey (1984) 450 So 2d 822:

'There is no valid policy argument against parents being recompensed for these costs of extraordinary care in raising a deformed child to majority. We hold these special upbringing costs associated with a deformed child to be recoverable.' (See [2001] 3 All ER 97 at [49].)

He then stated: 'Unless we are bound by authority to the contrary, I find this argument persuasive.' And, he stated:

'... an award of compensation which is limited to the special upbringing costs associated with rearing a child with a serious disability would be fair, just and reasonable; (vii) if principles of distributive justice are called in aid, I believe that ordinary people would consider that it would be fair for the law to make an award in such a case, provided that it is limited to the extra expenses associated with the child's disability.'

[90] In her judgment Hale LJ gave consideration to the right to physical autonomy ([2001] 3 All ER 97 at [56] and discussed conception, pregnancy and childbirth as an invasion of bodily integrity (at [58]). Having discussed the judgment in McFarlane's case she stated (at [87]):

'At the heart of it all is the feeling that to compensate for the financial costs of bringing up a healthy child is a step too far. A child brings benefits as well as costs; it is impossible accurately to calculate those benefits so as to give a proper discount; the only sensible course is to assume that they balance one another out.' a

And (at [90]):

'The solution of deemed equilibrium also has its attractions and is in any event binding upon us. Indeed, it provides the answer to many of the b questions arising in this case. The true analysis is that this is a limitation on the damages which would otherwise be recoverable on normal principles. There is therefore no reason or need to take that limitation any further than it was taken in McFarlane's case. This caters for the ordinary costs of the ordinary child. A disabled child needs extra care and extra expenditure. He is c deemed, on this analysis, to bring as much pleasure and as many advantages as does a normal healthy child. Frankly, in many cases, of which this may be one, this is much less likely. The additional stresses and strains can have seriously adverse effects upon the whole family, and not infrequently lead, as here, to the break up of the parents' relationship and detriment to the other children. But we all know of cases where the whole family has been d enriched by the presence of a disabled member and would not have things any other way. This analysis treats a disabled child as having exactly the same worth as a non-disabled child. It affords him the same dignity and status. It simply acknowledges that he costs more.'

At the end of her judgment she stated: e

'[94] ... The difference between a normal and a disabled child is primarily in the extra care that they need, although this may bring with it extra expenditure. It is right, therefore, that the parent who bears those extra burdens should have a claim.

[95] Longmore J considered that such a claim would not "stick in the f gullet". I agree. Whatever the commuter on the Underground might think of the claim for Catherine McFarlane, it might reasonably be thought that he or she would not consider it unfair, unjust or disproportionate that the person who had undertaken to prevent conception, pregnancy and birth and negligently failed to do so were held responsible for the extra costs of caring g for and bringing up a disabled child.

[96] For those reasons, as well as those given by Brooke LJ, I would dismiss this appeal.'

Sir Martin Nourse agreed with both judgments.

[91] In my opinion the decision of the Court of Appeal in Parkinson's case was h right. In McFarlane's case the House confined its considerations to the case of the birth of a healthy child and expressed no opinion in relation to the birth of a child with disabilities. In that case the House considered that it was not fair, just or reasonable to award damages for the costs of bringing up a healthy child. But in my opinion it is fair, just and reasonable to award damages for the extra costs of j bringing up a disabled child and I am in agreement with the observation of Robert Walker LJ in relation to Parkinson in his judgment in the present case ([2002] 2 All ER 177 at [33]):

'There is not the same intuitive feeling that it would be exorbitant compensation to award damages for financial burdens which are the direct consequence of the disability of a child who was born disabled after a failed sterilisation, and which would not be incurred in consequence of the birth of a normal, healthy child.'

THE DECISION OF THE COURT OF APPEAL IN THIS CASE

[92] In the instant case Robert Walker LJ stated the basis of his decision as follows ([2002] 2 All ER 177 at [37]):

> 'I would base my decision on there being nothing unfair, unjust, unreasonable, unacceptable or morally repugnant in permitting recovery of compensation for a limited range of expenses which (when specified and proved) will be found to have a very close connection with the mother's severe visual impairment, and nothing to do with the blessings which the birth of her healthy son may have brought her.'

He further stated, that the circumstances of Karina Rees' case are not covered by McFarlane's case, that an award to her would be a legitimate extension of the decision in Parkinson's case, and that disabled persons are a category of the public whom the law increasingly recognises as requiring special consideration.

[93] Hale LJ also held that the appeal of Karina Rees should be allowed. She stated that all the discussion in the judgments in McFarlane's case was on the basis that the child was healthy and the costs were those of bringing up a healthy child. In her opinion it did no violence to the reasoning in McFarlane's case to conclude in Parkinson's case that the extra costs of bringing up a disabled child altered the justice of the case. In McFarlane's case in terms of the actual care required by the child, the parents were as well able to provide such care as any other parents and the House had not considered the position of a parent in a different position. Earlier in her judgment, she had referred to the concept of deemed equilibrium upon which she had relied in her judgment in Parkinson's case and she stated (at [23]):

> 'Hence I would conclude that, just as the extra costs involved in discharging that responsibility towards a disabled child can be recovered, so too can the extra costs involved in a disabled parent discharging that responsibility towards a healthy child. Of course we can assume that such a parent benefits, and benefits greatly, from having a child she never thought she would have. We can and must assume that those benefits negative the claim for the ordinary costs of looking after and bringing him up. But we do not have to assume that it goes further than that. She is not being overcompensated by being given recompense for the extra costs of child care occasioned by her disability. She is being put in the same position as her able-bodied fellows.'

[94] However both Robert Walker LJ (at [36]) and Waller LJ (at [50]) questioned the validity of the concept of deemed equilibrium on the ground that, as expressed by Waller LJ, in McFarlane's case the members of the House did not think in terms of an equilibrium with precise quantities on either side of the balance. In my respectful opinion this non-acceptance of the concept was justified for the reason stated by Waller LJ.

[95] Waller LJ dissented from the opinion of the majority of the court that Karina Rees should recover the extra costs of bringing up her child on the ground that such a ruling would constitute an exception to the general rule established by McFarlane's case, and that such an exception would not be fair and reasonable when the difficulties of a mother who was not disabled but who faced other severe difficulties and problems was compared with the difficulties of Karina Rees. He gave as an example a woman who already had four children and wished not to have a fifth, and for whom the birth of a fifth child would create a crisis in health terms unless help in caring for the child was available. Waller LJ concluded his judgment by stating at [55]:

> 'It is because the court is simply not prepared to go into a calculation which involves weighing one aspect against the other which in my view should bring about the conclusion that it is not fair, just, and reasonable that a disabled person should recover when other mothers in as great a need cannot. On the basis of distributive justice I believe that ordinary people would think that it was not fair that a disabled person should recover when mothers who may in effect become disabled by ill-health through having a healthy child would not.'

CONCLUSION

[96] The difficulties posited by Waller LJ place in sharp focus the problem which arises on this appeal, but I find myself in respectful agreement with the opinion of Robert Walker LJ (at [41]) that these difficulties should not deter the courts from deciding that a disabled mother is entitled to recover compensation for the extra costs of bringing up her child.

[97] My reasons for so holding, which have been foreshadowed in the views which I have already expressed, can be stated shortly. As I have said, I consider that the decision in McFarlane's case was grounded on the principle that it is not just, fair or reasonable to award damages to healthy parents for the costs of bringing up a healthy baby; the House did not consider the position where the mother was disabled. In my opinion where the mother is disabled it is not unjust, unfair or unreasonable to award damages for the extra costs of bringing up the child. In considering whether damages should be awarded there is, in my view, a clear distinction between a disabled mother and a mother in normal health. It is right, in my opinion, to recognise and give effect to this distinction in laying down a principle to guide courts of first instance notwithstanding that a mother who is not disabled may face the serious difficulties described by Waller LJ. The fact that hard cases can be pointed to very close to the line which divides recovery from non-recovery does not invalidate the principle itself.

[98] Secondly, there are two ways of stating the decision of the Court of Appeal in this case. It can either be said that the decision creates an exception to the principle established by McFarlane's case, or it can be said that McFarlane's case created an exception, in the case of the birth of a healthy baby to healthy parents, to the principle that where there is a breach of duty causing physical harm, all the damages directly flowing from that breach of duty can be recovered. As I have stated, I think that the members of the House recognised that under the general principles applicable to the recovery of damages for negligent breach of duty the McFarlane parents would have been entitled to recover damages. Therefore, whilst to some extent the matter is one of terminology, I would hold that McFarlane's case created an exception to the general principles, that that exception does not apply to a disabled child or to a disabled mother, and that accordingly the McFarlane decision does not bar the mother from recovering in this case.

[99] Accordingly, for the reasons which I have given, I would dismiss this appeal.

LORD MILLETT.

[100] My Lords, in McFarlane v Tayside Health Board [1999] 4 All ER 961, [2000] 2 AC 59 your Lordships were called upon to consider for the first time the extent to which damages are recoverable for the birth of an unintended child following a wrongful pregnancy. By this is meant a pregnancy which is consequent upon a failed sterilisation, whether it has been performed negligently or the parents have been negligently informed that it has been successful. The House held that the parents could not recover the costs of bringing up a normal, healthy child. In Parkinson v St James and Seacroft University Hospital NHS Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 530, [2001] 3 All ER 97, [2002] QB 266 the Court of Appeal held that the additional costs of bringing up a disabled child were recoverable. The question in the present case is whether the additional costs of bringing up a normal, healthy child which are attributable to the fact that one of the parents is disabled are similarly recoverable.

[101] Your Lordships are therefore asked to decide whether the present case is a legitimate extension of Parkinson's case or is governed by the overriding principle established in McFarlane's case. The respondent sought to avoid this question by inviting the House to depart from its decision in McFarlane's case.

[102] The principles which guide the House in deciding whether to depart from a previous decision of its own are well established and have been repeatedly stated: see Practice Statement (Judicial Precedent) [1966] 3 All ER 77, [1966] 1 WLR 1234; Knuller (Publishing, Printing and Promotions) Ltd v DPP [1972] 2 All ER 898 at 903, [1973] AC 435 at 455 per Lord Reid; and Fitzleet Estates Ltd v Cherry (Inspector of Taxes) [1977] 3 All ER 996 at 999, [1977] 1 WLR 1345 at 1349 per Lord Wilberforce. As Lord Wilberforce said in the last-mentioned case: 'It requires much more than doubts as to the correctness of [the previous decision] to justify departing from it.'

[103] The established criteria are nowhere near satisfied in the present case. I would not depart from the unanimous decision of the House in McFarlane's case even if, after further reflection, I thought that it was wrong. But I am not persuaded that it was. I have heard nothing in the arguments presented to us which was not considered in McFarlane's case. All aspects of the question and the reasoning of the final appellate courts in numerous jurisdictions (which were seldom unanimous) were exhaustively canvassed. Experience has not shown there to be unforeseen difficulties in application; nor has it shown that the decision is productive of injustice. It has not been universally welcomed by academic writers; nor has it been universally condemned. The most that can be said is that the decision was controversial; and that was evident from the most casual reading of the comparative case law. If further evidence were needed, it is provided by the recent decision of the High Court of Australia in Cattanach v Melchior [2003] HCA 38, which was reached by a majority of four to three. Quot judices tot sententiae. Despite the diversity of opinion, the judgments cover familiar ground and contribute no new insight.

[104] McFarlane's case was a case of negligent sterilisation advice. It decided that the costs of bringing up a normal, healthy child are not recoverable. Negligence was not admitted—that issue remained to be tried—but the appeal was brought on the pleadings and negligence had to be assumed. The defenders conceded that they were responsible for having given the advice in question and that they were under a duty to take reasonable care to ensure that it was correct. They acknowledged that they would normally be liable for all the foreseeable consequences of its being wrong. They accepted that Mrs McFarlane's pregnancy and the child's birth were the direct and foreseeable consequences of the advice being wrong. Causation was not in issue. On conventional legal reasoning Mr and Mrs McFarlane would be entitled to recover damages which represented the full extent of the financial and other losses consequent upon Mrs McFarlane's pregnancy and the birth of their child, including the costs of bringing her up.

[105] The House nevertheless unanimously held that the costs of bringing up the child were not recoverable. In their speeches the individual members of the Appellate Committee all based this conclusion on legal policy, though they expressed themselves in different terms. My noble and learned friend Lord Steyn spoke of distributive justice; he asked himself what would be morally acceptable to the ordinary person. Others spoke of what was 'fair, just and reasonable'—which expresses the same idea. I spoke openly of legal policy. I said ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 1000, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 108):

> 'The admission of a novel head of damages is not solely a question of principle. Limitations on the scope of legal liability arise from legal policy, which is to say "our more or less inadequately expressed ideas of what justice demands" (see Prosser and Keeton Law of Torts (5th edn, 1984) p 264). This is the case whether the question concerns the admission of a new head of damages or the admission of a duty of care in a new situation. Legal policy in this sense is not the same as public policy, even though moral considerations may play a part in both. The court is engaged in a search for justice, and this demands that the dispute be resolved in a way which is fair and reasonable and accords with ordinary notions of what is fit and proper. It is also concerned to maintain the coherence of the law and the avoidance of inappropriate distinctions if injustice is to be avoided in other cases.'

Others too made it clear that this was not the same as public policy in the traditional sense of that expression. It would not have been contrary to public policy to award damages to the pursuers in McFarlane's case any more than it would be contrary to public policy to award damages for breach of contract beyond the limits imposed by the rule in Hadley v Baxendale (1854) 9 Exch 341, [1843–60] All ER Rep 461. But in both cases the denial of damages rests upon policy considerations.

[106] Another and more technical difference of approach is detectable in the speeches. Lord Clyde and I considered that the question was directed to the admission of a new head of loss. Others considered that the question was whether the loss claimed was within the scope of the duty of care. In my opinion this is merely a difference of exposition. In some cases it is more illuminating to approach the question from one end; in other cases from the other. In Caparo Industries plc v Dickman [1990] 1 All ER 568 at 581, [1990] 2 AC 605 at 627 Lord Bridge of Harwich said:

> 'It is never sufficient to ask simply whether A owes B a duty of care. It is always necessary to determine the scope of the duty by reference to the kind of damage from which A must take care to save B harmless. "The question is always whether the defendant was under a duty to avoid or prevent that damage, but the actual nature of the damage suffered is relevant to the existence and extent of any duty to avoid or prevent it." (See Sutherland Shire Council v Heyman (1985) 60 ALR 1 at 48 per Brennan J.)'

In South Australia Asset Management Corp v York Montague Ltd, United Bank of Kuwait plc v Prudential Property Services Ltd, Nykredit Mortgage Bank plc v Edward Erdman Group plc [1996] 3 All ER 365 at 370, [1997] AC 191 at 211 Lord Hoffmann said:

> 'A duty of care such as the valuer owes does not, however, exist in the abstract. A plaintiff who sues for breach of a duty imposed by the law (whether in contract or tort or under statute) must do more than prove that the defendant has failed to comply. He must show that the duty was owed to him and that it was a duty in respect of the kind of loss which he has suffered.'

[107] Each of those cases raised an issue of causation. In neither case was it a factual issue, for there was no doubt that the loss was sustained as a direct result of the negligent information which the defendant had supplied. But the law does not hold a person liable for all the foreseeable consequences of his actions. So the question in each case was one of responsibility: was the defendant legally responsible for the loss which his negligence had caused? There was nothing unusual, however, in the nature of the loss; indeed it was commonplace—financial loss arising from a bad investment. The difficulty arose from the causal relationship between the defendant's negligence and the loss sustained by the plaintiff. The solution lay in recognising that a person is only liable for loss which falls within the scope of his duty of care.

[108] The problem in a case of wrongful pregnancy is not the same. There is no difficulty about causation, whether as a matter of fact or of legal responsibility. The pregnancy and birth of a child are the very things which the defendants are employed to prevent. It is impossible to say that consequential loss falls outside the scope of their duty of care. They are accordingly liable for the normal and foreseeable heads of loss, such as the mother's pain and suffering (and where appropriate loss of earnings) due to the confinement and delivery. The novelty of the claim in McFarlane's case lay in one particular head of damage—the cost of bringing up a healthy child. The House considered it to be morally repugnant to award damages for the birth of a healthy child. It makes for easier exposition to identify the issue by reference to the head of damage rather than the duty of care. It also has the added advantage that identifying the ratio of McFarlane's case in this way may make it simpler to find the answer to the question raised by the present case.

[109] In a lecture to the Personal Injury Bar Association's Annual Conference in 2003 Sir Roger Toulson, Chairman of the Law Commission, described the ratio of McFarlane's case as follows:

> 'Although at a detailed level there are therefore significant differences between the judgments, at a broader level two features dominate them. These are, first, the incalculability in monetary terms of the benefits to the parents of the birth of a healthy child; and, secondly, a sense that for the parents to recover the costs of bringing up a healthy child ran counter to the values which they held and which they believed that society at large could be expected to hold.'

[110] I agree with this analysis, which accurately represents my own reasoning and, I believe, that of other members of the Committee. I said ([1999] 4 All ER 961 at 1005, [2000] 2 AC 59 at 113–114):

> 'In my opinion the law must take the birth of a normal, healthy baby to be a blessing, not a detriment. In truth it is a mixed blessing. It brings joy and sorrow, blessing and responsibility. The advantages and the disadvantages are inseparable. Individuals may choose to regard the balance as unfavourable and take steps to forgo the pleasures as well as the responsibilities of parenthood. They are entitled to decide for themselves where their own interests lie. But society itself must regard the balance as beneficial. It would be repugnant to its own sense of values to do otherwise. It is morally offensive to regard a normal, healthy baby as more trouble and expense than it is worth.' (My emphasis.)

[111] In subsequent cases Hale LJ has developed the idea that the decision in McFarlane's case rested on a theory of 'deemed equilibrium'. With respect, such a theory cannot be extracted from any of the speeches; on the contrary, it is entirely inconsistent with them. To say that something is incalculable or cannot be weighed at all is quite different from saying that it is deemed to weigh the same as something else. To say, as I did, that 'society itself must regard the balance as beneficial' is quite different from saying that the balance must be treated as level.

[112] McFarlane's case decides that the costs of bringing up a normal, healthy child must be taken to be outweighed by the incalculable blessings which such a child brings to his or her parents and do not sound in damages. Parkinson's case decides that the additional costs of bringing up a disabled child are recoverable in damages. It may be that strict logic demands a different answer. A disabled child is not 'worth' less than a healthy one. The blessings of his or her birth are no less incalculable. Society must equally 'regard the balance as beneficial'. But the law does not develop by strict logic; and most people would instinctively feel that there was a difference, even if they had difficulty in articulating it. Told that a friend has given birth to a normal, healthy baby, we would express relief as well as joy. Told that she had given birth to a seriously disabled child, most of us would feel (though not express) sympathy for the parents. Our joy at the birth would not be unalloyed; it would be tinged with sorrow for the child's disability. Speaking for myself, I would not find it morally offensive to reflect this difference in an award of compensation. But it is not necessary for the disposal of the present appeal to reach any conclusion whether Parkinson's case was rightly decided, and I would wish to keep the point open. It would in any case be necessary to limit the compensation to the additional costs attributable to the child's disability; and this may prove difficult to achieve without introducing nice distinctions and unacceptable refinements of a kind which tend to bring the law into disrepute. For the reasons I gave in my speech in McFarlane's case I would not for my part wish to distinguish between the various motives which the parties might have for desiring to avoid a pregnancy.

[113] However that may be, the decision of the Court of Appeal in the present case is not a legitimate extension of Parkinson's case, but an illegitimate gloss on McFarlane's case. The conventional approach to damages would allow the costs of bringing up a healthy child, but only so far as they were reasonable. Costs which are incurred unreasonably are not recoverable. So what McFarlane's case decides is that the costs of bringing up a healthy child, even though reasonably incurred, are not recoverable.

[114] Such costs are infinitely variable. They will differ as between one family and another. They will vary, not only according to the needs of the individual child, but according to the circumstances of the parents and other members of the family. They may be greater in the case of a single parent, and less where there are grandparents or siblings to fetch and carry and help with the care of the child. They may be greater where the mother chooses or has to go out to work and so must employ a child minder or home help. They may be very great if the mother is a highly paid professional woman or works at a job which takes her frequently away from home; or if the family is accustomed to private health care or education. All these factors, which are referable to the personal circumstances of the child's family and not to those of the child, go to increase the costs which are reasonably incurred in bringing up the child. But McFarlane's case teaches that none of these costs are recoverable in the case of a healthy child, however reasonably they may be incurred. In principle, the same must be true of the disabled parent. To the extent that her disability has any effect, it increases the amount of the costs which she reasonably incurs in bringing up the child, costs which are nevertheless not recoverable.

[115] It is, with respect, no answer to say that the disabled parent has no choice in the matter; and that if a mother's disability makes it impossible for her to look after the child, she must perforce employ someone to do it for her. The normal, healthy parent may also have no real choice in the matter. A single mother with no disability allowance may have no choice but to go out to work. A mother who, like the old woman who lived in a shoe, has 'so many children she doesn't know what to do' may have no choice but to employ someone to look after them. A family which has already resorted to private health care and private education for the existing children cannot realistically choose to do less for their latest child. By contrast, a disabled mother may have a husband, parents and other members of the family to give support and look after the child. There is no relevant difference between costs which are 'necessary' and those which are 'reasonable', even if it were practicable to attempt to draw it; but it cannot be drawn on the line which distinguishes the disabled parent from the normal, healthy one.

[116] There is another consideration. A child who is born disabled is disabled throughout his or her childhood. Likewise a disabled parent is disabled throughout his or her child's childhood. But there is a significant difference. The factors which make it appropriate to award compensation for the birth of a disabled child are present throughout; those which appear to make it appropriate to award damages for the birth of a healthy child to a disabled parent gradually disappear to be overtaken by the advantages. Once the child is able to go to school alone and be of some help around the house, his or her presence will to a greater or lesser extent help to alleviate the disadvantages of the parent's disability. And once the child has grown to adulthood, he or she can provide immeasurable help to an ageing and disabled parent.

[117] It is a mistake to assume that, because the costs attributable to the disability are 'extras' whether the disabled party is the child or the parent, there is any symmetry. It is true that McFarlane's case was concerned with a normal, healthy baby born to normal, healthy parents, though this group includes parents who for one reason or another could ill afford to have to look after another child. We expressly confined our decision to the case of a healthy child because we recognised that the case of a disabled child might be distinguishable. But, speaking for myself, I made no assumptions about the health or other characteristics of the parents. I considered their circumstances to be irrelevant. It was enough that they did not want or could not properly look after another child. I expressly said that their motives for not wanting another child were irrelevant. I still regard this to be the case.

[118] Disability is a misfortune, and it is the mark of a civilised society that it should provide financial assistance to the disabled. The United Kingdom discharges this responsibility by payment of disability allowance. But this is the responsibility of the state and is properly funded by general taxation. It is not the responsibility of the private citizen whose conduct has neither caused nor contributed to the disability. McFarlane's case teaches that the costs of bringing up a healthy child by an unimpaired parent do not sound in damages. Whatever we may say to the contrary, an award of the 'extra' costs which are attributable to the fact that the parent is disabled is an award of damages for the disability.

[119] It is accepted that care must be taken not to award damages for the parent's disability. An immediate difficulty is that the costs which are attributable to the parent's disability cannot be disentangled from those which are attributable to the birth of the child. If the parent is unable through disability to look after her healthy child, she must employ someone to do so. How are those costs to be characterised? They must be due at least in part to the birth of the child, and in part to the parent's disability. It is impossible to separate the two elements. They are not different components of the cost, but a single cost with composite causes.

[120] But even if they could be separately identified it would not help, for in principle no part of the costs is recoverable. This is what marks the difference between the present case and Parkinson's case. Where it is the child who is disabled the costs are attributable either to the birth of the child or to the fact that the child is disabled. The former are not recoverable; the latter are. Where it is the mother who is disabled they are attributable either to the birth of the child or to the fact that the mother is disabled. There is no third possibility. To the extent that they are due to the birth of the child McFarlane's case precludes recovery and to the extent that they are not due to the birth of the child, the causal link with the wrong is broken and the defendants are not liable for them in any case. The fact that the mother is disabled aggravates the financial consequences of the birth of a healthy child, and the birth of a healthy child aggravates the financial consequences of the mother's disability. The former is the defendants' responsibility but does not sound in damages and the latter is not the responsibility of the defendants at all.

[121] In my opinion, principle mandates the rejection of the parent's claim. But in this case principle also marches with justice. The decision of the majority of the Court of Appeal is destructive of the concept of distributive justice. It renders the law incoherent and is bound to lead to artificial and indefensible distinctions being drawn as the courts struggle to draw a principled line between costs which are recoverable and those which are not. In his powerful dissenting judgment Waller LJ drew attention to the absurdities which would result from drawing the line in entirely the wrong place. He said:

> '[53] Let me address some examples, I hope not too extreme. If one takes the facts to be that a woman already has four children and wishes not to have a fifth; and if one assumes that having the fifth will create a crisis in health terms, unless help in caring for the child was available. She cannot recover the costs of caring for the child which might alleviate the crisis, as I understand McFarlane's case. I would have thought that her need to avoid a breakdown in her health was no different from the need of someone already with a disability, and indeed her need might be greater depending on the degree of disability. Does she, or ordinary people, look favourably on the law not allowing her to recover but allowing someone who is disabled to recover?

[54] If one were to add that the lady with four children was poor, but the lady with a disability was rich—what then? It would simply emphasise the perception that the rule was not operating fairly. One can add to the example by making comparisons between possible family circumstances of the different mothers. Assume the mother with four children had no support from husband, mother or siblings, and then compare her with the person who is disabled, but who has a husband, siblings and a mother all willing to help. I think ordinary people would feel uncomfortable about the thought that it was simply the disability which made a difference.'

[122] I can see no answer to these criticisms. In my opinion, principle, common justice and the coherence of the law alike demand that the line be drawn between those costs which are referable to the characteristics of the child and those which are referable to the characteristics of the parent. I agree with Waller LJ that ordinary people would think it unfair that a disabled person should recover the costs of looking after a healthy child when a person not suffering from disability who through no fault of her own was no better able to look after such a child could not. I can identify no legal principle by which such a distinction could be defended.

[123] I still regard the proper outcome in all these cases is to award the parents a modest conventional sum by way of general damages, not for the birth of the child, but for the denial of an important aspect of their personal autonomy, viz the right to limit the size of their family. This is an important aspect of human dignity, which is increasingly being regarded as an important human right which should be protected by law. The loss of this right is not an abstract or theoretical one. As my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill has pointed out, the parents have lost the opportunity to live their lives in the way that they wished and planned to do. The loss of this opportunity, whether characterised as a right or a freedom, is a proper subject for compensation by way of damages.

[124] I made this suggestion in McFarlane's case, but it was not taken up by any one else. As I see it, it was neither accepted nor rejected, and I do not think it right to say that the point was decided. The majority did not consider it at all, at least expressly, perhaps because it was wrongly thought to be an alternative to the award of damages for the mother's pain and suffering. It was not, for I would have awarded it to both parents. In my opinion the point is still open for consideration without the need to depart from the decision in McFarlane's case.

[125] The award of a modest sum would not, of course, go far towards the costs of bringing up a child. It would not reflect the financial consequences of the birth of a normal, healthy child; but it would not be meant to. They are not the proper subject of compensation for the reasons stated in McFarlane's case. A modest award would, however, adequately compensate for the very different injury to the parents' autonomy; moreover it would be available without proof of financial loss, and so would not attract the distaste or moral repugnance which was the decisive factor in McFarlane's case. In that case I suggested that the award should not exceed £5,000 in a straightforward case. On reflection, I am persuaded that the figure should be a purely conventional one which should not be susceptible of increase or decrease by reference to the circumstances of the particular case. I agree with the figure of £15,000 which Lord Bingham has suggested.

[126] I would allow the appeal and substitute an award of £15,000 as a conventional sum.

LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE.

[127] My Lords, in this appeal your Lordships have been invited to reconsider the decision of the House in McFarlane v Tayside Health Board [1999] 4 All ER 961, [2000] 2 AC 59 and, second, to consider whether the principle established by that decision is determinative of the issue arising in the present case. It is, therefore, necessary to try to identify the principle underlying McFarlane's case.

[128] McFarlane's case was one in which a married couple decided that they did not want any more children. So the husband, Mr McFarlane, underwent a vasectomy, or so he thought. After the operation had been carried out, Mr McFarlane submitted sperm samples for examination by the surgeon who had carried out the operation. The surgeon advised Mr and Mrs McFarlane that the samples showed the vasectomy had been successful and that they no longer needed to take contraceptive measures. This advice was acted on by Mr and Mrs McFarlane but unfortunately was wrong. Six months or so later Mrs McFarlane became pregnant and subsequently gave birth to a healthy baby who, although originally unwanted, became a much loved member of the McFarlane family. Mr and Mrs McFarlane sued for damages in negligence. It may be that the vasectomy had been negligently carried out but they based their claim on the surgeon's negligent representation that Mr McFarlane's sperm counts were negative. This negligent advice was, indeed, the only basis on which Mrs McFarlane could have based an action. The McFarlanes claimed damages for Mrs McFarlane's pain, suffering and distress attributable to the unwanted pregnancy and the trauma of childbirth and also for the costs they would incur in raising the child to adulthood. Nothing, for present purposes, turns on the former damages claim. The House held, unanimously that the McFarlanes were not entitled to the latter.

[129] It is helpful, to me at least, to start with a review of the general principles that apply to damages. The basic rule of damages, whether in contract or in tort, was expressed by Lord Blackburn in Livingstone v Rawyards Coal Co (1880) 5 App Cas 25. He said (at 39) that damages should be—

> 'that sum of money which will put the party who has been injured, or who has suffered, in the same position as he would have been in if he had not sustained the wrong for which he is now getting his compensation or reparation.'

[130] In applying this principle there is often, however, a difference depending on whether the claim is a contractual one or a claim in tort. In general, where a claim is based on a breach of contract, the claimant is entitled to the benefit of the contract and entitled, therefore, to be placed in the position, so far as money can do so, in which he would have been if the contractual obligation had been properly performed. But where the claim is in tort, there being no contract to the benefit of which the claimant is entitled, the claimant is entitled to be placed in the position in which he would have been if the tortious act, the wrong, had not been committed. The difference in approach is often important in cases where the claim is based on negligent advice or negligent misrepresentation. If the defendant was under a contractual obligation to give competent advice, the claimant is entitled to be put in the position he would have been in if competent advice had been given. But if the defendant owes no contractual obligation to the claimant and the case is brought in tort, the claimant must be put in the position he would have been in if no advice had been given at all.

[131] I have mentioned this difference in approach to claims in contract and claims in tort in order to clear it out of the way. For it has, in my opinion, no relevance at all in cases based on professional advice or services given by professionals. There are two reasons for this. First, if a professional, whether a doctor, a lawyer or any other professional, provides professional advice or services to a client on a non-contractual basis, the professional owes to the client a professional duty of care in doing so. In the case, for example, of a doctor working in the National Health Service and advising or treating an NHS patient, the advice or services are provided by the doctor pursuant to his contractual arrangements with the NHS, not pursuant to any contract with the patient. But the intention and purpose of those arrangements is that the doctor's services be made available to NHS patients. That being so, the extent of the duty of care owed to each NHS patient and the extent of the doctor's liability, and his NHS employer's vicarious liability, if the doctor is in breach of that duty, cannot in my opinion be any different from the extent of the duty and of the liability for any breach of duty that would apply in the case of a private patient with whom the doctor had a contractual relationship. The NHS patient is entitled to the benefit of the contractual duty owed by the doctor pursuant to his contract with his NHS employers (cf White v Jones [1995] 1 All ER 691, [1995] 2 AC 207 where the disappointed beneficiaries, suing in tort, were placed by way of damages in the position they would have been in if the negligent solicitor had properly discharged his duty to his client, the testator).

[132] Alternatively, applying the traditional approach to tortious damages, it can be said that if, in a case like McFarlane's case, no representation at all had been made by the surgeon about Mr McFarlane's post-vasectomy fertility, the McFarlanes would not have assumed that contraceptive measures were unnecessary, would have taken suitable precautions and would have been in exactly the same position as they would have been in if a correct representation about his fertility had been made. Similarly, in a case like the present one, if a sterilisation operation had not been carried out on the respondent by the negligent doctor, the respondent would either have continued to take contraceptive measures or she would have had a sterilisation operation carried out by some other doctor. In either case her baby would, on a balance of probabilities, not have been conceived.

[133] Accordingly, as it seems to me, the answer to McFarlane's case, to the present case and to each of the other like cases to which your Lordships have been referred does not depend on whether the claim is a contractual or a tortious one. The same result must be reached whether the claimant was a private patient or an NHS patient. In every case the claimant, having established negligence, is entitled, as a matter of general principle, to be placed in the same position he or she would have been in if the professional advice or services had been competently provided. So in every case this general principle of damages would require the claimant to be placed in the position he or she would have been in if the baby had not been born.

[134] It is at this point that, as it seems to me, the application of general principle becomes difficult. It becomes difficult because the consequence of the negligence is the birth of a human being and because assessments about the value or the burden of a particular human life are impossible. These difficulties have to be grappled with, and I will come back to them, but before doing so I want to consider how the damages issue would look if analogous professional negligence had occurred in a context that did not involve these difficulties. Suppose the owner of a two-year old colt decided to have the colt gelded and engaged a veterinary surgeon (a vet) to carry out the operation. The vet operates on the colt and advises the owner that the operation has been successful. In the belief that that is so the owner allows the gelding, as he believes the colt to have become, to graze in a paddock with some mares. But the operation has been negligently performed, the colt succeeds in getting one of the mares in foal, the condition of the mare is not discovered until it is too late to do anything about it and in due time the mare gives birth to a healthy foal. The mare is not damaged by the experience but the owner sues the vet for damages. Negligence is not in issue. For what damages would the vet be liable? An account of detriment and benefit would need to be drawn up. Veterinary costs occasioned by the mare's unwanted pregnancy and the birth of the foal would be recoverable. But what else? Special circumstances might, subject to remoteness rules, justify special claims; but leave special claims aside. What about the costs of rearing the foal to maturity? The proposition that the defendant vet would be liable for such costs seems absurd. It is instructive to ask oneself why that is so. It is absurd, in my opinion, because the owner of the foal does not have to keep it. Its unexpected and originally unwanted arrival would present him with a number of choices. He could have the foal destroyed as soon as it was born. But this would be an unlikely choice for the foal would be likely to have some value and it would cost very little to leave it with its dam until it could be weaned. Or the owner could decide to keep the foal until it could be weaned and then to sell it. Or he could decide to keep it until, as a yearling or a two-year old, it had reached a little more maturity and then sell it. Or he could try and add value to it by breaking it in, schooling it and then selling it. Or he could keep it for his own use. Each of these choices, bar the first, would have involved the owner in some expense in rearing the foal. But the expense would be the result of his choice to keep the foal. Moreover, the expense of rearing the foal would have to be set against the value of the foal. The owner could not claim as damages reimbursement of the expenses without bringing into account the benefit.

[135] The inability of the owner of the unwanted foal to claim from the negligent vet the cost of rearing the foal seems to me to raise no particular difficulty or issue of principle. The difficulty produced by cases like McFarlane's case and the present case is because the originally unwanted progeny is a human being, not an animal, and because, for very deeply ingrained cultural and, for some, religious reasons, human life, whether that of babies, children, adults in the prime of life or the aged and whether normal or associated with disability, is regarded by society generally and by the law as uniquely precious and as incapable of valuation in monetary terms. And the relationship between the originally unwanted but, once born, loved and cherished baby and his or her parents and siblings cannot be put into any monetary scale of benefit and detriment.

[136] None the less it must be recognised that the parents' costs and expenses in looking after and providing for the originally unwanted baby until his or her maturity do result from the decision of the parent or parents to keep the child. If the parents decided, for example, to place the child with an adoption society with a view to adoption, they would not incur those costs and expenses. Nor would they incur them if, for whatever reason, the mother had had her unwanted pregnancy terminated. Most parents, I am sure, would not regard their decision to keep and rear their baby as representing a choice. It would seem to them inevitable that this is what they would have to do. The owner of the unwanted foal, they would say, has a true choice. There is no reason why he should keep the foal and if he decides to do so he must accept the adverse as well as the beneficial consequences of doing so. But the choice, if that is the right word, facing the parents of the originally unwanted baby is not comparable. For a mix of cultural, moral and religious reasons the parents of every baby are expected to accept a responsibility for the baby and its well being that has no parallel in the case of the unwanted foal. The law, indeed, reinforces these reasons with its own expectations of and duties imposed on parents in relation to the children born to them. It is, in my opinion, reasonable for parents who have produced an originally unwanted baby to say that they regard themselves as having had no choice but to keep the child as a member of their family and raise him or her to the best of their ability.

[137] But this conclusion does not itself answer the question: why should the negligent doctor be liable for the economic consequences of the parents' decision to keep and rear the child, reasonable, praiseworthy and socially valuable though that decision no doubt was? As to causation, the doctor's negligence was undoubtedly a causa sine qua non of the costs in question and was a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the pregnancy notwithstanding that it resulted from an independent decision of the parents to keep the child. And the pregnancy was the outcome the avoidance of which had been the reason for seeking the doctor's services. These considerations suggest that the answer to the question should favour the claimant.

[138] But there are two further considerations which seem to me to be of importance and, in the end, determinative. First, there is no escaping that it is a feature of these cases that the expenses sought to be recovered from the negligent doctor have been, or will be, necessarily accepted by the parents of the child as the price to be paid for having the child as a member of their family. It has not been asserted by any parent in any of the cases to which your Lordships have been referred that the price was not worth paying. The value to the parents and the other family members of having the child as a member is not capable of valuation, either at a particular snapshot of chosen time or over the period until the child reaches maturity. Is it right to charge the defendant with the costs and expenses of providing the parents with something of unique value but incapable of valuation? The account of detriment and benefit, into which would go the costs of rearing the child on one side and, at least, the child benefit allowance on the other, would be incomplete without anything to represent the value of what was being acquired by the expenditure. The impossibility of drawing up a balance fair to both sides seems to me a strong argument why no balance should be drawn up at all. And, finally, the placing of a money value on the net detriment to the child's parents of having to rear the child would, it seems to me, be inconsistent with the status of the child as a valued and loved member of the family. I regard these considerations as having a weight that requires a departure from the conclusion to which the normal application of tortious damages rules would lead.

[139] In McFarlane's case somewhat different reasons were given by different members of the Appellate Committee for concluding that the parents could not claim damages for the cost of rearing their healthy and much loved baby. I am not in disagreement with the reasons they expressed and have reached the same conclusion. In my opinion, however, it is important to recognise that the conclusion is not that which the normal application of established tortious damages principles would lead to. It is an exception based upon a recognition of the unique nature of human life, a uniqueness that our culture and society recognise and that the law, too, should recognise. It seems to me to be an acceptable irony that the conclusion is the same conclusion as that which would have been reached in the case of the unwanted foal, but reached by an entirely different route.

[140] If I am right in concluding that the unanimous decision in McFarlane's case was correct and that the decision was not reached by applying normal principles of damages but by constructing an exception to those principles based upon a recognition of the uniqueness of every human being and, therefore, of every baby whether wanted or unwanted, the question then arises whether the present case falls within that exception.

[141] The only relevant factual difference between McFarlane's case and the present case is that in the present case the mother is blind. Her blindness was the reason why she wanted a sterilisation operation to be performed on her. She doubted her ability to look after her baby if she were to bear one. But, due to the doctor's negligence, she did bear one and, on the footing that McFarlane's case bars her recovery as damages of the ordinary expenses of looking after her child, she seeks damages to reimburse herself for the extra costs she will incur on account of her blindness.

[142] My Lords, in my opinion the mother's visual disability does not take the case out of the exception to normal principle established by McFarlane's case. Her baby, too, is a healthy and much loved baby. She has not said, and would not say, that her baby's presence in her household is not a joy and a delight. But it has caused her to incur expenses and will, no doubt, continue for some years to do so. However, all the features of McFarlane's case that justify creating an exception from normal principle are present, too, in this case. The mother need not have kept her baby but decided to do so. I do not imagine that she ever felt that she had a real choice. There is no doubt that her baby adds value to her life and that the value is not capable of assessment in monetary terms. A balance sheet of detriment and benefit caused by the doctor's negligence cannot be drawn up.

[143] The majority in the Court of Appeal treated this case as justifying, on account of the mother's blindness, an exception to McFarlane's case. An exception to an exception is apt to produce messy jurisprudence and for all the reasons so cogently expressed by Waller LJ in his dissenting judgment in the Court of Appeal, the creation of an exception in the present case would lead to further exceptions. The exception that McFarlane's case constitutes is based on a recognition of the uniqueness of a human being. The principle on which McFarlane's case is based cannot be limited to the particular circumstances peculiar to that particular case and I do not think the mother's disability in the present case can justify a departure from the basis on which McFarlane's case was decided. I suspect that underlying the majority decision in the Court of Appeal lies the thought that McFarlane's case was wrong and a desire to limit its effect as much as possible. In my opinion, however, McFarlane's case was correctly decided and the basis of the decision should be applied in the present case.

[144] I should mention Parkinson v St James and Seacroft University Hospital NHS Trust [2001] EWCA Civ 530, [2001] 3 All ER 97, [2002] QB 266. In Parkinson's case a sterilisation operation on the claimant was negligently performed. As a result the claimant conceived when she thought, and hoped, she was unable to do so. She declined to have her pregnancy terminated although warned that the child might be born with a disability. The child was born with severe disabilities. The claimant claimed damages for negligence. The Court of Appeal, following McFarlane's case up to a point, held that she was entitled to recover damages for the costs of providing for her child's special needs relating to his disabilities but was not entitled to recover the basic costs of his ordinary maintenance.

[145] The question how the McFarlane principle should be applied to a case in which the mother is healthy but the child is born with a disability is not one which needs to be resolved on this appeal. In my opinion, however, a distinction may need to be drawn between a case where the avoidance of the birth of a child with a disability is the very reason why the parent or parents sought the medical treatment or services to avoid conception that, in the event, were negligently provided and a case where the medical treatment or services were sought simply to avoid conception. Parkinson's case was a case in the latter category. In such a case, where the parents have had no particular reason to fear that if a child is born to them it will suffer from a disability, I do not think there is any sufficient basis for treating the expenses occasioned by the disability as falling outside the principles underlying McFarlane's case. The striking of the balance between the burden of rearing the disabled child and the benefit to the parents of the child as a member of their family seems to me as invidious and impossible as in the case of the child born without any disability.

[146] Moreover, the immediate cause of the extra expenses is the child's disability, not the doctor's negligence. In Emeh v Kensington and Chelsea and Westminster Area Health Authority [1984] 3 All ER 1044, [1985] QB 1012 evidence was given to the effect that the chance of a baby being born with a congenital abnormality was between one in 200 and one in 400 (see [1984] 3 All ER 1044 at 1049, [1985] QB 1012 at 1019 per Waller LJ). Waller LJ's reference to this statistic was cited by Brooke LJ in Parkinson's case in support of his conclusion that the birth of a child with abnormalities was a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the negligent failure to carry out a sterilisation operation successfully.

[147] My Lords, I have some doubts about this conclusion. The possibility that a child may be born with a congenital abnormality is plainly present to some degree in the case of every pregnancy. But is that a sufficient reason for holding the negligent doctor liable for the extra costs, attributable to the abnormality, of rearing the child? In my opinion it is not. Foreseeability of a one in 200 to 400 chance does not seem to me, by itself, enough to make it reasonable to impose on the negligent doctor liability for these costs. It might be otherwise in a case where there had been particular reason to fear that if a child were conceived and born it might suffer from some inherited disability. And, particularly, it might be otherwise in a case where the very purpose of the sterilisation operation had been to protect against that fear. But on the facts of Parkinson's case I do not think the Court of Appeal's conclusion was consistent with McFarlane's case.

[148] For the reasons I have given I would allow this appeal. But, like my noble and learned friends Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Millett, I am not sure that the recovery by the respondent of nothing for the frustration of her expectation that her sterilisation operation would safeguard her against conception satisfies justice. She was owed a duty of care in the carrying out of the operation. She was entitled to the benefit of the doctor's contractual obligation to his NHS employers to carry out the operation with due care. It is open to the court to put a monetary value on the expected benefit of which she was, by the doctor's negligence, deprived (cf Farley v Skinner [2001] UKHL 49, [2001] 4 All ER 801, [2002] 2 AC 732). I would respectfully agree with Lord Bingham's suggestion that she be awarded £15,000. So I, too, while allowing the appeal, would substitute an award of £15,000 as a conventional sum to compensate the respondent for being deprived of the benefit that she was entitled to expect.

Appeal allowed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

Fernandez and another v McDonald and another

[2003] EWCA Civ 1219

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
POTTER AND HALE LJJ
29 JULY, 19 AUGUST 2003

Landlord and tenant – Recovery of possession – Order for possession – Assured tenancy – Periodic tenancy – Statutory provision requiring court to make order for possession of assured shorthold periodic tenancy if landlord serving notice specifying last date of period of tenancy and requiring possession thereafter – Whether notice valid if not specifying last date of period of tenancy but requiring possession on day known to be day immediately following last day of period – Housing Act 1988, s 21(4)(a).

The defendant tenants were granted an assured shorthold tenancy for six months. After the end of the term, they remained as statutory periodic tenants from the fourth day of each month to the third day of the following month. As an assured tenancy, the tenancy could not be brought to an end by the claimant landlords except by obtaining an order of the court in accordance with provisions of the Housing Act 1988. In October 2002 the landlords gave the tenants a notice stating that they required possession on 4 January 2003, ie the day after the last day of a period of the tenancy. That notice was headed: 'Section 21(4)(a)—Assured Shorthold Tenancy: Notice Requiring Possession: Periodic Tenancy'. The provision referred to in the heading of the notice was s 21(4)(a)[a] of the 1988 Act. Section 21(4)(a) required a court to make an order for possession of a dwelling-house let on an assured shorthold tenancy which was a periodic tenancy if it was satisfied, inter alia, that the landlord had given the tenant a notice in writing 'stating that, after a date specified in the notice, being the last day of a period of the tenancy', possession was required by virtue of s 21. In subsequent possession proceedings, the district judge struck out the tenants' defence, and the circuit judge dismissed their appeal. On a second appeal by the tenants, the Court of Appeal was required to determine whether a notice, which did not specify any date which was, or was said to be, the last day of a periodic tenancy, but required possession to be given on a day which was, and was known to be, the day immediately following the last day of a periodic tenancy, was a valid notice for the purpose of s 21(4)(a).

Held – A notice that failed to specify a date which was the last day of a period of the tenancy was not a valid notice for the purposes of s 21(4)(a) of the 1988 Act. The statute did not require the landlord to specify a date on which he required possession. It was not a notice to quit. The landlord would not get possession without the tenant's consent unless he went to court. For that reason, the statute required the landlord to state that possession was required 'after a date specified in the notice, being the last day of a period of the tenancy'. The subsection was clear and precise. Nor was it difficult for landlords to comply. They knew when the period ended. Furthermore, the consequences of a failure to comply were not particularly serious for landlords: a defective notice could be cured the next day. Even if the defect were not noticed until the point was taken in court, a valid notice could then be given. The landlord was not unwillingly and unwittingly saddled with a tenant who had security of tenure. It followed in the instant case that the notice had not complied with s 21(4)(a). Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [22]–[25], below).

a Section 21(4) is set out at [2], below

Burman v Mount Cook Land Ltd [2002] 1 All ER 144 and Ravenseft Properties v Hall [2002] HLR 624 considered.

Notes

For recovery of possession of assured shorthold periodic tenancies, see 27(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 975.

For the Housing Act 1988, s 21, see 23 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (1997 reissue) 1082.

Cases referred to in judgments

Burman v Mount Cook Land Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 1712, [2002] 1 All ER 144, [2002] Ch 256, [2002] 2 WLR 1172.
Carradine Properties Ltd v Aslam [1976] 1 All ER 573, [1976] 1 WLR 442.
Crate v Miller [1947] 2 All ER 45, [1947] 1 KB 946, CA.
Gracechurch International SA v Tribhovan and Abdul (2001) 33 HLR 263, CA.
Lower Street Properties v Jones (1996) 28 HLR 877, CA.
Mannai Investment Co Ltd v Eagle Star Life Assurance Co Ltd [1997] 3 All ER 352, [1997] AC 749, [1997] 2 WLR 945, HL.
Ravenseft Properties v Hall [2001] EWCA Civ 2034, [2002] HLR 624.
Sidebotham v Holland [1895] 1 QB 378, [1891–4] All ER Rep 617, CA.
Speedwell Estates Ltd v Dalziel [2001] EWCA Civ 1277, [2002] HLR 813.
Yeandle v Reigate and Banstead BC [1996] 1 EGLR 20, CA.
York v Casey [1998] 2 EGLR 25, CA.

Application for permission to appeal

The defendants, James McDonald and Kerry Allen, the tenants of residential premises known as 15 Avenue Road Extension, Leicester, applied for permission to appeal from the order of Judge Mayor QC in Leicester County Court on 11 April 2003 dismissing their appeal from the order of District Judge Merriman on 17 March 2003 striking out their defence to possession proceedings brought by the claimant landlords, J Fernandez and Mrs Fernandez. The Court of Appeal granted permission to appeal at the outset of hearing, and proceed to hear the appeal. The facts are set out in the judgment of Hale LJ.

Mark Jones (instructed by Abbot Kennedy) for the tenants.
Peter Dean (instructed by Bray & Bray, Leicester) for the landlords.

Cur adv vult

19 August 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

HALE LJ (giving the first judgment at the invitation of Potter LJ).

[1] This was listed as an application for permission to make a second appeal against the order of Judge Mayor QC dated 11 April 2003 in Leicester County Court dismissing the applicants' appeal against the order of District Judge Merriman dated 17 March 2003. The district judge had struck out the applicant tenants' defence to the respondent landlords' claim for possession of their home. Chadwick LJ adjourned the application for hearing on notice with the appeal to follow if permission is granted.

[2] The case raises a short point on the construction of s 21(4) of the Housing Act 1988. This reads as follows, with the relevant words italicised:

> 'Without prejudice to any such right as is referred to in subsection (1) above, a court shall make an order for possession of a dwelling-house let on an assured shorthold tenancy which is a periodic tenancy if the court is satisfied—(a) that the landlord or, in the case of joint landlords, at least one of them has given to the tenant a notice in writing stating that, after a date specified in the notice, being the last day of a period of the tenancy and not earlier than two months after the date the notice was given, possession of the dwelling-house is required by virtue of this section; and (b) that the date specified in the notice under paragraph (a) above is not earlier than the earliest day on which, apart from section 5(1) above, the tenancy could be brought to an end by a notice to quit given by the landlord on the same date as the notice under paragraph (a) above.'

[3] The facts are not disputed. The tenants were granted an assured shorthold tenancy of 15 Avenue Road Extension, Leicester, for six months from 4 September 1999 to 3 March 2000. They remained thereafter as statutory periodic tenants from the 4th of each month to the 3rd of the following month. On 24 October 2002 the landlords gave them a notice headed 'Section 21(4)(a)—Assured Shorthold Tenancy: Notice Requiring Possession: Periodic Tenancy'. The relevant part reads as follows: 'I give you notice that I require possession of the dwelling house known as 15 Avenue Road Extension Leicester on 4th January 2003.'

[4] The issue, therefore, as summed up by Chadwick LJ, is—

> 'whether a notice which (i) does not specify any date which is (or is said to be) the last day of a periodic tenancy, but (ii) requires possession to be given on a day which is (and is known to be) the day immediately following the last day of a periodic tenancy is a valid notice for purpose of s 21(4)(a).'

[5] He considered that this was a question which ought not to be in doubt. County courts deal with large volumes of accelerated possession proceedings every day. There should not be uncertainty and inconsistency between them. Chadwick LJ did not himself give permission to appeal because a stay of execution would be needed and this should not be granted without giving the landlord an opportunity to make representations. Hence the most convenient course was to adjourn for hearing on notice.

[6] Despite Mr Peter Dean's valiant attempts to persuade us that the case does not raise 'an important point of principle or practice' for the purpose of s 55(1) of the Access to Justice Act 1999, we agree that this simple question of great practical importance to the everyday work of county courts up and down the country should not be left in doubt. Save to the parties in this case, to whom of course it is important, it matters less which way the issue is resolved than that it is resolved one way or the other. We therefore gave permission to appeal at the outset of the hearing.

[7] Mr Mark Jones' argument on behalf of the tenants is simple. It must be understood against the background of s 5(1) of the 1988 Act, which provides that 'An assured tenancy cannot be brought to an end by the landlord except by obtaining an order of the court' in accordance with Chapters I or II of the Act. Accordingly, 'the service by the landlord of a notice to quit shall be of no effect in relation to a periodic assured tenancy'. Section 21 is in Chapter II. Section 21(1) deals with court orders for possession 'on or after the coming to an end of an assured shorthold tenancy which was a fixed term tenancy'. Section 21(4) deals with court orders for possession where the dwelling is let 'on an assured shorthold tenancy which is a periodic tenancy', as here. Section 21(4) is 'Without prejudice to any such right as is referred to in subsection (1)' so they are obviously intended to make different provision from one another.

[8] Both subsections, it should be noted, are concerned with the criteria for making court orders for possession and not with the requirements of notices to quit in the contractual or common law sense.

[9] Mr Jones also points out that the notice stated that possession was required on 4 January 2003. This was not 'the last day of a period of the tenancy' for the purpose of s 21(4)(a). The last day was 3 January. The notice did not therefore comply with the requirement that the notice state that possession was required 'after a date specified in the notice, being the last day of a period of the tenancy'. It was thus invalid. Apart from the straightforward wording of the section, Mr Jones relies on the only two authorities dealing with s 21(4) which counsel have traced.

[10] In Lower Street Properties v Jones (1996) 28 HLR 877, the notice did not give a date, but did say that it would expire 'at the end of the period of your tenancy which will end after the expiry of two months from service' of the notice. It therefore referred to the last day with sufficient specificity because it could readily be ascertained. But Kennedy LJ said (at 882):

> 'Because of the wording of section 21(4) if an actual date is to be given in the notice it must be "the last day of the period of the tenancy" and there is an obvious risk of a minor arithmetical error giving rise to the argument that the notice is invalid which no doubt is why the printed form suggests as a possible form of wording that the notice will expire "at the end of the period of your tenancy which will end after the expiry of two months from the service upon you of this notice".'

We are told that landlords do often use this saving formula, but they did not do so in this case.

[11] Mr Jones also refers us to Gracechurch International SA v Tribhovan and Abdul (2001) 33 HLR 263, in which it was accepted that the notice was invalid and the Lower Street Properties case was referred to in that context. Although it might be inferred that the notice was invalid because the wrong date was specified, we do not know this to be the case. This case therefore adds nothing to the simple proposition that the subsection requires the date specified to be the last date of a period of the tenancy, which this was not.

[12] For the landlords, Mr Dean has two submissions. His first is that a periodic tenancy may have 'two last days', the last day of one period and the first day of the next. Hence the last day of this period could be either 3 or 4 January and the notice was accurate. To the ordinary person this would be a startling proposition. But Mr Dean relies on authorities dealing with contractual and common law notices to quit. In Sidebotham v Holland [1895] 1 QB 378, [1891–4] All ER Rep 617, this court held (AL Smith LJ doubting) that a notice to quit a yearly tenancy on either the last day of the year or the anniversary of its beginning was a good notice. This was followed in Crate v Miller [1947] 2 All ER 45, [1947] 1 KB 946, where this court held that a weekly tenancy which begins on Saturday may be determined validly by notice to quit either on Friday or Saturday. Both are equally intimations that the tenant is to quit when the current period ends.

[13] Mr Dean very properly admitted that in neither of these cases was it stated that a periodic tenancy could have two last days. He relied upon the words of Leggatt LJ in Yeandle v Reigate and Banstead BC [1996] 1 EGLR 20 at 21:

> 'In my judgment, a valid 12 months' notice in writing to determine the tenancy from year to year, commencing on September 29 1968, may, if given in time, specify either September 28 or 29 in a subsequent year as the date for delivery of possession because the tenancy would be construed as ending on the last moment of the 28th or on the first moment of the 29th.'

[14] However, the other member of the court, Roch LJ, expressed himself differently (at 22):

> 'A 12 months' notice will mean a 12 months' notice to quit and will remain a 12 months' notice to quit, whether it is expressed to end on September 28—in which case it will take effect at the last moment of September 28—or whether it is expressed to take effect on September 29, when it would take effect on the first moment of that day.'

[15] In my view, this approach makes much more sense. It may be possible to give a notice to quit which expires on either day, but that is not because there are two last days: it is because the last day ends at midnight and the first day of the new period begins thereafter and that is the first day on which possession can be required. It might, I suppose, be possible to grant a tenancy from midday on the 3rd of each month to midday on the 3rd of the next. In that event, the same day could be both the first day of the new period and the last day of the old. Otherwise, however, the idea that one day could simultaneously be the first day of a new period and the last day of the old would come as a surprise to most people. The niceties of contractual notices to quit should not be imported into the plain words of a statute which is about something else. I would therefore reject Mr Dean's first submission.

[16] Mr Dean's second submission is that the notice in this case was sufficiently clear to comply with its statutory purpose. He relies upon the House of Lords' approach to the construction of contractual notices in Mannai Investment Co Ltd v Eagle Star Life Assurance Co Ltd [1997] 3 All ER 352, [1997] AC 749. The facts were the reverse of ours. There was a contractual provision that notice under a break clause in a commercial lease had to expire on the third anniversary of the commencement date. The tenants served a notice referring to the day before that anniversary. The majority of their Lordships held that it was valid. They approved the test adopted by Goulding J in Carradine Properties Ltd v Aslam [1976] 1 All ER 573 at 576, [1976] 1 WLR 442 at 444: '... is the notice quite clear to a reasonable tenant reading it? is it plain that he cannot be misled by it?'; the reasonable tenant must be taken to know the terms of the lease. But Lord Steyn made it clear that the reasonable recipient should be left in no doubt as to what was intended by the notice.

[17] These tenants, it is argued, knew that their tenancy ran from the 4th to the 3rd. They can have been in no doubt that the landlord was giving them notice that after the expiry of the December 2002 to January 2003 period, he would be going to court to seek possession if they did not voluntarily vacate the property. Saying 'I want possession on 4 January' is no different from saying 'I want possession on the day after 3 January'.

[18] The question is how the reasonable recipient test is to be applied to a statutory requirement of this sort. In Ravenseft Properties v Hall [2001] EWCA Civ 2034, [2002] HLR 624, the court was concerned with notices under s 20 of the 1988 Act. An assured tenancy is an assured shorthold tenancy if, among other things, the landlord serves a notice which is in the prescribed form. The relevant regulations (the Assured Tenancies and Agricultural Occupancies (Forms) Regulations 1988, SI 1988/2203) prescribe either a form scheduled to the regulations or one 'substantially to the same effect'. Mummery LJ (at [11]) pointed out that—

> 'the question whether a notice under section 20 is in the prescribed form or is in a form "substantially to the same effect" is a question of fact and degree in each case, turning on a comparison between the prescribed form in Annex 1 and the particular form of notice given.'

He went on (at [12]–[13]) to make two general statements steering the courts to a consistent approach. The first concerned the purposive approach: the purpose of the notice was to tell the tenant that it would be an assured shorthold tenancy with legal consequences which included very limited security of tenure. The second concerned the reasonable recipient test derived from the Mannai Investment Co Ltd case:

> 'In applying the Mannai approach, it is therefore important to have well in mind the context of the evident purpose of the requirement of a notice in the prescribed form. If notwithstanding errors or omissions, the substance of the notice is sufficiently clear to the reasonable person reading it, the notice is likely to serve the purpose ...'

[19] The question remains, however, what does the statute require and has it been complied with? Burman v Mount Cook Land Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 1712, [2002] 1 All ER 144, [2002] Ch 256 concerned the contents of landlords' counter-notices in proceedings for a new lease under the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act 1993. The judge had applied the reasonable recipient test, but Chadwick LJ said (at [11]):

> 'The relevant inquiry is what does the statutory language require. The task is to construe the words which Parliament has used in context of the statutory scheme. It is only when the court has informed itself of the true nature of the statutory requirement that it can sensibly address the second question: does the notice in this case meet that requirement?'

He went on to explain (at [18]) that the proper working of the statutory scheme required that the tenant be left in no doubt as to what the landlord admitted, how far the tenant's proposals are accepted and what, if any, are the landlord's counter-proposals. He commented (at [23]), that in neither the Carradine Properties Ltd case nor the Mannai Investment Co Ltd case did the contract require the notice to be in any particular form. If they had done, the result would have been different. He cited with approval (at [26]) a passage from the judgment of Rimer J in the Court of Appeal decision in Speedwell Estates Ltd v Dalziel [2001] EWCA Civ 1277 at [22], [2002] HLR 813 at [22]:

> '... I consider that the better approach is to look at the particular statutory provisions pursuant to which the notice is given and to identify what its requirements are. Having done so, it should then be possible to arrive at a conclusion as to whether or not the notice served under it adequately complies > with those requirements. If anything in the notice contains what appears to be an error on its face, then it may be that there will be scope for the application of the Mannai approach, although this may depend upon the particular statutory provisions in question. The key question will always be: is the notice a valid one for the purpose of satisfying the relevant statutory provisions?'

Chadwick LJ described this passage as encapsulating 'succinctly and accurately' the correct approach not only for notices served under statutes but also notices served under contractual provisions such as those commonly found in leases.

[20] Mr Dean did not disagree, save with the suggestion that the scope for the approach in the Mannai Investment Co Ltd case arises only if the notice contains what appears to be an error on its face. He argued that the reasonable recipient test applies whether or not the error is obvious. In York v Casey [1998] 2 EGLR 25 at 27, Peter Gibson LJ had said that the court must see whether the error in the notice was obvious or evident and then go on to ask whether it was sufficiently clear. In Ravenseft Properties v Hall [2002] HLR 624 at [27], on the other hand, Mummery LJ did—

> 'not read the authorities as laying down a two stage test which can only be operated when the error is "obvious." The question is simply whether, notwithstanding any errors and omissions, the notice is "substantially to the same effect" in accomplishing the statutory purpose of telling the proposed tenant of the special nature of an assured shorthold tenancy.'

In my view, the obviousness or otherwise of an error is simply a factor in deciding what the reasonable recipient would understand by the notice. The more obvious it is that a slip has been made, the less likely is the reasonable recipient to be in any doubt as to what was meant.

[21] In this case, however, a good deal hangs upon the precise question which is to be asked. If the question is simply, what would a reasonable tenant understand by this notice, then a reasonable tenant would understand that the landlord wanted to regain possession on or after 4 January 2003. If the question is what is the purpose of requiring such notice, I would accept that one purpose is to give the tenant at least two months' notice that the landlord will be starting the process of regaining possession once the relevant period of the tenancy has expired, so that the tenant can begin to make plans accordingly.

[22] But if the question is, what does the statute require, the answer is that the statute requires the notice to specify a date which is the last day of the period. The statute does not require the landlord to specify a date on which he requires possession. This is not a notice to quit. The landlord will not get possession without the tenant's consent unless he goes to court. That is why the statute requires the landlord to state that possession is required 'after a date specified in the notice, being the last day of a period of the tenancy' (see s 21(4) of the 1988 Act).

[23] This is not a case where the legislation permits a form to be 'substantially to the same effect'. The subsection is clear and precise. Nor is it difficult for landlords to comply. They know when the period ends. Furthermore, this is not a case where the consequences of failure to comply are particularly serious for landlords: a defective notice can be cured the next day. Even if the defect is not noticed until the point is taken in court, a valid notice can then be given. The landlord is not unwillingly and unwittingly saddled with a tenant who has security of tenure, as would be the case with an invalid notice under s 20 of the 1988 Act. One purpose of the subsection may be to alert tenants to the need to look for alternative accommodation, but another is to give the courts a clear and simple set of criteria which trigger their mandatory duty to order possession. The notice in this case was only one day out, but once Mr Dean's first submission is rejected, his alternative submission would leave room for all sorts of arguments, uncertainty and inconsistency up and down the country on a matter about which there should be no doubt at all. a

[24] I would therefore hold that this notice did not comply with s 21(4)(a) of the 1988 Act and allow this appeal. b

POTTER LJ.

[25] I agree.

Application for permission to appeal granted and appeal allowed.

Alexander Horne Barrister.

Re Casterbridge Properties Ltd (in liquidation)

Jeeves v Official Receiver

[2003] EWCA Civ 1246

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
SIMON BROWN, CHADWICK AND RIX LJJ
28, 30 JULY 2003

Company – Compulsory winding up – Public examination – Official Receiver applying for public examination of person concerned with management of company – Whether court required to grant application – Discretion of court on application to rescind order for public examination – Insolvency Act 1986, s 133 – Insolvency Rules 1986, r 7.47(1).

The appellant was a director of a company, incorporated in St Vincent and the Grenadines which was the sole director of CP Ltd, a company also registered in St Vincent, whose business involved the buying and selling on of timeshare interests, including a timeshare development in Kent. An order for the winding up of CP Ltd was made on 1 August 2000 on the petition of the Secretary of State. On 27 February 2001 the registrar made an order on a without notice application by the Official Receiver for public examination of the appellant under s 133[a] of the Insolvency Act 1986. The categories of persons who might be expected to have knowledge of a company's affairs specified in s 133(1) included officers of the company and those who were, or had been, concerned or had taken part in the promotion, formation or management of the company. The appellant successfully applied for an adjournment of the examination on the grounds that the provisions of the Confidential Relations Preservation (International Finance) Act 1996 of St Vincent (the CRPA 1996) required him to apply to the High Court in St Vincent for directions before supplying any confidential information relating to CP Ltd. The application in St Vincent was duly made but was adjourned on numerous occasions. The appellant applied to set aside the s 133 order. But it was upheld by the judge in November 2001 who found that it was unlikely that the CRPA 1996 would be construed in St Vincent so as to prevent the appellant disclosing at least most of the information sought. In March 2002 the High Court in St Vincent directed that the appellant should not give the evidence required by the Official Receiver in connection with the winding up of CP Ltd. In May 2002 the CRPA 1996 was repealed and a new statute came into force expressed to be for the purpose of making provision for assisting overseas regulatory authorities to obtain information from within St Vincent. The appellant later made a separate application for rescission of the s 133 order under r 7.47(1)[b] of the Insolvency Rules 1986 which provided that every court having jurisdiction to wind up companies could review, rescind or vary any order made by it in that jurisdiction. That application came before a second judge in July 2003, who, being satisfied that it was no longer unlawful in St Vincent for the

a Section 133, so far as material, is set out at [8], below

b Rule 7.47, so far as material, provides: '(1) Every court having jurisdiction under the [Insolvency Act 1986] to wind up companies may review, rescind or vary any order made by it in the exercise of that jurisdiction ...'

appellant to give the information sought by the Official Receiver, dismissed the application. The appellant appealed against both judgments. The issues before the Court of Appeal were (i) whether on a proper construction of s 133 the court was required to make an order for public examination on an application by the Official Receiver; and (ii) what was the proper approach on an application under r 7.47(1) to rescind such an order.

Held – (1) The mandatory language of s 133(3) required the court to grant the Official Receiver's application for public examination if it were satisfied that the person whose public examination was sought fell within the categories in s 133(1), unless the exceptional case arose where the examination order would serve no useful purpose; for example, where it could be seen, at the time of the application, that there were no questions which it would be proper for the court to put, or allow to be put, to the examinee (see [44], [53], below).

(2) Where it could be seen on an application under r 7.47(1) that there was no purpose to be served by the public examination that had been ordered, the court could set aside the order which it had made. It would be appropriate for the court to consider whether there was some factor which should lead it to conclude that, at the public examination, it would not be proper to put any questions or require any questions to be answered, such as that the examinee was liable to some sanction in a foreign jurisdiction which would make it unduly oppressive to require him to answer any questions put to him. If, however, the only purpose of the application was to assert that there would be some questions which could not be answered, then the convenient course was likely to be to leave those questions to be identified at the public examination. The appeals would accordingly be dismissed (see [54], [55], [57], [58], [61], below).

Notes

For public examination of officers and order for public examination, see 7(3) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (1996 reissue), paras 2298, 2300.

For the Insolvency Act 1986, s 133, see 4 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (1998 reissue) 829.

For the Insolvency Rules 1986, SI 1986/1927, r 7.47(1), see 3 Halsbury's Statutory Instruments (2001 issue) 610.

Cases referred to in judgments

Avatar Communications Ltd, Re (1988) 4 BCC 473.

Douglas v Pindling [1996] AC 890, [1996] 3 WLR 242, PC.

Isaacs v Robertson [1984] 3 All ER 140, [1985] AC 97, [1984] 3 WLR 705, PC.

Richbell Strategic Holdings Ltd (in liq) (No 2) [2000] 2 BCLC 794.

Seagull Manufacturing Co Ltd (in liq), Re [1991] 4 All ER 257, [1992] Ch 128, [1991] 3 WLR 307; affd [1993] 2 All ER 980, [1993] Ch 345, [1993] 2 WLR 872, CA.

Stocznia Gdanska SA v Latreefers Inc (No 2) [2001] 2 BCLC 116, CA.

Appeals

The appellant, Bryan Jeeves, appealed (i) with permission granted by Chadwick LJ on 6 February 2002 from the decision of Burton J on 21 November 2001 ([2002] BPIR 428) dismissing the appellant's application to set aside or rescind the order of Mr Registrar Buckley for the appellant's public examination under s 133 of the Insolvency Act 1986 (the order) in connection with the winding up of Casterbridge Properties Ltd under an order of Park J made on 1 August 2000 and (ii) with permission of Jacob J from his decision on 2 July 2003 ([2003] EWHC 1731 (Ch)) dismissing the appellant's further application to rescind the order. The facts are set out in the judgment of Chadwick LJ.

Lloyd Tamlyn (instructed by Druces & Attlee) for Mr Jeeves.
Richard Ritchie (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the Official Receiver.

Cur adv vult

30 July 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

SIMON BROWN LJ.

[1] Chadwick LJ will give the first judgment.

CHADWICK LJ.

[2] On 1 August 2000 an order was made by Park J in the High Court for the winding up of Casterbridge Properties Ltd (Casterbridge) under the provisions of the Insolvency Act 1986. The order was made on a petition presented by the Secretary of State, under s 124A of the 1986 Act, on 29 August 1999—that is to say, some 11 months earlier. Although an affidavit had been sworn on 15 October 1999 by the present appellant, Mr Bryan Jeeves, in opposition to the petition, in the event the petition was not opposed at the hearing before Park J.

[3] On 14 February 2001 the Official Receiver applied to the High Court, under s 133 of the 1986 Act, for an order for the public examination of Mr Jeeves. That application was made—as is usual in applications under s 133 of the Act—without notice to Mr Jeeves. He neither attended, nor was represented at, the hearing of the application on 27 February 2001 before Mr Registrar Buckley. The registrar made the order sought.

[4] By an application made to the High Court on or about 8 June 2001 Mr Jeeves sought an order that the registrar's order of 27 February 2001 be set aside; in the alternative, that that order be reviewed and rescinded pursuant to r 7.47(1) of the Insolvency Rules 1986, SI 1986/1925. That application came before Burton J in November 2001 ([2002] BPIR 428). His order dismissing the application is dated 22 November 2001—although it was, I think, made when he handed down his written judgment on the previous day. The first of the two appeals now before this court (under reference 2001/2697) is from that order of 22 November 2001.

[5] While that first appeal was pending—and in circumstances to which I shall need to refer in more detail later in this judgment—Mr Jeeves made a second application to the High Court, by notice dated 27 June 2002, for an order under r 7.47(1) of the 1986 rules that the order of Burton J dated 22 November 2001 be reviewed and rescinded or varied so as to provide that the registrar's order of 7 February 2001 be set aside. That application came before Jacob J on 2 July 2003 ([2003] EWHC 1731 (Ch)). He dismissed the application. The second of the appeals now before this court (under reference 2003/1596) is an appeal from that order of 2 July 2003.

THE STATUTORY FRAMEWORK

[6] Section 124A of the 1986 Act provides that, where it appears to the Secretary of State from reports made or information obtained under the statutory powers there set out that it is expedient in the public interest that a company should be wound up, he may present a petition for it to be wound up if the court thinks it is just and equitable for it to be wound up. The power of the court to wind up a company if it is of opinion that it is just and equitable that the company should be wound up is conferred by s 122(1)(g) of the Act. The power to wind up under s 122(1)(g), on a petition presented by s 124A, is exercisable in respect of an 'unregistered company' (see s 221(1) and (5)). A company incorporated or registered outside Great Britain is an 'unregistered company' in that context. For an analysis of the circumstances in which the jurisdiction to wind up will be exercised in respect of a foreign company see the judgment of this court in Stocznia Gdanska SA v Latreefers Inc (No 2) [2001] 2 BCLC 116.

[7] Section 132 of the 1986 Act is in these terms:

> '(1) Where a winding-up order is made by the court in England and Wales, it is the duty of the official receiver to investigate—(a) if the company has failed, the causes of the failure; and (b) generally, the promotion, formation, business, dealings and affairs of the company, and to make such report (if any) to the court as he thinks fit.
>
> (2) The report is, in any proceedings, prima facie evidence of the facts stated in it.'

That duty arises where the company in respect of which a winding-up order has been made is an unregistered company as well as where the company is a company formed and registered under the Companies Act 1985 (see ss 222(1) and 229(1) of the 1986 Act).

[8] Section 133 of the 1986 Act must be read in conjunction with s 132. It gives to the Official Receiver power to require those who may be expected to have knowledge of the company's affairs to attend for public examination. The section is in these terms, so far as material:

> '(1) Where a company is being wound up by the court, the official receiver ... may at any time before the dissolution of the company apply to the court for the public examination of any person who—(a) is or has been an officer of the company; or (b) has acted as liquidator or administrator of the company or as receiver or manager ... of its property; or (c) not being a person falling within paragraph (a) or (b), is or has been concerned, or has taken part, in the promotion, formation or management of the company.
>
> (2) Unless the court otherwise orders, the official receiver ... shall make an application under subsection (1) if he is requested in accordance with the rules to do so by—(a) one-half, in value, of the company's creditors; or (b) three-quarters, in value, of the company's contributories.
>
> (3) On an application under subsection (1), the court shall direct that a public examination of the person to whom the application relates shall be held on a day appointed by the court; and that person shall attend on that day and be publicly examined as to the promotion, formation or management of the company or as to the conduct of its business and affairs, or his conduct or dealings in relation to the company.
>
> (4) The following may take part in the public examination of a person under this section and may question that person concerning the matters mentioned in subsection (3), namely—(a) the official receiver; (b) the liquidator of the company; (c) any person who has been appointed as special manager of the company's property or business; (d) any creditor of the a company who has tendered a proof ... in the winding up; (e) any contributory of the company.'

Failure, without reasonable cause, to attend for public examination (if an order has been made under s 133) is punishable as a contempt of court (see s 134(1) of the 1986 Act).

b [9] The conduct of the public examination remains under the control of the court. This is made clear by r 4.215 (Procedure at Hearing) in Ch 19 (Public Examination of Company Officers and Others) in Pt 4 of the 1986 rules. Sub-rule (1) is in these terms:

'The examinee shall at the hearing be examined on oath; and he shall answer all such questions as the court may put, or allow to be put, to him.'

c

[10] Further powers to obtain information are conferred by s 236 of the 1986 Act. Subsections (2) and (3) provide:

'(2) The court may, on the application of the office-holder, summon to appear before it—(a) any officer of the company, (b) any person known or d suspected to have in his possession any property of the company or supposed to be indebted to the company, or (c) any person whom the court thinks capable of giving information concerning the promotion, formation, business, dealings, affairs or property of the company.

(3) The court may require any such person as is mentioned in subsection 2(a) to (c) to submit an affidavit to the court containing an e account of his dealings with the company or to produce any books, papers or other records in his possession or under his control relating to the company or the matters mentioned in paragraph (c) of the subsection.'

In that context an 'office-holder' includes the Official Receiver, whether or not he is also the liquidator (see s 236(1)). A person who appears or who is brought f before the court under s 236 may be examined on oath, either orally or by interrogatories, concerning the company or the matters mentioned in s 236(2)(c) (see s 237(4) of the 1986 Act). Section 237(3) enables the court, if it thinks fit, to order that any person who, if within the jurisdiction of the court would be liable to be summoned to appear before it under s 236, to be examined in a place g outside the United Kingdom.

[11] Rule 7.47(1) of the 1986 rules provides that every court having jurisdiction under the 1986 Act to wind up companies may review, rescind or vary any order made by it in the exercise of that jurisdiction.

THE UNDERLYING FACTS

h [12] Casterbridge is a company incorporated in the British Virgin Islands but continued and registered in St Vincent and the Grenadines (SVG) as an international business company under the International Business Companies Act 1996. The sole director of Casterbridge—at least during the period from its registration in SVG until its winding up in this jurisdiction—was Corporate j Directors Ltd, a company incorporated in SVG. Mr Jeeves was one of nine directors of Corporate Directors Ltd. In his affidavit of 15 October 1999, sworn in opposition to the Secretary of State's petition, Mr Jeeves deposed that, since 1993 he had been president of the St Vincent Trust Service Ltd and the trustee of two trusts (the Mars Trust and the Blue Ridge Trust) which were (as he put it) 'the ultimate owners of the shares in Casterbridge'. It is plain from the contents of that affidavit that Mr Jeeves is a person who may be expected to have a detailed knowledge as to the affairs of Casterbridge prior to 1999. It is plain, also, that he is a person who has been concerned in the management of Casterbridge and who falls within s 133(1)(c).

[13] The business of Casterbridge involved the buying and selling on of timeshare interests. Those included interests in a timeshare development at the Hever Golf and Country Club in Kent. It appears that timeshare accommodation was sold to the public through a United Kingdom company, Hever Worldwide Ltd. It was alleged in the Secretary of State's petition that moneys subscribed by the public (amounting to some £7m) for shares in Hever Worldwide and the rights to timeshare accommodation were transferred by Hever Worldwide to Casterbridge; and that Hever Worldwide was left with so-called 'occupation rights' of dubious title and value. The point is put at para 54 of the petition in these terms:

> 'A substantial proportion of moneys paid by the public to Hever Worldwide for ordinary point shares has been transferred (by means of invoices for occupation rights) by Hever Worldwide to Casterbridge, a company incorporated outside the jurisdiction, in relation to which it is impossible to obtain information without a court order, and which is effectively beneficially owned by interests connected with [Mr Ron Popely and Mr John Popely]. The money is transferred to Casterbridge by means of unparticularised invoices for "occupation rights" for which no proper valuation has been obtained, and some of which appear not even to belong to Casterbridge. Casterbridge has received a substantial proportion of the proceeds of the wrongdoing in relation to Hever Worldwide summarised ... above.'

That Casterbridge did receive substantial sums from Hever Worldwide is not disputed by Mr Jeeves. In his affidavit of 15 October 1999 he said:

> 'It is correct that Casterbridge sold occupation rights at the Hever and other resorts to Hever Worldwide for a sum of £988,000 and that Hever Worldwide acquired other occupation rights ... for a total sum of over £2m and that Casterbridge received payment for these. The important point is not whether Casterbridge legally owned all the occupation rights it contracted to sell: it is whether Casterbridge was in a position to procure the transfer to Hever Worldwide of those occupation rights. So far as I am aware it is not alleged that Casterbridge is in breach of its contract or that Hever Worldwide failed to receive that which it paid for. Casterbridge was in a position to procure the transfers of occupation rights and ... nothing has occurred which could be the subject of any criticism.'

[14] On 7 December 2000—following an interview with Mr Ron Popely, who (as Burton J observed) was then living in Turkish North Cyprus—the Official Receiver invited Mr Jeeves to answer questions which were sent to him in the form of a questionnaire. It was Mr Jeeves' failure to meet that request which led the Official Receiver to apply to the High Court, in February 2001, for his public examination. The order made by Mr Registrar Buckley required Mr Jeeves to attend for public examination on 6 April 2001. That was deferred, by agreement, to 11 May 2001. On 8 May 2001 Mr Jeeves applied for a further adjournment on the grounds—set out in his solicitor's affidavit of that date—that he was making an application to the High Court in St Vincent for directions under s 4 of the Confidential Relationships Preservation (International Finance) Act 1996. The application to the court in St Vincent had been made on 4 May 2001 and was to be heard on 15 May 2001. On 10 May 2001 it was ordered that the public examination be adjourned. It has not yet taken place.

THE CONFIDENTIAL RELATIONSHIPS PRESERVATION (INTERNATIONAL FINANCE) ACT 1996

[15] The Confidential Relationships Preservation (International Finance) Act 1996 (Act No 17 of 1996 in the laws of SVG) (to which I shall refer as CRPA) was enacted on 7 October 1996 for the purpose of giving effect to the policy expressed in s 3(1):

> 'The public policy of the State is to protect and preserve the confidentiality, and to prevent the unauthorised disclosure, of all confidential information with respect to business of a professional nature which arises in or is created or disseminated within or is transported into the jurisdiction of the State.'

Section 4(1) of that Act required that—

> 'Whenever a person intends or is required to give evidence in, or in connection with, any proceedings being tried, inquired into, or determined by any court, tribunal or other authority (whether within or outside the State) of any confidential information within the meaning of this Act, he shall before so doing apply for and await directions from the Court.'

It was under that provision that Mr Jeeves applied to the High Court in St Vincent for directions. A 'professional person' who gave information in evidence other than as prescribed by the court in directions given under s 4 of CRPA was guilty of an offence and liable to a fine or imprisonment (see s 5(1) of that Act). It is not clear what (if any) directions were given by the High Court in St Vincent at that stage—that is to say, on 15 May 2001.

THE APPLICATION TO SET ASIDE THE ORDER FOR PUBLIC EXAMINATION

[16] The application of 8 June 2001—to set aside or rescind the registrar's order of 27 February 2001—was supported by a witness statement of that date signed by Mr Jeeves. He pointed out that he had lived in Liechtenstein since 1962; that, between 1992 and 2001 he was British Honorary Consul in Liechtenstein; and that he was an Officer of the Order of the British Empire. He challenged the order of 27 February 2001 on two grounds—which, as he said, were independent of the outcome of his application to the High Court in St Vincent. It was said, first, that the Official Receiver ought to have sought an order for private examination under s 236 of the 1986 Act, rather than an order for public examination under s 133 of that Act. Second, that if the Official Receiver had been right to apply for an order for public examination at all, he should have made the application on notice to Mr Jeeves. In para 21.5 of that witness statement Mr Jeeves explained why the requirement that he attend for public examination caused him severe prejudice and embarrassment. He said:

> 'As a result of the Insolvency Service contacting the Foreign Office concerning the affairs of Casterbridge I was asked by the Foreign Office and I did resign as the British Honorary Consul. In addition, the business which I operate, namely offshore companies and trusts is a small world where news spreads rapidly. Integrity, probity and confidentiality are vital to the running and retention of these businesses and the spectre of a public examination and its impact on the confidence of my clients is one of extreme concern and embarrassment to me.'

THE JUDGMENT OF 21 NOVEMBER 2001

[17] At the time when the application of 8 June 2001 was heard by Burton J in November 2001 ([2002] BPIR 428), little progress had been made on Mr Jeeves' application to the High Court in St Vincent for directions under CRPA. Burton J described the position (at [6]):

'What has happened ... in St Vincent is manifestly unfortunate. It is in no way the fault of the applicant (nor of course of the Official Receiver), but it is clearly quite different from what Evans-Lombe J expected would be the case when he adjourned the public examination initially for a short period at the instance of the applicant, and notwithstanding the opposition of [the Official Receiver], on 10 May. After the three adjournments of the s 4 application in St Vincent to which I have referred, there was a further adjournment on 6 July until 28 September: the case was not listed on 28 September and was instead listed for 5 October: on 5 October it was further adjourned until 19 October: on 19 October further adjourned until 2 November, and on 2 November yet further adjourned because there was no judge available until 23 November when it presently stands for hearing.'

[18] The position, therefore, was that Burton J did not know—and could not have known—when he gave judgment on 21 November 2001, what directions the High Court in St Vincent might give on the application which Mr Jeeves had made under s 4 of CRPA. But, in a judgment of conspicuous care to which I pay respectful tribute, he examined the provisions of that Act, and the parties' submissions upon it, and reached the conclusions which he expressed (at [35]):

'(i) I am not in a position to construe the CRPA, but I am persuaded by the Official Receiver's case that, on the basis of the declared public policy in s 3(1), and allowing for the due protection by St Vincent of confidential professional advice, it cannot be likely that it will or should be construed so as to prevent the disclosing by the applicant of at least most of the information sought in this case ... (ii) Consequently, whereas the possibility that, unless relieved, the applicant may be at risk under the CRPA must be taken into account in the exercise of my discretion, I agree with [the Official Receiver] that this must be given very much less weight than that for which [Mr Jeeves] contends. I also conclude that as he has opposed the making, or continuing, of the order it is neither likely nor reasonable that he should be regarded as in breach of any duty nor of any professional obligation or standard if he was compelled to be examined. (iii) The relevance of the CRPA does not of course stop there. There remains the outstanding application under s 4 to the St Vincent court, which, by virtue of the previous adjournments, remains still unresolved. I hope and believe that there is in fact no need for what might otherwise be regarded as a stand-off between the two jurisdictions, or any kind of even possible double jeopardy for the applicant. Particularly now that, perhaps with the assistance of this judgment, the St Vincent court is in a position to appreciate the respects in which there is no impingement, nor intention to impinge, upon the public policy of the state of St Vincent, but a desire on the part of the Official

Receiver adequately to complete his investigation into the affairs of a company being wound up in England as a result of the carrying on of business by it in England, it may be that relief under s 4 will be granted by the court.'

[19] Burton J rejected the attack on the order of 27 February 2001 in so far as it was based on the absence of notice. He said (at [14]):

'I am satisfied that there is no need for me to doubt the propriety or appropriateness of the present standard procedure for an order to be sought without notice, accompanied by the appropriate Official Receiver's report where appropriate, pursuant to r 4.211(2), as was the case here, nor for me to resolve the issue between the parties on a fully argued basis (and indeed I encouraged the cutting short of oral argument on this point), because as there is before me an application to review or rescind the order under r 7.47 I have all the power and the material to decide whether I can or should discharge this order, now that it has been argued fully before me.'

[20] The judge then considered the basis upon which he should address the application to discharge an order made under s 133 of the 1986 Act. He reminded himself of the terms of s 133(3):

'On an application under subsection (1), the court shall direct that a public examination of the person to whom the application relates shall be held ...'

And he said (at [19]):

'[The court is indeed bound on the original] application by the Official Receiver to make an order ... but ... it is not bound to continue or uphold that order when there is an application under r 7.47: albeit that there would plainly not be the same exercise as on an entirely discretionary decision relating to a s 236 examination, because adequate weight must be placed upon the mandatory nature of the original order, the special role of the Official Receiver and in particular the special duties of the Official Receiver pursuant to s 132 ...'

[21] Burton J addressed the submissions which had been made to him on the application under r 7.47 of the 1986 rules on that basis. In expressing his conclusions, he emphasised that, although he accepted that he had power to discharge the order of 27 February 2001, he also accepted that 'because the order is ordinarily mandatory the onus of discharging it must lie on the applicant'. He rejected the contention that an order for private examination, under s 236 of the 1986 Act, would have been more appropriate. In particular, he recognised that there was a question whether an order under s 236 of the Act would have full extra-territorial effect; and he rejected the contention that the order for public examination was materially or unjustifiably more onerous than an order for private examination in the circumstances of this case. It is, I think, pertinent to set out his conclusions on what he described as 'the more general matters involved in the balancing exercise'. Those conclusions appear (at [47]):

'(i) I see no problem in ordering the examination when the applicant is resident in Liechtenstein. I take into account that the order cannot be directly enforced, but the Liechtenstein court will no doubt approach an application for the order to be enforced within the ordinary principles of comity, when it is clear the order is made in favour of the Official Receiver to enable, in relation to a company being wound up by the English court, the proper investigation of its affairs in the circumstances set out in this judgment. As for the need for the applicant to come here, Liechtenstein is no great distance by air: and no case has been put forward that the applicant would be in any personal difficulties or at any hazard if he came to England. (ii) The connection with the UK is in my judgment fully established both by the winding-up order itself and the facts that I have seen, some of which I have set out in this judgment. (iii) The applicant is plainly not a "third party" and his role, on his own evidence, and the knowledge he clearly has about matters relevant to the carrying on of the business of Casterbridge in this country, are sufficiently established. I am further not in any way persuaded that the Official Receiver has failed to set out or explain what information is required and/or what information it is believed that the applicant can give, or has failed to show that he has taken any material steps which might have discovered any alternative way of eliciting the information. In so far as it is suggested that insufficient steps were taken with regard to the advertisement of the petition, that may well be so, but none of the criticisms of the Official Receiver in any way detract from the clear case that the applicant has information to give, and indeed, irrespective of any other steps, is the person with the most relevant information to give ...'

[22] The judge took into account the particular problem posed by the application then pending before the High Court in St Vincent. He returned to that matter (at [50]):

'I turn finally back to the St Vincent legislation. I have concluded, after taking into account all other matters urged before me, that a s 133 order was appropriate. Although there is no privilege against self-incrimination, I also take into account in my discretion the CRPA. For the reasons that I have given: (i) the risk of sanctions being taken against the applicant (the effective author of the St Vincent legislation) is in any event, even if it exists at all, considerably less than has been submitted, whether on a proper construction of the statute and its implementation or at all, and/or he may in any event be granted relief. (ii) The desirability and appropriateness of the obtaining of the information by the course proposed in any event in my judgment outweighs any such consideration. I do not believe that this court is in any way in conflict with the St Vincent court. One of our two courts has to resolve this matter first, and, given the unfortunate but it seems inevitable delays in the St Vincent proceedings, but in any event by virtue of the greater knowledge available to this court, where the jurisdiction of the winding-up in any event resides, that decision has been made by this court, and I hope will be of assistance to the St Vincent court in considering the question of relief. Whether or not however relief is granted, I conclude, taking all matters into account, and assuming in favour of the applicant that I have the discretion he urges, that I should exercise it in favour of upholding the s 133 order.'

THE APPLICATION FOR PERMISSION TO APPEAL TO THIS COURT

[23] The judge refused permission to appeal to this court, essentially on the grounds that he had exercised a discretion entrusted to him. Mr Jeeves applied to this court for permission to appeal. The first four of the six grounds set out under s 7 of his appellant's notice dated 6 December 2001, were in these terms:

> '1. The learned judge erred in law in concluding that on a proper construction of s 133 ... of the 1986 Act ... on the Official Receiver applying for an order for a person's public examination under s 133 the court is bound to make the order sought.
>
> 2. The learned judge ought to have concluded that on a proper construction of s 133 (which construction, unlike the construction contended for by the Official Receiver, would be compatible with the provisions of art 6(1) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998), when the Official Receiver applies for an order for a person's public examination under s 133: (a) the court has a complete discretion as to whether or not to make the order sought; (b) the onus lies on the Official Receiver to satisfy the court that the order sought should be made; (c) save in exceptional circumstances, the Official Receiver should not apply for the order without notice to the proposed examinee; (d) the court should only make the order sought if satisfied both: (1) that the specific purposes of a public examination would be served by the making of such an order; and (2) that a public examination of the proposed examinee is reasonably required, after conducting a balancing exercise similar to that which it would carry out when deciding whether to make an order for private examination under s 236 of the 1986 Act.
>
> 3. The learned judge erred in law in concluding that in circumstances where the Official Receiver has obtained a without notice order for a person's public examination under s 133 and the proposed examinee applies under r 7.47 of the 1986 rules ... to rescind that order: (a) apparently because of the learned judge's aforementioned error of law in concluding that an order under s 133 is "ordinarily mandatory" the onus lies on the proposed examinee to satisfy the court that the order for his public examination should be rescinded; and (b) the court should not conduct a balancing exercise similar to that which it would carry out when faced with an application by a proposed examinee to rescind a without notice order obtained by the Official Receiver or liquidator for their private examination under s 236, but rather should place greater weight on the "mandatory nature of the original order" and the special role and duties of the Official Receiver.
>
> 4. The learned judge ought to have concluded that when a proposed examinee applies under r 7.47 for rescission of an order, obtained without notice, for their public examination under s 133: (a) the onus lies on the Official Receiver to satisfy the court that the order obtained without notice should be continued and not rescinded; and (b) the court should only continue the order and not rescind it if satisfied both: (1) that the specific purposes of a public examination would be served by the continuation of the order; and (2) that a public examination of the proposed examinee is reasonably required, after conducting a balancing exercise similar to that which it would carry out when deciding whether to continue or rescind an order obtained without notice for a private examination under s 236.'

[24] Ground 5 of the grounds of appeal challenged the judge's conclusions as to the effect of s 4 of CRPA. Ground 6 set out, under 17 subparagraphs, matters of which it was said that the judge failed to take any or any sufficient account in deciding whether to uphold the order for public examination.

[25] The application for permission to appeal came before me on paper. It was coupled with an application to adduce further evidence. On 6 February 2002 I gave permission to appeal limited to grounds 1–4. I was satisfied that this court should have the opportunity (i) of deciding whether, on the proper construction of s 133 of the 1986 Act, a court to which an application for an order for public examination is made by the Official Receiver is required to make the order sought; and (in the light of its decision on that ground) (ii) of giving guidance as to the proper approach to an application under r 7.47 of the 1986 rules for an order rescinding an order made under s 133 of that Act. I refused permission to appeal on grounds 5 and 6; for the reason that, if the judge's approach to the application before him was correct in principle, there was no real prospect of persuading this court that it should interfere with a decision that he had reached in the exercise of his discretion. And I refused permission to adduce further evidence on the ground that that evidence was either evidence which could have been put before the judge at the hearing in November 2001 or evidence which, if it had been put before the judge at that hearing, was unlikely to have had any material effect on his decision.

[26] The application for permission to appeal on grounds 5 and 6 was renewed at an oral hearing before this court (Charles J and myself) on 12 March 2002. In the meantime, on 20 February 2002, the High Court in St Vincent had made an order—on the application for directions made to it on 4 May 2001—declaring that Mr Jeeves was a 'professional person' for the purposes of CRPA and was 'competent to prosecute the application for directions'. The application for directions was stood over for further hearing to a date and time to be arranged. On 7 March 2002 very shortly before the hearing fixed in this court for 12 March 2002, Mr Jeeves made a further application in St Vincent—pursuant to s 108 of the International Business Companies Act 1996—for determination of the questions whether the order for the winding up of Casterbridge, made in London on 1 August 2000, had had the effect of winding up the company in St Vincent; and whether Casterbridge was a company in good standing in St Vincent. The declaration of good standing was made by the High Court of St Vincent on the following day, 8 March 2002. Paragraph 2 of the order in St Vincent made that day gave the directions sought under s 4 of CRPA by the application of 4 May 2001. The paragraph was in these terms:

> 'Pursuant to section 4 of the Confidential Relationships Preservation (International Finance) Act 1996 (Number 17 of 1996) Directions are hereby given to the Second-named Applicant BRYAN JEEVES that the evidence required by the Official Receiver (UK) in connection with the purported winding up of Casterbridge Properties Ltd shall not be given.'

[27] No copy of the judgment upon which that order was made has been provided to this court. It is impossible to tell whether the judge when making the order on 8 March 2002 had been made aware of the matters which Burton J had set out so carefully in his judgment of 21 November 2001. That order of 8 March 2002 was put before this court at the hearing on 12 March 2002. This court took the view that the order made in St Vincent on 8 March 2002 undermined (in part, at least) the basis upon which Burton J had exercised his discretion on 21 November 2001; and that—in the circumstances that counsel had not come prepared to argue the points of principle identified in my order of 6 February 2002—the appropriate course was to allow the applicant to make a further application to the High Court, under r 7.47(1) of the 1986 rules, for a review of the order of 22 November 2001 and for a further review of the order of 27 February 2001. The court had in mind that, if there were to be argument as to the effect in this jurisdiction of the order made in St Vincent on 8 March 2002, it was convenient that that argument should take place (in the first instance) in the High Court rather than in this court so that any facts relevant to that argument could be found on the basis of evidence as to the laws of St Vincent. Accordingly we adjourned the appeal, the renewed application for permission to rely on grounds 5 and 6 of the appellant's notice and the application to adduce further evidence until after that further application had been made.

THE EXCHANGE OF INFORMATION ACT 2002

[28] The further application under r 7.47(1) of the 1986 rules was made on 27 June 2002. In the meantime, however, there had been new legislation in SVG. On 30 May 2002 the Exchange of Information Act 2002 was enacted and came into force. The legislative purpose of that Act, as appears from the long title, was to make provision for assisting overseas regulatory authorities to obtain information from within SVG. Section 9 of that Act repealed the CRPA. Prima facie, at least, the repeal of CRPA removed the basis upon which para 2 of the order of 8 March 2002 had been made by the High Court in St Vincent.

THE REPORT OF THE JOINT EXPERT

[29] It was in those circumstances that, on 15 November 2002, an order was made in the High Court in London for the instruction of a joint expert to report on the questions: (i) whether the repeal of CRPA was retrospective, and (ii) the effect of the repeal on the order made in St Vincent on 8 March 2002, with reference, in particular, to Mr Jeeves' present and future obligations in relation to public examination.

[30] The joint expert reported on 7 February 2003. She explained that, until 2002, the cornerstone of the policy of the government of SVG so far as it concerned the protection of confidential information was set out in s 3(1) of CRPA—to which I have already referred. But she went on to say this:

> 'On 30 May 2002 the [Exchange of Information Act 2002] was signed by the Governor General and came into force on the same date when it was published in an extraordinary issue of the Government Gazette. The scope and intent of the EIA is completely different from that of the CRPA. Its object is "to make provision or assisting overseas regulatory authorities to obtain information from St Vincent and the Grenadines and other related matters". Although there is no public policy declaration in the EIA, the legislation was enacted in response to severe criticisms and sanctions from certain countries, including England and the putting of [SVG] on the so-called black list of the OEDC countries. By being on this black list SVG was/is adversely affected as an offshore financial centre. Any local bank that had offshore companies, especially offshore banks, as customers were denied the facility and convenience of corresponding banking relationships by banks in the United Kingdom and elsewhere.'

[31] The joint expert advised that the repeal of CRPA did not have retrospective effect; and that, although CRPA had been repealed, there was no doubt that the order of 8 March 2002 still stood and should be obeyed unless and until it was set aside by the court. She referred to the opinion of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Isaacs v Robertson [1984] 3 All ER 140, [1985] AC 97.

[32] She then considered the practical effect of Mr Jeeves giving evidence on public examination notwithstanding the order of 8 March 2002. She said:

> 'Arguably given the present policy of the government of St Vincent and the Grenadines and the repeal of the CRPA it is unlikely that Mr Jeeves will be prosecuted or even pursued civilly for contempt of court by any government department or regulatory authority in SVG if he did in fact breach the St Vincent order and give the evidence required by the Official Receiver.'

But she made it clear that she was not suggesting that Mr Jeeves could be advised to disregard the order of 8 March 2002. She said this:

> 'Mr Jeeves could himself apply to the court in SVG to have the St Vincent order set aside. The repeal of the CRPA should make this application relatively uncomplicated. The other parties involved in the application for directions before Bruce-Lyle J were the Attorney General's Office (represented by the Solicitor General) and the Offshore Finance Authority (represented by Louise Mitchell Esq now Offshore Finance Inspector). In SVG both offices fall under the portfolio of the Prime Minister respectively as Minister of Legal Affairs and Minister of Finance. It is therefore highly unlikely that either office will oppose an application by Mr Jeeves to set aside the St Vincent order. Further, even if a private individual party or entity with an interest in the matter sought to object to his application to set aside the St Vincent order, Mr Jeeves could rely on this dictum of Lord Keith of Kinkel who delivered the judgment of the Privy Council in Douglas v Pindling [1996] AC 890 at 902, [1996] 3 WLR 242 at 251: "The confidentiality continues to be personal to the customer in the same way as if the [Banks and Trust Companies Regulation Act 1965] had not been passed. The only balance which requires to be made is that between the public interest in the administration of justice or the promotion of the work of a commission of inquiry and the customer's personal interest. If the public interest appears on good grounds to require disclosure the customer's interest must give way." This case is not directly on point but helps to illustrate that the courts willingly accept that even protected rights must in some circumstances give way to the public interest. In the case of Casterbridge and corporate directors it is my opinion that public interest will have to take precedence over any right that anyone or any entity associated with either company may seek to protect pursuant to the St Vincent order. Alternatively the Attorney General's office or the Offshore Finance Authority, through the proper channels, could be asked to make the abovementioned application to set aside the St Vincent order. For reasons already given it would be extremely difficult for them to refuse such a request and even more difficult for the High Court of SVG to refuse to set aside the St Vincent order.'

THE JUDGMENT OF 2 JULY 2003

[33] The further application under r 7.47(1) was heard by Jacob J on 2 July 2003 ([2003] EWHC 1731 (Ch)). He referred to the joint expert's report and asked himself whether, in the light of that report, there was a real risk that attendance for public examination in this jurisdiction would expose Mr Jeeves to sanctions for breach of the order of 8 March 2002. He concluded that there was no real risk, even while the order stood; and that, in any event, Mr Jeeves could, if he chose, remove any vestige of risk by taking the obvious step of applying to have the order of 8 March 2002 set aside following the repeal of CRPA. The joint expert had advised that such an application would be 'relatively uncomplicated' and would not be opposed by the authorities in SVG. Jacob J dismissed the application. But, on the basis that there was to be an appeal to this court from the order of 22 November 2001 in any event, he gave permission to appeal from his own order.

THE FURTHER APPLICATION IN ST VINCENT

[34] In the light of the joint expert's advice that an application to set aside the order of 8 March 2002 would succeed, and following the observations by Jacob J in his judgment that that was an obvious course for Mr Jeeves to take if he wished to remove any perceived risk that he would be exposed to sanctions in SVG for breach of that order, it might have been expected that he (Mr Jeeves) would make a further application to the High Court in St Vincent. It was no surprise, therefore, when this court received a letter from solicitors acting for Mr Jeeves, dated 25 July 2003, stating that—

> 'Our client is making an application, in the light of the Order of Mr Justice Jacob dated 2nd July 2003, to the High Court of St Vincent and the Grenadines ... concerning the Order made by Mr Justice Frederick Bruce-Lyle on 8th March 2002.'

[35] Nor was it any surprise to find, when the court sat to hear these appeals on Monday 28 July 2003, that there was a formal application to adjourn this hearing on the grounds that Mr Jeeves was making an application to the High Court in St Vincent. The application to adjourn was supported by a witness statement, signed by a solicitor and dated 28 July 2003, which contained the paragraph:

> 'I respectfully request that any decision on the appeals listed for hearing on 28 July 2003 be deferred pending the outcome of the applicant's application to the High Court of St Vincent and the Grenadines.'

But it was a surprise to find, on examination of the copy application exhibited to that witness statement, that the application to the High Court in St Vincent was not being made by Mr Jeeves. The application, dated 25 July 2003, was made by St Vincent Trust Services Ltd and Corporate Directors Ltd. The application seeks a declaration that Mr Jeeves would be in contempt of court if he breached the order of 8 March 2002 by attending a public examination pursuant to the order of the High Court in London. It appears that that application is to be heard on 9 October 2003.

[36] We refused the application to adjourn this hearing. It is now some three years since the order to wind up Casterbridge; and nearly two-and-a-half years since the order for public examination was made on 27 February 2001. It is time that the question whether or not Mr Jeeves should be required to submit to public examination in respect of the affairs of Casterbridge is resolved in this court. It seems clear that Mr Jeeves does not, himself, intend to apply to set aside the order made in St Vincent under CRPA, notwithstanding the repeal of that Act. We have the benefit of the joint expert's report, in which she has advised that such an application would succeed. For my part, I find her reasons compelling. It seems plain that there is no longer any basis for the continuation of an order made under CRPA. Nor can I see any basis for the application made in St Vincent by St Vincent Trust Service Ltd and Corporate Directors Ltd; in particular, I cannot see what proper interest those companies have in seeking a declaration that Mr Jeeves would be in contempt of court if he were to act in breach of an order which was not made for their protection and which, on the evidence, he could readily have set aside if he chose.

THE ISSUES ON THESE APPEALS

[37] With that lengthy account of the circumstances in which these appeals come before this court, I turn to identify the issues which are for decision. But, before addressing those issues, I should mention that neither the application for permission to appeal from the order of 22 November 2001 on ground 5 in the appellant's notice of 6 December 2001, nor the application of 11 January 2002 to adduce further evidence, are now pursued. It is recognised, on behalf of Mr Jeeves, that ground 5 has been overtaken by events; and that the evidence which needs to be before the court was put in on the further application under r 7.47(1) before Jacob J and will be considered in the context of the appeal from his order of 2 July 2003.

[38] The matters before the court, therefore, were: (i) the appeal from the order of 22 November 2001 on grounds 1–4 in the appellant's notice; (ii) the application for permission to appeal from that order on ground 6 of the appellant's notice; and (iii) the appeal from the order of 2 July 2003.

[39] We have already indicated, in the course of argument, that we will not give permission to appeal from the first order on the basis of ground 6. As I have said, that ground goes to the exercise of his discretion by Burton J. If this court were to hold that he had exercised his discretion on a false basis—as contended in grounds 1 to 4—then ground 6 would become otiose. This court would be required to exercise its own discretion in the light of the factors (which might include factors within ground 6) which appeared to it material. But, if the court holds that Burton J has correctly identified the principles upon which his discretion was to be exercised, then there is nothing in ground 6 which persuades me that this court should entertain an appeal against the exercise of a discretion which, plainly, Parliament has entrusted to a judge of the High Court. Further, the purpose of this court's order of 12 March 2002 and the further application to Jacob J under r 7.47(1) of the 1986 rules was to enable a judge of the High Court to exercise his discretion afresh in the light of the changed circumstances. In the events which have happened, the relevant exercise of discretion under r 7.47(1), as it seems to me, is that of Jacob J. If, as counsel appeared to accept, Jacob J was not asked to consider the matters in ground 6 of the appellant's notice of 6 December 2001, Mr Jeeves cannot now be heard to complain that they were not taken into account by that judge when he exercised his discretion on 2 July 2003. Mr Jeeves cannot, now, raise those matters on an appeal from Jacob J; and, as I have said, the particular factors which Burton J did or did not take into account, and the weight which he gave to them, have been overtaken by events.

[40] Further, I should say at this stage that an appeal against Jacob J's decision, on the material before him, that Mr Jeeves was at no real risk of sanctions in SVG if he complied with the order for public examination made on 27 February 2001 is not capable of being sustained. As the judge pointed out, the evidence of the joint expert was clear. The removal of any perceived risk in St Vincent lay in Mr Jeeves' own hands. If he sought to have the order of 8 March 2002 set aside, his application would be successful. He cannot rely on a risk which it is within his power to remove by asserting that it is not in his commercial interests to be seen to be seeking to remove it.

[41] The issues which need to be determined on these appeals are those identified in my order of 6 February 2002: (i) whether, on the proper construction of s 133 of the 1986 Act, a court to which an application for an order for public examination is made by the Official Receiver is required to make the order sought; and (ii) what is the proper approach to an application under r 7.47(1) of the 1986 rules for an order rescinding an order made under s 133 of that Act. It is to those issues that I now turn.

IS THE COURT REQUIRED TO MAKE AN ORDER FOR PUBLIC EXAMINATION ON AN APPLICATION BY THE OFFICIAL RECEIVER UNDER SECTION 133 OF THE 1986 ACT

[42] It is plain that, at the least, the court is required to satisfy itself on an application by the Official Receiver under s 133(1) of the 1986 Act: (i) that the company is being wound up by the court; and (ii) that the person whose public examination is sought falls within one or other of the categories set out under paras (a)–(c) of that subsection. That is emphasised by the provisions in r 4.211(2) and (4) of the 1986 rules:

> '(2) Where the application relates to a person falling within section 133(1)(c) (promoters, past managers, etc), it shall be accompanied by a report by the official receiver indicating—(a) the grounds on which the person is supposed to fall within that paragraph ...
>
> (4) In a case to which [para (2) applies], the court shall rescind the order if satisfied by the person to whom it is directed that he does not fall within section 133(1)(c).'

[43] No doubt it was thought that there was a need to make specific provision for cases within para (c) of s 133(1), because it was in those cases that disputes were most likely to arise. But, given the extended meaning of 'officer'—which includes 'any person occupying the position of director by whatever name called' (see ss 741(1) and 744 of the Companies Act 1985 and s 251 of the 1986 Act)—it is not difficult to envisage circumstances in which the court might be required to decide, also, whether a person fell within para (a) of s 133(1). On those grounds alone, it is wrong to describe the function of the court under s 133(3) as being that of applying 'a rubber stamp' to the application of the Official Receiver.

[44] But, if satisfied that the person whose public examination is sought falls within one or other of the categories set out in paras (a)–(c) of s 133(1) of the 1986 Act, is the court required by the mandatory language of s 133(3) to make the order sought? In my view the answer to that question must be a qualified affirmative. The court must keep in mind the purposes of public examination; and that the examinee will be examined on oath and will be required to answer 'all such questions as the court may put, or allow to be put, to him'. In the wholly exceptional case in which it could be seen, at the time of the application for public examination, that there were no questions which it would be proper for the court to put, or to allow to be put, to the examinee at the hearing of the examination—or that there were no purposes to be served by such an examination—the court should decline to make the order. The reason is simple: the court should do nothing in vain. If the order for public examination can serve no useful purpose, it should not be made. Subject to that qualification, however, it seems to me that the court is required to make the order sought. If there are particular questions or areas of inquiry to which objection can be taken, that can be raised and debated at the public examination itself—or, if more convenient, at a preliminary hearing. But it is, I think, only in the very rare case in which it can be seen at the time of the application that there is no proper purpose to be served by a public examination that the court would be justified in refusing to make the order which the Official Receiver—or, in a case under s 133(2), the requisite majority of the creditors and contributories—considers to be needed if the Official Receiver is to carry out the duties imposed on him by s 132(1) of the Act.

[45] In reaching that conclusion I have had regard to the legislative history of s 133 of the 1986 Act; to the comparable provisions in bankruptcy; and to the recommendations of the Review Committee on Insolvency Law and Practice chaired by Sir Kenneth Cork (Insolvency Law and Practice: Report of the Review Committee (1982) (Cmnd 8558)).

[46] The provisions now in s 133 of the 1986 Act were first introduced, in a different form, as s 8 of the Companies Act 1890. They were re-enacted in the Companies Act 1908, 1929 and 1948. They appear in the 1948 Act as s 270(1). The subsection was in these terms:

> 'Where an order has been made in England for winding up a company by the court, and the official receiver has made a further report under this Act stating that in his opinion a fraud has been committed by any person in the promotion or formation of the company or by any officer of the company in relation to the company since its formation, the court may, after consideration of the report, direct that that person or officer shall attend before the court on a day appointed by the court for that purpose and be publicly examined as to the promotion or formation or the conduct of the business of the company or as to his conduct and dealings as officer thereof.'

[47] The further report referred to in that subsection was a report made under s 236(2) of the 1948 Act, stating whether, in the opinion of the Official Receiver, any fraud had been committed by any person in its promotion or formation or by any officer of the company in relation to the company since its formation and setting out any other matters which he thought desirable to bring to the court's notice.

[48] The provisions in s 270(1) of the 1948 Act were the subject of comment and recommendation by the Cork Committee, in its report published in 1982, under the heading 'Public examination':

> '653. Under the existing law and procedure a public examination can only be held in a winding up case if the Official Receiver makes "a further report" to the Court under section 236(2) of the Act of 1948 alleging fraud in relation to the company; in these circumstances the Court may order a public examination of the person against whom the allegations have been made. In practice, the provisions enabling a public examination to be held are no longer invoked. A public examination does not appear to have been held since 1935.

654. We believe that this approach to the public examination requires to be reviewed. If, as we recommend, the whole purpose of a Compulsory Winding up Order is to deal with cases which are of sufficient gravity to justify a full investigation, then, we believe, a public examination has a role to play in the proceedings. We attach importance to a public examination for individual debtors in the event of a Bankruptcy Order being made and we consider that it would be undesirable if a similar provision was not available in the Compulsory Winding Up of an insolvent company, for use where the Court felt it to be appropriate.

655. A public examination during the course of Compulsory Winding Up proceedings should, as in Bankruptcy, be intended to serve three principal purposes: (a) to form the basis of reports which the Official Receiver may have to submit to the Department concerning the affairs of the company; for example, concerning possible offences by officers of the company and others; (b) to obtain material information for the administration of the estate which cannot as well be obtained privately; and (c) to give publicity, for the information of creditors and the community at large, to the salient facts and unusual features connected with the company's failure.

656. We believe, as did the Jenkins Committee, that the revival of the public examination as a factor to be reckoned with in winding up proceedings is desirable. By exposing serious misconduct, it will help to promote high standards of commercial and business morality and will also serve as a form of sanction against former officers of a failed company who have not adequately assisted the Official Receiver and the liquidator in the course of their respective investigations and administration of the company's affairs.'

[49] Section 270(1) of the 1948 Act was re-enacted as s 563 of the 1985 Act, in substantially the same terms. In particular, s 563 of the 1985 Act continued to use the word 'may' in conferring upon the court power to make an order; and it continued to require a report evidencing fraud. But when those provisions came to be incorporated in the 1986 insolvency legislation—as s 133—two significant changes were made. First, public examination was to be available in all cases and not merely in cases where there was a report alleging fraud; and, second, Parliament enacted—by sub-s (3)—that, on an application for a public examination, the court 'shall', not merely 'may', make an order. In making that latter change Parliament must have recognised that the word 'may' continued to be used in relation to private examinations under s 236.

[50] In my view the clear statutory purpose behind the change that was made in the 1986 legislation—in recognition of the recommendations—was, first, to make greater use of public examination in cases where companies were being wound up by the court and, second, to assimilate the practice in corporate insolvency to that which had existed in individual insolvency since at least the Bankruptcy Act 1869 (see s 19 of that Act). For the 70 years prior to 1986 the relevant provisions were those in s 15(1) of the Bankruptcy Act 1914, which required that a public examination shall be ordered by the court whenever the court made a receiving order, unless the debtor were a lunatic or suffered from such mental or physical affliction as in the opinion of the court made him unfit to attend his public examination (see s 15(10) of the 1914 Act).

[51] Public examination in bankruptcy was mandatory save in the circumstances set out in s 15(10) of the 1914 Act, until the enactment of the Insolvency Act 1976. Section 6(1) of that Act provided that the court might, if it thought fit, make an order dispensing with the public examination of a debtor under s 15 of the 1914 Act. In determining whether to make an order dispensing with public examination the court was to have regard to all the circumstances of the case including, in particular: (a) whether the debtor had made full disclosure of his affairs; (b) whether he had been adjudged bankrupt on a previous occasion; (c) the number and nature of his debts; (d) whether his bankruptcy would for any reason be a matter of public concern; and (e) such other matters as might be prescribed for the purposes of the subsection under the Bankruptcy Rules. But it is pertinent to note that an order dispensing with public examination could not be made under s 6(1) of the 1976 Act except on the application of the Official Receiver (see s 6(2) of that Act). So the position in bankruptcy prior to 1986 was that public examination was the norm. The relevant provisions in relation to individual insolvency are now contained in s 290 of the 1986 Act. They are, in all material respects, the same as those in relation to corporate insolvency, contained in s 133 of that Act—see, in particular, s 290(3) of the 1986 Act.

[52] In my view, Parliament intended that public examination should be ordered in corporate insolvency—should the Official Receiver think it appropriate—as in individual insolvency. That is why it enacted s 133 in terms which were so markedly different from those which had gone before. That view of the effect of s 133 of the 1986 Act has been adopted by judges of the Companies Court in Re Seagull Manufacturing Co Ltd (in liq) [1991] 4 All ER 257 at 265–266, [1992] Ch 128 at 140–141, in Richbell Strategic Holdings Ltd (in liq) (No 2) [2000] 2 BCLC 794 at 799 and in Re Avatar Communications Ltd (1988) 4 BCC 473 at 474. To my mind, those judges were correct to take the view that they did.

[53] Accordingly, in answer to the first of the issues raised, I would hold that the court is required to make an order for public examination if the conditions set out in s 133(1) are satisfied, unless it is satisfied that there is no useful purpose to be served by such an examination.

THE APPROACH TO BE TAKEN ON AN APPLICATION TO RESCIND UNDER RULE 7.47(1) OF THE 1986 RULES

[54] In the light of the view which I have taken as to the approach which the court should adopt on an application under s 133 of the 1986 Act, the approach which it should adopt on a subsequent application under r 7.47(1) of the 1986 rules is not, I think, in doubt. If an application is made without notice under s 133 of the Act, the court will not have the opportunity to consider the matters which the proposed examinee may wish it to take into account in support of a contention that no useful purpose will be served by a public examination. Rule 7.47(1) provides an opportunity for the court to consider representations by the proposed examinee at a hearing in advance of the public examination itself. So, where it can be seen on an application under r 7.47(1) that there is indeed no purpose to be served by the public examination that has been ordered, the court may set aside the order which it has made.

[55] On an application under r 7.47(1) it would be appropriate, as it seems to me, for the court to consider a submission that the examinee was liable to some sanction in a foreign jurisdiction which would make it unduly oppressive to require him to answer any questions put to him at the public examination; in other words, to consider whether there was some factor which should lead the court to conclude that, at the public examination, it would not be proper to put any questions, or to require any questions to be answered. And, in the rare circumstances in which it could be seen that there were simply no questions that could be asked and answered at a public examination, it might be appropriate to discharge the order on an application under r 7.47(1). But, if the only purpose of the application is to assert that there will be some questions which cannot be answered, then the convenient course is likely to be to leave those questions to be identified at the public examination.

[56] It is, I think, of some significance that the provisions formerly enacted in s 6(1) of the 1976 Act have not been carried into the 1986 insolvency code, either in relation to individual bankruptcy or in relation to corporate winding up. Parliament may be taken to have determined that, in the first place, it was for the Official Receiver to determine whether the circumstances required a public examination; and, if so, to apply for an order. But the matters set out in s 6(1) of the 1976 Act are matters which might be expected to be relevant to a decision whether or not a public examination would serve some useful purpose; and, in my view it would be appropriate for the court to take those matters into account on an application under s 375(1) of the 1986 Act (the statutory successor of s 198(1) of the 1914 Act—to which express reference is made in s 6(2) of the 1976 Act). Rule 7.47(1) of the 1986 rules applies the principle of review and rescission to corporate insolvency; and it must, I think, follow, that a court can take account, on an application under r 7.47(1), of matters analogous to those which would be relevant on an application under s 375(1) of the Act. The court should also, as it seems to me, have regard (in a case like the present) to the purpose to be served by a public examination—identified at para 655(c) of the Cork Report.

CONCLUSION

[57] For these reasons I would dismiss both these appeals. I am satisfied that, on a proper understanding of the approach to be adopted on an application under r 7.47(1) of the 1986 rules, there is no basis upon which the order of 27 February 2001 could be set aside.

RIX LJ.

[58] I agree.

SIMON BROWN LJ.

[59] I have found myself truly shocked by the lengths to which this appellant has been prepared to go to avoid a public, or indeed any other, examination into his knowledge of and dealings with Casterbridge Properties Ltd. Perhaps I should not have been. Perhaps all is fair in insolvency litigation no less than in love and war. But to promote an application to the courts of St Vincent to declare that the appellant would be in contempt there were he to obey this court's order, when a release from the St Vincent court order theoretically putting him at risk of such contempt is his for the asking, quite aside from his transparent twelfth-hour efforts thereby once again to postpone the hearing of these appeals, strikes me as in the highest degree disingenuous, and for my part I strongly deprecate it.

[60] With regard to Chadwick LJ's very full discussions of the substantive questions of law arising on this appeal, I wish to make but a single observation. A s 133(1) application will come before the court on an ex parte basis. That being so, it seems to me that rarely, if ever, will there be a case where the court will be sufficiently alive to the detailed circumstances of the case to be justified in declining to make the mandatory order ordinarily required by s 133(3) on the ground that no useful purpose would be served by it, ie because no question whatever could properly be put at the public examination applied for.

[61] These paragraphs, however, are essentially by the way. For the reasons given by Chadwick LJ, with all of which I respectfully agree, these appeals must clearly be dismissed.

Appeals dismissed.

Dilys Tausz Barrister.

igroup Ltd v Ocwen and others

[2003] EWHC 2431 (Ch)

CHANCERY DIVISION (COMPANIES COURT)

LIGHTMAN J

13, 14, 23 OCTOBER 2003

Company – Charge – Registration – Rectification of register – Omission or mis-statement of particular – Whether statutory power to rectify register extending to information particulars submitted on prescribed forms by applicant for registration – Companies Act 1985, ss 401, 403, 404.

The defendant companies were the subsidiary and associated companies of the claimant. Both the claimant and the defendant companies carried on the business of mortgage lending to members of the public. In the course of that business, the defendant companies borrowed moneys from various banks and gave security to them by way of debentures. The debentures charged the defendant companies' rights and interests under the mortgages which they held over their customers' properties. Prescribed particulars of the charges were duly delivered to the Registrar of Companies. Those forms were drafted in sufficiently general terms as to disclose no personal information about the customers. The defendant companies carried out a securitisation programme which involved the equitable assignment of their interest in the mortgage loans to a number of special purpose vehicles. As part of that process, the defendant companies' solicitors sent to the registrar various prescribed forms relating to (i) deeds of release of certain properties from the charges that the defendants had previously given to their lenders (the 403b forms) and (ii) new charges which they had granted to lending banks or security trustees (the 395 forms). The forms referred to, and had attached to them, a number of schedules. Although they did not need to, those schedules contained accurate personal information relating to the customers, eg their names, addresses, the price paid for their properties, the original advances, the current balances of their mortgage loans, the payment dates, the monthly payment amounts and the interest rates charged. On receipt of the forms, the registrar made appropriate entries on the register of charges of the particulars referred to in s 401(1)[a] of the Companies Act 1985 and the memoranda of satisfaction referred to in s 403(1)[b] of that Act. The claimant was concerned that the disclosure of the personal information in the forms might constitute a breach of duty owed by it or the defendant companies to the customers. It therefore brought proceedings for rectification or amendment of the forms, contending that the inclusion of unnecessary information fell within the court's power, under s 404[c], to rectify a 'mis-statement of any particular with respect to

a Section 401, so far as material, is set out at [9], below

b Section 403, so far as material, provides: '(1) The registrar of companies, on receipt of a statutory declaration in the prescribed form verifying, with respect to a registered charge,—(a) that the debt for which the charge was given has been paid or satisfied in whole or in part, or (b) that part of the property or undertaking charged has been released from the charge or has ceased to form part of the company's property or undertaking, may enter on the register a memorandum of satisfaction in whole or in part, or of the fact that part of the property or undertaking has been released from the charge or has ceased to form part of the company's property or undertaking (as the case may be) ...'

c Section 404, so far as material, is set out at [11], below any ... charge or in a memorandum of satisfaction'. Alternatively, the claimant sought rectification under the court's inherent jurisdiction. On the hearing of the application, which was supported by the defendant companies but opposed by the registrar, the court was required to determine whether it had jurisdiction to make the order sought, and in particular whether its jurisdiction under s 404 was restricted to entries on the face of the register of charges or extended to the forms and schedules thereto.

Held – The power of rectification granted to the court by s 404 of the 1985 Act was limited to correcting mistakes of omission or commission in the entry of any particular with respect to a mortgage or charge or in a memorandum of satisfaction made by the registrar on the register of charges maintained by the registrar under s 401. It did not extend to mistakes otherwise than in a particular entered on the register, and accordingly did not extend to the information particulars entered on a form 395 or a form 403b by or on behalf of an applicant for registration. The references in s 404 to 'any particular with respect to any ... charge' and to 'a memorandum of satisfaction' were references to the particulars that the registrar was required to enter on the register of charges under s 401(1), and to the memorandum of satisfaction that the registrar could enter on the register of charges under s 403. It followed in the instant case that the court had no power to grant the relief claimed under s 404. Nor did the court have any inherent power of rectification since there was binding authority that such a power was wholly inconsistent with the limited statutory jurisdiction to order rectification under s 404. Accordingly, the application would be dismissed (see [16], [19], [26], [27], [33], below).

Notes

For rectification of the register of charges, see 7(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (1996 reissue) para 1314.

For the Companies Act 1985, ss 401, 403, 404, see 8 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (1999 reissue) 460, 461, 462.

Cases referred to in judgment

Calmex Ltd, Re, Calmex Ltd v C Lila Ltd [1989] 1 All ER 485.

Exeter Trust Ltd v Screenways Ltd [1991] BCLC 888, CA.

R (on the application of Robertson) v Wakefield Metropolitan DC [2001] EWHC 915 (Admin), [2002] LGR 286, [2002] QB 1052, [2002] 2 WLR 889.

R v Registrar of Companies, ex p Central Bank of India [1986] 1 All ER 105, [1986] QB 1114, [1986] 2 WLR 177, CA.

Cases referred to in skeleton arguments

Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corp [1947] 2 All ER 680, [1948] 1 KB 223, CA.

Calgary and Edmonton Land Co Ltd v Dobinson [1974] 1 All ER 484, [1974] Ch 102, [1974] 2 WLR 143.

Council of Civil Service Unions v Minister for the Civil Service [1984] 3 All ER 935, [1985] AC 374, [1984] 3 WLR 1174, HL.

Établissements Georges et Paul Levy v Adderley Navigation Co Panama SA [1980] 2 Lloyd's Rep 67.

Heywood v BDC Properties Ltd (No 2) [1964] 2 All ER 702, [1964] 1 WLR 971, CA.

Norman v Hardy [1974] 1 All ER 1170, [1974] 1 WLR 1048.

Northern Developments (Holdings) Ltd v UDT Securities Ltd [1977] 1 All ER 747, [1976] 1 WLR 1230.
Nye (CL) Ltd, Re [1970] 3 All ER 1061, [1971] Ch 442, [1970] 3 WLR 158, CA.
Oyston v Blaker [1996] 2 All ER 106, [1996] 1 WLR 1236, CA.

Claim

By a claim form issued on 6 November 2002 under CPR Pt 8, the claimant, igroup Ltd, sought, as a person interested, the rectification or amendment of a number of prescribed forms delivered by the first to ninth defendants, Ocwen (an unlimited company), igroup2 Ltd, igroup3 Ltd, igroup4 Ltd, igroup5 Ltd, igroup6 Ltd, Originated Mortgage Loans 1 plc, Originated Mortgage Loans 2 plc and Originated Mortgage Loans 3 plc (collectively the defendant companies), to the tenth defendant, the Registrar of Companies. The defendant companies, which were subsidiary and associated companies of the claimant, supported the application, and were not represented. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Matthew Shankland (barrister) of Weil, Gotshal & Manges for the claimant.
Richard Snowden QC (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the registrar.

Cur adv vult

23 October 2003. The following judgment was delivered.

LIGHTMAN J.

INTRODUCTION

[1] This is the hearing of a Pt 8 claim by igroup Ltd (the claimant), as a person interested, seeking rectification or amendment of a number of forms 395 and 403b prescribed by the Companies (Forms) Regulations 1985, SI 1985/854 (the Forms) that were delivered to the Registrar of Companies (the registrar) on behalf of the first to ninth defendant companies. The defendant companies are its subsidiary and associated companies and support the application. The claimant's case is that the schedules attached to the Forms contained some unnecessary (but entirely accurate) personal information relating to their customers (the Customers) whose mortgages were the subject matter of the charges in question. The claimant asks for an order that the schedules to the forms 395 simply be removed altogether and that the schedules to the forms 403b be replaced by new schedules. The tenth defendant, the registrar, opposes the application. The issue before the court is whether the court has jurisdiction to make such an order either under s 404 of the Companies Act 1985 (the Act) or its inherent jurisdiction. References in this judgment to sections are to sections in the Act.

[2] The claimant has been represented by Mr Matthew Shankland and the registrar by Mr Richard Snowden QC. They have both afforded me invaluable assistance in deciding this case.

FACTS

[3] The claimant and the defendant companies carry on the business of mortgage lending to Customers who are members of the public. In the course of that business, the defendant companies borrowed moneys from various banks and gave security to the banks by way of debentures. The debentures charged the defendant companies' rights and interests under the mortgages which they held over the Customers' properties. Prescribed particulars of the charges were duly delivered to the registrar in accordance with s 395 of the Act. The forms were drafted in sufficiently general terms as to disclose no personal information about the Customers.

[4] From June 1999 the defendant companies carried out a securitisation programme which involved the equitable assignment of their interest in the mortgage loans to a number of special purpose vehicles. As part of this process, the solicitors instructed on behalf of the defendant companies sent to the registrar the Forms, being various forms 403b relating to deeds of release of certain properties from the charges that the defendant companies had previously given to their lenders and various forms 395 relating to new charges which they had granted to lending banks or security trustees. The Forms referred to and had attached to them a number of schedules (the Schedules) that not merely accurately identified the properties released from the charges or which were the subject of the new charges, but also variously contained entirely accurate personal information relating to the Customers such as their names, their addresses, the prices paid for their properties, the original advances, the current balances of their mortgage loans, the payment dates, the monthly payment amounts and the interest rates charged (the Information). For whatever reason the solicitors who prepared the Forms plainly took a deliberate decision to use schedules supplied by the claimant containing the Information (namely the Schedules) and to refer to those Schedules in the body of the Forms. They could have prepared forms acceptable to the registrar using different schedules that did not contain the Information, as the defendant companies had done on their applications for registration made prior to June 1999. But they did not do so. On receipt of the Forms, the registrar made appropriate entries on the register of charges of the particulars referred to in s 401(1) and the memoranda of satisfaction referred to in s 403(1). There is no suggestion that such entries were inaccurate or incomplete in any way.

[5] On learning of the disclosure in the Forms of the Information the claimant commenced these proceedings. The particular concern of the claimant prompting the proceedings is not so much prejudice to the claimant or the defendant companies, although the claimant's evidence suggests that they might suffer prejudice if competitors or others seek to use the Information to market products to the Customers without their consent. No suggestion is made that this has actually happened. The claimant's real concern is for the Customers, and in particular to mitigate the consequences of the disclosure already made. Such mitigation is considered to be called for because the disclosure may constitute a breach by the claimant or the defendant companies of duties owed to the Customers of confidence and under the Data Protection Act 1998 or an interference with the Customers' human rights. The claimant relies on the possible existence of these breaches of duty and the possible interference in support of the contention that the court has jurisdiction to order the deletion of the Information from the Forms and Schedules and should exercise that jurisdiction. The registrar disputes that the court has the jurisdiction to make any such order.

THE STATUTORY PROVISIONS

[6] Chapter 1 of Pt XII of the Act contains the statutory provisions relating to registration of companies' charges with the registrar and in the chargor companies' registers of charges. Part XXIV sets out the functions of the registrar in relation to the keeping of company records. Both Parts are relevant on this application.

(a) Registration with the registrar

[7] Section 395(1) provides that certain (in fact most) charges created by a company registered in England and Wales shall be void:

> '... unless the prescribed particulars of the charge together with the instrument (if any) by which the charge is created or evidenced, are delivered to or received by the [registrar] for registration in the manner required by this Chapter within 21 days after the date of the charge's creation.'

[8] The 1985 regulations provide in reg 4(2) that the particulars prescribed for the purposes of s 395(1) are the particulars contained in Pt I of Sch 4 and in particular form 395. Form 395, headed 'Particulars of a mortgage or charge' pursuant to s 395, requires the form to be completed by inserting the company number, the name of the company, the date of creation of the mortgage or charge, the description of the instrument (if any) creating or evidencing the amount secured by it, the names and addresses of the mortgagees or persons entitled to it and short particulars of the property mortgaged or charged.

[9] Section 401(1) provides for the registrar to keep a register in prescribed form, of all charges requiring registration under Pt XII, Ch 1 of the Act. It provides as follows:

> '401. Register of charges to be kept by registrar of companies.—(1) The registrar of companies shall keep, with respect to each company, a register in the prescribed form of all the charges requiring registration under this Chapter; and he shall enter in the register with respect to such charges the following particulars—(a) in the case of a charge to the benefit of which the holders of a series of debentures are entitled, the particulars specified in section 397(1) [including the total amount secured by the whole series, the date of the resolution authorising the issue of the series and the date of the covering deed (if any) by which the security is created or defined, a general description of the property charged, and the names of the trustees (if any) for the debenture holders], (b) in the case of any other charge—(i) if it is a charge created by the company, the date of its creation, and if it is a charge which was existing on property acquired by the company, the date of the acquisition of the property, and (ii) the amount secured by the charge, and (iii) short particulars of the property charged, and (iv) the persons entitled to the charge.'

Section 401(2) provides that the registrar shall give a certificate of any charge registered in pursuance of the Chapter and that such certificate shall be conclusive evidence that the requirements of the Chapter as to registration have been satisfied.

[10] Section 403 provides that the registrar, on receipt of a statutory declaration in the prescribed form verifying the satisfaction (in whole or in part) of the secured debt or the release of part of the charged property from the charge, may enter on the register a 'memorandum of satisfaction'.

[11] Section 404 contains the statutory provision for rectification of the register. The provision is concerned with 'rectification' of the register (though, not exclusively rectification). This is clear not merely by reason of the terms of the sub-heading to s 404, but because of the concluding words of sub-s (2). It is of course also concerned with extensions of time for registration. Section 404 provides as follows:

> 'Rectification of register of charges.—(1) The following applies if the court is satisfied that the omission to register a charge within the time required by this Chapter or that the omission or mis-statement of any particular with respect to any such charge or in a memorandum of satisfaction was accidental, or due to inadvertence or to some other sufficient cause, or is not of a nature to prejudice the position of creditors or shareholders of the company, or that on other grounds it is just and equitable to grant relief.
>
> (2) The court may, on the application of the company or a person interested, and on such terms and conditions as seem to the court just and expedient, order that the time for registration shall be extended or, as the case may be, that the omission or mis-statement shall be rectified.'

(b) Registration in the chargor company's register

[12] Section 407 requires every limited company to keep at its registered office a register of charges and to enter on it all charges specifically affecting property of the company. The entry must in each case give a short description of the property charged, the amount of the charge and (except in case of securities to bearer) the names of the persons entitled to it. Failure to register does not invalidate a charge, but an officer of the company knowingly or wilfully authorising or permitting the omission of an entry required to be made in pursuance of the section is liable to a fine. Section 408 provides that creditors and members of the company have a right to inspect any instrument creating a charge requiring registration under the Chapter and the register of charges shall be open to inspection by any person.

(c) Registrar's records

[13] Section 707A of the Act requires the registrar to keep the originals of documents delivered to the registrar for ten years and s 709 entitles anyone to inspect the records kept by the registrar for the purposes of the Act, and this includes the original of any document delivered to the registrar where the record kept by the registrar of the contents of the document is illegible or unavailable. These provisions apply to forms (and accordingly schedules to forms) submitted to the registrar on an application for registration of a mortgage or charge. As a matter of practice and quite exceptionally the registrar does not keep the original charge documents or copies of them and accordingly these are not available for inspection. A creditor or member may however, as I have already said, inspect copies of the charge documents at the company's registered office and in principle anyone should be entitled to inspect the charge documents if registered at the Land Registry (see the Land Registration Act 2002).

JURISDICTION UNDER s 404

[14] It is plain on a reading of s 404 that the jurisdiction to order rectification under s 404 only exists if (i) there has been an 'omission or mis-statement' and (ii) that omission or mis-statement has been 'of any particular with respect to any such charge or in a memorandum of satisfaction'. I must consider whether these two conditions are satisfied in this case beginning with the second of the conditions.

[15] There is no complaint of any omission, but of mis-statement. The 'mis-statement' of which complaint is made by the claimant is not in respect of any entry on the face of the register of charges, but in the Forms and the Schedules. The issue accordingly arises whether the jurisdiction of the court under s 404 is restricted to entries on the face of the register of charges or extends to the Forms and the Schedules thereto.

[16] Notwithstanding Mr Shankland's submissions to the contrary I am satisfied that the references in s 404 to 'any particular with respect to any ... charge' and to 'a memorandum of satisfaction' are references to the particulars that the registrar is required to enter on the register of charges under s 401(1), and to the memorandum of satisfaction that the registrar may enter on the register of charges under s 403. The wording of s 404, 'any particular with respect to any ... charge' mirrors the wording in s 401(1), 'he shall enter in the register with respect to such charges the following particulars'. And a 'memorandum of satisfaction' can only be a reference to an entry made on the register of charges by the registrar under s 403, because the concept of a memorandum of satisfaction does not appear anywhere else. Accordingly, the power of rectification granted to the court by s 404 is limited to correcting mistakes of omission or commission in the entry of any particular with respect to a mortgage or charge or in a memorandum of satisfaction made by the registrar on the register of charges maintained by the registrar under s 401. It does not extend to mistakes otherwise than in a particular entered on the register and accordingly does not extend to the information particulars entered on a form 395 or a form 403b by or on behalf of an applicant for registration under s 395(1).

[17] Mr Shankland sought to overcome this hurdle by arguing that forms 395 and 403b are necessarily part of the register of charges or can be made part of the register of charges by the registrar choosing to enter certain of the particulars by reference to the Forms. In support of this contention the claimant prayed in aid the fact that the contents of the Forms may be necessary information to spell out and understand the full (or any) meaning from the particulars registered. In this context he referred to the note at the top of the pages of the register: 'Searchers may find it desirable to refer to the mortgage documents microfiche for more detailed particulars'; and the note on the Registry's website under the heading 'Company Charges and Mortgages' in relation to the process for registering charges: 'If you omit or mis-state any detail in the documents registered, then you should apply to the court to correct under section 404 of the Act: Rectification of the register of charges.'

[18] There is no basis in law for that submission. The mere fact that a (necessarily short) entry on the register of charges indicates that further details can be found in another document does not make that other document part of the register of charges. As Mr Snowden pointed out, it cannot, for example, sensibly be suggested that a reference on the register to a debenture makes that document part of the register and so empowers the court to rectify the debenture under s 404. Nor can the notes written by the registrar in an effort to provide helpful guidance operate to convert the material referred to into (in effect) a continuation sheet or addendum to the register.

[19] In a word, the Forms are not part of the register of charges and s 404 of the Act has no application to the Forms or the Schedules thereto, and the court has no jurisdiction under s 404 to rectify them. The Forms once received by the registrar under ss 707A and 709 have to be retained by the registrar as part of the records kept by the registrar and made available in copy or original form for inspection by any person. There is not merely absent any provision for 'rectification' of such documents: the provision for their preservation as part of the registrar's record and for their availability to public inspection is inconsistent with any amendment being made to them.

[20] I now turn to the question whether the first condition has been satisfied and accordingly whether there has been an omission or mis-statement within the meaning of s 404. As I have already said, the claimant does not contend that there has been any 'omission' from the Forms. Its case is that the inclusion of unnecessary information on the Forms is a 'mis-statement' within the meaning of s 404 because the inclusion (which rendered the Information available to the public) potentially was or potentially would occasion a breach of duty owed to the Customers. The proposition regarding a breach of duty was advanced in tentative form for reasons of self-preservation because the claimant does not wish to admit breach and expose itself and its associated companies to any liability to the Customers.

[21] I do not think that I really need be concerned with propositions advanced in such a tentative form. Since no case is made by the claimant that a breach of duty or interference has actually occurred, it cannot be part of my duty on this application to resolve whether it has or has not. Indeed it is scarcely practicable for me to do so without a positive case to this effect being advanced. In a word the claimant's case in this regard is embarrassing. The most I can do in respect of them is to say that, whilst the claimant may have reason to feel concern, on the evidence before me the existence of any breach of duty or infringement is far from obvious.

[22] The first suggested possible breach of a duty is of confidence owed by the claimant and defendant companies to the Customers in respect of the Information. The inclusion of the Information in the Forms or Schedules makes the Information publicly available, for the public have a right to inspect the Forms under ss 707A and 709. The evidence before me is insufficient to establish the existence of any duty of confidence owed by the claimant or the defendant companies to the Customers in respect of the Information. All I am told is the fact that the claimant and the defendant companies would not have wished the Information to have been included in the Forms or the Schedules and accordingly made publicly available if they had realised what was being done and that an alternative was available. I am far from satisfied that the claimant or the defendant companies assumed any duty of confidence in relation to the Information or that (if any duty was assumed) it precluded disclosure of the Information to the registrar in the way it was disclosed on registration of a sub-mortgage. In any event the registrar cannot have owed any duty of confidence to the Customers or have been concerned with the existence of any such confidence in performing faithfully her duties under the Act or have been concerned to filter out on registration information on the Forms or in the Schedules which may be confidential to third parties.

[23] The second suggested possible breach is of the Data Protection Act 1998. It is unnecessary to examine that complicated legislation in any detail. It is sufficient to say that it appears highly dubious whether the disclosure of the Information in the Forms by the defendant companies constituted any breach of its provisions. But in any event it is clear that there was no breach by the registrar in effecting the registration and retaining for inspection by the public the Forms and Schedules, for s 34 of the 1998 Act provides an exemption from the non-disclosure provisions if the data consists of information which the data controller is obliged (as the registrar is obliged) by or under any enactment to make available to the public for inspection.

[24] The third suggested possible breach is by the registrar of s 6 of the Human Rights Act 1998 which provides that it is unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a right under the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act). The relevant convention right is art 8(1) which provides that everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence. Article 8(2) provides an exception where the interference is necessary in the interests of the economic well-being of the country. The only authority cited in this context was the judgment of Maurice Kay J in R (on the application of Robertson) v Wakefield Metropolitan DC [2001] EWHC 915 (Admin), [2002] LGR 286, [2002] QB 1052. In Robertson's case it was held that for a public body to require electors to include their names and addresses on the electoral register and to adopt the practice of selling the register to commercial concerns without affording the individual elector a right of objection breached the electors' right to respect for his private life. The facts of the present case are far removed from those under consideration in that case. The Information has not been (as the information was in Robertson's case) exacted by a public authority for one purpose and then used or exploited for another. The Information is a form of a statement of the accounts between the defendant companies and their customers. I cannot think that disclosure of the Information for proper business purposes and in particular in pursuit of an obligation to register a charge can engage art 8(1). But in any event any interference with that right is surely justified as in accordance with law, necessary in the interests of the economic well-being of the country (the maintenance of an accurate and complete record of filings at Companies House) and proportionate. In particular it is necessary that the public have the means of access to information as to the subject matter of the charges granted by the defendant companies so that they can deal with those companies on a properly informed basis. That is the rationale for the registration provisions of the Act to which I have referred. I have considered whether it is significant for present purposes that the Forms and Schedules open to inspection in the case are more informative than they might have been. I have reached the conclusion that it is not significant. It cannot be a matter for the registrar to undertake the quite impossible task of deciding in the case of each application for registration whether or not apparently relevant information disclosed needs to be dispensed with. But in any event the rationale of the statutory provisions is that registration shall be informative. The fact that the registrar for good and practical reasons may perforce accept applications and forms which are less informative cannot mean that objection can be taken to acceptance of more informative forms and applications which more fully achieve the statutory objective.

[25] Accordingly there appears to me to be no substance in the suggestion that the disclosure or consequent public availability of the Information constitutes any form of wrongdoing by the defendant companies, still less the registrar. But in any event even if there were any such wrongdoing as is suggested, I cannot see how such wrongdoing could render the disclosure of the Information a 'mis-statement' entitling the court to exercise its jurisdiction to rectify the register under s 404. There is nothing stated which is erroneous or wrong and there is no allegation that there is. The complaint is about the telling of the truth.

[26] Accordingly for the reasons which I have given the court has no jurisdiction to grant relief claimed under s 404.

INHERENT JURISDICTION

[27] In the alternative the claimant contends that, if s 404 does not give the court jurisdiction to order rectification of the Forms and their Schedules, the court has an inherent jurisdiction to order such rectification. This submission is unmaintainable, for in the case of Exeter Trust Ltd v Screenways Ltd [1991] BCLC 888, the Court of Appeal expressly held that the existence of the limited statutory jurisdiction to order rectification under s 404 was wholly inconsistent with any suggestion that the court has any inherent power of rectification.

[28] The claimant seeks to escape from the decision in the Exeter Trust case by submitting that Re Calmex Ltd, Calmex Ltd v C Lila Ltd [1989] 1 All ER 485 is authority for the proposition that the court has an inherent jurisdiction to order the registrar to rectify documents held by the registrar; that the Exeter Trust case only decided that s 404 was a statutory fetter upon the exercise of that inherent jurisdiction in relation to the register of charges; and that the Court of Appeal in the Exeter Trust case referred to the Calmex case with approval. Neither of the first two propositions are correct. The Calmex case merely established (if ever authority were required for the proposition) that the court has a supervisory jurisdiction over the registrar and can in judicial review proceedings make orders enforcing the performance by the registrar of the registrar's public duties.

[29] The Calmex case was a case in which the company in question had been the subject of a winding-up order that had been forwarded to the registrar and entered on the registrar's records relating to the company in accordance with s 130(1) of the Insolvency Act 1986. It turned out that the winding-up order had been made entirely by mistake as a result of a confusion between similarly named companies, and that the company that had ostensibly been wound up had not even been served with the petition. Hoffmann J held that the proceedings and winding-up order were a complete nullity.

[30] Hoffmann J then went on to deal with the question whether an order could be made for the removal of the winding-up order from the registrar's records (see [1989] 1 All ER 485 at 488):

> 'Finally, counsel for the registrar submitted that the court had no jurisdiction to tell the registrar to remove documents from the register. I would be surprised if a company had no remedy against the registrar if he chose to include in the file a document which was prejudicial to the company and which he had no statutory duty to keep. And I have held that, on the true construction of s 130(1) of the 1986 Act, the registrar has no duty to retain entered in his records a winding-up order which the court has declared to be a nullity. I suspect that the remedy would be by way of judicial review, but counsel for the registrar said that the registrar did not wish to take any point on the procedure by which the matter has been brought before the court, but contended that even by way of judicial review there was no jurisdiction. In my judgment the court does in principle have jurisdiction according to ordinary public law principles to control the way in which the registrar carries out his statutory duties, subject to any specific exclusions of that jurisdiction or the evidence on which it could be founded, as in R v

Registrar of Companies, ex p Central Bank of India [1986] 1 All ER 105, [1986] QB 1114.'

[31] The Calmex case was a case dealing with the question of whether the registrar should retain in the registrar's records a particular document (namely the winding-up order) which was a nullity. It was not a case like the present dealing with whether it might be permissible to order the registrar to rectify or alter a document held by the registrar. Hoffmann J held that the registrar had no statutory duty to keep such a nullity and therefore should not do so. It was not a case like the present which is concerned with the question of how the registrar should deal with valid documents, namely the Forms and Schedules that had been duly delivered in accordance with the relevant legislation and properly relied upon by the registrar in the discharge of the registrar's statutory functions and which the registrar is under a statutory duty to retain as part of the registrar's records available for public inspection.

[32] In a word, Hoffmann J held in the Calmex case that the registrar had a statutory duty to remove from the registrar's records the nullity and the court in exercise of its supervisory jurisdiction would enforce that duty. In the present case, far from there being any public duty to rectify, the registrar is under a public duty to retain the Forms and Schedules in their present form. There are no grounds alleged or shown for invoking the court's jurisdiction by way of judicial review. The Calmex case accordingly affords no support for the proposition that the court has inherent jurisdiction to make the order sought.

CONCLUSION

[33] For the above reasons this application must be dismissed.

Application dismissed.

Celia Fox Barrister.

P v BW

[2003] EWHC 1541 (Fam)

FAMILY DIVISION

BENNETT J

5, 6, 18 JUNE, 2 JULY 2003

Child – Court proceedings in relation to child – Proceedings in private – Publication of information – Right to fair trial – Whether court proceedings in private in relation to child contrary to right to fair trial – Children Act 1989, s 97 – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 6, Family Proceedings Rules 1991, r 4.16(7).

Section 97(2)[a] of the Children Act 1989, which provides that no person shall publish any material which is intended to, or likely to, identify any child as being involved in legal proceedings in which any power under the 1989 Act may be exercised by the court with respect to that or any other child unless the court is satisfied that the welfare of the child requires it, is compatible with art 6(1)[b] of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) which provides for the right to a fair trial, including the right to a public hearing. Rule 4.16(7)[c] of the Family Proceedings Rules 1991, which provides that unless the court directs otherwise, a hearing of proceedings under the 1989 Act, or a directions appointment in proceedings under the 1989 Act, shall be in chambers, is in conformity with art 6 of the convention (see [46], [47], below); Re P-B (a minor) (child cases: hearing in open court) [1997] 1 All ER 58 and B v UK [2001] 2 FCR 221 considered; Clibbery v Allan [2002] 1 All ER 865 applied.

Notes

For privacy for children in proceedings and for the right to a public hearing, see 5(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 836 and 8(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 138, respectively.

For the Children Act 1989, s 97, see 6 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2003 reissue) 558.

For the Family Proceedings Rules 1991, r 4.16, see 12 Halsbury's Statutory Instruments (2002 issue) 154.

Cases referred to in judgment

Axen v Germany (1984) 6 EHRR 195, [1983] ECHR 8273/78, ECt HR.
B v UK [2001] 2 FCR 221, ECt HR.
Campbell v UK (1984) 7 EHRR 165, [1984] ECHR 7819/77, ECt HR.
Clibbery v Allan [2002] EWCA Civ 45, [2002] 1 All ER 865, [2002] 2 WLR 1511.
G (minors) (celebrities: publicity), Re [1999] 3 FCR 181, CA.
Handyside v UK (1976) 1 EHRR 737, [1976] ECHR 5493/72, ECt HR.
Klass v Germany (1978) 2 EHRR 214, [1978] ECHR 5029/71, ECt HR.
P-B (a minor) (child cases: hearing in open court), Re [1997] 1 All ER 58, CA.
Pretto v Italy (1984) 6 EHRR 182, [1983] ECHR 7984/77, ECt HR.
R (Court of Appeal: order against identification), Re [1999] 3 FCR 213, CA.

a Section 97, so far as material, is set out at [9], below
b Article 6, so far as material, is set out at [10], below
c Rule 4.16, so far as material, is set out at [17] below

R v Central Independent Television plc [1994] 3 All ER 641, [1994] Fam 192, [1994] 3 WLR 20, CA.
R v Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies, ex p New Cross Building Society [1984] 2 All ER 27, [1984] QB 227, [1984] 2 WLR 370, CA.
Riepan v Austria [2001] Crim LR 230, [2000] ECHR 35115/97, ECt HR.
Scott v Scott [1913] AC 417, [1911–13] All ER Rep 1, HL.
Silver v UK (1983) 5 EHRR 347, [1983] ECHR 5947/72, ECt HR.
Sutter v Switzerland (1984) 6 EHRR 272, [1984] ECHR 8209/78, ECt HR.
Szücs v Austria (1998) 26 EHRR 310, ECt HR.
Werner v Austria (1998) 26 EHRR 310, [1997] 21835/93, ECt HR.

Application

The applicant, P, applied in January 2003 for a joint residence order in respect of his infant child and for trial of the application in open court with public pronouncement of judgment and a declaration of incompatibility of s 97(2) of the Children Act 1989 with, inter alia, art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) and on 17 March 2003 for permission to apply for judicial review of, inter alia, r 4.16(7) of the Family Proceedings Rules 1991, as being incompatible with, inter alia, art 6(1) of the convention. The respondent, BW, the child's mother, opposed the applications. By order of Hughes J on 29 May 2003 the Crown was invited to be heard in the proceedings. Bennett J handed down judgment in the application for residence in private. The facts are set out in the judgment.

The applicant appeared in person.
The respondent appeared in person.
Stephen Cobb QC appeared for the Crown.

Cur adv vult

2 July 2003. The following judgment was delivered.

BENNETT J.

[1] In January 2003 the applicant, the child's father, applied for a joint residence order in respect of his 12-year-old son. The respondent, the child's mother, opposes it. In his application the applicant applied also for:

> '3. Trial in open court with public pronouncement of judgment
> 4. Declaration of incompatibility of s 97(2) of the Children Act, 1989, with arts 6 and 10 ECHR.'

By a supplementary application dated 17 March 2003 the applicant moved for an order of certiorari to quash r 4.16(7) of the Family Proceedings Rules 1991, SI 1991/1247, and rr 4.23(1) and 10.20(3) so far as they prevent disclosure or inspection respectively of Children Act judgments, without leave of the judge or the district judge. It was said that those rules are incompatible with arts 6(1) and 10(1) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998).

[2] On 5 June 2003 I heard argument on those applications from the applicant in person, the respondent in person and from Mr Stephen Cobb QC, who appeared on behalf of the Crown pursuant to an invitation by the court on 29 May 2003.

[3] This judgment on those and other legal issues is being handed down in open court but has been anonymised. I direct that nothing should be done or said which might lead to the identity of the child being revealed.

[4] It is appropriate to give a very short recitation of the background of this case. In 1986 the applicant and the respondent began to cohabit. In 1990 their child, who is the subject of these proceedings, was born. In January 1992 the applicant and the respondent married. The marriage quickly foundered. In 1995 the parties separated and the child thereafter lived with the respondent. The parties were divorced in December 1995. Proceedings were initiated in respect of the residence of the child. An application was made that the whole of the evidence, submissions and judgment should be in open court. The judge refused that application. The applicant appealed. His appeal was decided on 20 June 1996. The Court of Appeal dismissed it, see Re P-B (a minor) (child cases: hearing in open court) [1997] 1 All ER 58. In August 1996 the judge, having heard the evidence, decided that it was in the best interests of the child that a residence order should be granted to the respondent. The applicant did not seek to appeal that decision.

[5] The father was dissatisfied with the decision of the Court of Appeal and initiated an application to the European Court of Human Rights (the European Court) alleging a violation of his rights under arts 6 and 10 of the convention. His application was consolidated with another case and the two cases were orally argued on 14 November 2000. On 24 April 2001 the European Court gave its decision and found by a majority (five votes to two) that there had been no violation of art 6 and found unanimously that it was not necessary to consider separately the complaint under art 10 (see B v UK [2001] 2 FCR 221).

[6] Since the separation in 1995 the child has always lived with the respondent. The applicant had contact with the child from the separation until he voluntary chose not to have contact with the child between August 1996 and the beginning of 1999. Contact was then resumed. In early 2003 the father decided to initiate an application for joint residence and to challenge the validity of s 97 of the Children Act 1989.

[7] This judgment gives my reasons for (a) dismissing the applicant's applications with reference to a declaration of incompatibility with the convention, (b) why the argument in relation to the applications on the 5 June was heard in chambers, and (c) why this judgment has been anonymised and why the judgment in relation to the substantive issue of residence of the child will be given in chambers, ie privately.

[8] Section 4 of the Human Rights Act 1998 provides as follows:

> '(1) Subsection (2) applies in any proceedings in which a court determines whether a provision of primary legislation is compatible with a Convention right.
>
> (2) If the court is satisfied that the provision is incompatible with a Convention right, it may make a declaration of that incompatibility.'

[9] Section 97 of the 1989 Act provides as follows:

> '(1) Rules made under section 144 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980 may make provision for a magistrates' court to sit in private in proceedings in which any powers under this Act may be exercised by the court with respect to any child.

(2) No person shall publish any material which is intended, or likely, to identify—(a) any child as being involved in any proceedings before the High Court, a county court or a magistrates' court in which any power under this Act ... may be exercised by the court with respect to that or any other child; or (b) an address or school as being that of a child involved in any such proceedings.

(3) In any proceedings for an offence under this section it shall be a defence for the accused to prove that he did not know, and had no reason to suspect, that the published material was intended, or likely, to identify the child.

(4) The court or the Lord Chancellor may, if satisfied that the welfare of the child requires it, by order dispense with the requirements of subsection (2) to such extent as may be specified in the order.

(5) For the purposes of this section—"publish" includes:—(a) include in a programme service (within the meaning of the Broadcasting Act 1990); or (b) cause to be published; and "material" includes any picture or representation.

(6) Any person who contravenes this section shall be guilty of an offence and liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding level 4 on the standard scale.'

Subsections (7) and (8) are not germane.

[10] The applicant has submitted that that section infringes both arts 6 and 10 of the convention. Article 6(1) provides:

'In the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law. Judgment shall be pronounced publicly but the press and public may be excluded from all or part of the trial in the interests of morals, public order or national security in a democratic society, where the interests of juveniles or the protection of the private life of the parties so require, or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice.'

[11] Article 10 provides:

'1. Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers. This Article shall not prevent States from requiring the licensing of broadcasting, television or cinema enterprises.

2. The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary.'

[12] The applicant submitted that he wanted the proceedings to be in public. He is a 'victim' in that he is prevented by s 97 from publishing information identifying or likely to identify (a) his own child and (b) other children in other proceedings and which he does wish to publish as a writer, editor and communicator. He further submitted that he is a 'victim' because he is prevented from receiving information of this kind from those who would wish to impart it to him in relation to their own proceedings involving their children. He says he faces a threat of prosecution under s 97 of the 1989 Act as a result of publishing a pamphlet 'Contact', five issues of which he exhibited in the bundle of authorities placed before me. He submitted, in my judgment correctly, that s 97 applied to the proceedings which he launched in January 2003.

[13] He submitted that s 97 infringed both arts 6 and 10. There was no justification for invoking any of the exceptions either in art 6 or art 10. He drew to my attention a number of cases in particular R v Central Independent Television plc [1994] 3 All ER 641, [1994] Fam 192, Re G (minors) (celebrities: publicity) [1999] 3 FCR 181 and Re R (Court of Appeal: order against identification) [1999] 3 FCR 213. In particular he drew my attention to a passage in Re G [1999] 3 FCR 181 at 190 where Thorpe LJ said:

> 'The extent to which family proceedings in our jurisdiction are conducted in private hearings has been the subject of considerable recent criticism and there are powerful arguments for more openness.'

He also cited part of the judgment of Hoffmann LJ (as he then was) in R v Central Television [1994] 3 All ER 641 at 651–652, [1994] Fam 192 at 202–203:

> 'There are in the law reports many impressive and emphatic statements about the importance of the freedom of speech and the press. But they are often followed by a paragraph which begins with the word "nevertheless". The judge then goes on to explain that there are other interests which have to be balanced against press freedom. And in deciding upon the importance of press freedom in the particular case, he is likely to distinguish between what he thinks deserves publication in the public interest and things in which the public are merely interested. He may even advert to the commercial motives of the newspaper or television company compared with the damage to the public or individual interest which would be caused by publication. The motives which impel judges to assume a power to balance freedom of speech against other interests are almost always understandable and humane on the facts of the particular case before them. Newspapers are sometimes irresponsible and their motives in a market economy cannot be expected to be unalloyed by considerations of commercial advantage. And publication may cause needless pain, distress and damage to individuals or harm to other aspects of the public interest. But a freedom which is restricted to what judges think to be responsible or in the public interest is no freedom. Freedom means the right to publish things which government and judges, however well motivated, think should not be published. It means the right to say things which "right-thinking people" regard as dangerous or irresponsible. This freedom is subject only to clearly defined exceptions laid down by common law or statute. Furthermore, in order to enable us to meet our international obligations under the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Rome, 4 November 1950; TS 71 (1953); Cmd 8969), it is necessary that any exceptions should satisfy the tests laid down in art 10(2). They must be "necessary in a democratic society" and fall within certain permissible categories, namely—"in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, for maintaining the authority or impartiality of the judiciary." It cannot be too strongly emphasised that outside the established exceptions (or any new ones which Parliament may enact in accordance with its obligations under the convention) there is no question of balancing freedom of speech against other interests. It is a trump card which always wins.'

[14] He also drew my attention to para 97 of the judgment of the European Court in Silver v UK (1983) 5 EHRR 347 at 376–377 where it was said:

'On a number of occasions, the Court has stated its understanding of the phrase "necessary in a democratic society", the nature of its functions in the examination of issues turning on that phrase and the manner in which it will perform those functions. It suffices here to summarise certain principles: (a) the adjective "necessary" is not synonymous with "indispensable", neither has it the flexibility of such expressions as "admissible", "ordinary", "useful", "reasonable", or "desirable" [see Handyside v UK (1976) 1 EHRR 737 at 753–754 (para 48)]; (b) the Contracting States enjoy a certain but not unlimited margin of appreciation in the matter of the imposition of restrictions, but it is for the Court to give the final ruling on whether they are compatible with the Convention [para 49]; (c) the phrase "necessary in a democratic society" means that, to be compatible with the Convention, the interference must, inter alia, correspond to a "pressing social need" and be "proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued" [paras 48–49]; (d) those paragraphs of Article of the Convention which provide for an exception to a right guaranteed are to be narrowly interpreted [see Klass v Germany (1978) 2 EHRR 214 at 230–231 (para 42)].'

[15] He submitted that it would be for the Crown to justify why it would be necessary in a democratic society for hearings involving children to be held in private. He submitted that in Scotland courts routinely hear children cases in public and there is no restriction. Since therefore it was impossible for the Crown to justify any of the exceptions in arts 6 and 10 it would follow that s 97 of the 1989 Act should be declared incompatible with those provisions in the convention. He robustly challenged pronouncements of the courts that it is not in children's interests for matters about children to be heard in public. He submitted that there was no justification for saying that children would be embarrassed or teased or bullied as a result of publicity. To that end he called Mr O'Connor who, as I understood it from his evidence, has two children and is separated from their mother. He told me that his children had no concerns and were very relaxed, indeed almost excited, about being seen on television. They had not experienced any bullying or teasing and indeed their mother is a teacher at their school. They have suffered no distress he told me. His children are seven and five years old respectively.

[16] The second theme of the applicant's submissions was that the hearing should be in public and that r 4.16(7) of the 1991 rules was in direct contravention of arts 6 and 10 of the convention. He submitted that it was not an abuse of the process to re-litigate that matter even in the light of the decision of the European Court in his own case in 2001 to which I have already referred. He argued that as the original domestic proceedings took place in 1996 prior to the incorporation into English domestic law of the convention, I was not strictly bound by the decision of the European Court in respect of the present proceedings and that the decision of the European Court was inconsistent with other European Court jurisprudence and ought not to be followed. a

[17] Rule 4.16(7) of the 1991 rules provides as follows: 'Unless the court otherwise directs, a hearing of, or directions appointment in, proceedings to which this Part applies shall be in chambers.'

[18] The applicant emphasised, by reference to certain authorities, the importance of public proceedings. He drew my attention to Sutter v Switzerland (1984) 6 EHRR 272, and to a passage in the judgment of the European Court which said (at 277 (para 26)): b

> 'The public character of proceedings before the judicial bodies referred to in Article 6(1) protects litigants against the administration of justice in secret with no public scrutiny; it is also one of the means whereby confidence in the courts, superior and inferior, can be maintained. By rendering the administration of justice visible, publicity contributes to the achievement of the aim of Article 6(1), namely a fair trial, the guarantee of which is one of the fundamental principles of any democratic society, within the meaning of the Convention.' c d

He further referred me to the well-known passage in the speech of Lord Shaw of Dunfermline in Scott v Scott [1913] AC 417 at 477, [1911–13] All ER Rep 1 at 30, who said:

> 'It is needless to quote authority on this topic from legal, philosophical, or historical writers. It moves Bentham over and over again. "In the darkness of secrecy, sinister interest and evil in every shape, have full swing. Only in proportion as publicity has place can any of the checks applicable to judicial injustice operate. Where there is no publicity there is no justice." "Publicity is the very soul of justice. It is the keenest spur to exertion, and the surest of all guards against improbity. It keeps the judge himself while trying under trial."' e f

Lord Shaw further referred to the words of Hallam.

[19] The nub of the applicant's submission is contained in para 30 of his written submissions. I quote: g

> 'However, the Human Rights Act 1998 is in force and for the reason set out in the applications of P and B for referral to Grand Chamber of the adverse decision of the Third Chamber which upheld r 4.16(7) and the current practice, and for the reasons given in the dissenting judgment in the Third Chamber, it is submitted that the English courts are now bound by art 6(1) to make public trial the norm in child cases and without any exceptions at all to publicly pronounce judgment in them.' h

[20] Before turning to consider these submissions it is appropriate that I should refer to the Court of Appeal decision in Re P-B [1997] 1 All ER 58. In her judgment Butler-Sloss LJ (as she then was) said (at 60): j

> 'In support of his arguments he [ie the applicant] has relied upon a line of cases which set out the importance of open justice in the courts and in particular upon the decision in Scott v Scott ... In that case the House of Lords considered the jurisdiction to hear a nullity suit in camera. The principle of the open administration of justice was clearly and trenchantly asserted in the speeches ... Viscount Haldane LC said: "While the broad principle is that the Courts of this country must, as between parties, administer justice in public, this principle is subject to apparent exceptions, such as those to which I have referred. But the exceptions are themselves the outcome of a yet more fundamental principle that the chief object of Courts of justice must be to secure that justice is done. In the two cases of wards of Court and of lunatics the Court is really sitting primarily to guard the interests of the ward or the lunatic. Its jurisdiction is in this respect parental and administrative, and the disposal of controverted questions is an instant only in the jurisdiction. It may often be necessary, in order to attain its primary object, that the Court should exclude the public. The broad principle which ordinarily governs it therefore yields to the paramount duty, which is the care of the ward or the lunatic." (See [1913] AC 417 at 437, [1911–13] All ER Rep 1 at 9.) The appellant recognised the long-established procedure in wardship and sought to distinguish the hearing of wardship cases in private from all other children cases. He is not, in my view, able to sustain that distinction. The paramount duty expressed by Viscount Haldane LC is now found in s 1 of the 1989 Act in words very similar to the previous Guardianship of Minors Acts, that "the welfare of the child shall be the court's paramount consideration" ... The appellant relied also upon the views of several members of the judiciary given in lectures or articles in support of hearing children cases in open court ... However, to my knowledge, there is no judgment to the effect that a court should always or even regularly hear family cases in public. The practice in children cases has been and is to the contrary despite the views of some judges which are irrelevant to the decision we have to make as to the meaning and proper application of para (7) (of r 4.16 of the 1991 rules).'

[21] Butler-Sloss LJ continued (at 61):

'The appellant has also addressed us upon the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ... and has suggested that family proceedings in the English jurisdiction are in conflict with arts 6 and 10 of the Convention.'

Butler-Sloss LJ then set out the relevant provisions of arts 6 and 10 and continued:

'It would seem to me that the present procedures in family proceedings are in accordance with the spirit of the convention. The long-established practice in the English High Court and county court hearing applications for custody/access, (now called residence/contact) or wardship has been and remains to hear the whole of the evidence in private. In the High Court, which hears the more difficult cases and those which create public interest, judgment will often be given in public either in part or in whole where the court believes there to be a public interest in the case or to give guidance to practitioners.'

[22] Butler-Sloss LJ concluded her judgment (at 62):

'In answer to the appellant's second point that the exercise of discretion should always be in favour of hearings in open court, it would seem to me that he is directing his arguments to the wrong forum. The wording of para (7) is clear. The exercise of discretion remains in the hands of the trial judge and it is a matter for the judge in each case to exercise that discretion if called upon to do so. In the absence of an application to hear the case in open court and unusual circumstances, the normal position would remain, as recognised by the wording of the sub-paragraph, that the evidence would be heard in private.'

[23] In the European Court the applicant and his co-applicant alleged 'violations of their rights to a public hearing and public pronouncement of judgment under art 6(1) of the convention and of their right to freedom of expression under art 10' (see the court's judgment in B v UK [2001] 2 FCR 221 at 224 (para 3)). Between paras 19 and 22 (at 227–228) the European Court set out the facts underlying the application of the applicant. The European Court (at 228–230 (paras 23–26)) referred to the hearing and judgment in the Court of Appeal and the outcome of the case in front of the county court judge in August 1996.

[24] The European Court briefly summarised (at 232–233 (para 34)) the submissions of the applicant, namely that the public's right to attend the hearing was an essential safeguard against judicial arbitrariness and helped maintain confidence in the administration of justice. Openness was particularly important in cases involving the residence of children in view of the wide discretion afforded to judges, the inevitability that judges decide such cases in accordance with their own personal values and morality, and the heavy reliance placed on the views of court welfare officers. The court noted that his application for residence was 'run of the mill' but he nevertheless submitted that, even as such, it merited exposure to public scrutiny.

[25] The European Court's majority judgment was as follows (at 233–234):

'38. The proceedings which the present applicants wished to take place in public concerned the residence of each man's son following the parents' divorce or separation. The Court considers that such proceedings are prime examples of cases where the exclusion of the press and public may be justified in order to protect the privacy of the child and parties and to avoid prejudicing the interest of justice. To enable the deciding judge to gain as full and accurate a picture as possible of the advantages and disadvantages of the various residence and contact options open to the child, it is essential that the parents and other witnesses feel able to express themselves candidly on highly personal issues without fear of public curiosity or comment.

39. The applicants submit that the presumption in favour of a private hearing in cases under the Children Act should be reversed. However, while the Court agrees that art 6(1) states a general rule that civil proceedings, inter alia, should take place in public, it does not find it inconsistent with this provision for a state to designate an entire class of case as an exception to the general rule where considered necessary in the interests of morals, public order or national security or where required by the interests of juveniles or the protection of the private life of the parties (see Campbell v UK (1984) 7 EHRR 165, paras 86–87), although the need for such a measure must always be subject to the Court's control (see, for example Riepan v Austria [2001] Crim LR 230, [2000] ECHR 35115/97 (para 34)). The English procedural law can therefore be seen as a specific reflection of the general exceptions provided for by art 6(1).

40. Furthermore, the English tribunals have a discretion to hold Children Act proceedings in public if merited by the special features of the case, and the judge must consider whether or not to exercise his or her discretion in this respect if requested by one of the parties. Turning to the facts before it, the > Court notes that ... In the second applicant's case [I interpolate ie the applicant in the instant case] the judges at first instance and on appeal gave careful consideration and detailed explanations of their reasons for holding that the proceedings should continue in chambers (see paras 21 and 23 above).

>
> 41. In conclusion, therefore the Court does not consider that the decision in each applicant's case to hold the hearing of his application for the residence of his son in chambers gave rise to a violation of art 6(1) of the Convention.'

[26] So far as art 10 was concerned, the court referred to its findings in connection with art 6(1) ([2001] 2 FCR 221 at 236 (para 52)) and did not find it necessary to examine the complaint under art 10 separately.

[27] Sir Nicolas Bratza agreed with the majority of the court in finding that there had been no violation of the convention. As to the complaint concerning the holding of the proceedings in private he fully shared the reasoning of the majority (at 237):

> '... the decisive point in my view being in that both cases the county court judge exercised his independent discretion to exclude the public from the substantive hearing in the interests of the children concerned.'

[28] The dissenting opinion of two of the seven judges of the European Court was to the effect that private hearings can be justified only if the needs of the particular case so demand and that has to be decided by the court in any specific case where such an issue arises. The exceptional decision to hold a private hearing cannot be decided in abstracto or by reference to a category of cases; it must be determined in concreto by reference to the particular facts of a case. The dissentients wholly disagreed with the view of the majority that a state can designate an entire class of case as an exception to a general rule. Furthermore the dissentients were of the view that the decisions to hold private hearings in the applications in front of them were not taken by reference to any specific facts applicable to the relevant proceedings, but were the direct result of implementing a general rule of law in the absence of any concrete criteria. They believe that the legal ruling in England to the effect that unless the court otherwise directs hearings of family cases should be in camera is the reverse of what art 6 demands, namely that in civil proceedings the hearings must be held in public unless the court (and not any general rule of law) decides, exceptionally, in the light of the particular facts nature or circumstances of the concrete case before it to exclude the press or public from all or part of the trial on any of the grounds specified in art 6.

[29] It was accordingly submitted by the applicant before me that the correct approach of 'trial courts' is only to accede to a request for the trial or part of it to be in chambers if the child's interests or the protection of the private life of the parties positively required that or if the interests of justice would otherwise be prejudiced. The test was a high one. Special reasons now had to be given to justify departure from the principle of open justice. Mere discomfort or embarrassment or loss of privacy was not enough; there had to be such harm that no reasonable citizen fully instructed in democratic principles rights and duties could be expected none the less to participate in a public trial.

[30] The applicant put before me the requests of himself and of his co-applicant before the European Court for referral of the decision of the Third Chamber to the Grand Chamber, pursuant to the provisions of art 43 of the Rules of Court of the European Court of Human Rights. The request in both the applicant and the co-applicant's case, was refused on 5 September 2001. The applicant submitted to me that the majority had not decided the case by reference to the particular facts, that there had been a fundamental departure from the normal canons of interpretation of the court and to put it generally, was wrong. In other words he sought to reopen in front of me the very points that had been decided adversely to him by the European Court in 2001. He sought to persuade me that I should reject the reasoning of the majority of the Third Chamber and follow the reasoning of the dissentient minority. So far as the request for referral to the Grand Chamber of his co-applicant was concerned he specifically relied upon para 3(b), namely that the Third Chamber's decision that art 6(1) allowed a state to designate an entire class of cases as an exception to the general rule was clearly contrary to the wording of art 6(1) and was well beyond any permissible restriction to the right to a public hearing accepted by the European Court to date.

[31] At the conclusion of the submissions of the applicant the respondent indicated that she was content to wait and listen to the submissions of Mr Cobb and to see if she wished to add anything to them.

[32] Mr Cobb began his submissions by reminding me that the Crown was not a party to the proceedings as such and that he had no instructions to ask for the Crown to be joined straight away. He had attended pursuant to the request of Hughes J expressed in his order of 29 May 2003.

[33] He made two general submissions. The first went to the application for a declaration of incompatibility. He submitted that there was nothing in the 1989 Act which absolutely prevented publication of material intended or likely to identify any child as being involved in any proceedings before the courts. It was only if the court refused to exercise its discretion to permit publication was there a ban on publication of such material. He pointed out that r 4.16(7) also involved the court exercising its discretion. Similarly with rr 4.23 and 10.20(3), he submitted that there was nothing in any of the above rules which prevented publication in the right case, ie where the court gave its leave. He reminded me that art 6 spoke of not just a 'public hearing' but a 'fair and public hearing'. 'Fair' could mean, in an appropriate case, without the threat of public gaze and/or publicity. Article 8 of the convention gave a right to respect for private and family life. That was, in the appropriate case, a counterbalance to a public hearing provided for in art 6. He submitted that if the presumption in English law, namely that children cases are to be heard in private unless the court permit otherwise, was to be reversed, that could lead to delay. There could be many applications by worried and distraught parents to the court to restrict publicity. Litigation could become more uncertain. Costs would be likely to increase.

[34] The second general observation was to the effect that the answers to the applications of the applicant, both as to incompatibility and that hearings should be in public, were to be found in the decision of the European Court in B v UK decided in 2001, to which I have already referred extensively. He accepted that s 97 of the 1989 Act was not referred to in that decision. But he pointed out that s 12 of the Administration of Justice Act 1960 was referred to (see the decision of the majority [2001] 2 FCR 221 at 231 (para 30)) which provides that the publication of information relating to proceedings before any court sitting in private would not of itself be a contempt of court except in relation to, inter alia, proceedings brought under the 1989 Act. Mr Cobb therefore submitted that it would be wholly artificial to say that because s 97 of the 1989 Act was not addressed by the European Court in 2001 the issue of its compatibility with the convention was at large.

[35] Mr Cobb submitted that the legal issues in front of me were identical to the issues in front of the European Court in 2001. He took me through a number of paragraphs of the decision of the majority in an endeavour to make that submission good. It is quite apparent that he is correct in that submission. The same case that has been put to me by the applicant was put to the European Court by the applicant and his co-applicant in 2000 and 2001 and was rejected by the majority. In his submission the decision disposes of the applicant's application in this case both as to incompatibility of s 97 and of his application that the matter should be heard in open court.

[36] Mr Cobb further referred me Clibbery v Allan [2002] EWCA Civ 45, [2002] 1 All ER 865, [2002] 2 WLR 1511. It is common ground that that case did not involve children. The woman in the case sought a non-molestation order against the man and an occupation order in respect of a flat. The hearing was conducted in chambers. Newspaper articles appeared giving the woman's view of the facts including direct quotations from the man's sworn written evidence. The man argued, on his application for a continuation of ex parte injunctions, that chambers proceedings in the Family Division were held in private for substantive and substantial reasons, and that matters relating to proceedings held in chambers should not be made public. The judge dismissed the application and discharged the injunction. The man appealed. There were three main issues in the case (see the judgment of Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss P at [2002] 1 All ER 865 at [14]) one of which is relevant to the instant case, namely whether proceedings held in chambers are private in the sense that the public can properly be excluded. That issue was discussed by Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss P between [16] and [50] inclusive of her judgment. She said:

> '[47] Part IV of the 1991 rules deals with children applications under the Children Act 1989. There is no disagreement that children applications fall to be determined in private. Confidentiality in wardship cases was specifically recognised in Scott v Scott ([1913] AC 417 [1911–13] All ER Rep 1), and s 12(1)(a) of the Administration of Justice Act 1960 treated children cases as an exception to the general rule of publication of court proceedings; see below. The procedure in children cases is set out in careful detail in the 1991 rules and the confidentiality of all aspects of the proceedings, the evidence of the parties, the reports filed, and the documents disclosed is specifically provided for in r 4.23, headed "Confidentiality of documents".'

She then set out r 4.16(7). She continued:

> '[48] The public is almost always excluded from children proceedings which almost invariably remain confidential, subject to judgments, made suitably anonymous in cases of wider interest, being given in public or made available for publication.'

[37] Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss P said under 'The European Convention for Human Rights':

> '[81] In my judgment there is nothing in art 6 of the convention which requires all cases, willy nilly, to be heard in open court. To hear them in private and to debar publication of the proceedings heard in private must be necessary in a democratic society and proportionate to that necessity. The European Court recognised in B v UK [2001] 2 FCR 221 that the art 6 requirements to hold a public hearing was subject to exceptions.'

She quoted para 37 of the decision of the European Court ([2001] 2 FCR 221 at 233) and continued:

> 'The Human Rights Act 1998 and the European jurisprudence underline our own long-established principles of open justice which are entirely in conformity with the convention and which our exceptions do not, in my judgment, breach.'

[38] I accept that Thorpe LJ did not specifically refer to [81] of Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss P's decision. In his judgment ([2002] 1 All ER 865 at [86]) he said he had had the advantage of reading in draft the judgment of Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss P and he was in complete agreement with the first 51 paragraphs. He had nothing to add on the issue. On a fair reading of the Thorpe LJ's judgment I can see nothing in it whatsoever which in any way questions Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss P's dicta at [81].

[39] Keene LJ agreed that the appeal should be dismissed for the reasons given by Dame Butler-Sloss P. He said:

> '[123] On the topic of hearings taking place in public or private, I would endorse the need to scrutinise more closely than has happened in practice in the past whether a hearing in private can be justified. Of course, in many cases in the Family Division, especially those involving children, there can be no doubt that the hearings should take place in private, and this situation is reflected in the Family Proceedings Rules 1991 ...'

[40] Mr Cobb submitted that the passages that I have quoted were powerful dicta, albeit not the ratio of that case, which I cannot ignore. He submitted that the Court of Appeal has adopted the reasoning and decision of the European Court in B v UK. He further submitted it would be perverse to rely at this hearing on the minority judgment of the European Court, and upon the arguments addressed in the requests for referral to the Grand Chamber which were turned down on 5 September 2001.

[41] I am indebted to the applicant for having produced to me the relevant rules of the European Court. Rule 24, 5(a) provides that the panel of five judges of the Grand Chamber called upon to consider requests under art 43 are to be composed of the President of the European Court, the presidents or vice-presidents of the sections other than the section which was constituted the chamber that dealt with the case and one further judge designated in rotation from among the judges other than those who dealt with the case in the chamber. It therefore appears that the five judges who considered the request of the applicant and co-applicant for a referral to the Grand Chamber consisted of judges who were not the judges who sat and decided the case of the applicant and co-applicant in the Third Chamber.

[42] The respondent in her submissions adopted the submissions of Mr Cobb and urged me to hear the matter as to residence in private. She reminded me that none of the previous litigation involving the child had been heard in open court and that it was not in the interests of the child for the matter now to be heard in public. In cross-examination she said that had the hearing been in open court she would not have withdrawn from the case.

[43] At the conclusion of those arguments I rose and considered the matter further in my room. I returned to court and stated that for the reasons which I would give in a judgment at a later date I refused the applications of the applicant in relation to the declaration of incompatibility and for the hearing of evidence and submissions to be heard in public. I indicated that I would hear the parties at the conclusion of the hearing whether the judgment on the applicant's applications which I had just refused and on his application for residence in respect of the child was to be given in public or private or partly in public and partly in private and whether, if in public they should be anonymised. I further indicated that I would give my reasons why I had excluded the public from the application of the applicant that his arguments about the case being heard in public should themselves be heard publicly.

[44] Section 2(1) of the Human Rights Act 1998 provides:

> '2. Interpretation of Convention Rights.—(1) A court or tribunal determining a question which has arisen in connection with a Convention right must take into account any—(a) judgment, decision, declaration or advisory opinion of the European Court of Human Rights ... whenever made or given, so far as, in the opinion of the court or tribunal, it is relevant to the proceedings in which that question has arisen.'

[45] It follows that the court determining the application for a declaration of incompatibility of s 97 and for the hearing to be heard in public must take into account the decision of the European Court in B v UK to which I have extensively referred.

[46] In the instant case there seems to me to be a number of important factors. First, the Court of Appeal in Re P-B (a minor) (child cases: hearing in open court) [1997] 1 All ER 58 stated that r 4.16(7) was within the spirit of the convention and that it reflected a long-established practice in the High Court and county court of hearing children cases in private. Second, the majority of the European Court in B v UK specifically stated that r 4.16(7) was not inconsistent with art 6(1) of the convention. Third, as I read the decision of the majority of the court, the decision was specifically in relation to the facts of the case of the applicant and to the facts of his co-applicant. Fourth, the European Court said that the judge in each case had specifically exercised control over the proceedings in that it had exercised its discretion, as had, in the case of the applicant, the Court of Appeal, and as in the case of the co-applicant, by the single judge on seeking leave to appeal. Fifth, the request for a referral of the decision to the Grand Chamber was refused by a panel of judges who had no connection with the applications to the European Court, in conformity with the European Court's rules. Sixth, the Court of Appeal in Clibbery v Allan specifically adopted or endorsed the European Court's approach to children's cases. I agree that the dicta in that case, in so far as they refer to children cases, were strictly speaking obiter but none the less they are highly persuasive. Seventh, in any event, and with respect, I agree with the judgment of the majority and the observations in the concurring judgment of Sir Nicolas Bratza in B v UK. Eighth, I reject the applicant's contention that B v UK is contrary to earlier European Court jurisprudence. Earlier authorities, to which the applicant has referred, were specifically cited to the European Court. If the applicant's contention is correct, then it is surprising, to say the least, that the request for referral to the Grand Chamber was dismissed. Ninth, I agree with Mr Cobb that s 97 of the 1989 Act is not an absolute prohibition and the court can be specifically asked to exercise its discretion to permit the identity of the child to be published. If the court is not asked to exercise its discretion or, is asked to exercise its discretion but declines to do so, then s 97(2) bites and the material there referred to cannot be published. Tenth, whilst the dicta in the decisions of the English courts and of the European Court referred to in [13], [14], and [18], hereinbefore, must be given all due respect, the fact is that those authorities are not directly concerned with the issues before me and cannot outweigh or override the Court of Appeal's decision in Re P-B, the European Court's decision in B v UK, and the dicta of the Court of Appeal in Clibbery v Allan. Eleventh, in reality the arguments addressed to me by the applicant were put to the European Court and rejected.

[47] It therefore seems to me that the submissions of the applicant as to declaration of incompatibility are bound to fail. Accordingly I dismiss the applicant's application for such a declaration. Furthermore, in my judgment, for the reasons that I have endeavoured to give, r 4.16(7) is in conformity with art 6 of the convention. So far as any alleged violation of art 10 of the convention is concerned I propose to adopt the reasoning of the European Court ([2001] 2 FCR 221 at 236 (para 52)), namely in the light of findings which I have made I do not find it necessary to examine the complaint under art 10 separately. Further, it seems to me that the applicant's application for certiorari in relation to rr 4.16(7), 4.23(1) and 10.20(3) of the 1991 rules made in his supplemental application of 17 March 2003 are doomed to failure and accordingly I refuse the applicant permission to apply for judicial review.

[48] However that does not dispose of the matter because it is essential that I exercise my discretion as provided for under r 4.16(7). In my judgment it would be a wholly faulty exercise of discretion to allow the evidence and submissions in the joint residence application to have been heard in public. I say that for the following reasons. First, so far as the child in this case and his parents are concerned all matters in the English courts in relation to him specifically have so far been heard in chambers, or if they have been heard in public then they have been heard in public only in respect of legal matters and in any event suitably anonymised. Second, both the respondent and the child could legitimately expect that that practice would continue in this application. I specifically refer myself to art 8 of the convention which provides for the protection of the privacy of the child. Third, in order for me to gain as full and as accurate a picture as possible of this case, of the facts, and of the options available to me it is, in my judgment, essential that the parents, the children and family reporter and other witnesses should feel able to express themselves candidly on highly personal issues without fear of public curiosity or comment. Fourth, in the instant case there has been a breakdown in the relationship between the applicant and the child such that the child does not wish to see the applicant, at least for the moment. In my judgment, for the hearing as to joint residence to be in public would be contrary to the child's best interests and might well have the effect of widening rather than healing the breach between the applicant and his child. Fifth, the applicant specifically accepted that his case as to joint residence was 'run of the mill' and that there were no exceptional or unusual features. Sixth, the practice embodied in r 4.16(7) is long established and should not be lightly disregarded. I should say, in that connection, that although I heard the evidence of Mr O'Connor I did not find it helpful or persuasive.

[49] Accordingly I ruled that the evidence and submissions should be heard in private.

[50] At the conclusion of the evidence and submissions in relation to joint residence on 6 June 2003 I indicated to the applicant and respondent that I was minded, subject to any further submissions, to give a judgment in relation to the declaration of incompatibility and in relation to the convention matters in open court subject to it being anonymised. The respondent had no objection to that course of action. I further indicated to the applicant that, having given that judgment in open court which could well be a matter of public interest, I was minded not to give my judgment as to joint residence in public but in private. The applicant wished to argue those matters further. Accordingly a further short hearing was arranged and took place on Wednesday 18 June 2003.

[51] At that hearing, where I restricted the applicant to one hour of oral argument, given that he had put in a very extensive written submission (and a supplementary submission), the applicant made several points, orally and in writing, which I summarise. (1) The Human Rights Act 1998 has radically altered the position in English law and the courts have no choice (the applicant's own emphasis) but to pronounce judgment in public in all cases before them. (2) Rule 4.16(7) and Re P-B are 'statutorily overruled' so far as concerns judgment. (3) B v UK is wrong, being totally out of tune with other pronouncements of the European Court (see the authorities referred to in paras 81–95 inclusive of his supplementary skeleton argument) including the judgment of Sir Nicolas Bratza. (4) I must/should follow the dissenting judgment of the minority in B v UK. (5) The dicta in Clibbery v Allan, to which I have already referred, are obiter and, in any event, wrong. (6) The applicant relied upon numerous English authorities but he encapsulated his submissions by referring to the dicta of Donaldson MR in R v Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies, ex p New Cross Building Society [1984] 2 All ER 27 at 31, [1984] QB 227 at 235:

> 'Hearing in camera
>
> The whole of the proceedings before Webster J were conducted in camera ... When he gave judgment, he did so in camera ... In this highly unusual situation, the first question which we had to ask ourselves was whether and to what extent it would be right that the proceedings in this court should also be in camera. It is fundamental to British justice as we know it, and as our forebears have known it, that the Queen's courts are open to all. And when I say that they are open to all I do not limit this to those who have business in the courts. The judges administer justice in the Queen's name on behalf of the whole community. No one is more entitled than a member of the general public to see for himself that justice is done. Nevertheless it is well settled that occasions can arise when it becomes the duty of the court to close its doors. This problem was considered in depth by the House of Lords in Scott v Scott [1913] AC 417, [1911–13] All ER Rep 1. The guidance which I get from their Lordships' speeches can be summarised as follows. The general rule that the courts shall conduct their proceedings in public is but an aid, albeit a very important aid, to the achievement of the paramount object of the courts, which is to do justice in accordance with the law. It is only if, in wholly exceptional circumstances, the presence of the public or public knowledge of the proceedings is likely to defeat that paramount object that the courts are justified in proceedings in camera. These circumstances are incapable of definition. Each application for privacy must be considered on its merits, but the applicant must satisfy the court that nothing short of total privacy will enable justice to be done. It is not sufficient that a public hearing will create embarrassment for some or all of those concerned. It must be shown that a public hearing is likely to lead, directly or indirectly, to a denial of justice.'

(It should be noted that the Court of Appeal did decide in that case to hear the appeal in camera, but gave judgment in open court.)

[52] As to whether the judgment/s should be anonymised, the applicant submitted that a public judgment necessitated no anonymity. He conceded that in truly exceptional cases (which he submitted his joint residence application was not) where justice would be impossible to attain, it might be necessary to conceal the identity of a party or witness. But, generally speaking, art 6(1) did not permit any censoring of judgments.

[53] I reject his submissions. The 1998 Act, whether because of its provisions and/or because it incorporated the convention into English domestic law, does not mandate that the English courts have no choice but to pronounce judgment in public in all cases before them. Rule 4.16(7) and Re P-B are not overruled, statutorily or in any way at all. They are part of English family law jurisprudence. I decline the applicant's invitations to rule that the majority decision of the European Court in B v UK was wrong or was contrary to earlier authority of the European Court, and to follow the judgment of the dissentients. I have already followed Clibbery v Allan earlier in this judgment.

[54] In B v UK [2001] 2 FCR 221 at 235–236 the majority said:

> '45. The Court recalls its long standing case-law that the form of publicity given under the domestic law to a judgment must be assessed in the light of the special features of the proceedings in question and by reference to the object and purpose of art 6(1) (see the above-mentioned Sutter judgment ((1984) 6 EHRR 272), para 33). Thus in the Sutter case, for example, it found that the publicity requirement under art 6(1) was satisfied by the fact that anyone who could establish an interest could consult or obtain a copy of the full text of the judgments of the Military Court of Cassation, together with the fact that the court's most important judgments were published in an official collection (para 34).
>
> 46. The Court further recalls its above finding that, in view of the type of issues requiring to be examined in cases concerning the residence of children, the domestic authorities were justified in conducting these proceedings in chambers in order to protect the privacy of the children and the parties and to avoid prejudicing the interests of justice. It agrees with the government that to pronounce the judgment in public would, to a large extent, frustrate these aims ...
>
> 48. Having regard to the nature of the proceedings and the form of the publicity applied by the national law, the Court considers that a literal interpretation of the terms of art 6(1) concerning the pronouncement of judgments would not only be unnecessary for the purposes of public scrutiny but might even frustrate the primary aim of art 6(1), which is to secure a fair hearing (see mutatis mutandis, the above-mentioned Sutter judgment, para 34).
>
> 49. The Court thus concludes that the Convention did not require making available to the general public the residence judgments in the present cases, and there has been no violation of art 6(1) in this respect.'

[55] Sir Nicolas Bratza in his concurring judgment stated that in the end he was persuaded that in the present cases there had been sufficient compliance with the requirements of art 6 in relation to the judgments being given in private. In particular he said (at 238):

> '(2) It is well established that art 6(1) of the Convention must be read as a whole. There is, as the majority judgment recognises, a logical relationship between the public nature of the proceedings and the public pronouncement of the judgment which is the result of those proceedings. If the public may legitimately be excluded from the hearing for the purpose of protecting the interests of children or the private lives of parties to a matrimonial dispute, the requirement that the judgment should be pronounced publicly should not be interpreted in such a way to undermine that protection. It seems to me that it is not a satisfactory answer to this point to argue that the judgment could be entirely anonymised so that it contained no details capable of identifying the parties or the children concerned and/or abridged to the point where only the operative part of the court's decision was made public. Even if such a course could be said to be adequate to protect the interests of the children or the parties concerned, it is difficult to see how the publication of a judgment so anonymised and abridged could be said to serve the aim of public scrutability of judicial proceedings.'

[56] In my judgment, a further passage in Sir Nicolas Bratza's concurring judgment demolishes the applicant's submission that B v UK was contrary to earlier European Court authorities. He said (at 239):

'(3) It is, moreover, clear from the case-law of this Court that, despite its unqualified terms, the requirement that the judgment shall be pronounced publicly has been interpreted with some flexibility, the Court emphasising that: "in each case the form of publicity to be given to the 'judgment' under the domestic law of the respondent State must be assessed in the light of the special features of the proceedings in question and by reference to the object and purpose of Art 6(1)." (see Pretto v Italy (1984) 6 EHRR 182, para 26; and see, most recently, Szücs v Austria and Werner v Austria (1998) 26 EHRR 310). Thus, for example, in Axen v Germany (1984) 6 EHRR 195 (at para 32) public delivery of a decision of a Supreme Court was held to be unnecessary, the requirements of art 6 being met by the public pronouncement of the judgments of the lower courts. More immediately relevant to the present case, in its Sutter judgment, the Court held the requirements of art 6 to be satisfied by the fact that "anyone who could establish an interest could consult or obtain a copy of the full text of the judgment of the Military Court of Cassation". It is true that the Sutter judgment has been subject to some extra-judicial criticism. Nevertheless, there is nothing in my view in the subsequent case-law of the Court to cast doubt on the authority of the decision: on the contrary, the case was expressly cited without disapproval in the Campbell v UK judgment itself ((1984) 7 EHRR 165) and, more recently, in the Szücs and Werner judgments referred to above.'

[57] Further on in his judgment Sir Nicolas said (at 239):

'(4) The county court judgments in the present case, concerned as they were with contested applications held in camera for residence orders in respect of young children and involving details of the private lives of the parties, fell clearly within the category of judgment to which limited public access might be regarded as justified.'

[58] In the dissenting opinion the judges recalled the obligation under art 6 to pronounce judgments publicly and that obligation is expressed in unqualified terms. The minority said (at 244–245):

'The majority's reasoning appears at first sight reasonable. However, what has taken place in a private hearing does not have to be fully reflected in a publicly pronounced judgment and care can be taken to ensure that names and other information which might lead to identification of the parties or detail about the family's personal life can be omitted from the judgment, without affecting the clarity of the approach and the solution given by the court to the issues arising in the case, which should be made public in order to achieve the purpose of public scrutiny.'

[59] As to that part of the dissenting opinion quoted in [58], above, in the instant case it is quite unworkable. The applicant agreed fully with me that it was impossible not to fully reflect in a judgment the evidence and submissions that had taken place in private. Nor was it possible to omit details about the family's personal life from such a judgment. He agreed that editing is simply not possible.

[60] In my judgment if I were to allow my judgment in the joint residence application to be published, even if it were anonymised, it would to a large extent frustrate the aims that have sought to be achieved by conducting the hearing of the evidence and submissions in private. The detail of such a judgment would, in my view, make it perfectly clear which child was being discussed or from which it could easily inferred or deduced about which child the case concerned. Such would certainly not be in the interests of the child and could well lead to the widening not healing of the rift that currently prevails in the relationship between the applicant and his child. I reject the applicant's submission to the contrary.

[61] At the very beginning of the hearing on 5 June the applicant submitted to me that he wished to make his arguments in respect of the declaration of incompatibility and as he put it 'open justice', in public and asked that the court be opened so that the public could come in. The respondent objected. She submitted that this was really all about the child and was a private matter. Mr Cobb submitted that the application for a declaration of incompatibility and for the matter to be heard in open court had been made within Children Act proceedings and thus it came within r 4.16(7).

[62] In my judgment there were no valid grounds for exercising my discretion so that the public could be admitted to what in effect was a preliminary submission within a matter involving a child. It does not follow that merely because that preliminary application involved the convention and/or was for a declaration of incompatibility that that part of the proceedings should be open to the public. In any event, since the European Court placed great emphasis upon the judge at first instance exercising his discretion in relation to the facts of the particular case, it seemed to me that there was a real danger that if I heard the preliminary application in public and I then decided to hear the matters as to evidence and submissions as to residence in private, that the damage might already have been done and sufficient w ould have been known by the public about the intimate facts of the case as to make it impossible to follow the long-established procedure in the English courts which is to generally hold those proceedings in private.

[63] I have therefore decided, in the exercise of my discretion, to give this judgment publicly, but suitably anonymised, and with the direction contained in [3], above. I will now hand down my judgment in the residence matter but in private.

Applications dismissed.

Victoria Parkin Barrister.

R (on the application of McFetrich) v Secretary of State for the Home Department

[2003] EWHC 1542 (Admin)

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (DIVISIONAL COURT)
SCOTT BAKER LJ AND PITCHFORD J
7 MAY, 30 JUNE 2003

Sentence – Mandatory life sentence – Murder – Tariff – Transfer of claimant from prison in Scotland to prison in England – Tariff fixed by Secretary of State of greater length than that recommended by trial judge in Scotland – Effect of transfer on tariff recommendation – Whether imposition of longer tariff heavier penalty than the one applicable at the time offence committed – Criminal Justice Act 1961, s 26(4) – Human Rights Act 1988, Sch 1, Pt I, art 7.

The claimant was sentenced by a Scottish court to life imprisonment for murder. In 1997, the claimant, at his request, was transferred to a prison in England under s 26 of the Criminal Justice Act 1961. By s 26(4)[a] a person transferred was 'treated for the purposes of detention, release, supervision, recall or otherwise' as if the sentence which had been imposed 'had been an "equivalent sentence" passed by the court in the place to which he was transferred.' At the date of transfer no tariff period had been set in Scotland. The Secretary of State consulted the trial judge, who recommended a tariff of eight years. The Lord Chief Justice of England and Wales, however, was of the opinion that had the claimant been convicted in England the tariff would have been fixed at 10 to 11 years. In 2000, the Secretary of State set a tariff of 12 years. Following representations from the claimant's solicitor, the Secretary of State, on 4 October 2002, maintained that decision. The claimant applied for judicial review, arguing that he was being required to serve a longer tariff in England than he would have had to serve had he remained in Scotland which violated his rights under art 7[b] of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998), which provided, inter alia, that a penalty for a criminal offence heavier than the one applicable at the time the offence was committed should not be imposed.

Held – Article 7 of the convention was not concerned with the machinery for carrying out a penalty, but rather the penalty itself. The mischief that the article was designed to prevent was the imposition by the state of criminal liability for an act which did not attract such liability at the time it was committed or a penalty greater than the maximum permitted when the offence was committed. The penalty for murder was life imprisonment and was unaffected by the tariff-setting process which was concerned with the period to be served for retribution and deterrence. The tariff-setting process did not spell out the actual period to be served, merely the minimum period. The court had to look at the penalty that could have been imposed and compare it with what was actually

a Section 26(4), so far as material, is set out at [6], below
b Article 7, so far as material, is set out at [10], below imposed. In the instant case, the claimant faced a sentence of life imprisonment for the murder he had committed in Scotland. He still faced that sentence following his transfer to England. The fact that there was some evidence that at the material time tariffs generally were somewhat lower in Scotland was irrelevant. Indeed the Secretary of State was obliged by s 26(4) of the 1961 Act to set the tariff as he had. The language of the subsection was clear. The prisoner was to be treated as if his life sentence had been passed by a judge sitting in a court in England. Furthermore, the subsection was drafted to cover all aspects of the sentence. That was clear from the words 'treated for the purposes of detention, release, supervision, recall or otherwise'. The section was looking beyond merely the detention element of the sentence. Moreover as the only sentence for murder that could be 'passed by a court' was one of life imprisonment, the phrase 'equivalent sentence' was not to be read as meaning the sentence of life imprisonment and the tariff. It followed that the application for judicial review would be dismissed (see [16], [17], [20], [21], [24], [27], [28], [32], [35], [37], [38], below).

Hogben v UK App No 11653/85 (3 March 1986, unreported) considered.

Notes

For the prohibition of retrospective laws see 8(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 148.

Section 26(4) of the Criminal Justice Act 1961 is repealed by the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997, s 65(2), Sch 6, but by virtue of art 5(6) of the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997 (Commencement No 2 and Transitional Provisions) Order 1997 SI 1997/2200 remains in force in respect of any person who on 1 October 1997 was in any part of the United Kingdom by virtue of an order made under Pt III of the 1961 Act for so long as that order has effect.

For the Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 7 see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (2002 reissue) 554.

Cases referred to in judgments

Coeme v Belgium App no 32492/96 (22 June 2000, unreported), ECt HR.

Hogben v UK App No 11653/85 (3 March 1986, unreported), E Com HR.

R (on the application of Anderson) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] UKHL 46, [2002] 4 All ER 1089, [2003] 1 AC 837, [2002] 3 WLR 1800.

R (on the application of Uttley) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2003] EWHC 950 (Admin), [2003] All ER (D) 130 (Apr); rvsd [2003] EWCA Civ 1130, [2003] 4 All ER 891, [2003] 1 WLR 2590.

Welch v UK (1995) 20 EHRR 247, [1995] ECHR 17440/90, ECt HR.

Application

The claimant applied for judicial review of (i) the decision of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, dated 15 September 2000, setting a tariff of 12 years to satisfy the requirements of retribution and deterrence in respect of the claimant's conviction for murder; and (ii) the decision of the Secretary of State, dated 4 October 2002, to reject the claimant's representations and maintain the tariff set at 12 years. The facts are set out in the judgment of Scott Baker LJ.

Hugh Southey (instructed by Stephensons, Salford) for the claimant.

Sarah-Jane Davies (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the Secretary of State.

Cur adv vult

30 June 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

SCOTT BAKER LJ.

[1] On 27 February 1995 the claimant pleaded guilty in the High Court in Edinburgh to murder. The judge, Lord Abernethy, sentenced him to life imprisonment. The victim was the claimant's wife from whom, at the time of the offence, he was separated. In September 1997, at his request, the claimant was transferred to prison in England under s 26(1) of the Criminal Justice Act 1961.

[2] Following transfer the Secretary of State for the Home Department consulted the trial judge, the Lord Justice Clerk, acting on behalf of the Lord Justice General, and the Lord Chief Justice of England and Wales. The trial judge recommended a tariff of eight years, with which the Lord Justice Clerk agreed. However, the Lord Chief Justice said:

> 'If this defendant had been convicted of murder in England and Wales, on the facts summarised in the Scottish reports, I would expect a tariff somewhat longer than eight years to be recommended. Plainly this was a case in which there was a highly fraught emotional background arising out of the disputes concerning the children and the accusations made against the defendant, and that background would to some extent be recognised as mitigating the gravity of the offence. But this was a very savage attack on the deceased, carried out with a knife which it appears the defendant had taken with him to her address. On the facts as summarised, and having regard to the defendant's plea of guilty, I would expect a tariff term in England and Wales to be fixed at 10–11 years. I question whether a shorter term would be thought to meet the requirements of retribution and general deterrence.'

[3] On 15 September 2000 the Secretary of State set a tariff of 12 years. He said:

> 'The Secretary of State does not accept that a tariff of eight years, as recommended by the trial judge and the Lord Justice General, is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of retribution and deterrence for your offence. He has attached weight to the fact that you carried out a savage attack on your wife with a knife which you had taken with you to the scene. He has also attached weight to the fact that the attack took place in front of your elder son. The Secretary of State has also attached weight to the fact that, by going to your wife's new home and there killing her, you abused the information as to her whereabouts that came to you through the legal process in relation to custody of your son. Having regard to all the circumstances of your case, the Secretary of State has concluded that a tariff of 12 years is necessary to satisfy the requirements of retribution and deterrence for your offence.'

[4] On 18 September 2002 the claimant's solicitors wrote asking for an urgent review, submitting that a tariff of eight years should be imposed in line with the trial judge's recommendation, supported by the Lord Justice Clerk and that in any event the tariff should not exceed the maximum of 11 years recommended by the Lord Chief Justice.

[5] In a letter dated 4 October 2002 the Secretary of State rejected those representations. The tariff was therefore maintained at 12 years. The claimant seeks judicial review, both of the original decision to set the tariff at 12 years and of the subsequent decision to maintain it.

[6] The relevant provisions of s 26 of the 1961 Act, as amended, are as follows:

'(1) The responsible Minister may, on the application of a person serving a sentence of imprisonment or detention in any part of the United Kingdom, make an order for his transfer to another part of the United Kingdom or to any of the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man, there to serve the remainder of his sentence, and for his removal to an appropriate institution there.

(2) Where a person has been sentenced to imprisonment or detention in any part of the United Kingdom or in any of the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man, the Secretary of State may, without application in that behalf, make an order for his transfer to any part of the United Kingdom, there to serve the remainder of his sentence, as the case may be, and for his removal to an appropriate institution in that part of the United Kingdom ...

(4) Subject to the following provisions of this section, a person transferred under this section to any part of the United Kingdom or to any of the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man there to serve his sentence or the remainder of his sentence, shall be treated for the purposes of detention, release, supervision, recall or otherwise, as if that sentence (and any other sentence to which he may be subject) had been an equivalent sentence passed by a court in the place to which he is transferred.'

[7] By virtue of art 5(6) of the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997 (Commencement No 2 and Transitional Provisions) Order 1997, SI 1997/2200, these provisions remain in force in respect of any person who on 1 October 1997 was in part of the United Kingdom by virtue of an order made under Pt 3 of the 1961 Act, for so long as that order has effect. The claimant was, as I have said, transferred to England in September 1997.

[8] The release of mandatory life prisoners in England and Wales is governed by s 29 of the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997 which provides that:

'(1) If recommended to do so by the Parole Board, the Secretary of State may, after consultation with the Lord Chief Justice together with the trial judge if available, release on licence a life prisoner who is not one to whom section 28 above applies.

(2) The Parole Board shall not make a recommendation under subsection (1) above unless the Secretary of State has referred the particular case, or the class of case to which that case belongs, to the Board for its advice.'

This section replaced s 35(2) and (3) of the Criminal Justice 1991 Act, which was in identical terms.

[9] The offence of murder falls into a special category for, unlike other offences, the sentence is prescribed by law. Under s 1 of the Murder (Abolition of Death Penalty) Act 1965 the sentence is life imprisonment. The position is no different in Scotland from England. In practice, however, only a small proportion of those convicted of murder remain in prison for the rest of their life. The prisoner serves a minimum period in prison to reflect retribution and deterrence in respect of the crime (known as the tariff). Thereafter he continues to be detained until such time as he is regarded as safe to be released on life licence.

[10] The claimant's underlying complaint is that he will serve a longer tariff in England than he would have served had he remained in prison in Scotland. Thus he would have been eligible for parole on an earlier date had he remained in Scotland. This, it is submitted, violates his rights under art 7 of the European Convention for the Protection Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950

(as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). The two decisions fixing and maintaining a tariff of 12 years are unlawful. Article 7(1) provides:

> 'No one shall be guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence under national or international law at the time when it was committed. Nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time the criminal offence was committed.'

THE ENGLISH PROCEDURE

[11] The tariff is ordinarily fixed by the Secretary of State soon after the trial and following recommendations from the trial judge and the Lord Chief Justice. Towards the end of the tariff element of his sentence, the prisoner's case is referred by the Secretary of State to the Parole Board for its consideration. Save in exceptional cases, a prisoner will not be released on life licence unless he has first spent a period of at least two years being tested in open conditions. Hence the first reference to the Parole Board is usually about two years before the tariff has expired.

THE SCOTTISH PROCEDURE

[12] At the time with which this case is concerned, ie prior to the implementation of the Convention Rights (Compliance) (Scotland) Act 2001 the procedure for mandatory life prisoners in Scotland was different from that in England. In Scotland, prior to 2001, the position of mandatory life prisoners was governed by s 1 of the Prisoners and Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Act 1993, which was similar in effect to s 29 of the 1997 Act in England and Wales. However, the material difference in procedure was that there was no formal tariff-setting process either by the judge or the Secretary of State for Scotland. A Preliminary Review Committee (PRC) recommended to the Scottish ministers the date for the first review by the Parole Board of an adult mandatory life prisoner's suitability for release on life licence. This committee, which was non-statutory, met in private and was set up by the Secretary of State for Scotland to review all mandatory life sentence cases in Scotland at about the end of the fourth year of the sentence. The PRC was chaired by a senior civil servant and comprised the Chairman of the Scottish Parole Board, the High Court judge who at the time was a member of the Board, a psychiatrist member of the Board and a senior member of the Scottish Prison Service. The issue for the PRC to consider was when the prisoner's suitability for release should first be considered by the Board and consideration was given to the seriousness of the murder, assessment of risk and the prisoner's response to custody. In assessing each case the PRC took into account a wide range of information, including the trial judge's comments and any minimum recommendation made by him, the prisoner's own representations and any previous consideration by the PRC. There were normally two meetings of the PRC each year, each considering some 20 cases. In each case a recommendation would be made to Scottish ministers. The prisoner would be notified of this and invited to make any further representations before a decision was taken whether to accept the Committee's recommendation as to the timing of the first review by the Parole Board.

[13] Once a case was referred to it by the Scottish ministers, the Parole Board carried out a review of the prisoner's suitability for release on life licence, focussing on the issue of risk to the public. It then made a recommendation to ministers whether or not the prisoner should be released. Ministers then looked to the judiciary for advice as to whether or not the requirements of justice and deterrence would be satisfied if the prisoner was released in accordance with the Board's recommendation. The prisoner was then informed of the recommendation and the judiciary's views and invited to make representations before the Scottish ministers took their decision.

[14] The position in Scotland changed under the 2001 Act with the introduction of a judicial tariff-setting process (see paras 12 and 13 of Pt 1 of the Schedule to the 2001 Act). As at March of this year the Scottish courts had set tariffs in approaching 95% of the cases of adult mandatory life sentence prisoners, in Scotland, the average tariff being just over 13 years.

[15] From the above it will be appreciated that at the time with which this case is concerned both jurisdictions had a tariff setting system but the mode of operation was different. The material difference between the English procedure and the Scottish procedure was that in England the tariff was set very soon after the sentence was passed, so that the prisoner knew from very early in his sentence the minimum period he would have to serve before release on life licence. In Scotland the prisoner did not have that knowledge until well into his sentence. However, the point taken by Mr Southey, who has appeared for the claimant, is, he submits, one of substance rather than procedure and it is that Scottish life prisoners generally and Mr McFetrich in particular generally serve shorter periods in custody for retribution and deterrence (the tariff) than those in England. Mr Southey submits that this is plainly illustrated by the fact that in the present case both the trial judge and the Lord Justice Clerk recommended a tariff of eight years whilst the Lord Chief Justice recommended one of ten or eleven. In the claimant's case he was transferred to England under s 26(1) of the 1961 Act before the PRC reviewed his case. Thus he came with no tariff set and his tariff was set by the Secretary of State after he had been transferred to England.

SECTION 26

[16] On the face of it the wording of s 26(4) appears clear. The prisoner is to be treated as if he had been sentenced by a court in the place to which he is transferred. In other words the claimant is to be treated as if his life sentence had been passed by a judge sitting in a court in England. Furthermore, the subsection is drafted to cover all aspects of the sentence. This is clear from the words 'treated for the purposes of detention, release, supervision, recall or otherwise'. The section is looking beyond merely the detention element of the sentence. In the case of a life sentence release, supervision and recall are all potentially relevant matters. A life sentence lasts for the whole of the prisoner's life. After he is released he remains subject to the terms of his life licence. There is more to a life sentence than just the tariff element for retribution and deterrence. Ms Davies, who has appeared for the Secretary of State, emphasises that in setting the tariff he was doing precisely what the section required him to do, treat the claimant as if he had been sentenced by a court in England. Had he not followed the ordinary practice he would have been in breach of s 26.

[17] Mr Southey's argument is that the phrase 'equivalent sentence' in s 26(4) must be read as meaning the sentence of life imprisonment and the tariff, because under s 3 of the 1998 Act legislation has to be read and given effect to in accordance with the convention and any other interpretation gives rise to a risk of non-compliance with art 7. I am unable to read the subsection in this way. It will be seen that the subsection refers to 'an equivalent sentence passed by a court in the place to which he is transferred'. The words 'passed by a court' are in my view important. The only sentence that can be passed for murder is one of life imprisonment. The claimant was a mandatory lifer in Scotland. Once he is transferred, he is to be treated for the purposes described in the section as if his life sentence had been imposed by a court in England. The tariff is not a creature of statute (see Lord Bingham of Cornhill in R (on the application of Anderson) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] UKHL 46 at [6]–[8], [2002] 4 All ER 1089 at [6]–[8], [2003] 1 AC 837). Mr Southey's argument runs up against other difficulties because no tariff was ever set in Scotland. His case never reached the PRC and it is impossible to know what its decision would have been had it done so. Mr Southey's answer to this is that there was nothing to prevent the Secretary of State from routing the case through the PRC and the Secretary of State for Scotland. Such a course however seems to me to be completely at odds with the plain wording of the section.

[18] Mr Southey's argument really, I think, comes to this. When a prisoner transfers from one jurisdiction to another he brings his tariff with him and in a case such as the present one where no tariff has been set it should be set in the transferring country even after transfer. Thus Mr McFetrich's case should have gone to the PRC and then the Secretary of State for Scotland with the result that he would have had a lesser tariff than 12 years. But this seems to me to run counter to the section. The problem is that the inter-relationship between the PRC, Scottish ministers and the Scottish Parole Board is different from that between the Secretary of State and the Parole Board in England.

[19] Mr Southey was forced to accept in argument that as a domestic construction point he really had no pre-Human Rights Act argument on s 26(4). He could only get his argument on its feet on the basis that the subsection had to be read compliantly with art 7.

ARTICLE 7

[20] I turn therefore to consider whether the circumstances of this case have violated art 7. In order to establish a violation of art 7 the claimant must show that a heavier penalty has been imposed on him than the one that was applicable at the time he committed the offence. By s 1 of the Murder (Abolition of Death Penalty) Act 1965, the penalty for murder is mandatory life imprisonment. That was so at the time the offence was committed and has remained so ever since. The position is the same in Scotland as in England. Article 7 is concerned with retrospectivity and the word 'penalty' is in my view referring to the whole penalty rather than to its constituent elements. The penalty is a life sentence and the fact that some prisoners, perhaps the vast majority, are released during their lifetime does not prevent the sentence from being a life sentence. Even after release the sentence continues for the prisoner is on licence for the rest of his life and liable to recall to prison. If he is recalled to prison he will inevitably serve a greater period in custody than the original tariff.

[21] A sentence of life imprisonment is different from a determinate sentence because it contains separate elements aimed (i) at retribution and deterrence and (ii) at the protection of the public. It is, in my judgment, however, not possible to equate the period to be served for retribution and deterrence (the tariff) with the penalty for the offence. Put slightly differently, art 7 is not concerned with the machinery for carrying out the penalty but rather with the penalty itself. Release on licence (parole) relates to the execution of the sentence but the actual sentence remains life imprisonment. The penalty of life imprisonment is unaffected by the tariff-setting process. The tariff-setting process does not spell out the actual period to be served, it sets the minimum period. The actual period served by the prisoner will depend on when it is safe to release him and whether, having been released, he is recalled.

[22] Support for this approach is to be found in the European jurisprudence. In Welch v UK (1995) 20 EHRR 247, the applicant was convicted in 1988 of drug offences committed in 1986. The judge passed a sentence of imprisonment and imposed, pursuant to an Act that came into force in 1987, a confiscation order. The court said (at 261 (para 27)) that the concept of penalty in art 7 was an autonomous convention concept and that to render the protection of art 7 effective the court had to remain free to go behind appearances and assess for itself whether a particular measure amounted in substance to a 'penalty' within the meaning of the provision. The court said (at 263 (para 34)):

> 'Finally, looking behind appearances at the realities of the situation, whatever the characterisation of the measure of confiscation, the fact remains that the applicant faced more far-reaching detriment as a result of the order than that to which he was exposed at the time of the commission of the offences for which he was convicted.'

[23] Perhaps of greater significance is Hogben v UK App No 11653/85 (3 March 1986, unreported), where the Commission rejected the application as manifestly ill-founded. The Commission said:

> '3. The Commission recalls that the applicant was sentenced to life imprisonment in 1973 for committing a murder in the course of a robbery. It is clear that the penalty for this offence at the time it was committed was life imprisonment and thus no issue under art 7 arises in this respect.
>
> 4. Furthermore, in the opinion of the Commission, the "penalty" for purposes of art 7(1), must be considered to be that of life imprisonment. Nevertheless it is true that as a result of the change in parole policy the applicant will not become eligible for release on parole until he has served 20 years' imprisonment. Although this may give rise to the result that his imprisonment is effectively harsher than if he had been eligible for release on parole at an earlier stage, such matters relate to the execution of the imprisonment as opposed to the "penalty" which remains that of life imprisonment. Accordingly, it cannot be said that the "penalty" imposed is a heavier one than that imposed by the trial judge.'

[24] In the present case the claimant faced a sentence of life imprisonment for the murder he committed in Scotland. He still faced that sentence following his transfer to England. How long an individual life sentence prisoner actually services in custody depends on many factors, one of them being the tariff he is given. The fact that there is some evidence that at the material time tariffs generally were somewhat lower in Scotland is in my view nothing to the point.

[25] Mr Southey relies on R (on the application of Anderson) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] 4 All ER 1089, [2003] 1 AC 837 in support of his proposition that tariff is to be equated to penalty. In Anderson's case the Secretary of State had fixed a longer tariff than that recommended by the judiciary and this was challenged by an application for judicial review on the ground that in fixing the tariff the Secretary of State had acted incompatibly with art 6(1) of the convention. It was argued on behalf of Mr Anderson that fixing the tariff for a convicted murderer was legally indistinguishable from the imposition of sentence. Lord Bingham accepted this, saying (at [24]):

> 'It is clear beyond doubt that the fixing of a convicted murderer's tariff, whether it be for the remainder of his days or for a relatively short time only, involves an assessment of the quantum of punishment he should undergo.'

Lord Steyn said (at [52]):

> 'A decision fixing the tariff in an individual case is unquestionably a decision about the level of punishment which is appropriate. Mellifluous words cannot hide this reality.'

[26] Anderson's case was a case concerning not art 7 but art 6. The House of Lords decided that in fixing the tariff the Secretary of State was performing a sentencing function and that in doing so he had breached Mr Anderson's rights under art 6 to have a sentence imposed by an independent and impartial tribunal. Anderson's case was concerned only, however, with the punitive element of the sentence, namely fixing the tariff for retribution and deterrence, the minimum period to be served. It was not concerned with the whole sentence, namely the mandatory life sentence that had been imposed by the trial judge and it is the whole sentence, including that element imposed to protect the public for the rest of the defendant's life, that is in reality the penalty referred to in art 7.

[27] Some help in construing art 7 is in my judgment to be found in looking at its purpose. The mischief that art 7 is designed to prevent is the imposition by the state of (i) criminal liability for an act which did not attract such liability at the time it was committed or (ii) a penalty greater than the maximum permitted when the offence was committed. In the present case not only has the maximum penalty remained unchanged, the penalty has throughout been mandatory life imprisonment. As the European Court of Human Rights said in Coeme v Belgium App no 32492/96 (22 June 2000, unreported) (para 145):

> 'The court must therefore verify that at the time when the accused prisoner performed the act which led to him being prosecuted and convicted there was in force a legal provision which made that act punishable, and that the punishment imposed did not exceed the limits fixed by that provision ...'

[28] That test is met in the present case. The tariff is but an element of the sentence, the minimum period that person must serve. The court has to look at the penalty that could have been imposed and compare it with what was actually imposed. In this case they were the same, life imprisonment. As was pointed out in argument, when the offence was committed the tariff was both unknown and incapable of being known. The same would be true in the case of a determinate sentence. When the offender commits the offence he knows or can ascertain, the maximum penalty but he cannot know what actual penalty will be imposed.

[29] In the course of argument Pitchford J made the point that it is difficult to identify any retrospectivity in the present case. All that has happened is that the claimant has, at his own request moved to England. The situation can be tested in this way. Suppose the Secretary of State after the tariff has been set at say 12 years, discovers that the prisoner has committed another murder under a different name and increases the tariff from 12 years to 20 years. Where is a breach of art 7 in such circumstances? The appropriate comparison is between the actual penalty and what could have been imposed when the offence was committed. In each instance in the present case the answer is life imprisonment.

[30] After the conclusion of the hearing Mr Southey drew the court's attention to R (on the application of Uttley) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2003] EWHC 950 (Admin), [2003] All ER (D) 130 (Apr). He submits it supports his argument. Moses J had to consider whether the application of statutory provisions requiring a prisoner to be released on licence, that were not applicable at the date of the offence, violated art 7. The claimant had been sentenced to 12 years' imprisonment for various sex offences. Moses J held that they did not. He said (at [8]):

> 'The essential question is whether the statutory imposition of the licence constituted the imposition of a penalty greater than that which would have been imposed at the time he committed the offences.'

He said it was plain that the purpose of a licence was to enable a long-term prisoner to stay out of trouble, both for his own benefit and for the benefit of the community and so that he did not again lose his liberty. He said (at [15]):

> 'I conclude that the nature and purpose of the licence are such that they dominate the factors which go to the conclusion as to whether the imposition of a licence is a penalty or not. The imposition of a licence is designed to protect the public once an prisoner is released, and assist in preventing the prisoner from committing further offences.'

[31] Mr Southey submits that the logical conclusion from this is that a tariff is a penalty because any detention following breach of licence is preventative and not part of a penalty. I am unable to read the decision in this way. Uttley's case was a determinate sentence case. It was not concerned with tariff. The difference in the present case is that Mr McFetrich was sentenced to life imprisonment.

[32] In short, my conclusion on the art 7 issue is that the penalty envisaged in art 7(1) in the case of murder committed by an adult is the mandatory sentence of life imprisonment. The general level of tariff for particular types of murder has changed from time to time, so has the level of sentence for many offences where there is a maximum determinate sentence. An obvious example is causing death by dangerous driving, but that in my view is nothing to the point. The claimant, when he committed the offence, was liable to the penalty of life imprisonment and so he was when the Secretary of State fixed a 12-year tariff. There is no breach of art 7.

[33] There are other practical problems about the claimant's argument. No tariff was ever in fact fixed by Scottish ministers. The very highest the argument can be put is that the Scottish judges were recommending a tariff of eight years which was lower than that recommended by the Lord Chief Justice and that therefore it is likely, if the claimant had remained in Scotland, that he would have served a shorter period in custody before being considered for parole. The truth is that in Scotland his case never reached the PRC and one simply does not know at what stage his case would have been referred to the Scottish Parole Board. Also, although there is a difference between the judicial recommendations and the tariff imposed, this is no different from any case in which the Secretary of State does not accept the judicial recommendations as to tariff (see, for example, R (on the application of Anderson) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] 4 All ER 1089, [2003] AC 837 where the judges recommended 15 years and the Secretary of State imposed 20 years).

[34] In the course of argument Ms Davies made the following points, each of which seems to me to present a difficulty for Mr Southey's contention that art 7 has been violated. (i) When the claimant committed the offence there was no tariff that was applicable. (ii) When passing sentence the judge said nothing about the length of time the claimant should serve in prison. (iii) There was at the time in Scotland no formal tariff-setting process, either by the judiciary or the Secretary of State for Scotland. (iv) Had the claimant remained in Scotland his case would have been referred to the PRC after approximately four years for it to consider recommending when his case should first be referred to the Parole Board. The PRC would not at that time have had the recommendations of either the trial judge or the Lord Justice Clerk. (v) It can only be speculation what the PRC would have recommended. There is no basis for constructing a notional tariff. (vi) The evidence is that the PRC took about eight years as a benchmark, adding for some factors and substituting for others. It is again speculative how the balancing exercise would have been carried out in the present case. (vii) Even if the case had been referred to the Parole Board it is impossible to know whether it would have recommended release. It would not have had the recommendation of the trial judge or the Lord Justice Clerk. (viii) The recommendations of the trial judge and the Lord Justice Clerk were in fact made as part of the process for setting a tariff in England. There is no way in which those recommendations can retrospectively affect the applicable penalty at the time the offence was committed. (ix) Absent the transfer to England, one simply does not know when the trial judge and the Lord Justice Clerk's views would have been sought. (x) In the present case one is left, on the claimant's argument, with what might have happened in the past had the claimant not asked to be transferred to an English prison.

[35] All this, so it seems to me, leads to the conclusion that the highest the claimant can put his case is that if he had remained in Scotland there is a possibility that he would in fact have served a shorter period for retribution and deterrence than will be the case with a 12-year tariff in England. But that is a long way from the imposition of a heavier penalty than the one that was applicable when he committed the killing.

[36] Mr Southey's main line of attack was against the Secretary of State's decision in October 2002 not to review the tariff of 12 years that he had set in September 2000. The reason for this was that the tariff had been set shortly before the 1998 Act came into force, which was on 2 October 2000 and he was faced with the obstacle of s 22(4). That obstacle was in my view insuperable. With the 2002 decision he has a different problem. There he has to show that the Secretary of State in maintaining the tariff acted incompatibly with convention rights. The short answer is that there was no violation of art 7, which is the only right in focus. Had there been a violation, s 6(2)(a) of the 1998 Act would have prevented the Home Secretary's action from being categorised as unlawful because the true meaning of s 26(4) of the 1961 Act is such that he could not have acted differently.

CONCLUSION

[37] Although there were at the material time different tariff settings arrangements in place in Scotland from those in England and although there is evidence that some mandatory life sentence prisoners were likely to receive a somewhat shorter tariff in Scotland than in England, there has been no violation of art 7 of the convention. The Secretary of State was entitled, indeed obliged, by virtue of s 26(4) of the 1961 Act to set the tariff in the manner that he did. The true penalty imposed on the claimant was one of life imprisonment. That was the penalty to which he was liable when he committed the murder and that was the sentence that was imposed upon him. In my judgment the claim for judicial review must fail.

PITCHFORD J.

[38] I agree.

Application dismissed.

Dilys Tausz Barrister.

Steward v Director of Public Prosecutions

[2003] EWHC 2251 (Admin)

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (DIVISIONAL COURT)
MAURICE KAY AND CRANE JJ
30 JULY 2003

Magistrates – Jurisdiction – Re-opening case to rectify mistake – Justices ruling no case to answer due to mistaken belief as to admissibility of evidence – Justices rescinding decision and convicting defendant – Whether justices functi officio.

Road traffic – Driving while unfit to drive through drink – Evidence – Medical evidence – No evidence called from doctor taking specimen of blood at police station – Whether requirement for doctor to give evidence mandatory – Road Traffic Offenders Act 1988, s 16(2).

The defendant was arrested and taken to a police station following a positive roadside breath test. The alcohol levels in the specimens of breath provided by the defendant were such that he was entitled to elect for those specimens to be replaced by a specimen of blood. The authorised intoximeter officer arranged for the police surgeon, Dr B, to take the blood. The officer observed Dr B obtain the defendant's consent and take two specimens of blood. The defendant was charged with being in charge of a motor vehicle after consuming so much alcohol that the proportion of it in his blood exceeded the prescribed limit contrary to s 5(1)(a) of the Road Traffic Act 1988. At trial, the officer gave evidence, as did the authorised analyst. The latter produced his certificate relating to the proportion of alcohol found in the blood specimen. At the end of the prosecution case, the justices ruled that there was no case to answer. Their reasons were that as the analyst's certificate had not been served at least seven days before the hearing, the evidence of analysis of the blood was inadmissible and therefore an essential element of the offence was missing. Thereafter, the prosecution pointed out that the certificate was not in dispute and had been accepted under s 9 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 and read out to the court. Once their mistake had been explained to them and agreed by all, the justices found that there was a case for the defendant to answer. The defendant then submitted that the police officer's evidence was not capable of being substituted for the attendance of Dr B or a duly signed statement from him under s 16(2) of the Road Traffic Offenders Act 1988[a]. The justices found the case proved and convicted the defendant. He appealed by way of case stated. On appeal, the defendant submitted, inter alia, that from the moment the justices ruled that there was no case to answer, they were functi officio, and that the utterance of the words 'no case to answer' amounted to an acquittal. He also contended that s 16(2) was mandatory and that there could be no evidence about consent or the qualifications of the medical practitioner save from the medical practitioner himself.

Held – (1) Justices were entitled to re-open a case, despite acceding to a submission of no case to answer, where they had made a mistake and all parties agreed that there had been an error. In those circumstances, the process of the adjudication had not been completed and the justices were not functi officio. Moreover, common sense and policy favoured immediate rectification without the cost and delay of an appeal by way of case stated (see [9]–[11], below); R v Essex JJ, ex p Final [1962] 3 All ER 924 distinguished.

a Section 16(2), so far as material, is set out at [14], below

(2) Section 16(2) of the Road Traffic Offenders Act 1988 was not in mandatory terms, and did not preclude evidence being given from another source as to consent or the qualifications of the medical practitioner. That was made plain by the use of the word 'may' in the section, and having regard to its purpose, which was to provide a way of enabling the prosecution to present evidence at minimal cost and inconvenience. In the instant case, there had been evidence that the police officer had been present and had witnessed the defendant consenting to the procedure. That evidence had been sufficient to found a conviction. Accordingly, the appeal would be dismissed (see [15], below).

Notes

For the doctrine of functus officio and procedure for admissing evidence of specimens of blood taken by medical practitioners, see respectively 29(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 766, and 40(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 694.

For the Road Traffic Offenders Act 1988, s 16(2), see 38 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn 2001 reissue) 1033.

Cases referred to in judgments

R v Essex JJ, ex p Final [1962] 3 All ER 924, [1963] 2 QB 816, [1963] 2 WLR 38, DC.

S (an infant) v Manchester City Recorder [1969] 3 All ER 1230, [1971] AC 481, [1970] 2 WLR 21, HL.

Case stated

Gary David Steward appealed by way of case stated from an adjudication of Portsmouth Magistrates' Court on 22 January 2003 whereby he was convicted of an offence contrary to s 5(1)(a) of the Road Traffic Act 1988. The questions for the opinion of the High Court were: (i) whether the justices were entitled to re-open the case after finding that there was no case for the defendant to answer; (ii) whether in the absence of a certificate from a medical practitioner certifying that a sample of blood had been taken from the defendant with his consent or oral evidence from the medical practitioner, the justices were entitled to rely upon other evidence to show that such a sample had been taken; and (iii) whether there was evidence upon which the justices were entitled to convict the defendant. The facts are set out in the judgment of Maurice Kay J.

John Lofthouse (instructed by Coffin Mew and Clover, Portsmouth) for the defendant.

Stephen Parish (instructed by the Crown Prosecution Service) for the prosecution.

MAURICE KAY J.

[1] This is an appeal by case stated from an adjudication of a magistrates' court sitting at Portsmouth on 22 January this year. The defendant, Gary David Steward, faced a charge that on 6 August 2002 he had driven a motor vehicle on the M27 after consuming so much alcohol that the proportion of it in his blood, namely 97 mg of alcohol in 100 m of blood, exceeded the prescribed limit contrary to s 5(1)(a) of the Road Traffic Act 1988. He pleaded not guilty and the trial occurred on 22 January. Eventually the justices found the case proved. They fined the defendant £500 plus costs, endorsed his licence and disqualified him for 12 months.

[2] The evidence came mainly from two police officers, PC Davis and PC Jackson. It was PC Davis who had encountered the defendant on the M27 and who administered the breath test at the roadside; that test proving to be positive. The defendant was then arrested and taken to Fareham Police Station. The evidence of PC Jackson related to events at the police station. The case stated contains these findings:

> 'We found the following facts form the sworn evidence of PC Jackson: (a) He was the authorised intoximeter operator who undertook this procedure in respect of the defendant at the police station. The defendant provided two specimens of breath; the lower of the two readings was 41 microgrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of the breath. (b) The defendant then elected for the specimen to be replaced by a specimen of blood. (c) He [PC Jackson] arranged for Dr Bell, police surgeon, to attend. (d) He observed Dr Bell obtain the defendant's consent to blood being taken and then Dr Bell actually take two specimens of blood from the defendant. (e) One sample of blood was given to the defendant. (f) PC Jackson took the second sample from Dr Bell at 21.58 hrs.'

The remaining findings in relation to his evidence concern the transmission of the samples and is not material to this appeal.

[3] The other witness who gave evidence (by way of witness statement) was Dr Trotter, an authorised analyst. He produced his certificate relating to the proportion of alcohol found in the blood specimen. At the end of the prosecution case a submission of no case to answer was made on behalf of the defendant. The contention was that there had been no oral evidence or a certificate from Dr Bell, and that therefore there was no evidence upon which the defendant could be convicted.

[4] The justices heard rival submissions and then retired. When they came back, the case stated records:

> 'We ruled there was no case to answer on the basis we believed that Dr Trotter's certificate should have been served at least seven days before the hearing. The evidence of analysis of the blood was therefore inadmissible. Therefore an essential element of the offence was missing ... (a) Upon the decision of no case to answer being announced, the prosecuting solicitor asked which certificate was referred to by the Bench; upon the chairwoman's reply that it was the analyst's certificate, he stated (and it was agreed by the defence) that the statement of the analyst was not in dispute, and had been accepted under s 9 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 and read to the court. The issue was as to the absence of evidence from Dr Bell to prove that he was a medical practitioner and that the samples had been taken with the defendant's consent. (b) We sought advice from the legal adviser as to whether we could now review our decision. The legal adviser advised us that we were able to review our decision. (c) As the basis of our decision of no case to answer was that we believed that a certificate by Dr Trotter had to be served at least seven days before the hearing, or otherwise the certificate by him ... was inadmissible ... we realised that we had erred in finding no case to answer on this basis. (d) The prosecution clarified that the certificate/statement by Dr Bell was not necessary because PC Jackson had observed the consent being given and was aware Dr Bell was a police surgeon.' a

Once their mistake had been explained to them and agreed by all, after further consideration the magistrates found that there was a case for the defendant to answer, despite the fact that the prosecution had not produced any statement or certificate from Dr Bell and he had not given evidence. The case stated then refers to the fact that PC Jackson had given evidence that the blood samples were taken by Dr Bell at the election of the defendant, and that PC Jackson had been present when the blood samples were taken. The case therefore proceeded. b

[5] The defendant did not give or call any evidence. It seems that the defendant's solicitor submitted, either following the reconsideration or in final submissions, that the magistrates were not entitled to re-open the case after finding that there was no case to answer. The submission was made that PC Jackson's evidence was not capable of being accepted in substitution for the attendance of Dr Bell or a duly signed statement from him under s 16(2) of the Road Traffic Offenders Act 1988. It was further submitted that there was insufficient evidence upon which they were entitled to convict the defendant. c d

[6] However, they found the case proved. The case stated explains:

'In this case, the prosecution relied on the evidence of PC Jackson that the two blood samples were taken by Dr Bell from the defendant, with his consent. We were satisfied on this evidence that the sample was taken from the defendant with his consent by a medical practitioner. PC Jackson had given evidence a police surgeon was arranged and this was Dr Bell. Therefore the evidence of the taking of the blood sample was admissible.' e

A little later:

'We were entitled to reverse our decision ... because we had not finished hearing the case and it became quite clear that we made our decision on the submission of no case to answer on the mistaken belief that it was Dr Trotter's certificate that was in issue ... We found there was sufficient evidence to satisfy us beyond reasonable doubt that the defendant was guilty of the offence charged.' f g

[7] The appeal to this court is put on three bases. The first ground of appeal relates to the magistrates proceeding to hear the case after finding that there was no case to answer. In short, the submission of Mr Lofthouse, on behalf of the defendant, is that from the moment the magistrates ruled that there was no case to answer, the magistrates were functi officio. He submits that the utterance of the words 'no case to answer' amounted to an acquittal. He points out that under s 9 of the Magistrates' Court Act 1980 a magistrates' court in a summary trial has only two choices: either to convict the accused or to dismiss the information. He submits that by the utterance 'no case to answer' the information was dismissed. In support of this submission he refers to R v Essex JJ, ex p Final [1962] 3 All ER 924, [1963] 2 QB 816. In that case, having heard the evidence and retired to consider it, the magistrates returned and announced that the case had been proved and that a fine of £3 would be imposed. At that point the defendant's solicitor began to make submissions to the effect that the case had not been proved, adverting to factual evidence that was or was not before the court. He succeeded in persuading the Bench to reconsider their verdict. When they did so, h j

the justices dismissed the information. The Divisional Court held that the justices had erred in so doing because they were functi officio and had no jurisdiction to substitute an acquittal for a conviction or vice versa. Lord Parker CJ said:

> 'It is, I think, perfectly clear that what the chairman of the bench announced amounted to a conviction ... it is perfectly clear that the justices intended to, and were understood to, find that the case against the defendant had been proved and to inflict a fine of £3.' See [1962] 3 All ER 924 at 925, [1963] 2 QB 816 at 820.

Counsel for the defendant had contended for a principle to the effect that if, before dispersing, a matter was drawn to the attention of the Bench which would make them change their minds, they were at liberty to do so and substitute an acquittal. Lord Parker CJ said:

> 'There is, I think, clearly no statutory power to enable them to do so, nor do I for my part think that there is any inherent power. They are, in my judgment, functi officio the moment they have announced their decision, however inconvenient the result may be.' See [1962] 3 All ER 924 at 926, [1963] 2 QB 816 at 821.

Gorman J agreed, as did Salmon J, who said:

> 'It is quite plain on authority that once a decision by magistrates is announced in open court, that decision so announced amounts either to an acquittal or to a conviction, as the case may be. Once the magistrates have convicted or acquitted, they are functus officio and cannot alter their decision.' See [1962] 3 All ER 924 at 927, [1963] 2 QB 816 at 823.

Mr Lofthouse additionally relies on S (an infant) v Manchester City Recorder [1969] 3 All ER 1230, [1971] AC 481, to which I shall make brief reference later.

[8] Mr Lofthouse also observes that the 1980 Act contains provisions permitting a magistrates' court to reopen a case to rectify mistakes. Those provisions are to be found in s 142. However, they do not extend to the circumstances of the present case. This leads to the submission that if Parliament had intended a case to be re-opened, in the manner in which it was in the present case, it would have extended the power of rectification to cover such circumstances.

[9] In my judgment, the position for which Mr Lofthouse contends is highly schematic and artificially so. As Crane J observed in the course of submissions, it is a matter of chance as to whether magistrates begin a ruling with references to the evidence with the intention of only making clear their finding of no case at the end, or whether, as here, the conclusion preceded the reasons.

[10] In the former case, if the solicitor had spotted an error in the course of the review of the evidence it is a matter of chance as to whether he would have interrupted immediately or waited until the end. This is not a case like Ex p Final where a Bench was persuaded to re-open the case and, in effect, hear further submissions as to the evidence. It is a case of an error having been identified, having been agreed by the defendant's solicitor and having been admitted to by the magistrates. I do not consider that that comes within the principles set out in Ex p Final, or in the case of S [1969] 3 All ER 1230 at 1240, [1971] AC 481 at 498 in which Lord MacDermott referred to the point where 'the process of adjudication ... had been completed and was effective in point of law' as the cut-off point.

[11] In my judgment that point had not been reached in this case. In making that statement I also have in mind the fact that at the time of Ex p Final it was not usual for magistrates to give reasons at all and, therefore, the announcement of the decision one way or the other was laconic in the extreme. Now that the giving of reasons is common, the process of adjudication is extended. Mr Lofthouse suggests that there are also strong policy reasons for this court to adopt the approach taken in Ex p Final, the policy being one of discouragement of attempts at second bites at the cherry. However, there are also strong policy reasons for taking a broader view. Where, as here, magistrates make a mistake and both parties agree, and the magistrates agree that they have made such a mistake, policy and common sense favour its immediate rectification without the cost and delay of an appeal by case stated.

[12] For all these reasons, I do not accept the first ground of appeal advanced by Mr Lofthouse. I turn, therefore, to the second ground.

[13] Mr Lofthouse puts it in this way. No evidence was called from or provided by Dr Bell. By s 15(4) of the Road Traffic Offenders Act 1988 'A specimen of blood shall be disregarded unless it was taken from the accused with his consent by a medical practitioner'. Mr Lofthouse submits that the legislation is a careful and complete code and requires that the issues of the taking of a blood specimen (a) by a medical practitioner and (b) with the consent of the accused cannot be established without evidence from the medical practitioner either by oral evidence or by certificate.

[14] The certificate process is governed by s 16 of the Road Traffic Offenders Act 1988 and, in particular, s 16(2), which provides:

> 'Subject to subsections (3) and (4) below, evidence that a specimen of blood was taken from the accused with his consent by a medical practitioner may be given by the production of a document purporting to certify that fact and to be signed by a medical practitioner.'

The submission advanced by Mr Lofthouse is essentially that s 16(2) is mandatory and that there can be no evidence about consent or the qualifications of the medical practitioner, save from the medical practitioner himself usually through the certification there provided for. His submission is that the legislation is permissive as to whether the doctor's evidence is oral or by way of certification, but it is mandatory that it is the doctor who provides it. He contends that the provisions of the Act would be unnecessary if a police officer could give evidence which the Act envisages coming from a medical practitioner. He further submits that the strictness of such a requirement makes good sense since it is consent at the time of the taking of the sample that is relevant and the medical practitioner is the best placed person to assess that.

[15] I do not accept these submissions. It is abundantly clear from the words of s 16(2) that it is permissive. That much is plain from the word 'may'. Its purpose is to provide a way which enables the prosecution to present evidence with minimal cost and inconvenience. However, in my judgment, it is not the only evidence which is admissible on the issues of consent or the qualifications of the medical practitioner. To take two examples that were canvassed in the course of submissions. If the accused person had been interviewed under caution in the police station and had admitted in the course of that interview that he had consented to the taking of the blood sample, it is absurd to suggest that that evidence would not be admissible to prove his consent in the absence of a certificate or other evidence from the medical practitioner. Moreover, if there were a dispute about consent in the course of the evidence, and the police officer who was present was able to give evidence as to what had happened, supporting or contradicting the evidence of the doctor, there is absolutely no reason why the police officer should not give such evidence. Indeed, it seems to me that if there were such a colourful dispute it would be the duty of the defence advocate to cross-examine the police officer in relation to it, as it would be inevitable that he would have been present and in a position to provide evidence about the disputed matter.

[16] Accordingly, I conclude that there is nothing in this second ground of appeal.

[17] The third ground of appeal is to some extent a continuation of the second ground but is put in global terms, to the effect that there was no or insufficient evidence upon which the defendant could be convicted. Again, the points which Mr Lofthouse seeks to make relate to the issues of consent and the medical practitioner. I return again to the wording of the case stated, which reports that the magistrates found as facts from the evidence of PC Jackson: (i) that he had arranged 'for Dr Bell, police surgeon, to attend', and (ii) that he had observed Dr Bell obtain the defendant's consent to blood being taken and then Dr Bell actually taking the blood samples from the defendant.

[18] It is not suggested that that evidence was challenged in any way, or that any issue about those matters was raised with PC Jackson. It is also instructive to have regard to the context. This is not a case in which the driver was being required to provide a blood sample pursuant to s 7 of the Road Traffic Act 1988. It is a case in which the blood samples were being taken as a result of the defendant's election under s 8(2) of that Act, which provides:

> 'If the specimen with the lower proportion of alcohol contains no more than 50 microgrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of breath, the person who provided it may claim that it should be replaced by such specimen as may be required under section 7(4) of this Act and, if he then provides such a specimen, neither specimen of breath shall be used.'

I observe that that section is headed 'Choice of specimens of breath'.

[19] In my judgment, it is plain on the face of the case stated that there was evidence as to the taking of the samples by Dr Bell. There was evidence that the defendant consented to that course and there was evidence that Dr Bell was a medical practitioner; it is fanciful to suggest that he was not.

[20] Mr Lofthouse complains that the case stated is defective because it does not disclose whether the findings about consent and, to a lesser extent, the status of the medical practitioner were matters of direct evidence from PC Jackson or were inferences drawn from parts of his evidence. We agreed to look at the notes taken by the legal adviser to the justices, but we do not find that they take the matter any further. I propose to ignore them.

[21] I see no reason not to take the case stated at face value. The position adopted by Mr Lofthouse is that the case stated is defective because it does not properly separate the findings from the evidence upon which they were based, and it does not make clear that which was based on direct evidence and that which was based on inference. He refers to r 81 of the Magistrates' Court Rules 1981, SI 1981/552.

[22] I do not accept his arguments about that. The case stated is, in my judgment, unequivocal. These criticisms of its contents relating to the facts that were found seem to me to be utterly unmeritorious and I reject them. It follows that I am not persuaded by this third ground of appeal.

[23] I therefore turn to the three questions that are posed in the case stated for the consideration of this court. Question 1: 'Whether the justices were entitled to re-open the case after finding that there was no case for the defendant to answer.' I answer that in the affirmative. Question 2:

> 'Whether, in the absence of a certificate from a medical practitioner certifying that a sample of blood had been taken from the defendant with his consent or oral evidence from the medical practitioner, the justices were entitled to rely upon other evidence to show that such a sample had been taken.'

Again, I answer that in the affirmative. Question 3: 'Whether there was evidence upon which the justices were entitled to convict the defendant.' Once again I answer that in the affirmative.

[24] Accordingly, I would dismiss the appeal.

CRANE J.

[25] I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Alexander Horne Barrister.

Relaxion Group plc v Rhys-Harper D'Souza v Lambeth London Borough Council Jones v 3M Healthcare Ltd and other appeals

[2003] UKHL 33

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD, LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD, LORD HOBHOUSE OF WOODBOROUGH, LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE AND LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY

25–28 NOVEMBER 2002, 19 JUNE 2003

Discrimination – Sex discrimination – Employment – Jurisdiction of employment tribunal – Whether employment tribunal having jurisdiction to hear complaint relating to benefit arising from employment relationship after termination of employment – Whether tribunal having jurisdiction to hear complaint of sex discrimination with regard to employer's alleged failure to carry out proper investigation of allegation of sexual harassment – Sex Discrimination Act 1975, s 6(2).

Discrimination – Racial discrimination – Employment – Whether employment tribunal having jurisdiction to hear complaint relating to benefit arising from employment relationship after termination of employment – Whether tribunal having jurisdiction to hear complaint of discrimination based on employer's failure to comply with reinstatement order – Race Relations Act 1976, s 4(2).

Discrimination – Disability discrimination – Employment – Whether employment tribunal having jurisdiction to hear complaint relating to benefit arising from employment relationship after termination of employment – Whether tribunal having jurisdiction to hear complaints relating to provision of references – Whether tribunal having jurisdiction to hear complaints relating to employer's failure to return employee's property – Disability Discrimination Act 1995, s 4(2).

In three consolidated appeals, the principal question raised was whether discriminatory acts done by an employer after termination of an employee's contract of employment were outside the scope of s 6(2)[a] of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975, s 4(2)[b] of the Race Relations Act 1976, and s 4(2)[c] of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. In the first appeal, which concerned the 1975 Act, the Court of Appeal held that the employment tribunal had had no jurisdiction to hear the employee's complaint of sex discrimination with regard to the alleged failure of her employer to carry out a proper investigation of her allegation of sexual harassment, as the discriminatory conduct was alleged to have occurred after her employment had ended. In the second appeal, which concerned the 1976 Act, the Court of Appeal held that the tribunal had had no jurisdiction to hear a complaint of discrimination based on the employer's failure to comply with a reinstatement order made after the employee had succeeded in his complaint of unfair dismissal, racial discrimination and a Section 6(2) is set out at [23], below

b Section 4(2) is set out at [24], below
c Section 4(2) is set out at [25], below

victimisation. In the third appeal, which concerned the 1995 Act, the Court of Appeal held that the tribunal had had no jurisdiction to hear three complaints relating to the provision of references after employment had been terminated, or a complaint relating to the refusal by the employer to return property of the employee after his dismissal.

Held – The natural and proper interpretation of s 6(2) of the 1975 Act and the corresponding provisions in s 4(2) of the 1976 Act and s 4(2) of the 1995 Act in the present context was that once two persons entered into the relationship of employer and employee, the employee was intended to be protected against discrimination by the employer in respect of all the benefits arising from that relationship. The statutory provisions were concerned with the manner in which the employer conducted himself, vis-à-vis the employee, with regard to all the benefits arising from that relationship, whether as a matter of strict legal entitlement or not. That being the purpose, it would make no sense to draw an arbitrary line at the precise moment when the contract of employment ended, protecting the employee against discrimination in respect of all benefits up to that point, but in respect of none thereafter. To be an 'incident' of the employment relationship for that purpose the benefit in question had to arise between the employer or former employer as such and the employee or former employee as such. The first and third appeals would, accordingly, be allowed. However, the second appeal would be dismissed, since the benefit acquired by an employee from a reinstatement order did not arise from the employment relationship, but rather derived from an order of the tribunal (see [37]–[40], [44], [45], [47], [48], [51]–[53], [123], [125], [129], [162]–[165], [197], [205], [206], below).

Adekeye v Post Office [1997] IRLR 105 overruled.

Notes

For time limits for bringing a complaint of discrimination in the employment field, see 13 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2000 reissue) para 376.

For the Sex Discrimination Act 1975, s 6, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 53.

For the Race Relations Act 1976, s 4, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 140.

For the Disability Discrimination Act 1995, s 4, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 295.

Cases referred to in opinions

Adekeye v Post Office [1997] IRLR 105, [1997] ICR 110, CA; affg sub nom Post Office v Adekeye [1995] IRLR 297, [1995] ICR 540, EAT.

Anyanwu v South Bank Student Union (Commission for Racial Equality, interveners) [2001] UKHL 14, [2001] 2 All ER 353, [2001] ICR 391, [2001] 1 WLR 638.

Burton v British Railways Board Case 19/81 [1982] 3 All ER 537, [1982] QB 1080, [1982] 3 WLR 387, [1982] ECR 555, ECJ.

Coote v Granada Hospitality Ltd Case C-185/97 [1998] All ER (EC) 865, [1999] ICR 100, [1998] ECR I-5199, ECJ.

Coote v Granada Hospitality Ltd (No 2) [1999] IRLR 452, [1999] ICR 942, EAT.

D'Souza v Lambeth London BC [2000] All ER (D) 878, EAT; affd [2001] EWCA Civ 794, [2001] All ER (D) 346 (May).

De Souza v Automobile Association [1986] IRLR 103, [1986] ICR 514, CA.

Garland v British Rail Engineering Ltd [1982] 2 All ER 402, [1983] 2 AC 751, [1982] 2 WLR 918, ECJ and HL.

Hall v Woolston Hall Leisure Ltd [2000] 4 All ER 787, [2001] ICR 99, [2001] 1 WLR 225, CA.

Jones v Tower Boot Co Ltd [1997] 2 All ER 406, [1997] ICR 254, CA.

Kirker v British Sugar plc, Jones v 3M Healthcare Ltd, Angel v New Possibilities NHS Trust, Bond v Hackney Citizens' Advice Bureau [2002] ICR 341, EAT; affd [2002] EWCA Civ 304, (2002) 70 BMLR 1, [2002] ICR 1124.

Leighton v Michael [1996] IRLR 67, [1995] ICR 1091, EAT.

Litster v Forth Dry Dock and Engineering Co Ltd [1989] 1 All ER 1134, [1990] 1 AC 546, [1989] 2 WLR 634, HL.

Marleasing SA v La Comercial Internacional de Alimentación SA Case C-106/89 [1990] ECR I-4135, ECJ.

Nagarajan v Agnew [1994] IRLR 61, [1995] ICR 520, EAT.

Nagarajan v London Regional Transport [1999] 4 All ER 65, [2000] 1 AC 501, [1999] 3 WLR 425, HL.

Rhys-Harper v Relaxion Group plc [2001] EWCA Civ 634, [2001] IRLR 460, [2001] ICR 1176; affg [2000] IRLR 810, EAT.

Sainsbury (J) Ltd v Savage [1980] IRLR 109, [1981] ICR 1, CA.

Spring v Guardian Assurance plc [1994] 3 All ER 129, [1995] 2 AC 296, [1994] 3 WLR 354, HL.

Wagner Miret v Fondo de Garantía Salarial Case C-334/92 [1993] ECR I-6911, ECJ.

Webb v EMO Air Cargo (UK) Ltd [1992] 4 All ER 929, [1993] ICR 175, [1993] 1 WLR 49, HL.

Cases referred to in list of authorities

Barclays Bank plc v Kapur [1991] 1 All ER 646, [1991] 2 AC 355, [1991] 2 WLR 401, HL.

Duke v GEC Reliance Systems Ltd [1988] 1 All ER 626, [1988] AC 618, [1988] 2 WLR 359, HL.

Falkirk Council v Whyte [1997] IRLR 560, EAT.

Hampson v Dept of Education and Science [1990] 2 All ER 513, [1991] 1 AC 171, [1990] 3 WLR 42, HL.

Khan v Chief Constable of West Yorkshire [2001] UKHL 48, [2001] 4 All ER 834, [2001] ICR 1065, [2001] 1 WLR 1947.

Savjani v IRC [1981] 1 All ER 1121, [1981] QB 458, [1981] 2 WLR 636, CA.

Appeal

Relaxion Group plc v Rhys-Harper

Christine Lillian Rhys-Harper appealed with permission of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords given on 7 February 2002 from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Pill, Mantell and Buxton LJJ) on 3 May 2001 ([2001] EWCA Civ 634, [2001] IRLR 460, [2001] ICR 1176) dismissing her appeal from the decision of the Employment Appeal Tribunal (Judge Collins CBE, CHolroyd, Sir Gavin Laird CBE) on 24 March 2000 allowing an appeal by the respondent, Relaxion Group plc from the decision of an employment tribunal sitting at Truro (Chairman AD Puttick, B Dunstan, J Cook) promulgated on 28 April 1999 that it had jurisdiction to hear the appellant's claims under the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 for acts allegedly done by the respondent after the termination of the appellant's contract of employment. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead.

D'Souza v Lambeth London BC

Donald D'Souza appealed with permission of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords given on 11 February 2002 from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Schiemann, Robert Walker LJJ and Lloyd J) on 25 May 2001([2001] EWCA Civ 794, [2001] All ER (D) 346 (May) dismissing his appeal from the decision of the Employment Appeal Tribunal (Morison J, TA Marsland, RN Straker) on 27 June 2000, dismissing his appeal from the decision of an industrial tribunal sitting at London South (Chairman DWH Brayden, C Curson, T MacLean) promulgated on 14 March 1996 that it had no jurisdiction to hear the appellant's claims under the Race Relations Act 1976 for acts allegedly done by the respondent, Lambeth London Borough Council after the termination of the appellant's contract of employment. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead.

Jones v 3M Healthcare Ltd

Gerald Philip Jones appealed with permission of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Pill, Mummery and Latham LJJ) on 27 February 2002 ([2002] EWCA Civ 304, (2002) 70 BMLR 1, [2002] ICR 1142) dismissing his appeal from the decision of the Employment Appeal Tribunal (Lindsay J, P Dawson, I Ezekiel) on 11 December 2001 ([2002] ICR 341) dismissing his appeal from the decision of an employment tribunal sitting at Leicester (Chairman D Price, J Harper, M Kamal) promulgated on 5 May 2000 that it had no jurisdiction to hear the appellant's claim for victimisation under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 in relation to acts allegedly done by the respondent, 3M Healthcare Ltd, after the termination of the appellant's contract of employment. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead.

Kirker v Ambitions Personnel and anor

Nicholas Kirker appealed with permission of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Pill, Mummery and Latham LJJ) on 27 February 2002 ([2002] EWCA Civ 304, (2002) 70 BMLR 1, [2002] ICR 1142) dismissing his appeal from the decision of the Employment Appeal Tribunal (Lindsay J, P Dawson, I Ezekiel) on 11 December 2001 ([2002] ICR 341) dismissing his appeal from the decision of an employment tribunal sitting at Nottingham (Chairman JS Walker, AJ Hutchins, N Greatrex) promulgated on 28 July 2000 striking out the appellant's claim for victimisation under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 against the second respondent, British Sugar plc in relation to the provision of an allegedly unsatisfactory reference provided by British Sugar to the first respondent, Ambitions Personnel after the termination of the appellant's contract of employment with British Sugar. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead.

Angel v New Possibilities NHS Trust

Diana Dinsmor Angel appealed with permission of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Pill, Mummery and Latham LJJ) on 27 February 2002 ([2002] EWCA Civ 304, (2002) 70 BMLR 1, [2002] ICR 1142) dismissing her appeal from the decision of the Employment Appeal Tribunal (Lindsay J, P Dawson, I Ezekiel) on 11 December 2001 ([2002] ICR 341) dismissing her appeal from the decision of an employment tribunal sitting at Bury St Edmunds (Chairman BG Mitchell, G Adams, B Shelley) promulgated on 21 August 2000 that it had no jurisdiction to hear the appellant's claim for victimisation under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 against the respondent, New Possibilities NHS Trust in relation to the provision of an allegedly unsatisfactory reference provided by the respondent after the termination of the appellant's contract of employment with them. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead.

Bond v Hackney Citizens Advice Bureau

Charmaine Venise Bond appealed with permission of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords from the decision of the Court of Appeal (Pill, Mummery and Latham LJJ) on 27 February 2002 ([2002] EWCA Civ 304, (2002) 70 BMLR 1, [2002] ICR 1142) dismissing her appeal from the decision of the Employment Appeal Tribunal (Lindsay J, P Dawson, I Ezekiel) on 11 December 2001 ([2002] ICR 341) dismissing the decision of an employment tribunal sitting at London Central (Chairman MS Rabin, J Dickinson, K Thomas) promulgated on 25 October 2000 that it had no jurisdiction to hear the appellant's claim for victimisation under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 against the respondent, Hackney Citizens Advice Bureau in relation to acts allegedly done by the respondent after the termination of the appellant's contract of employment with them. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead.

Frederick Reynold QC and Helen Gower (instructed by Hancock Caffin, Truro) for the employee in the first appeal.

David Reade (instructed by Morrison & Foerster LLP) for the employer in the first appeal.

Karon Monaghan (instructed by Anthony Robinson) for the employee in the second appeal.

David Griffith-Jones QC and Keith Bryant (instructed by Gerard Curran) for the employer in the second appeal.

Robin Allen QC and Sandhya Drew (instructed by Pauline Hughes, Manchester) for the employees in the third appeal.

Adrian Lynch QC and Thomas Kibling (instructed by Eversheds, Nottingham, and Greenwoods, Peterborough) for the employers in the third appeal.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

19 June 2003. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD.

[1] My Lords, the principal question raised by these appeals is whether discriminatory acts done by an employer after termination of an employee's contract of employment are outside the scope of the anti-discrimination legislation. The first appeal raises this question in the context of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975, the second appeal in the context of the Race Relations Act 1976, and the third appeal in the context of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. In each case the issue has been decided as a preliminary point, without a full investigation of the facts. The facts relevant for the purpose of this preliminary point, as found or agreed for this purpose, can be summarised as follows.

THE SEX DISCRIMINATION CASE: MS RHYS-HARPER

[2] The discriminatory act alleged in the sex discrimination case is a little unusual. It relates to an employer's failure properly to investigate a sexual harassment complaint first made after the termination of the contract of employment. Christine Rhys-Harper was employed by Relaxion Group plc (Relaxion), now known as Leisure Connection plc, as a lifeguard and general assistant at the Helston Sports Centre. In October 1998 she was summarily dismissed on the grounds of misconduct, after a disciplinary hearing conducted by her manager, Mr Osborn. She had been rude to customers. Her contract of employment ended on 22 October.

[3] She then availed herself of her right to appeal against the decision to dismiss her. The appeal hearing took place on 9 November. It was conducted by the general manager, Mr Adamson. In the course of this hearing Ms Rhys-Harper complained that during her employment Mr Osborn had regularly subjected her to sexual harassment. On 30 November she was informed that her appeal had been dismissed. She was told also that the company had investigated the sexual harassment complaint, and had concluded there was insufficient evidence to establish a case against Mr Osborn.

[4] On 15 February 1999 Ms Rhys-Harper made an application to an employment tribunal in respect of unfair dismissal and sex discrimination. The discrimination alleged was sexual harassment during her employment and, additionally, failure to carry out a proper investigation of her sexual harassment complaint. In April 1999, after a preliminary hearing, the tribunal ruled that the complaint to the tribunal regarding the series of incidents of sexual harassment was made outside the prescribed period of three months. The claim should have been lodged by early January 1999. But Relaxion's decision, given on 30 November after investigation of Ms Rhys-Harper's complaint, could be in itself a continuing discrimination against her. She had not been seen during the investigation, nor had she been able to challenge the evidence of witnesses. So time ran from 30 November, and her sex discrimination application was in time.

[5] Relaxion appealed against this ruling in respect of the alleged post-termination discrimination. The Employment Appeal Tribunal (EAT), presided over by Judge Collins, allowed the appeal. The EAT rightly regarded itself as bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Adekeye v Post Office [1997] IRLR 105, [1997] ICR 110. Adekeye's case was a decision in respect of the 1976 Act, but the relevant provisions in the 1975 Act are indistinguishable. The Court of Appeal, comprising Pill, Mantell and Buxton LJJ, dismissed Ms Rhys-Harper's appeal against that decision ([2001] EWCA Civ 634, [2001] IRLR 460, [2001] ICR 1176). Buxton LJ said (at [25]) that Peter Gibson LJ's conclusion in Adekeye's case was 'entirely persuasive'. Ms Rhys-Harper has now appealed to your Lordships' House.

THE RACIAL DISCRIMINATION CASE: MR D'SOUZA

[6] The complaint in the racial discrimination case also is a little unusual. The discrimination alleged is the employer's failure to comply with a reinstatement order made by an employment tribunal. Donald D'Souza was employed by the London Borough of Lambeth (Lambeth) as an information systems group manager until his dismissal in January 1990. The employment tribunal upheld a complaint by Mr D'Souza that he had been unfairly dismissed, discriminated against on racial grounds and victimised within the meaning of the 1976 Act. The tribunal ordered Lambeth to reinstate Mr D'Souza by 16 January 1993. On 25 March 1993 Lambeth told Mr D'Souza it was not willing to do so.

[7] Two years later, on 11 July 1995, the employment tribunal held that it had not been practicable for Lambeth to reinstate Mr D'Souza. By a decision sent to the parties on 18 October 1995, an award of compensation was made in favour of Mr D'Souza, having regard to Lambeth's failure to reinstate Mr D'Souza. Meanwhile, in July 1995 Mr D'Souza had made two further applications to the employment tribunal, the subject of each being Lambeth's alleged racial discrimination and victimisation in deciding not to reinstate him. The employment tribunal held that, following the decision in Adekeye's case, it had no jurisdiction to hear these applications.

[8] The EAT, under the presidency of Morison J, dismissed an appeal by Mr D'Souza ([2000] All ER (D) 878). In so doing the EAT followed Adekeye's case, as it was obliged to do. But the EAT did not disguise its unease, saying: '... we are of the view that the Adekeye decision fails to give effect to the intention of Parliament to provide a comprehensive legislative code.' The Court of Appeal, comprising Schiemann, Robert Walker LJJ and Lloyd J, dismissed Mr D'Souza's further appeal ([2001] EWCA Civ 794, [2001] All ER (D) 346 (May)). Schiemann LJ said ([at 17]) that the court saw 'some force' in the submission that the decision in Adekeye's case could have gone the other way.

[9] Mr D'Souza has now appealed against this decision. His appeal is supported by the Commission for Racial Equality.

THE DISABILITY DISCRIMINATION CASES

[10] The third appeal comprises four disability cases. Each case involves victimisation. Each applicant claims he was discriminated against because he had previously made an application to an employment tribunal. In three of the four cases the alleged victimisation concerns the provision of a reference after the termination of the contract of employment.

[11] Mr Kirker's complaint is of this character. Nicholas Kirker was employed by British Sugar plc as a shift chemist until he was dismissed in March 1997. He has very poor eyesight and is registered as fully blind. He claimed he had been discriminated against as a disabled person and unfairly dismissed. Both claims succeeded in the employment tribunal and were upheld by the EAT ([2002] ICR 341).

[12] In August 1997 he applied for a job as a warehouse operative, through a company called Ambitions Personnel. He gave British Sugar as a referee. He was not appointed to the post he sought, although the position remained unfilled.

[13] Mr Kirker then made an application to an employment tribunal against Ambitions Personnel, alleging disability discrimination. He later joined British Sugar, alleging victimisation. He claimed that the reference supplied by British Sugar to Ambitions Personnel was unsatisfactory. British Sugar successfully applied to have the claim against it struck out, on the basis of the Adekeye decision. The tribunal was plainly unhappy at being obliged to follow and apply this decision, observing that 'a more purposive approach ... might now find more support in today's social and judicial climate'.

[14] Next, Mrs Angel. Diana Angel was employed by New Possibilities NHS Trust until July 1998, when she was dismissed from her nursing post because she suffered from back and hip problems. She made a successful claim to an employment tribunal in respect of her dismissal. In January 2000 the NHS Trust supplied a reference for her to a prospective employer. This contained material she considered to be adverse because of her earlier proceedings. In March 2000 she presented a second application to an employment tribunal, complaining of victimisation. Following a preliminary hearing the tribunal ruled, in August 2000, that it had no jurisdiction to hear the complaint.

[15] The third in this trilogy of 'reference' cases is that of Mrs Bond. Charmaine Bond suffers from back injuries sustained in a road accident. She was employed by Hackney Citizens' Advice Bureau until she was made redundant in October 1999. She then made three successive applications to an employment tribunal: in November 1999, when she claimed she had been discriminated against on account of her disability; in January 2000, when she alleged breach of contract and unlawful deduction of wages; and in June 2000, when she presented the application now under consideration. In this application she claimed she had been victimised in that the bureau had refused to supply her with a reference and had given false information in reply to inquiries by two companies which had insured her property in respect of mortgage repayments. The alleged acts of victimisation all related to periods after her employment with the bureau had come to an end. In October 2000 the tribunal dismissed the claim of victimisation, because she was not a person whom the bureau was employing at the relevant date. The tribunal considered this outcome was 'unsatisfactory and wrong in principle'.

[16] The fourth disability discrimination case is that of Mr Jones. Gerald Jones was employed by 3M Healthcare Ltd (3M) as a computer network analyst until dismissed in November 1997. He brought proceedings, which were unsuccessful, for unfair dismissal and sex and disability discrimination. While employed Mr Jones had received business cards from other organisations. He had left these cards in his office when his employment ended. In September 1999 he asked 3M to return the cards, but the company declined to do so. Mr Jones then brought proceedings in the county court, and the cards were delivered to him pursuant to an order of the court made in February 2000. Thereafter, in March 2000, Mr Jones made an application to an employment tribunal, complaining that in respect of 3M's earlier refusal to return the cards he had been subjected to victimisation and discrimination on the grounds of sex and disability, the disability being severe clinical depression. The tribunal held it had no jurisdiction to hear the claims under the 1995 Act, because at the time he was not employed by 3M, but that it did have jurisdiction to hear the victimisation claim made under the 1975 Act. This conclusion, which draws a distinction between a claim for victimisation under the 1975 Act and a similar claim under the 1995 Act, derives from the impact of Council Directive (EEC) 76/207 (OJ 1976 L39 p 40) (the Equal Treatment Directive). This directive is applicable to sex discrimination but not racial or disability discrimination.

[17] All four disability claimants appealed from the adverse decisions of the employment tribunals. Their appeals were heard together by the EAT under the presidency of Lindsay J. After reviewing the authorities the EAT dismissed the appeals. In doing so Lindsay J commented that this outcome was unsatisfactory, adding ([2002] ICR 341 at 358 (para 44)): '... if there is any escape other than by legislative amendment, it lies only, as it seems to us, in the House of Lords.'

[18] The four claimants then appealed to the Court of Appeal. The court, comprising Pill, Mummery and Latham LJJ, dismissed the appeals ([2002] EWCA Civ 304, (2002) 70 BMLR 1, [2002] ICR 1124). Mummery LJ said (at [12] and [21]) that the meaning of the legislation was plain. This further appeal to your Lordships' House is supported by the Disability Rights Commission.

THE STATUTORY PROVISIONS

[19] The basic structure of the 1975 Act and the 1976 Act is familiar enough. These are parallel Acts, using the same concepts. Much of the language is identical. Each statute defines discrimination, and prohibits discriminatory conduct over a wide range of activities in specified fields, of which the primary one is employment. Sanctions are provided for breaches of the prohibitions. Each Act established a commission: the Equal Opportunities Commission, in the case of the 1975 Act, and the Commission for Racial Equality, in the case of the 1976 Act. The duties of the Equal Opportunities Commission were to work towards the elimination of sex discrimination, to promote equality of opportunity between men and women, and to keep under review the working of the Act and the Equal Pay Act 1970. The Commission for Racial Equality was given comparable duties regarding racial discrimination. The Disability Rights Commission, established by the Disability Rights Commission Act 1999, exercises similar functions regarding disability discrimination.

[20] I can note first the relevant provisions of the 1975 Act. Nothing turns, for the purpose of the present appeals, on the precise wording of the definition of sex discrimination in ss 1 and 2. Suffice to say, under s 1(1)(a) a person discriminates directly against a woman, in any circumstances relevant for the purposes of any provision of the Act, if 'on the ground of her sex he treats her less favourably than he treats or would treat a man'. Under s 1(1)(b) discrimination also embraces 'indirect' discrimination. Stated very broadly, this consists of applying to a woman a requirement or condition which would equally be applied to a man but which can less readily be complied with by women. Section 2 applies the s 1 definition in the converse case of less favourable treatment of a man.

[21] Section 4 provides that discrimination also includes victimisation. Essentially this comprises treating a person less favourably in retaliation for her having exercised her rights under the 1975 Act or under the 1970 Act or having assisted others to do so. Section 4(1) provides:

> 'A person ("the discriminator") discriminates against another person ("the person victimised") in any circumstances relevant for the purposes of any provision of this Act if he treats the person victimised less favourably than in those circumstances he treats or would treat other persons, and does so by reason that the person victimised has—(a) brought proceedings against the discriminator or any other person under this Act or the Equal Pay Act 1970, or (b) given evidence or information in connection with proceedings brought by any person against the discriminator or any other person under this Act or the Equal Pay Act 1970, or (c) otherwise done anything under or by reference to this Act or the Equal Pay Act 1970 in relation to the discriminator or any other person, or (d) alleged that the discriminator or any other person has committed an act which (whether or not the allegation so states) would amount to a contravention of this Act or give rise to a claim under the Equal Pay Act 1970, or by reason that the discriminator knows the person victimised intends to do any of those things, or suspects the person victimised has done, or intends to do, any of them.' a Subsection (1) does not apply to treatment of a person by reason of a false allegation not made in good faith.

[22] Against the background of this definition of discrimination, including as it does victimisation under s 4 as well as sex discrimination under ss 1 and 2, I turn to s 6. This concerns discrimination by employers. Section 6(1) renders unlawful certain types of conduct by a prospective employer: b

'It is unlawful for a person, in relation to employment by him at an establishment in Great Britain, to discriminate against a woman—(a) in the arrangements he makes for the purpose of determining who should be offered that employment, or (b) in the terms on which he offers her that employment, or (c) by refusing or deliberately omitting to offer her that employment.' c

[23] Section 6(2) is the key section for present purposes. I have emphasised the crucial phrase: d

'It is unlawful for a person, in the case of a woman employed by him at an establishment in Great Britain, to discriminate against her—(a) in the way he affords her access to opportunities for promotion, transfer or training, or to any other benefits, facilities or services, or by refusing or deliberately omitting to afford her access to them, or (b) by dismissing her, or subjecting her to any other detriment.' e

[24] The structure and provisions of the 1976 Act are in substantially identical terms subject, of course, to discriminatory treatment being related to racial grounds and not, as in the 1975 Act, to the ground of sex. 'Racial grounds' means f grounds of colour, race, nationality or ethnic or national origins. The definitions of racial discrimination and victimisation in s 1(1) and s 2 of the 1976 Act correspond to the definitions of sex discrimination and victimisation in s 1(1) and s 4 of the 1975 Act. Similarly, the prohibition of discrimination against applicants and employees in s 4 of the 1976 Act corresponds in all respects now material to the like prohibition in s 6 of the 1975 Act. Section 4(2) provides: g

'It is unlawful for a person, in the case of a person employed by him at an establishment in Great Britain, to discriminate against that employee—(a) in the terms of employment which he affords him; or (b) in the way he affords him access to opportunities for promotion, transfer or training, or to any other benefits, facilities or services, or by refusing or deliberately omitting to afford him access to them; or (c) by dismissing him, or subjecting him to any other detriment.' (My emphasis.) h

[25] The structure and scope of the relevant provisions in the 1995 Act differ in some respects from the corresponding provisions in the other two Acts. But j the crucial provisions concerning discrimination by employers, although couched in slightly different language, are in the relevant respects to the same effect. Section 1 of the Act defines a disabled person as a person who has a disability. A person has a disability 'if he has a physical or mental impairment which has a substantial and long-term adverse effect on his ability to carry out

normal day-to-day activities'. Section 4(1) prohibits discrimination against applicants for employment. Section 4(2) prohibits discrimination against employees:

> 'It is unlawful for an employer to discriminate against a disabled person whom he employs—(a) in the terms of employment which he affords him; (b) in the opportunities which he affords him for promotion, a transfer, training or receiving any other benefit; (c) by refusing to afford him, or deliberately not affording him, any such opportunity; or (d) by dismissing him, or subjecting him to any other detriment.' (My emphasis.)

This subsection reproduces, in a more modern format and with minor linguistic changes, the corresponding provision in s 4(2) of the 1976 Act. For present purposes the only difference of note is that s 4(2) of the 1995 Act prohibits discrimination by an employer against 'a disabled person whom he employs'. As already mentioned, the corresponding phrase in s 6(2) of the 1975 Act and s 4(2) of the 1976 Act is a person 'employed by him'.

[26] Discrimination is defined in the 1995 Act in terms which, particularly in one respect, give this expression a wider meaning than under the other two Acts. Under s 5(1) an employer discriminates against a disabled person if, for a reason which relates to the disabled person's disability, he treats him less favourably than he treats others to whom that reason does not apply, and he cannot show that the treatment is justified. As under the other two Acts, discrimination also includes discrimination by way of victimisation: see s 55. Additionally, however, under the 1995 Act discrimination includes failure to comply with a s 6 duty which the employer cannot show is justified. A s 6 duty is a duty imposed on an employer to make adjustments to his arrangements, or to the physical features of premises occupied by him, which place the disabled person at a substantial disadvantage in comparison with persons who are not disabled. For this purpose 'arrangements' means arrangements for determining to whom employment should be offered, and terms, conditions or arrangements on which employment, promotion, a transfer, training or other benefit is offered or afforded.

[27] Each of the three Acts contains enforcement provisions. Under s 63 of the 1975 Act a complaint that an unlawful act of discrimination has been committed in the employment field may be made to an employment tribunal. Similar provisions are to be found in s 54 of the 1976 Act, and s 8 of the 1995 Act.

[28] I should next note Directive 76/207, of 9 February 1976. This directive, known colloquially as the Equal Treatment Directive, is concerned only with sex discrimination. The purpose of the Equal Treatment Directive was to put into effect in member states the principle of equal treatment for men and women in respect of several matters, including access to employment and working conditions (see art 1). Article 5 provided that application of the principle of equal treatment with regard to working conditions, including the conditions governing dismissal, means that men and women shall be guaranteed the same conditions without discrimination on the grounds of sex. Article 6 provided that member states should introduce into their national legal systems such measures as are necessary to enable all persons who consider themselves wronged by failure to apply to them the principle of equal treatment within the meaning of art 5 to pursue their claims by judicial process. Article 7 provided that member states should take the necessary measure to protect employees against dismissal by their employers 'as a reaction to a complaint within the undertaking or to any legal proceedings aimed at enforcing compliance with the principle of equal treatment'. In a word, victimisation. The 1975 Act gave effect to this directive in this country.

THE AUTHORITIES

[29] The question whether conduct of an employer after termination of the contract of employment can constitute unlawful discrimination appears to have arisen for decision for the first time in a case which came before the EAT in 1993: Nagarajan v Agnew [1994] IRLR 61, [1995] ICR 520. That was a claim under the 1976 Act. Knox J said that there has to be a 'subsisting employment relationship' at the time when the events contemplated in s 4(2) of the Act occur. The majority of the events listed in that subsection can occur only during employment, the whole provision is couched in the present tense, and had Parliament intended to include post-employment benefits, it would have made that intention explicit (see [1994] IRLR 61 at 65, [1995] ICR 520 at 530–531).

[30] Three years later the point came before the Court of Appeal, on another claim of racial discrimination: Adekeye v Post Office [1997] IRLR 105, [1997] ICR 110. Omolara Adekeye was employed by the Post Office as a customer care officer until summarily dismissed for misconduct. She utilised the internal appeal procedures of the Post Office to appeal against her dismissal. Her appeal was unsuccessful. She then presented a complaint to an employment tribunal, asserting she had been the subject of unlawful racial discrimination in the conduct and outcome of her appeal. The Court of Appeal, comprising Hirst, Peter Gibson and Pill LJJ, followed the decision in Nagarajan's case and held that the employment tribunal had no jurisdiction to entertain Ms Adekeye's complaint. Section 4(2) protects only those whose employment continues at the time of the act of discrimination (see [1997] IRLR 105 at 109, [1997] ICR 110 at 118). Peter Gibson and Pill LJJ considered it was 'unsatisfactory' that the Act does not extend to give a remedy to an ex-employee pursuing an appeal against dismissal.

[31] Meanwhile, the question of jurisdiction regarding post-termination conduct had arisen in the context of a victimisation claim. Belinda Coote presented a complaint against her former employer, Granada Hospitality Ltd (Granada). She had been employed as a bowling centre manager until dismissed. She brought a claim for sex discrimination against Granada, asserting she had been dismissed because of pregnancy. That claim was settled. Subsequently she presented another complaint, asserting that Granada's refusal to provide a reference to an employment agency was in retaliation for the claim she had previously brought against Granada. The EAT referred a question to the European Court of Justice.

[32] The European Court held that the 'principle of effective judicial control' laid down in art 6 would be deprived of an essential part of its effectiveness if the protection afforded did not cover retaliatory steps. Fear of such retaliation, if no legal redress were available, might deter employees from pursuing sex discrimination claims. That would be liable seriously to jeopardise the aim of the Equal Treatment Directive. The court rejected the United Kingdom government's argument that retaliatory steps were outside the scope of the directive if taken after the employment relationship had ended (see Coote v Granada Hospitality Ltd Case C-185/97 [1998] All ER (EC) 865, [1999] ICR 100, [1998] ECR I-5199).

[33] The EAT then resumed its hearing of Ms Coote's appeal (see Coote v Granada Hospitality Ltd (No 2) [1999] IRLR 452, [1999] ICR 942). In the light of the judgment of the European Court the EAT, presided over by Morison J, declined to follow Adekeye's case. The phrase 'in the case of a woman employed by him' in s 6(2) of the 1975 Act was capable of embracing the case of a woman 'who has been employed by him'. Thus it was possible to construe s 6(2) in a way which would conform with the Equal Treatment Directive as authoritatively interpreted by the European Court. Section 6(2) should be so interpreted. Accordingly, the employment tribunal had jurisdiction to entertain Ms Coote's claim even though the act of victimisation of which she complained had occurred after her dismissal.

THE INTERPRETATION OF THE LEGISLATION: 'EMPLOYED BY HIM' AND 'WHOM HE EMPLOYS'

[34] Two points relevant to the interpretation of the legislation are tolerably clear. First, the decisions in Adekeye's case and Coote's case are inconsistent. Coote's case was a case of victimisation, Adekeye's case seemingly was not. But, for the purpose now in hand, it is not possible to differentiate between victimisation and other forms of discrimination. Section 6(2) of the 1975 Act, containing the phrase 'employed by him', is a single provision governing all forms of discrimination prohibited by that subsection. The proper interpretation of s 6(2), whatever it may be, applies equally to all forms of discrimination prohibited by that subsection, sex discrimination as defined in ss 1 and 2 as well as victimisation as defined in s 4. The position is the same under s 4(2) of the 1976 Act and s 4(2) of the 1995 Act.

[35] Next, although this may be more controversial, s 6(2) of the 1975 Act, s 4(2) of the 1976 Act and s 4(2) of the 1995 Act all bear the same meaning on the point now in issue. (In saying this I am leaving aside for the moment any special implications the Equal Treatment Directive may have on the interpretation of the 1975 Act.) The only distinction between the language of these three Acts is the distinction already mentioned: the 1975 Act and the 1976 Act use the phrase 'employed by him', and the 1995 Act uses the expression 'whom he employs'. I consider this is a distinction without a difference. In the context of s 6(2) of the 1975 Act and s 4(2) of the 1976 Act, the phrase 'employed by him', although ambiguous, is more naturally to be read as having the meaning adopted when the phrase was reproduced in s 4(2) of the 1995 Act: a person 'whom he employs'.

[36] Translated into practical terms, where does this lead? The context in which these expressions are used includes benefits arising from a contract of employment. A contract of employment creates an employment relationship between two persons, an employer and an employee. It is a matter of ordinary experience that incidents of the employment relationship thus created often continue beyond the termination of the contract of employment which gave rise to the relationship. When a contract of employment ends the employee ceases to be obliged to work for the employer, and the employer ceases to be obliged to employ the employee. But the ending of these obligations does not normally signify a complete end to all aspects of the relationship between employer and employee. Frequently contractual obligations, express or implied, accrue or continue after the period of employment has come to an end. An employee may be subject to obligations of confidentiality or restrictions on where he may work or for whom he may work. An employer may be subject to obligations regarding pension rights or bonus payments. These obligations are matters of contractual right. Frequently also, an employee continues to enjoy, although not as a matter of contractual entitlement, other benefits arising in respect of his employment. One important example, of everyday occurrence, is the opportunity to obtain a reference to assist the employee in obtaining a new job. Another example is the employee's opportunity to have recourse to internal appeal or grievance procedures in respect of his dismissal. Sometimes this is a matter of contractual right, sometimes not.

[37] To my mind the natural and proper interpretation of s 6(2) of the 1975 Act and the corresponding provisions in the other two Acts in this context is that once two persons enter into the relationship of employer and employee, the employee is intended to be protected against discrimination by the employer in respect of all the benefits arising from that relationship. The statutory provisions are concerned with the manner in which the employer conducts himself, vis-à-vis the employee, with regard to all the benefits arising from his employment, whether as a matter of strict legal entitlement or not. This being the purpose, it would make no sense to draw an arbitrary line at the precise moment when the contract of employment ends, protecting the employee against discrimination in respect of all benefits up to that point but in respect of none thereafter.

[38] If such a hard and fast line were drawn at this point it would mean that the employee who asks for a reference before he retires from his employment is protected but the employee who asks for a reference the day after he left is not. It would mean that the employee who is dismissed with notice and whose appeal is heard before his notice expires is protected against discrimination in his recourse to the employer's appeal procedure, but the employee who is dismissed summarily and without notice is not. It would mean that retaliatory action taken by an employer before the contract of employment ends is within the scope of the legislation, but retaliatory action taken later, for instance, regarding bonus payments, is not.

[39] This cannot have been the intention of Parliament. Dismissal is one of the matters in respect of which discrimination is expressly prohibited by the statutes. Parliament cannot have intended that this prohibition should include an appeal decision regarding dismissal if the appeal is heard before the dismissal takes effect but not if it is heard later. That would be palpably absurd. Dismissal cannot have been intended to have such an artificially limited meaning. Nor can it have been intended that reprisals may be exacted, so long as they are postponed until after the employee has been dismissed. Nor can a sensible distinction be drawn between giving a reference the day before employment ends and giving a reference the day after.

[40] I recognise that a line has to be drawn somewhere between what is prohibited and what is not. I recognise also the pioneering character of the anti-discrimination legislation. Parliament may well have chosen to advance cautiously, one step at a time, while experience accumulates on the practical working of the legislation and guidance is forthcoming from the expert commissions entrusted with the task of keeping the law under review. But these considerations do not point to the conclusion that, when enacting this new form of legislation, Parliament intended to ban discrimination in respect of some of the benefits in respect of an employee's employment but not others, with the distinction between the two categories being self-evidently capricious.

[41] Nor am I impressed with the argument that prohibiting post-termination acts of discrimination would expose employers to 'long tail' liability. Fears have been expressed about the potentially burdensome nature of this liability regarding, in particular, the provision of references. Liability in respect of post-termination acts of discrimination would, it is said, enable a discontented former employee to harass his former employer, perhaps years later, when he is provided with an unfavourable reference or a reference is refused altogether.

[42] There are several strands interwoven in this expression of concern. They must be separated and considered one by one. First, whenever an employer gives a reference for a person currently employed by him he is subject to common law duties of care as well as statutory non-discrimination obligations. I can see no reason why in this regard the position should be different, or regarded as more onerous, if a reference is provided for a former employee as distinct from a current employee. If an employer provides a reference for a former employee he must do so as fairly as he would for a current employee. Second, regarding refusal to provide a reference, the question of discrimination can only arise if the employer's normal practice is to provide references for former employees on request. If that is the employer's practice, there is surely nothing burdensome in requiring him not to discriminate in the way he implements this practice. He must not treat one former employee less favourably than another on grounds of sex or race or disability or by way of victimisation. If, however, it is not the employer's practice to give references for former employees, for example, after the lapse of a certain time, then refusal of a reference after that time cannot give rise to a well-founded discrimination claim. In such a case there would be no question of the employer subjecting the former employee to a detriment. Third, the prospect of former employers being harassed with unfounded, vexatious claims cannot be a good reason for refusing to entertain well-founded claims. The appropriate response to this understandable concern of employers is for employment tribunals to be alert to strike out manifestly ill-founded claims as vexatious.

[43] For these reasons I respectfully disagree with the decision in Adekeye v Post Office [1997] IRLR 105, [1997] ICR 110. I understand the reasoning which attracted the Court of Appeal. But I consider this reasoning attaches insufficient importance to the capricious results which follow from a too literal interpretation of the statutory language. The Adekeye interpretation is insufficiently purposive. It pays insufficient heed to the context.

[44] The preferable approach is to recognise that in each of the relevant statutory provisions the employment relationship is the feature which triggers the employer's obligation not to discriminate in the stated respects. This is the connection between two persons which Parliament has identified as requisite for these purposes. Once triggered, the obligation not to discriminate applies to all the incidents of the employment relationship, whenever precisely they arise. For the reasons already given, this obligation cannot sensibly be regarded as confined to the precise duration of the period of employment if there are incidents of the employment which fall to be dealt with after the employment has ended. Some benefits accrue during the period of employment, some afterwards. For the purposes of discrimination, there is no rational ground for distinguishing the one from the other. They all arise equally from the employee's employment.

[45] To be an 'incident' of the employment relationship for this purpose the benefit in question must arise between employer or former employer as such and employee or former employee as such. A reference is a prime example. Further, save perhaps in exceptional circumstances which it is difficult to envisage, failure to provide a non-contractual benefit will not constitute a 'detriment', or discrimination in an opportunity to receive a 'benefit', within the meaning of the anti-discrimination legislation unless the non-contractual benefit in question is one which normally is provided, or would be provided, to others in comparable circumstances. This is so with regard to current employees. It is equally so with former employees. But I stress this is not to say that an employer's practice regarding current employees is to be treated as equally applicable to former employees. This is emphatically not so. The two situations are not comparable. What is comparable is the way the employer treats the claimant former employee and the normal way he treats or would treat other former employees in similar circumstances.

[46] I add, as a footnote, that the question whether the s 6 duty imposed by the 1995 Act continues after the termination of the contract of employment is a separate question which does not call for decision on these appeals. I prefer to leave that question open.

THE APPEALS

[47] I would therefore allow the appeal concerning the four disability discrimination cases. The employment tribunal has jurisdiction to consider each of these four victimisation claims.

[48] I would also allow Ms Rhys-Harper's appeal in the sex discrimination case. Whether Ms Rhys-Harper's claim has any reasonable prospect of success is not a relevant consideration on the issue of jurisdiction which alone is the issue under consideration by the House. I should add, in the context of this claim under the 1975 Act, that I have reached the conclusion expressed above on the proper interpretation of all three Acts without regard to the impact of the Equal Treatment Directive or the decision of the European Court in Coote v Granada Hospitality Ltd Case C-185/97 [1998] All ER (EC) 865, [1999] ICR 100, [1998] ECR I-5199. Having regard to the conclusion I have reached, it is not necessary to consider the issues arising out of the Equal Treatment Directive.

[49] In the racial discrimination case Lambeth has another string to its bow in seeking to resist Mr D'Souza's claim on jurisdictional grounds. It will be recalled that the basis of Mr D'Souza's claim is that the council discriminated against him by refusing to reinstate him as ordered by the employment tribunal. This raises the question whether such a refusal is conduct falling within s 4 of the 1976 Act.

[50] I can deal with this issue quite shortly. The effect of the relevant legislation can be summarised as follows. An order for reinstatement made by an employment tribunal is an order that the employer shall treat the employee in all respects as if he had not been dismissed. It is one of the orders an employment tribunal may make, in the exercise of its discretion, if it upholds an employee's complaint that he was unfairly dismissed. If an employer fails to reinstate an employee as ordered the tribunal is required to make an award of compensation for wrongful dismissal, with an additional award where the employer fails to satisfy the tribunal that it was not practicable to comply with the order: see ss 68, 69 and 71 of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978, now ss 112–114 and 117 of the Employment Rights Act 1996.

[51] In my view the benefit acquired by an employee from a reinstatement order cannot be regarded as a benefit within the meaning of s 4(2) of the 1976 Act. It does not arise from the employment relationship. It derives from an order of the tribunal, made in the exercise of its discretion, after the employee has been unfairly dismissed. Such an order is a discretionary statutory remedy for unfair dismissal, attracting its own sanctions in the event of non-compliance. Nor, for the like reason, can the employer's failure to comply with the order be regarded as a detriment within s 4(2).

[52] Nor does the case fall within s 4(1). Lambeth's conduct is not readily characterised as 'deliberately omitting to offer' Mr D'Souza employment within the meaning of s 4(1)(c). The nature of Lambeth's act was different. Lambeth was not in the normal position of a prospective employer. What Lambeth did was to fail to comply with a tribunal order which required the council to restore an employee to the employment from which he had been dismissed. That characterisation, coupled with the feature that the statute itself provides remedies for non-compliance with a reinstatement order, points strongly away from this circumstance being within s 4(1)(c) of the 1976 Act. I would so hold.

[53] Since, then, the discriminatory conduct alleged by Mr D'Souza does not fall within the ambit of s 4 of the 1976 Act, the employment tribunal has no jurisdiction to entertain his complaint. For this reason I would dismiss Mr D'Souza's appeal.

LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD.

[54] My Lords, these three appeals raise an important point about the present state of the law which prohibits discrimination in the field of employment. Common to all three is an issue of statutory construction. In three separate enactments Parliament has made it unlawful for employers to discriminate on the grounds of sex, race and disability. It is not in doubt that statutory protection against discrimination and victimisation has been given to prospective and existing employees. The area of doubt to which these appeals have been directed relates to the position of ex-employees. The question is whether the statutory protection extends to persons who are no longer employed by the employer and, if so, in what circumstances.

[55] There are two other questions each of which affects one appeal only which also need to be answered. In order to set the scene I must first set out the facts which have provided the background to your Lordships' examination of all these issues.

THE FACTS

(1) Relaxion Group plc v Rhys-Harper

[56] The appellant, Christine Lillian Rhys-Harper, was employed by the respondent in November 1997 as a lifeguard and general assistant at the Helston Sports Centre. On 3 October 1998 an incident occurred there as a result of which a complaint was made to her employers that the appellant had been rude to customers. She was suspended from her duties, and on 12 October 1998 the manager of the centre, Mr Osborn, conducted a disciplinary hearing which resulted in a decision that she should be dismissed on the ground of misconduct. Her dismissal was confirmed by Mr Osborn by a letter dated 15 October 1998, in which he told her that she would be receiving one week's pay in lieu of notice. She exercised her right of appeal under the respondent's disciplinary procedure.

[57] The appeal hearing was conducted by the respondent's general manager, Mr Adamson. It took place on 9 November 1998. In the course of the hearing the appellant alleged that throughout her employment she had been regularly subjected to sexual harassment by Mr Osborn. Following the appeal hearing the appellant received two letters from Mr Adamson. In the first, which was undated, he told her that, having investigated the events, the company had found that there were sufficient grounds to dismiss her and that the decision to do so was to stand. In the second, which was dated 30 November 1998, he told her that the company had carried out a full and thorough investigation into her allegation of sexual harassment against Mr Osborn at the appeal hearing and that the company's finding was that there was insufficient evidence to establish a case against him.

[58] On 18 February 1999 the appellant presented an application to the employment tribunal for unfair dismissal and sex discrimination. In her claim of sex discrimination she complained of sexual harassment and that the allegation relating to this matter which she had made at the appeal hearing had not been properly investigated. The tribunal referred the matter to a preliminary hearing to determine whether these claims had been lodged within the prescribed three-month time limit. A majority of the tribunal, the chairman dissenting, held that she had been dismissed on 30 November 1998, that the decision following the investigation into the allegation of sexual harassment could amount to continuing discrimination and that the claims of unfair dismissal and sex discrimination had been brought in time.

[59] The respondent appealed to the Employment Appeal Tribunal (EAT), which held that the appellant's employment terminated on 22 October 1998 at the end of her period of one week's notice and that her claim for unfair dismissal was out of time. It also held that it had no jurisdiction to consider her allegation of sex discrimination in regard to the alleged failure by the respondent to carry out a proper investigation of her allegation of sexual harassment as the discriminatory conduct was alleged to have occurred after her employment had ended. The appellant appealed on the question of jurisdiction only, but her appeal on this point was dismissed by the Court of Appeal (Pill, Mantell and Buxton LJJ) ([2001] EWCA Civ 634, [2001] IRLR 460, [2001] ICR 1176).

[60] The relevant provisions of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 (s 1 of which as originally enacted has been substituted by reg 3 of the Sex Discrimination (Indirect Discrimination and Burden of Proof) Regulations 2001, SI 2001/2660 are as follows:

'PART I

DISCRIMINATION TO WHICH ACT APPLIES ...

1. Direct and indirect discrimination against women.—(1) In any circumstances relevant for the purposes of any provision of this Act, other than a provision to which subsection (2) applies, a person discriminates against a woman if—(a) on the ground of her sex he treats her less favourably than he treats or would treat a man, or ...

'PART II

DISCRIMINATION IN THE EMPLOYMENT FIELD ...

6. Discrimination against applicants and employees.—(1) It is unlawful for a person, in relation to employment by him at an establishment in Great Britain, to discriminate against a woman—(a) in the arrangements he makes for the purpose of determining who should be offered that employment, or (b) in the terms on which he offers her that employment, or (c) by refusing or deliberately omitting to offer her that employment.

(2) It is unlawful for a person, in the case of a woman employed by him at an establishment in Great Britain, to discriminate against her—(a) in the way he affords her access to opportunities for promotion, transfer or training, or to any other benefits, facilities or services, or by refusing or deliberately omitting to afford her access to them, or (b) by dismissing her, or subjecting her to any other detriment.'

(2) D'Souza v Lambeth London BC

[61] The appellant, Donald D'Souza, was employed by the respondents (Lambeth) until his dismissal in January 1990. His complaint is of racial discrimination and victimisation under s 4(2), or alternatively under s 4(1), of the Race Relations Act 1976.

[62] On 11 April 1990, following his dismissal, the appellant commenced proceedings against the respondents in which he alleged unfair dismissal, race discrimination and victimisation. On 16 November 1992 the employment tribunal held that he had been unfairly dismissed within the meaning of s 57 of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 and that he had been unlawfully discriminated against on racial grounds and victimised within the meaning of the 1976 Act. The tribunal ordered the respondents to reinstate him by 16 January 1993. On 25 March 1993 the respondents informed the appellant that they were not willing to do so. The appellant made a further application for reinstatement on 31 July 1995, in response to which the respondent claimed that the relationship between them had broken down and that the post which he had previously occupied was no longer available. On 14 August 1995 the tribunal determined that it had not been reasonably practicable for the respondents to reinstate him, and it declined to make an award of compensation for the failure to reinstate under s 71(2)(b) of the 1978 Act. But on 18 October 1995 the tribunal made an award of compensation for the unfair dismissal, having regard to the fact that he was not reinstated.

[63] In the meantime on 1 July 1995 the appellant commenced separate proceedings in which he claimed that the original decision not to reinstate him was caused by discrimination and victimisation. It is these proceedings with which this appeal is concerned.

[64] On 14 March 1996 the tribunal determined that it had no jurisdiction to hear these complaints, as a person who was seeking to be restored to his former employment was not within the categories of persons who are protected against racial discrimination and victimisation under the 1976 Act. That decision was affirmed by the EAT, and an appeal against its decision was dismissed by the Court of Appeal (Schiemann, Robert Walker LJJ and Lloyd J) on 25 May 2001 ([2001] EWCA Civ 794, [2001] All ER (D) 346 (May)).

[65] The relevant provisions of the 1976 Act are as follows:

'PART I

DISCRIMINATION TO WHICH ACT APPLIES ...

1. Racial discrimination.—(1) A person discriminates against another in any circumstances relevant for the purposes of any provision of this Act if—(a) on racial grounds he treats that other less favourably than he treats or would treat other persons; or ...

2. Discrimination by way of victimisation.—(1) A person ("the discriminator") discriminates against another person ("the person victimised") in any circumstances relevant for the purposes of any provision of this Act if he treats the person victimised less favourably than in those circumstances he treats or would treat other persons, and does so by reason that the person victimised has—(a) brought proceedings against the discriminator or any other person under this Act; or ... (d) alleged that the discriminator or any other person has committed an act which (whether or not the allegation so states) would amount to a contravention of this Act ...

PART II

DISCRIMINATION IN THE EMPLOYMENT FIELD ...

4. Applicants and employees.—(1) It is unlawful for a person, in relation to employment by him at an establishment in Great Britain, to discriminate against another—(a) in the arrangements he makes for the purpose of determining who should be offered that employment; or (b) in the terms on which he offers him that employment; or (c) by refusing or deliberately omitting to offer him that employment.

(2) It is unlawful for a person, in the case of a person employed by him at an establishment in Great Britain, to discriminate against that employee—(a) in the terms of employment which he affords him; or (b) in the way he affords him access to opportunities for promotion, transfer or training, or to any other benefits, facilities or services, or by refusing or deliberately omitting to afford him access to them; or (c) by dismissing him, or subjecting him to any other detriment.'

(3) Jones v 3M Healthcare Ltd and other appeals

[66] This is a group of four appeals all of which raise the same question about the right to compensation for post-employment victimisation under s 4(2) of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. In summary the facts in each of these cases is as follows.

Nicholas Kirker

[67] The appellant has very poor eyesight, which has made him eligible for full registration as a blind person. He was employed by British Sugar plc at Newark as a shift chemist but was dismissed for redundancy on 17 March 1997. He claimed that he had been discriminated against as a disabled person. His claim was successful in the employment tribunal and upheld by the EAT ([1998] IRLR 624). On 13 August 1999 he applied for a position as a warehouse operative with Ambitions Personnel and named British Sugar as a referee. The manager at its Newark facility completed and returned the reference questionnaire which Ambitions Personnel had sent to him, but it was apparently not received and the appellant's application was rejected for lack of a reference. When this was brought to his attention the manager sent another copy of it to Ambitions Personnel as the position was still vacant, but the appellant was not appointed to fill the position. On 10 November 1999 he presented an application to the employment tribunal alleging disability discrimination against Ambitions Personnel. On 7 February 2000 he applied successfully for British Sugar to be joined as second respondent on the ground that it had victimised him by failing to respond to the application for a reference.

Gerald Philip Jones

[68] The appellant suffers from severe clinical depression. He was dismissed by 3M Healthcare in November 1997. He brought proceedings against them for unfair dismissal and disability discrimination, but they were dismissed on 26 August 1998. On 12 September 1999 he asked 3M Healthcare to return his business cards which he had left in the office when he was dismissed. They refused to return the cards as they considered that they belonged to them. On 14 February 2000 the appellant obtained an order for their return from the county court. On 8 March 2000 he presented an application to the employment tribunal complaining that his former employers had subjected him to discrimination and victimisation by refusing to return his business cards.

Diana Angel

[69] The appellant was suffering from back and hip problems when she was dismissed from the post which she had held since July 1993 as a nurse by New Possibilities NHS Trust in July 1998. She claimed that she had been discriminated against on the ground of her disability, and her claim was successful. She then sought employment with Ling Trust. On 12 January 2000 New Possibilities NHS Trust provided a reference to Ling Trust, who decided not to offer her employment. On 16 March 2000 she presented an application to the employment tribunal in which she complained that she had been discriminated against and victimised by New Possibilities NHS Trust by supplying her with an adverse reference.

Charmaine Bond

[70] The appellant suffers from back injuries which she sustained in a road accident. She was employed by Hackney Citizens' Advice Bureau until she was made redundant in October 1994. On 8 November 1999 she presented an application to the employment tribunal in which she claimed that she had been victimised because of her disability. On 6 June 2000 she presented a further application alleging that her former employer had victimised her by refusing to supply her with a reference and giving false information in reply to inquiries by two companies which had insured her property in respect of mortgage repayments.

[71] The employment tribunal held that it had no jurisdiction to consider the appellants' claims of victimisation under the 1995 Act, on the ground that s 4(2) of the Act applied to employees during the course of their employment only and did not extend to persons who were no longer employed on the date when the alleged act of victimisation took place. These decisions were upheld by the EAT ([2002] ICR 341). The appellants appealed, but their appeals were dismissed by the Court of Appeal (Pill, Mummery and Latham LJJ) ([2002] EWCA Civ 304, (2002) 70 BMLR 1, [2002] ICR 1124).

[72] The relevant provisions of the 1995 Act are as follows:

'PART I

DISABILITY

1. ... (1) Subject to the provisions of Schedule 1, a person has a disability for the purposes of this Act if he has a physical or mental impairment which has a substantial and long-term adverse effect on his ability to carry out normal day-to-day activities.

(2) In this Act "disabled person" means a person who has a disability ...

PART II

EMPLOYMENT ...

4. ... (2) It is unlawful for an employer to discriminate against a disabled person whom he employs—(a) in the terms of employment which he affords him; (b) in the opportunities which he affords him for promotion, a transfer, training or receiving any other benefit; (c) by refusing to afford him, or deliberately not affording him, any such opportunity; or (d) by dismissing him, or subjecting him to any other detriment ...

PART VI

SUPPLEMENTAL ...

55. ... (1) For the purposes of Part II or Part III, a person ("A") discriminates against another person ("B") if—(a) he treats B less favourably than he treats or would treat other persons whose circumstances are the same as B's; and (b) he does so for a reason mentioned in subsection (2).

(2) The reasons are that—(a) B has—(i) brought proceedings against A or any other person under this Act; or ... (iv) alleged that A or any other person has (whether or not the allegation so states) contravened this Act; or (b) A believes or suspects that B has done or intends to do any of those things.'

THE PRINCIPAL ISSUE

[73] Section 62(1) of the 1975 Act provides that a contravention of the Act shall incur as such no sanction, whether civil or criminal, except to the extent (if any) expressly provided by that Act. Section 63(1) of that Act provides that a complaint by any person that another person has committed an act of discrimination against the complainant which is unlawful by virtue of Pt II of the Act may be presented to an employment tribunal, and s 65 sets out the remedies that may be given by the tribunal if it finds that a complaint presented under s 63 is well founded. Provisions to the same effect are to be found in ss 53, 54 and 56 of the 1976 Act and in s 8 of the 1995 Act. The effect of these provisions is that complaints of discrimination on grounds of sex, race and disability in the employment field must be presented to an employment tribunal. The question of law which is common to all these cases is whether the employment tribunal has jurisdiction to consider a complaint of discrimination which relates to only acts which are alleged to have taken place after the complainant's employment has come to an end.

[74] The answer to this question depends on the meaning which is to be given in its context to the phrase 'employed by him' in s 6(2) of the 1975 Act and s 4(2) of the 1976 Act and to the phrase 'whom he employs' in s 4(2) of the 1995 Act. As Lord Bingham of Cornhill observed in Anyanwu v South Bank Student Union (Commission for Racial Equality, interveners) [2001] UKHL 14 at [2], [2001] 2 All ER 353 at [2], [2001] ICR 391, this is a trio of Acts which contain similar provisions, although they are directed to different forms of discrimination. It is plain that, when Parliament used the same phrase 'employed by him' in s 4(2) of the 1976 Act as it used in s 6(2) of the 1975 Act, it must have intended that it should be given the same meaning in each of these two Acts. The wording of the equivalent phrase in s 4(2) of the 1995 Act is slightly different, and there are other differences in the layout and wording of that Act in comparison with the Acts which deal with discrimination on the grounds of sex and race. So it will be necessary to consider the meaning which is to be given to the phrase in the 1995 Act separately.

[75] At the end of the hearing of the appeal in Mrs Rhys-Harper's case a further issue was raised by Mr Reynold QC on her behalf. Her complaint had been presented hitherto as a complaint about discrimination after the employment relationship had ended. But in his closing speech Mr Reynold submitted that, as her allegation of sexual harassment was made in the course of her appeal against dismissal, her complaint had a direct bearing on the part played by Mr Adamson who investigated and rejected that complaint and was the decision-taker in her appeal against her dismissal. He accepted that the nexus between her complaint of sexual discrimination investigation in his handling of that allegation and his decision in the appeal against dismissal had not been made clear previously. The point which he sought now to put in issue was that, on a correct analysis of the facts, this was a case of continuing discrimination by victimisation which could be related to the employer's act in dismissing her.

[76] In Mrs Rhys-Harper's case it will also be necessary to take account of the fact that the 1975 Act gave effect in domestic law to Council Directive (EEC) 76/207 (OJ 1976 L39 p 40) (the Equal Treatment Directive). This is a feature which is absent from the other two cases, as the legislation which dealt with discrimination on grounds of race and disability had no equivalent base under the EC Treaty when it was enacted. Council Directive (EEC) 2000/43 (OJ 2000 L180 p 22) (the Race Directive) was adopted under art 13 of the EC Treaty by the United Kingdom and other member states in 2000, but it does not have to be implemented until 19 July 2003. The Community has not yet turned its attention to discrimination in the employment field on the ground of disability.

[77] A further question of law is raised by the case of D'Souza, as he has an alternative argument that the decision of his former employer not to reinstate him when ordered to do so by the employment tribunal was a breach of s 4(1) of the 1976 Act. The question is whether, when it refused to do so, his employer was 'refusing or deliberately omitting to offer him' that employment within the meaning of s 4(1)(c) of that Act.

A BRIEF HISTORY OF THE LEGISLATION

[78] It is a remarkable fact that, although discrimination on whatever grounds is widely regarded as morally unacceptable, the common law was unable to provide a sound basis for removing it from situations where those who were vulnerable to discrimination were at risk and ensuring that all people were treated equally. Experience has taught us that this is a matter which can only be dealt with by legislation, and that it requires careful regulation by Parliament. The Community has adopted the same approach in its promotion of the principle of equal treatment as part of its social action programme. The fact is that the principle of equal treatment is easy to state but difficult to apply in practice. In the result the legislation which is under scrutiny in these appeals is designed to be specific and particular rather than universal in its application, and it is still being developed incrementally. It must, of course, be construed purposively, as Waite LJ said in Jones v Tower Boot Co Ltd [1997] 2 All ER 406 at 413, [1997] ICR 254 at 261–262. But the scope to be given to the legislation is essentially a matter for Parliament. The question which lies at the heart of these appeals is what its intention was when it enacted the provisions in each of these three Acts which deal with discrimination by employers against applicants and employees.

[79] The 1975 Act was designed to give effect to the principles contained in the White Paper Equality for Women (Cmnd 5724) of September 1974. The White Paper stated that the government's ultimate aim was to harmonise the powers and provisions for sex and race discrimination so as to secure genuine equality of opportunity in both fields. It made unlawful discrimination across a wide range of activities in the employment and social fields on the ground of sex and marital status. It drew on experience of the workings of the Race Relations Act 1968 and the Equal Pay Act 1970. In the field of employment it prohibited discrimination in the offering of and other acts preparatory to entering into a contract of employment. It also extended its provisions against discrimination once the contract was entered into to non-contractual aspects of the employment relationship to ensure equality of treatment in the provision of benefits and the avoidance of detriment. The contractual aspects were dealt with by an amendment to s 1(1) of the 1970 Act which substituted for the equal pay clause which was deemed to be included in every contract of employment by that subsection a more broadly framed equality clause. No indication was given in the White Paper of an intention to extend the prohibition to non-contractual acts or omissions by employers once the employment relationship had come to an end, and there is no provision in the Act which expressly addresses this matter. Some indication of the common understanding of the scope of the Act when it was enacted is given by the comment in a general note by the annotator in Current Law Statutes Annotated (1975) vol 2, p 65 that s 6 'provides the general prohibition of discrimination by an employer between prospective and existing employees'. (My emphasis.)

[80] The 1975 Act received the Royal Assent on 12 November 1975. The Equal Treatment Directive 'on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions' was published in the Official Journal on 14 February 1976. The preamble to the directive referred to the Council's resolution of 21 January 1971 concerning a social action programme for the purpose of achieving equality between men and women as regards access to employment and vocational training and promotion 'and as regards working conditions, including pay'. It also referred to Council Directive (EEC) 75/117 (on the approximation of the laws of Member States relating to the application of the principle of equal pay for men and women) (OJ 1975 L45 p 19) and stated that Community action to achieve the principle of equal treatment for men and women in respect of access to employment and vocational training and promotion and 'in respect of other working conditions' appeared to be necessary. No amendment to the 1975 Act to give effect to this directive in domestic law was thought to be necessary.

[81] The 1976 Act was the third enactment dealing with race relations. The first, in 1965, dealt with incitement to racial hatred and made discrimination on racial grounds unlawful in places of public resort. The second, in 1968, widened the prohibition of discrimination to other areas including employment, but it was soon appreciated that further legislation was needed. The 1976 Act too, like the 1975 Act, was preceded in September 1975 by a White Paper: Racial Discrimination (Cmnd 6234). This White Paper gives no indication of an intention to extend the scope of the prohibition of discrimination to acts or omissions by employers after the employment relationship has come to an end. The language and structure of this Act was closely modelled on the 1975 Act. Much of the wording of Pt II in both Acts about discrimination in the employment field, including the sections which deal with discrimination against applicants and employees, is identical.

[82] Provision was made by both of these Acts for keeping the working of the legislation under review. Section 53 of the 1975 Act provided for the establishment of the Equal Opportunities Commission, among whose duties was to be to keep under review the working of that Act and the 1970 Act and, when they were so required by the Secretary of State or otherwise think it necessary, to draw up and submit to the Secretary of State proposals for amending them: see s 53(1)(c). Section 43 of the 1976 Act provided for the establishment of the Commission for Racial Equality with the same duty to keep the working of that Act under review: see s 43(1)(c). This legislation has now been in force, and kept under review, for more than a quarter of a century. No amendments have been introduced with a view to making it clear that the prohibition in the employment field extends to acts or omissions by employers after the employment relationship has come to an end.

[83] The question whether the legislation as originally enacted had that effect, or whether employment must continue to subsist for a person to be 'a person employed by him' does not appear to have been raised until the point was argued for the first time before the EAT in Nagarajan v Agnew [1994] IRLR 61, [1995] ICR 520. In the meantime in De Souza v Automobile Association [1986] IRLR 103 at 107, [1986] ICR 514 at 522 May LJ felt able to say that the word 'detriment' in s 4(2)(c) of the 1976 Act referred to the circumstances in which the person 'had thereafter to work'. (My emphasis.) In Garland v British Rail Engineering Ltd [1982] 2 All ER 402, [1983] 2 AC 751 a female employee complained that she was being discriminated against by her employers who operated a scheme which gave concessionary travel facilities to employees and their families. This facility was available to employees after their retirement, but only male employees had the benefit of it after retirement for their families. An issue was raised as to the meaning to be given to the words 'provision in relation to death or retirement' in s 6(4) of the 1975 Act in the light of art 119 of the EEC Treaty (now art 141 EC). It was held, following a reference to the European Court of Justice, that the scheme was not covered by the exception in s 6(4) because these words should not be construed so widely as to include a privilege which had existed during employment and was allowed by the employer to continue after retirement. The result was that the scheme was subject to the prohibition on discrimination imposed by s 6(2)(a) of the 1975 Act. An important feature of that case, however, was that the employees were entitled to the benefit of the scheme both before and after their retirement. The issue whether s 6(2) was apt to cover things done or omitted to be done by the employer which could be attributed only to a period after the end of the employment relationship was not raised in that case.

[84] In Nagarajan v Agnew [1994] IRLR 61, [1995] ICR 520, in which an ex-employee alleged that he had been victimised by a bad reference from his former manager, the EAT held that the natural meaning of the phrase 'a person employed by him' in s 4(2) of the 1976 Act was that the employment must continue to subsist for the prohibition to apply. Knox J said ([1994] IRLR 61 at 65, [1995] ICR 520 at 531) that the whole provision was couched in the present tense and that, if it had been intended to include benefits, facilities or services or detriments post-employment, Parliament would certainly have made it explicit that that extended meaning was the correct one and it had not done so. In Post Office v Adekeye [1995] IRLR 297, [1995] ICR 540 the EAT held, for the same reasons, that the tribunal had not jurisdiction to hear a complaint about racial discrimination at an internal appeal hearing by a person who was pursing an appeal against her dismissal. But Smith J said ([1995] IRLR 297 at 300, [1995] ICR 540 at 548) that it was unsatisfactory that the Act did not give a remedy to an ex-employee in such circumstances. The decision by the EAT in that case was given on 15 February 1995.

[85] It was against this background that the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 was enacted. It received the Royal Assent on 8 November 1995. Once again the legislation was preceded by a White Paper Ending discrimination against disabled people (Cm 2729) (January 1995). It was stated (para 3.1) that ensuring full and fair access to employment opportunities was a key element in the government's policy of enabling disabled people to be fully active and independent members of society. It was stated (para 3.4) that a new right of non-discrimination in employment was to apply 'in all areas of employment, including recruitment, dismissal, training, career progression, terms of employment and general treatment at work'. No indication was given in the White Paper that it was the intention to extend this right to ex-employees to give them a right of non-discrimination by their former employers after the employment relationship had come to an end. Much of the structure and language of Pt II of the Act which deals with discrimination by employers follows closely the pattern which is to be found in Pt II of the 1975 Act and the 1976 Act, although there are some important differences. In his general note to this Part of the Act the annotator in Current Law Statutes (1995) vol 4, p 50–12 states that the right not to be discriminated against 'covers employees and applicants for employment'. In his note to s 55 (p 50–84), which deals with victimisation, he refers to the report of the decision of the EAT in Nagarajan v Agnew [1994] IRLR 61, [1995] ICR 520 and states that by analogy with that case it seemed likely that the protection against victimisation would be limited to events occurring during the course of employment. This a reminder, if any reminder were needed, that attention had already been drawn to this problem prior to the enactment of the 1995 Act.

[86] Parts VI and VII of the 1995 Act contain a number of provisions which are designed to assist in the working out of the Act in practice. Section 50 provides for the establishment of the National Disability Council among whose duties was to advise the Secretary of State on matters relating to the operation of the Act or of provisions made under it: see s 50(2)(c). Section 53 provides that the Secretary of State may issue codes of practice containing such practical guidance as he considers appropriate with a view to eliminating discrimination in the field of employment against disabled persons and persons who have had a disability and encouraging good practice in relation to such persons. This provision was implemented by the issuing of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 code of practice. Paragraph 2.8 answers the question 'Who counts as an employee under the Act?' It states that 'employee' means anyone whose contract is within the definition of employment in s 68 of the Act, which defines employment as a employment under a contract of service or of apprenticeship or a contract personally to do any work, 'whether or not, for example, he works full-time'. The guidance which the code gives with regard to employment relates entirely to prospective and existing employees. There is no indication that the Secretary of State thought that the Act was designed also to deal with the position of ex-employees after the employment relationship had come to an end, and no guidance whatever is offered on this issue.

[87] The conclusion which I would draw from this history is that up to this point the issue as to whether the prohibition against discrimination should be, or had been, extended to ex-employees had not been specifically addressed either by the government or by the legislature. None of the advisory bodies established under these Acts have asked to intervene in these appeals. Nor was your Lordships' attention drawn to any published statements by any of them indicating their views, either one way or the other, on the questions which the appeals have raised. The practical problems to which the competing interpretations of the relevant sections may give rise in the field of employment as a whole have not been explored.

[88] In an area which is as sensitive and as wide-ranging in its effects as this one, the absence of information of that kind is a significant omission. It inhibits the use of the purposive approach in this case, as we have no clear guide to the scope which was intended to be given to the enactments other than the words which they themselves have used to describe it. The extent to which, if at all, the legislation was intended to apply after the ending of the employment relationship was, of course, a matter for the legislature. In this situation I believe that, subject to the guidance of the European Court of Justice as to the scope to be given to the 1975 Act in the light of the Equal Treatment Directive, your Lordships must approach these questions by examining the language which Parliament used in order to discover what its intention was when the statutes were enacted. It is to this task that I now turn.

THE LANGUAGE OF THE LEGISLATION: INTRODUCTION

[89] The critical words in s 6(2) of the 1975 Act and s 4(2) of the 1976 Act are 'employed by him'. In s 4(2) of the 1995 Act they are 'whom he employs'. The question is whether these words extend to cases where the employment relationship had come to an end at the time of the alleged act of discrimination.

[90] In Adekeye v Post Office [1997] IRLR 105, [1997] ICR 110 this question reached the Court of Appeal for the first time. This was an appeal from the decision of the EAT in Post Office v Adekeye [1995] IRLR 297, [1995] ICR 540. The Court of Appeal held that, in the absence of any express extension of the term 'employee' to include a person whose employment had ceased, the words 'a person employed by him' in s 4(2) of the 1976 Act when given their ordinary and natural meaning in their context excluded a person whose employment had ceased at the time of the act of discrimination. Peter Gibson LJ, with whose judgment Pill and Hirst LJJ agreed, said ([1997] IRLR 105 at 109, [1997] ICR 110 at 118):

> 'I accept the submission of Mr Greening for the Post Office that giving the words "in the case of a person employed by him" their ordinary and natural meaning in their context, those words mean, and can only mean, "in the case of a person who is employed by him". I note that that person is referred to in the next line as "that employee" which is again suggestive of a present and not a past employee ... Further, as Smith J pointed out ([1995] IRLR 297 at 299, [1995] ICR 540 at 544–545) the definition of "employee" in s. 153 Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 (which re-enacted the definition in s. 167(1) Industrial Relations Act 1971) was expressly extended to include a person whose employment had ceased. It is significant that there > is no equivalent extension in the 1976 Act. I therefore conclude that the EAT was right to hold that s. 4(2) protects only those whose employment continues at the time of the act of discrimination.'

[91] The Court of Appeal in each of the three cases which are now before your Lordships appears to have had no difficulty in following and applying the decision in Adekeye's case. In Rhys-Harper v Relaxion Group plc [2001] EWCA Civ 634 at [25], [2001] IRLR 460 at [25], [2001] ICR 1176, Buxton LJ said that he found entirely persuasive the conclusion of Peter Gibson LJ that, when one read the words in s 4(2) of the 1976 Act which are the equivalent of s 6(2) of the 1975 Act, it was inescapable that what was addressed was events occurring during the actual course of employment. After quoting the words of s 6(2)(a) he said (at [26]):

> 'The concept of a person affording "access" to benefits to a woman "employed" by him only makes sense when directed to conduct taking place during the employment relationship. If what was addressed here was conduct towards former employees, not only would that be spelled out in terms, but also language a good deal different from that of providing access to facilities would be used.'

He said that he agreed with Peter Gibson LJ's conclusion that strong indications of post-contract activity within the events listed in that subsection, going beyond mere possibilities, would be needed in order to compel a reading of 'a person employed by him' in the unnatural sense of a person previously employed. In D'Souza v Lambeth London BC [2001] EWCA Civ 794 at [4], [2001] All ER (D) 346 (May) at [4] Schiemann LJ said that the Court of Appeal at the time regarded the decision in Adekeye's case as unsatisfactory but inescapable in the light of the wording of s 4 of the 1976 Act. He also said that it was fair to point out that, despite that expression of dissatisfaction, Parliament in passing the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000, had not seen fit to alter s 4 of the earlier Act in any relevant respect. In Kirker v British Sugar plc, Jones v 3M Healthcare Ltd, Angel v New Possibilities NHS Trust, Bond v Hackney Citizens' Advice Bureau [2002] EWCA Civ 304 at [23], (2002) 70 BMLR 1 at [23], [2002] ICR 1124 Mummery LJ observed the result of his reading of s 4(2) of the 1995 Act was consistent with the decisions in Adekeye's case, Rhys-Harper's case and D'Souza's case. But, as he said (at [25]), the wording of s 4(2) of the 1995 Act is different from that in the two other discrimination Acts, so it would have been possible for a different view to be taken as its meaning in their case without affecting the construction of the 1995 Act.

[92] In Kirker v British Sugar plc Mummery LJ said (at [14]) that on their plain and ordinary meaning the words of s 4(2) of the 1995 Act expressly conferred protection from discrimination by an employer on only two classes of disabled person: first, job applicants, and, secondly, persons 'whom he employs'. He referred to the fact that the words 'whom he employs' is couched in the present tense, which naturally referred to a contractual employment relationship existing at the date of the commission of any of the particular kinds of act referred to in the subsection all of which were plainly referable to events occurring in the course of an existing employment relationship. It was contended in that case that this result was unsatisfactory, arbitrary and contrary to the statutory purpose of the enactment. He responded to this argument (at [21]) in this way:

> 'In my judgment, the meaning of the language of section 4(2) is so plain that, as a matter of construction, the court would not be justified in departing from its natural meaning in order to avoid the predicted consequences. I would add that some surprising consequences might be thought to flow from the construction of section 4(2) proposed by the applicants. For example, a disabled employee, who was fairly dismissed for misconduct after a month of employment, would be entitled for the rest of his life to make claims of discrimination and victimisation against his former employer who would be potentially liable, even for subconscious acts of discrimination and victimisation (see Nagarajan v London Regional Transport [1999] 4 All ER 65, [2000] 1 AC 501) in respect of post-termination acts committed many years later, such as the provision or non-provision of a reference.'

[93] In contrast to the position which has been adopted by the Court of Appeal, Morison J has made his disgreement with the decision in Adekeye's case clear on at least two occasions. In Coote v Granada Hospitality Ltd (No 2) [1999] IRLR 452, [1999] ICR 942, a case under the 1975 Act which was decided following a reference to the European Court of Justice, he said ([1999] IRLR 452 at 454, [1999] ICR 942 at 949) that it seemed to the tribunal that the present tense would have been quite apt had the section been intended to apply to former employees since what is made unlawful is a present act of discrimination. He summed the position up ([1999] IRLR 452 at 455, [1999] ICR 942 at 950):

> 'We have not been persuaded that it could be said that the Court of Appeal's decision was so mistaken (per incuriam) that it need not be followed. We quite see the force of the criticisms made of it. Indeed, we would go further and respectfully say that we disagree with it. But the doctrine of precedent requires us to follow it and had it been applicable to this case we would have done so.'

In D'Souza v Lambeth London BC [2000] All ER (D) 878 he said:

> 'It seems to us that we are bound by the decision in Adekeye's case which must be faithfully followed, although we do so without relish. We can see a strong argument for adopting a purposive approach to s 4 and make it elastic enough to cover acts of discrimination against former employers. The employment relationship, in the most general sense, outlives the contractual relationship: there are references, pension matters, sports clubs and other post-employment events which links an ex-employee with his former employer. It would be intolerable if an employer could blacken the former employee in the market place because he had successfully sued his former employer in a tribunal. If people are frightened by what happens to them if they make a complaint, the evil of discrimination will be more likely to live on. Not all perks and privileges for retired staff could be considered contractual and it is difficult to understand why, if they are dealt with in a discriminatory way, they should not be covered by the Act, since there may be no other available remedy.'

[94] Against this background which indicates that there are powerful views on either side of the argument, I now turn to the language of the statutes themselves. I shall take them in their historical order, although it will not be necessary to say much about the 1976 Act as the wording which it uses is so close to that of the 1975 Act.

THE LANGUAGE OF THE LEGISLATION: THE WORDS THEMSELVES

[95] What is the meaning which is to be given in its context to the phrase 'employed by him' in s 6(2) of the 1975 Act and s 4(2) of the 1976 Act and to the phrase 'whom he employs' in the 1995 Act? I propose to examine this question by stages. I shall start with the wording of s 6(2) of the 1975 Act itself. Then I shall look at other provisions in order to determine how the critical phrase falls to be read in its context. Then I shall look at s 4(2) of the 1976 Act in its context. I shall deal finally with the slightly different wording of s 4(2) of the 1995 Act in its context.

(a) Section 6(2) of the 1975 Act: 'employed by him'

[96] The word 'employed' can serve either as an adjective or as a participle. If it is to serve as an adjective it will be attached to a noun. Here there is no noun, so at least one can say that it is being used in the subsection as a participle. But if it is to serve as a participle, the question whether it is being used as a past participle or as a present participle will depend on the tense of the verb with which it is associated. Here there is no verb. That is not to say that a verb cannot be read into the subsection. But this requires an understanding of the intention of Parliament, and the participle itself gives no indication as to the tense. So the phrase 'employed by him' without more is ambiguous.

[97] As soon as one beings to examine the context, however, the ambiguity beings to recede. The phrase 'in the case of a woman employed by him at an establishment in Great Britain', taken together with the words 'in the way he affords her access to opportunities for promotion, transfer or training' the first part of para (a) indicates beyond doubt that existing employees fall within the phrase 'employed by him'. But it also suggests that it is only existing employees who do so. This impression is reinforced by the words 'by dismissing her' in para (b). If Parliament had intended it to deal with ex-employees as well, one would have expected it to have said so. The reference to 'any other benefits, facilities or services' in para (a) and 'subjecting her to any other detriment' in para (b) are not so plainly related to things done to existing employees. They could include acts of discrimination after the employment has come to an end, and it is by no means impossible for the subsection as a whole to be read in this way. But it is not obvious that this is what Parliament intended. Elsewhere in s 6, sub-s (7) states that sub-s (2) does not apply to benefits, facilities or services of any description if the employer 'is' concerned with the provision of these things to the public, or to a section of the public comprising the woman in question. It then sets out three exceptions to this provision—(a) the provision differs in a material respect from the provision of these things by the employer to 'his employees', (b) the provision of these things to the woman 'is regulated' by her contract of employment and (c) they relate to training. This provision appears to have been designed on the assumption that the situation with which sub-s (2) is dealing is that which applies where the contract of employment is still on foot, not after it has come to an end.

[98] Two other provisions in the first group of sections in Pt II of the 1975 Act which deal with employers indicate that Parliament did not address itself to the position of their ex-employees. Section 9 makes it unlawful for a person to discriminate against a woman who 'is a contract worker'. Among the things he may not do is discriminate against her in the provision of 'any benefits, facilities or services' or by subjecting her to 'any other detriment'—phrases that are repeated from s 6(2). An exception is made for benefits, facilities or services if the person 'is' concerned with the provision of these things to the public, as in s 6(7). Section 10 deals with the meaning of employment at an establishment in Great Britain in terms which make use throughout of the present tense. The second group of sections in Pt II deals with discrimination by other bodies. Section 11 deals with partnerships. It makes it unlawful for a firm to discriminate against a woman who is seeking a position as partner and against a woman 'who already holds that position'. But it makes no mention of women who are no longer partners but who may—for example—be seeking a reference. Section 12, which deals with membership of trade unions, follows the same pattern. It protects a woman who is applying for membership and a woman who 'is' a member of the organisation. But it makes no mention of a woman who is no longer a member.

[99] I would hold that, taken overall and when given their ordinary meaning in their context, these provisions indicate that the phrase 'employed by him' in s 6(2) of the 1975 Act includes a woman who is employed by the alleged discriminator but that it does not include a woman who is no longer employed by him.

(b) Section 4(2) of the 1976 Act: 'employed by him'

[100] I can see no grounds for giving a different meaning to the phrase in this context from that which I would give to it in s 6(2) of the 1975 Act. The wording of s 4(2) of the 1976 Act is precisely the same except that it refers to a person where s 6(2) in the 1975 Act refers to a woman. The wording of s 4(4) of the 1976 Act matches that of s 6(7) of the 1975 Act, and ss 7, 8, 10 and 11 of the 1976 Act deal with contract workers, the meaning of employment at an establishment in Great Britain, partnerships and membership of trade unions in the same way as these matters are dealt with in the corresponding sections of the 1975 Act.

[101] So I would hold that the phrase 'employed by him' in s 4(2) of the 1976 Act includes a person who is employed by the alleged discriminator, but that it does not include a person who is no longer employed by him.

(c) Section 4(2) of the 1995 Act: 'whom he employs'

[102] The first thing that strikes one about the language of this subsection is that it does not use the participle 'employed'. It uses instead the verb 'employs'. As my noble and learned friend Lord Rodger of Earlsferry observed in the course of the argument, this was an odd choice of language if the draftsman's instructions were to cover the position of persons who were no longer employed by the alleged discriminator. And it was odd too, if those were his instructions, that this was not picked up during the passage of the Bill through Parliament. So in this case one starts from the position that the ordinary and natural meaning of the phrase is that it includes a person who is employed by the alleged discriminator, but that it does not include a person who is no longer employed by him. The question is whether there is anything in the context which requires that the phrase be read differently so that it includes a person who is no longer employed by the alleged discriminator.

[103] I can find nothing in s 4(2) itself which points to a different conclusion. Section 4(3) of the 1995 Act, like its counterparts in ss 6(7) and 4(4) of the 1975 and 1976 Acts, is cast in the present tense. So too are ss 12 and 13 of the 1995 Act which deal with discrimination against contract workers and by trade organisations. There are a number of other more subtle indications that the focus of this Act was on applicants for employment and those in employment, not on those whose employment has come to an end: see, for example, the wording of the exemption for small businesses in s 7. I can find no support anywhere else in the Act for the argument that s 4(2) extends to persons who are no longer in the employment of the alleged discriminator.

COMMUNITY LAW

[104] In Mrs Rhys-Harper's case it is necessary, as I said earlier (see [76], above), to take account of the fact that the 1975 Act gave effect in domestic law to the Equal Treatment Directive. The conclusion which one draws from this exercise may have implications for all the other cases too, as I shall explain later. The directive does not, of course, have direct effect on the relationship between a woman and her employer. The third paragraph of art 249 of the EC Treaty (formerly art 189 EEC) provides that a directive shall be binding, as to the result to be achieved, upon each member state to which it is addressed but that it shall leave to the national authorities the choice of form and method. So a directive works its way into our domestic system by means of the legislation which is designed to give effect to it. It is then for the courts to interpret that legislation, as far as possible, in a way that gives effect to this country's obligations under the treaty.

[105] In Litster v Forth Dry Dock and Engineering Co Ltd [1989] 1 All ER 1134 at 1140, [1990] 1 AC 546 at 559 Lord Oliver of Aylmerton said that the approach to the construction of primary and subordinate legislation enacted to give effect to the United Kingdom's obligations under the EEC treaty was not in doubt:

> 'If the legislation can reasonably be construed so as to conform with those obligations, obligations which are to be ascertained not only from the wording of the relevant directive but from the interpretation placed on it by the Court of Justice of the European Communities, such a purposive construction will be applied even though, perhaps, it may involve some departure from the strict and literal application of the words which the legislature has elected to use.'

In Webb v EMO Air Cargo (UK) Ltd [1992] 4 All ER 929 at 939, [1993] ICR 175 at 186 Lord Keith of Kinkel said:

> '... it is for a United Kingdom court to construe domestic legislation in any field covered by a Community Directive so as to accord with the interpretation of the directive as laid down by the European Court, if that can be done without distorting the meaning of the domestic legislation ...'

He referred ([1992] 4 All ER 929 at 940, [1993] ICR 175 at 187) to the way in which the European Court in Marleasing SA v La Comercial Internacional de Alimentacion SA Case C-106/89 [1990] ECR I-4135 expressed the obligation which is binding on the courts in applying national law, whether the provisions in question were adopted before or after the directive:

> 'As the European Court said, a national court must construe a domestic law to accord with the terms of a directive in the same field only if it is possible to do so. That means that the domestic law must be open to an interpretation consistent with the directive whether or not it is also open to an interpretation inconsistent with it.'

The European Court took the opportunity in Coote v Granada Hospitality Ltd Case C-185/97 [1998] All ER (EC) 865 at 876, [1999] ICR 100 at 111–112, [1998] ECR I-5199 at 5219 (para 18) to restate this point:

> 'As follows from Marleasing SA v La Comercial Internacional de Alimentación SA Case C-106/89 [1990] ECR I-4135 at 4159 (para 8) and Wagner Miret v Fondo de Garantía Salarial Case C-334/92 [1993] ECR I-6911 at 6932 (paras 20–21), in applying national law, in particular legislative provisions which, as in the present case, were specially introduced in order to implement the directive, the national court is required to interpret its national law, so far as possible, in the light of the wording and the purpose of the directive in order to achieve the result pursued by the third paragraph of art 189 of the Treaty.'

[106] The phrase 'employed by him' in s 6(2) of the 1975 Act is, as I have said, ambiguous. I think that it is possible to construe it as referring to a woman who is no longer employed by the alleged discriminator as well as to a person who is employed by him, although I do not think that that is what the phrase means when domestic rules of construction are applied to it and it is taken in its context. So the question which arises in Mrs Rhys-Harper's case is whether the Equal Treatment Directive, as interpreted by the European Court, requires us to adopt that possible construction.

[107] There is nothing in the wording of the directive which makes it plain to the domestic reader that its purpose was to extend the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment to cases where the employment relationship has come to an end. It refers in its long title to 'the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions'. The preamble too refers to access to employment, training and promotion and to 'working conditions, including pay', as does art 1 which describes the purpose of the directive. One finds here the familiar categories of people seeking employment, training or promotion on the one hand and those who are in work on the other. Nothing is said about ex-employees.

[108] The articles which are most directly in point with regard to the question what scope is to be given to the expression 'working conditions' are these:

> 'Article 5
>
> 1. Application of the principle of equal treatment with regard to working conditions, including the conditions governing dismissal, means that men and women shall be guaranteed the same conditions without discrimination on grounds of sex ...
>
> Article 6
>
> Member States shall introduce into their national legal systems such measures as are necessary to enable all persons who consider themselves wronged by failure to apply to them the principle of equal treatment within the meaning of Articles 3, 4 and 5 to pursue their claims by judicial process after possible recourse to other competent authorities.

Article 7

Member States shall take the necessary measures to protect employees against dismissal by the employer as a reaction to a complaint within the undertaking or to any legal proceedings aimed at enforcing compliance with the principle of equal treatment.

Article 8

Member States shall take care that the provisions adopted pursuant to this Directive, together with the relevant provisions already in force, are brought to the attention of employees by all appropriate means, for example at their place of employment.'

But here too no mention is made of the situation where the employment relationship is at an end.

[109] What then is to be said about the purpose of the directive? Here one must turn for guidance to the decision of the European Court in Coote's case. In that case, after settling a sex discrimination claim against her employer, the applicant had left the employer's employment by mutual consent. She then asked the employer to supply a reference to the employment agency through which she was trying to find another job. This was refused. She then brought proceedings against the employer under s 4 of the 1975 Act, which deals with victimisation, in which she alleged that this response was a reprisal for her previous claim of sex discrimination.

[110] The European Court saw this as an issue of judicial protection within the meaning of art 6 of the directive. It explained its approach ([1998] All ER (EC) 865 at 876, [1999] ICR 100 at 112, [1998] ECR I-5199 at 5220 (para 19):

'In those circumstances, the questions put by the national court must be understood as seeking to ascertain, for the purpose of interpreting national provisions transposing the directive, whether the directive requires member states to introduce into their national legal systems such measures as are necessary to ensure judicial protection for workers whose employer, after the end of the employment relationship, refuses to provide references as a reaction to proceedings brought to enforce compliance with the principle of equal treatment within the meaning of the directive.'

It went on to develop this point in the following paragraphs.

[111] The court noted ([1998] All ER (EC) 865 at 876–877, [1999] ICR 100 at 112, [1998] ECR I-5199 at 5220 (para 20)) that it followed from art 6 that the member states must ensure that the rights conferred by the directive could be effectively relied on before the national courts by the persons concerned. It observed ([1998] All ER (EC) 865 at 877, [1999] ICR 100 at 112, [1998] ECR I-5199 at 5220 (para 21)) that the requirement laid down by that article reflected a general principle of law which underlies the constitutional traditions common to the member states and which was also enshrined in art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). It emphasised ([1998] All ER (EC) 865 at 877, [1999] ICR 100 at 112, [1998] ECR I-5199 at 5221 (para 23)) that art 6 of the directive was an essential factor for attaining the fundamental objective of equal treatment for men and women which, as the court had repeatedly held, was one of the fundamental human rights whose observance it had a duty to ensure. It said ([1998] All ER (EC) 865 at 877, [1999] ICR 100 at 113, [1998] ECR I-5199 at 5221 (para 24)) that the principle of effective judicial control which art 6 of the directive lays down would be deprived of an essential part of its effectiveness if it did not cover measures which the employer took as a reaction to legal proceedings brought by the employee with the aim of enforcing the principle of equal treatment. The conclusion which it expressed ([1998] All ER (EC) 865 at 877, [1999] ICR 100 at 113, [1998] ECR I-5199 at 5221 (para 25)) was that it was not possible to accept the argument that such measures did not fall within the scope of the directive if they are taken after the employment relationship has ended.

[112] It would have been possible for the court to find a more direct answer to the problem in art 5 of the directive regarding working conditions as indicated by Advocate General Mischo in his opinion ([1998] All ER (EC) 865 at 869, [1999] ICR 100 at 104, [1998] ECR I-5199 at 5204–5205 (paras 11–12)). He said that an employer's appraisal of the quality of the services rendered fell entirely within the scope of the relationship between employee and employer, and that the service rendered by the employer in providing the employee with what he described as 'the parting gift' of a reference could not be severed from the employment relationship. He also said that the conditions regarding dismissal were to be construed broadly, as was clear from Burton v British Railways Board Case 19/81 [1982] 3 All ER 537 at 549, [1982] QB 1080 at 1112, [1982] ECR 555 at 575 (para 9) where the court said that in the context of the directive the word 'dismissal' must be widely construed so as to include termination of the employment relationship between a worker and his employer, even as part of a voluntary redundancy scheme. But the court did not go down that road. The principle underlying its approach was the right of a person who claimed to have been discriminated against by her employer to obtain an effective remedy.

[113] The conclusion which I would draw from this case is that the interpretation placed on the directive by the European Court does not require your Lordships to read the words 'employed by him' in s 6(2) of the 1975 Act as including each and every case where the employment relationship has come to an end. If that reading of those words were to be adopted it would enable all ex-employees to claim that they were entitled to the benefit of that subsection. It would extend the principle of equal treatment to them as a class, without regard to the question which was of concern to the court which was that the rights conferred by the directive could be relied upon effectively in the courts. It would also raise problems which the court did not address about the scope of the employer's liability. If the protection were to be extended to ex-employees as a class without some words of qualification, employers would be exposed to a potential liability for unconscious and perhaps trivial acts of discrimination for the rest of the employee's life. There is no indication in the court's decision that it saw this as one of the purposes of the directive. The Advocate General's description of a reference as a 'parting gift' which could not be severed from the employment relationship suggests that he regarded the expression 'working conditions' in art 5 as referring to things that fell within the employment relationship.

[114] It is to be noted however that the expression which the European Court used in Coote's case ([1998] All ER (EC) 865 at 876, [1999] ICR 100 at 112, [1998] ECR I-5199 at 5220 (para 19)) to describe the period which falls within the scope of the directive was 'the employment relationship'. Buxton LJ used the same phrase in Rhys-Harper v Relaxion Group plc [2001] IRLR 460 at [25] when he said that he agreed with Peter Gibson LJ's conclusion in Adekeye v Post Office [1997] IRLR 105, [1997] ICR 110 that strong indications of post-contract activity would be needed within the events listed in s 6(2)(a) in order to compel a reading of 'a person employed by him' in what he described as 'the unnatural sense' of a person previously employed. But, as my noble and learned friend Lord Scott of Foscote has pointed out, the relationship between the employer and the employee does not necessarily come to an end at the precise moment when their contract terminates. There may well be things that need to be done to bring their relationship to an end after the contract has terminated. There may also have been agreements entered into during the employment about benefits to be enjoyed afterwards, such as the continued use of sports facilities, which remain to be implemented or there may be evidence that it is the employer's practice to allow the continued use of such facilities. At that stage the employer will, of course, be dealing with someone who strictly speaking is a former employee. But the fact that this description applies will not of itself remove that person from the scope of the directive, so long as the transactions that remain to be completed are attributable to a continuation of their relationship as employer and employee.

[115] I think that the approach which is indicated by the decision in Coote's case strikes a reasonable balance between the interests of the employee after the employment is ended and the risk to the employer of being exposed to claims indefinitely. I would extend the same meaning to the words 'employed by him' in s 6(2) of the 1975 Act and, as I see no grounds for giving a different meaning to the same words where they appear in section 4(2) of the 1976 Act, to those words in that context also. That being so, as there are no rational grounds for a different approach to be taken to the use of similar language in the context of discrimination against disability, I would extend the same meaning to the words 'whom he employs' in s 4(2) of the 1995 Act. Whether or not there is still an employment relationship will be for determination according to the facts of each case.

[116] I would therefore, with respect, differ from the decision of the Court of Appeal in Adekeye's case that the words 'a person employed by him' in s 4(2) of the 1975 Act did not apply to a person who was no longer an employee. That approach, which confines the scope of the protection strictly to the duration of the contract, seems to be out of keeping with the approach of the European Court in Coote's case when it used the expression 'the employment relationship'. I too would hold that that case was wrongly decided.

CONCLUSIONS

(1) Relaxion Group plc v Rhys-Harper

[117] The issue in this case, as focused in the agreed statement of facts and issues, is whether, on a proper construction of s 6(2) of the 1975 Act, an employment tribunal has jurisdiction to entertain a claim of sex discrimination where the act or conduct complained of occurred after the employment relationship has ended. In his opening remarks Mr Reynold QC for the appellant said this was what her case was about. He said that her complaint was that she had been sexually discriminated against after her employment had come to an end because the respondent's general manager, Mr Adamson, failed to investigate properly a complaint which she made at the hearing of her appeal against her dismissal on 9 November 1998 that she had been harassed on the ground of her sex by Mr Osborn. Mr Reynold did not suggest that Mr Adamson's investigation into this complaint had any bearing on his decision that there were sufficient grounds for the appellant's dismissal and that Mr Osborn's decision to dismiss her should stand.

[118] I would hold that s 6(2) of that Act does not apply to the appellant's complaint of discrimination as so presented. What is alleged is a single and self-contained act of discrimination, which is said to have occurred when the appellant was no longer employed by the respondent. As for the wider question whether it was attributable to a continuation of their employment relationship, I would hold that there is nothing in this way of presenting her case which links the alleged act of discrimination by Mr Adamson to the conditions of her employment. The appellant did not ask Mr Adamson to investigate her complaint, and there has been no suggestion that she had any right to do so. She was no longer employed in the respondent's premises, so she was not in a position to benefit in any way from any decisions that Mr Adamson might have taken as a result of that investigation. Nor is there anything in it that links Mr Adamson's alleged failure to investigate this complaint properly to the appeal and his decision to confirm her dismissal.

[119] But Mr Reynold sought to present her case in a different way when he was replying to Mr Reade for the respondent. He based this presentation of it on the fact that the appellant received two letters from Mr Adamson on the same day. One of these letters dealt with the outcome of the appellant's appeal against her dismissal by Mr Osborn. In the other Mr Adamson said that the allegation which the appellant made at the hearing of her appeal of sexual harassment by Mr Osborn had been investigated and that there was insufficient evidence to establish a case against him. Mr Reynold said that fact that these two letters arrived together showed that Mr Adamson's decision in the appeal was linked to his investigation into the appellant's allegation. The allegation had arisen in the course of her appeal against her dismissal. What the appellant was alleging therefore was bias on the part of Mr Adamson as the decision-taker in her appeal against her dismissal. Mr Reynold said that it was not realistic to divorce the appeal procedure from the ambit of the allegation of sexual harassment. The reality was that they were part and parcel of the same thing.

[120] This presentation of the appellant's case makes it necessary to examine the history of her allegations against Mr Osborn more closely. According to a transcript of the notes of evidence of the chairman of the employment tribunal, the appellant said in her evidence that she did not bring the issue of sexual discrimination up when she attended the disciplinary hearing on 12 October 1998 which was conducted by Mr Osborn. She said that this was because he was the perpetrator and because his girlfriend was there. But the fact is that, for whatever reason, she did not mention this issue at the hearing. Moreover, she made no mention of sexual discrimination in her letter of 19 October 1998 in which she appealed against Mr Osborn's decision to dismiss her on the ground of misconduct. It was not until she saw Mr Adamson at the appeal hearing on 9 November 1998 that she mentioned the issue for the first time. She mentioned it again when she was setting out the details of her complaint in her application to the employment tribunal. She said that she was putting forward a complaint of sexual harassment and constructive dismissal against Mr Osborn, and gave details of various problems of this nature which she had encountered with him during her employment. At the end of this document she said that she felt that she had been sacked for misconduct once she had reported the sexual harassment. But the history which I have outlined shows that she did not make any such report until she mentioned the matter to Mr Adamson in the course of the hearing of her appeal against her dismissal.

[121] Although Mr Reynold did not put her case quite in these terms, it appears to me in the light of this further background that the case which he was seeking to put forward in his reply was that the appellant had been victimised within the meaning of s 4 of the 1975 Act by Mr Adamson in his conduct of the hearing of the appeal against her dismissal. Mr Reynold said that the appellant's case was that Mr Adamson's decision in the appeal was biased against her because of the complaint which she had made. An employment tribunal does not have jurisdiction under s 63 of the 1975 Act to investigate an allegation of bias on the part of the decision-taker in an appeal by an employee against her dismissal. But it does have jurisdiction under that section to deal with a complaint that she has been the victim of an act of discrimination by way of victimisation within the meaning of s 4 of the 1975 Act which is unlawful under Pt II of the Act.

[122] In my opinion there is no doubt that an employment tribunal has jurisdiction to entertain a complaint of discrimination by way of victimisation which relates to conduct by an employer in his determination of an appeal by a woman against her dismissal from his employment. Article 7 of the Equal Treatment Directive requires member states to take the necessary measures to protect employees against dismissal by the employer as a reaction to a complaint within the undertaking aimed at enforcing compliance with the principle of equal treatment. Section 6(2)(b) of the 1975 Act makes it unlawful for an employer to discriminate against a woman by dismissing her. Discrimination within the meaning of s 6(2) includes discrimination by way of victimisation as defined by s 4. Section 6(2)(b), when read together with s 4, provides the protection which art 7 requires. An act of dismissal by way of victimisation is made unlawful by s 6(2)(b). So there is no need here for the appellant to rely on the obligation to ensure effective judicial control for the protection of the rights provided by the Equal Treatment Directive arising from art 6 which the European Court of Justice described in Coote v Granada Hospitality Ltd Case C-185/97 [1998] All ER (EC) 865, [1999] ICR 100, [1998] ECR I-5199. The issues of statutory interpretation on this presentation of her case appear to me to be quite straightforward. The appellant's difficulty lies in the fact that her complaint that she was victimised by Mr Adamson in the course of the proceedings regarding her dismissal was not presented in this way at any stage in these proceedings until it was mentioned by Mr Reynold in his closing address to your Lordships.

[123] With some hesitation I have come to the conclusion that the events which happened in her case, as now presented, were all attributable to the employment relationship. There are various ways in which the facts can be analysed. But however this is done it would, as Mr Reynold said, be unrealistic to ignore the fact that the victimisation of which she complains was part and parcel of the events that were attributable to her employer's act in dismissing her. The stage at which it could be said that the employment relationship had ended had not yet been reached. I would allow this appeal.

(2) D'Souza v Lambeth London BC

[124] Mr D'Souza's complaint is of racial discrimination and victimisation contrary to s 4(2), or alternatively s 4(1), of the 1976 Act. The act of which he complains is the failure by his former employer to reinstate him when ordered to do so by the employment tribunal.

[125] I would hold that s 4(2) does not apply to his case, as it is plain that the act of which he complains occurred after the employment relationship had come to an end. I would hold that s 4(1) does not apply to his case either. His argument was that the decision by his former employer not to reinstate him when ordered to do so by the employment tribunal under what is now s 113(a) of the Employment Rights Act 1996 was a refusal or a deliberate omission to offer him that employment within the meaning of s 4(1)(c) of the 1976 Act. I would reject that argument. His former employer was not being required to offer him that employment. What it was ordered to do by the tribunal was simply to reinstate him on the terms which the order itself specified. Failure to comply with an order for reinstatement by the tribunal will result in an award of compensation under the statute. There is no other remedy. What the Act does is to lay down a statutory procedure by which the employee obtains the benefit of the original contract. I would dismiss this appeal.

(3) Jones v 3M Healthcare Ltd

[126] These are all cases where it is said that allegations were made under s 4(2) of the 1995 Act of discrimination and victimisation after the employment relationship had come to an end. I would hold that the phrase 'whom he employs', which qualifies the whole of that subsection, does not make it unlawful for an employer to discriminate against a disabled person who is no longer in his employment and with whom he no longer has an employment relationship. As to the facts, the question in each case is whether the interval in time was too long for it to be reasonable, in the light of all the surrounding circumstances, to conclude that there was still an employment relationship.

[127] A period of about one year and ten months had gone by before Mr Jones asked for the return of his business cards. The other cases all relate to requests for references. I consider that these cases all lie close to the limits of what comes within the boundaries of the employment relationship. A request which is made after a short interval may well be regarded as having been made while there was still an employment relationship. But it may well be thought to be unreasonable to expose employers to the risk of proceedings before an employment tribunal after a long interval. It is one thing to hold the door open, as it were, for this purpose for a few weeks or possibly for a few months. It is quite another for an employer to be compelled to provide references for an ex-employee, perhaps several times over, in response to repeated requests long after the employment has ended.

[128] The solution to this problem may well lie, as my noble and learned friend Lord Nicholls has pointed out, with employers in the first instance. If it is the employer's practice to give references to former employees after such a long interval, then the employer must be careful not to discriminate. If the employer's practice is to cease giving references after a given interval, then the refusal of a reference to a particular individual after that interval has passed will not, without more, be discriminatory. The 'chilling effect' of these propositions is regrettable but inescapable. It is by no means unknown for employers to seek safety by adopting practices in the giving of references which are as parsimonious as possible. For smaller employers, of course, the number of former employees asking for references may be too few to enable them to develop a practice which will protect them against vexatious claims. In their case employment tribunals will need to be particularly vigilant.

[129] With some hesitation I have come to the view that, although these cases lie close to the borderline, it has not been shown on the facts which are available so far that the employment tribunals do not have jurisdiction to consider them. For this reason I would allow these appeals and remit the cases to the tribunals for further consideration.

LORD HOBHOUSE OF WOODBOROUGH.

[130] My Lords, these appeals concern the proper understanding of the provisions of three anti-discrimination Acts and their application to the six cases concerned. The courts below were bound by the Court of Appeal decision in Adekeye v Post Office [1997] IRLR 105, [1997] ICR 110. It is necessary to decide whether that case was rightly decided. The appeals all came before the House as cases relating to the jurisdiction of employment tribunals.

[131] But, if one is to reject the bright line rule stated in Adekeye's case and adopt a less absolute criterion, it becomes necessary, in considering the disposal of the individual appeals, to consider whether by that criterion the tribunal should have accepted jurisdiction. This involves ascertaining what claim or claims it was that the aggrieved party made in the tribunal proceedings and to what extent they were rendered inadmissible by failure to present the claim to the tribunal within the period of three months beginning when the act complained of was done: see, for example, s 76(1)(a) of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975. A feature of discrimination cases in the employment field is that the obvious way of formulating a claim may be ruled out because the complainant has (without sufficient excuse) allowed the three-month time limit to expire without bringing proceedings. The complainant then has, artificially, to find some act within the three-month period on which to build the claim. (This point is particularly relevant to the disposal of the Rhys-Harper appeal.)

[132] The scheme which I will follow in this opinion is, first, to make some general observations about anti-discrimination legislation, then to discuss the Adekeye point, then, the victimisation point and then, finally, to apply my conclusions to the individual cases.

ANTI-DISCRIMINATION LEGISLATION

[133] The 1975 Act broke new ground for English domestic law and adopted a fairly cautious approach. The criteria for discrimination and the scope of the Act's application were fairly narrowly drawn. It is not right to view it, which was the invitation of the appellants, as creating a comprehensive anti-discrimination scheme. The Race Relations Act of the following year was in the same mould but at the same time adopted a more generalised criterion of unlawful discrimination. The former Act had said: '[a] person discriminates against a woman ... if—(a) on the ground of her sex he treats her less favourably than he treats or would treat a man ...' The latter Act uses the phrases 'on racial grounds' and 'other persons' which do not depend upon the racial group to which the actual complainant personally belongs or the racial group to which the comparator belongs provided the relevant racial ground would not apply to him but is otherwise comparable. For example, the relevance of race may be to the fact that the complainant is married to a person of a different race or has adopted children of a particular race. The drafting of the 1995 Act also shows signs of a developing confidence of those responsible for anti-discrimination legislation and refers to the 'reason' for treating someone less favourably. The same developments are to be observed in other provisions of the three Acts. In construing each of these Acts and assessing and understanding decisions made under one or other of them, it is necessary, if errors are not to be made, to have regard to the actual wording of the relevant Act as is illustrated by what I have said about the different criteria used in the 1975 and the 1976 Acts.

[134] Another self-evident point is that the drafting of each Act had to be adapted to the type of discrimination at which it is directed. Thus the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 inevitably has to relate to direct discrimination and include a defence of justification. It is coupled with qualified obligations to make special arrangements for those with disabilities, including, in limited circumstances, adapting buildings. Similarly, each Act makes specific but different provision for its scope of application and those it will affect. But each Act also has a similar structure and, as between the 1975 and 1976 Acts, some provisions are expressed in the same or very similar words. This is particularly so in relation to the 'employment field' provisions. I agree that these statutes should be read as contributions to a developing scheme of anti-discrimination law and such words should not without good reason be given a different reading as between one of the statutes and another. They are not statutes to be formally 'read with' each other but they are statutes which reflect a consistent (though developing) legislative policy. The wording of the 'employment field' provision in the 1975 and 1976 Acts is in a relevant respect slightly different from the 1995 Act which, instead of using the phrase 'employed by him', uses the phrase 'whom he employs'. None of the counsel in these appeals submitted that a distinction should be made between the Acts on this ground. I consider that they were right. I will accordingly use the 1975 Act as the reference point save where it is necessary to refer to the Acts separately.

[135] The structure of the relevant parts of each of the Acts is also similar. They start with a definition of the relevant test of discriminatory conduct: see Pt I in the 1975 Act. They continue by defining (with elaborations or qualifications) the 'fields' in which the Act is to apply: see Pts II and III of the 1975 Act. They then add provisions making some related acts unlawful and granting some general exceptions to the application of the 'fields': see Pts IV and V of the 1975 Act. The words directly involved in the Adekeye point are in the Part defining the 'employment field'. All these cases were said to arise in the employment field, which in all three Acts is the primary field of application. The victimisation point arises from provisions which in the 1975 and 1976 Acts appear in the Part defining discriminatory conduct but which, in the 1995 Act, are placed in the later Part which (inter alia) makes other related acts unlawful (see Pt VII). In all three Acts the actual wording of the victimisation provision is similar and is by way of extending the definition of 'discrimination'. In relation to sex discrimination, what is involved in victimisation has been the subject of a decision of the European Court of Justice in the case of Coote v Granada Hospitality Ltd Case C-185/97 [1998] All ER (EC) 865, [1999] ICR 100, [1998] ECR I-5199 applied by Morison J in Coote v Granada Hospitality Ltd (No 2) [1999] IRLR 452, [1999] ICR 942, to which I will revert later.

ADEKEYE'S CASE

[136] Adekeye's case was an employment field case under the 1976 Act. It was therefore essential for the complainant to show that the employment tribunal had jurisdiction under Pt II of the 1975 Act. Her complaint was that she had been summarily dismissed by her employers, the Post Office, on racial grounds and that, on the same grounds, she had again been discriminated against when she had appealed against her dismissal under the Post Office's internal appeal procedure and her appeal had been dismissed. Her complaint against her dismissal was out of time but her complaint relating to her appeal was not. The Court of Appeal referring to the wording of s 4(2) of the 1976 Act formulated the question to be answered as being: could a person who had been dismissed still be described as 'a person employed by' the person who had already dismissed him? They adopted a simple temporal test: did the relevant act come before or after the termination of the employment? The Court of Appeal, following an earlier decision by the Employment Appeal Tribunal (EAT) in Nagarajan v Agnew [1994] IRLR 61, [1995] ICR 520, concluded that being employed and being dismissed were mutually inconsistent states. The Court of Appeal accordingly held that the employment tribunal had no jurisdiction. It was this decision by which the courts below were bound and which caused them to decline to entertain the appellants' various applications.

[137] Was Adekeye's case right? As a matter of the simple language of s 4(2) and its equivalent in the 1975 and 1995 Acts, there is much to be said for it and it provides a rule of simple application. But a different view is possible. The words are not used to refer to a status but to a connection. Under the Acts the discriminatory treatment does not have to be an infringement of the complainant's contractual rights. It can simply be less favourable treatment than that afforded to others in a like position. To introduce at this point into the structure of the Acts a criterion of strict contractual status would be anomalous having regard to their scheme as a whole. There is the further recommendation for the connection approach that it avoids some of the individual anomalies as illustrated by the facts of Adekeye's case itself and referred to in the judgment in that case. Why distinguish between the discriminatory dismissal and the discriminatory conduct during the internal appeal against that dismissal? Indeed, the complainant may have a contractual right to invoke the appeal procedure and to a fair consideration of his or her appeal. The remedy for which the complainant may be asking in that appeal procedure is the revocation of the dismissal decision. To construe the Act so that the dismissal can be the subject of a discrimination complaint but the handling of the appeal cannot is irrational and unnecessary. The scheme of the Acts and the context in which the relevant words occur suggest that, rather than importing a crude temporal test, they describe the substantive scope within which the various duties not to discriminate under the Acts apply in the employment field.

[138] But that still leaves a problem. The purpose of the relevant Part of these Acts is to define the scope of their operation (and consequentially, in relation to the 'employment field', the jurisdiction of employment, formerly industrial, tribunals). One therefore needs, before one can properly discard the Adekeye interpretation, to see whether the alternative interpretation has a sufficient degree of clarity to be a fair reading of the words used and to perform the defining function of these words in the Acts. In the 1975 Act, the relevant words 'woman employed by him' only appear in s 2 of the Act. Subsection 2(1) does not use such words since it deals with those seeking employment; it uses the words 'in relation to employment by him'. In sub-s 2(2) where the words are used, no problem need arise under para (a) since the wording of that paragraph read as a whole clearly refers to things happening during the currency of the woman's employment by the discriminator; (a) is self-limiting and therefore does not raise the question presently under consideration nor does it need a restricted meaning to be given to the introductory phrase. It is in para (b) that the question manifests itself. Paragraph (b) includes two elements: first, 'by dismissing her'; secondly, by 'subjecting her to any other detriment'. The first should be read as referring to the whole of the process of dismissal. So, if the internal procedures of the employer or the legitimate expectations of the employee (or indeed the avoidance of an 'unfair' dismissal) include a review of the dismissal decision, whether by appeal or otherwise, para (b) should be read as including that review within its scope and any discrimination on grounds of the sex of the employee will be contrary to the law. (I have used the word 'employee' in this sentence deliberately to demonstrate that it is a perfectly natural use of language to refer to the woman in this situation in that way.) Thus the content of the first part of para (b) suffices to guide the giving of a non-legalistic meaning to the earlier phrase 'employed by him'. In my judgment a similar approach should be adopted in relation to the second part of (b)—'or subjecting her to any other detriment', a phrase which can include the denial of a benefit and ties in with the phrase 'treats her less favourably' in s 1.

[139] The words 'subjecting her to any other detriment' are general and undefined but it can be seen that the problem of construction is to decide what breadth they should be given and whether, on the facts of any given case, the facts fall within them. Guidance upon the scope can again be derived from the content of the provision. What are the detriments which an employer may subject an employee to which can fairly be referred to as 'any other detriment' in the context of this subsection? The answer must lie in a test of proximity. Does the conduct complained about have a sufficiently close connection with her employment? Is it sufficiently similar to the other conduct mentioned in the subsection? Any criterion of proximity has as its antithesis the concept of remoteness. Remoteness can have, as an element, remoteness in time. The further removed the conduct is in time from the employment, the greater the likelihood that the conduct is too remote and that the employment has become merely a matter of history. This is not a resurrection of the Adekeye test; it involves no cut-off point but is simply a recognition that, as time passes, it may become more difficult to show that the conduct complained of had a sufficient connection with the employment and a sufficient similarity with the other conduct falling within sub-s (2). Thus it is relevant to ask whether the conduct complained of, if committed whilst she had still been currently employed by the person complained about, would have come within s 6(2)(a); but she will also have to show that other former employees would, in the same circumstances, not have been subjected to the detriment—would have enjoyed the benefit denied to her.

[140] I appreciate that such an approach will ultimately lead to fact-specific decisions in a number of cases but that is what is involved in the rejection of an arbitrary time-based criterion. It should not lead to any additional uncertainty for employers since the construction which I prefer is based upon a factual connection with the employment which it should be easier for the lay employer to understand and apply than an essentially legal criterion depending upon identifying the moment when 'dismissal' was complete. The nub is that the introductory words 'a woman employed by him' are to be read with the rest of sub-s (2) and relate to a substantive and proximate connection between the conduct complained of and her employment by the alleged discriminator.

[141] In assessing whether the requisite connection exists, a starting point is to ask whether the same conduct during the currency of the employment would be unlawful. Likewise it is relevant whether or not a legitimate expectation of the benefit, or the contractual right to it, has continued and whether other former employees do in the same circumstances enjoy the benefit or suffer the detriment. For example, if other employees are permitted to continue to enjoy the use of the employee's social club after they have retired, but the complainant is not, that will come within the expression 'any other detriment' and, if she has been discriminated against on grounds of her sex, she will be entitled to complain.

[142] More difficult is the giving of references since it may refer to many different situations—the refusal of any reference at all, the giving of a limited reference, the giving of an unfavourable reference—and to many different complaints—breach of contract, breach of a legitimate expectation, breach of a duty of care, defamation, discrimination. Also the complainant may well be able to argue that, if the same reference had been refused or given during the currency of her employment, she would have been discriminated against but it of course does not necessarily follow that later conduct would also amount to discrimination. Something more has to be alleged and proved, that she had at the least a legitimate expectation of being given a reference at a later stage and in her then circumstances and that other ex-employees would in the same circumstances have been given one. Likewise, if one has been given but she is complaining about what it does or does not say, she must allege and prove that others in the like circumstances would have received a favourable one. In Spring v Guardian Assurance plc [1994] 3 All ER 129, [1995] 2 AC 296, your Lordships' House considered the extent and content of the obligation to give a reference. Lord Woolf ([1994] 3 All ER 129 at 179, [1995] 2 AC 296 at 354) referred to the fact that the position might not be the same once the employee had left his employment and there had been a lapse of time. Discussing the contractual term which might be implied he used the phrase 'during the continuance of the engagement or within a reasonable time thereafter'. The obligation will not necessarily be open-ended and the later it is asked for the less detail and information it may contain. It must be an obligation which the employer recognises in respect of other ex-employees in the like circumstances, otherwise the complainant cannot say she has been subjected to a detriment or denied a benefit. If the conduct is to be the subject of a complaint under one or other of the anti-discrimination Acts, it must come within and satisfy the criteria of the relevant Act. This illustrates the link in practice between the questions of 'less favourable treatment', denying a 'benefit' and subjecting to a 'detriment'. I will have to revert to the question of references when I come to deal with the appeals in the cases which arose under the 1995 Act.

[143] What I have said in the preceding paragraphs also reflects the view of the European Court of Justice in their decision in the case of Coote v Granada Hospitality Ltd Case C-185/97 [1998] All ER (EC) 865, [1999] ICR 100, [1998] ECR I-5199. The employee's complaint was that she had been discriminated against on the grounds of her sex in that after leaving her employment she had applied to her former employer for a reference and had been refused one. The background to the dispute was that she had earlier, whilst still actually employed by him, complained about other conduct of her employer and her discrimination claim on that occasion had been settled. The case therefore had a victimisation element. The industrial tribunal had rejected her (second) claim under the 1975

Act on the ground that at the time she was refused a reference she was no longer employed by him. However, since her case was also covered by the Council Directive (EEC) 76/207 (OJ 1976 L39 p 40) (the Equal Treatment Directive), the EAT sought an opinion from the European Court of Justice whether that decision was consistent with the directive's requirement that member states provide effective remedies.

[144] The Advocate General ([1998] All ER (EC) 865 at 870, [1999] ICR 100 at 105, [1998] ECR I-5199 at 5205, 5206 emphatically rejected the Adekeye criterion:

> '14. It would be totally unjustifiable for the application of the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of sex to a decision on the provision or refusal of references to depend on the moment when that decision was taken ...
>
> 15. The court has, moreover, always held with regard to equal pay that the prohibition of discrimination by an employer between employees on grounds of sex does not cease to have effect on termination of the contract of employment ...
>
> 16. I therefore consider that an employer may not discriminate on grounds of sex when providing an employee with references, whatever the moment—whether during or after the period of the employment relationship—at which the decision is taken in that regard or at which those references are requested.'

[145] The European Court of Justice in its judgment, after noting the element of victimisation, summarised its ruling upon the question referred ([1998] All ER (EC) 865 at 878, [1999] ICR 100 at 113, [1998] ECR I-5199 at 5222 (para 28)):

> 'In those circumstances, the answer to the questions put by the national court must be that art 6 of the directive requires member states to introduce into their national legal systems such measures as are necessary to ensure judicial protection for workers whose employer, after the employment relationship has ended, refuses to provide references ...'

It would be possible to read this judgment as limiting the ruling to cases of victimisation but in my view that would not do justice to the reasoning which is more comprehensive. Nor would it pay adequate regard to the clear views expressed by the Advocate General.

[146] On the return of the case to the EAT ([1999] IRLR 452, [1999] ICR 942) the EAT recognised ([1999] IRLR 452 at 454, [1999] ICR 942 at 947) that the main issue which they had to consider was—

> 'whether it is possible to construe the 1975 Act so as to enable a claimant to make a victimisation complaint in relation to events that occurred after the employment relationship had terminated.'

The judgment of the appeal tribunal given by Morison J, carefully reviewed the reasoning of the Court of Appeal in Adekeye v Post Office [1997] IRLR 105, [1997] ICR 110 and concluded that it could no longer be followed. Victimisation cases may be a fortiori but within the scheme of these Acts all cases have to pass through the gateway of one of the 'fields' of application and therefore it is still, in an 'employment field' case, necessary to consider the 'employed by' question. I consider that Morison J was right and that Adekeye's case is no longer good law.

VICTIMISATION

[147] What I have said in the preceding paragraphs is also largely dispositive of the treatment of victimisation cases. Victimisation is in principle a free-standing unlawful wrong. It is ancillary to the main provisions of the relevant Act. It is not dependant upon the primary criterion of discrimination—sex, race, disability. The criteria are different. For example, to use the wording of s 4 of the 1975 Act, the victimisation arises from the complainant having made a sex discrimination complaint against the discriminator or any other person or having assisted another to do so or having given evidence in support of that other. The section has even been amended to bring in other Acts and extends to suspected conduct of the victim either past or future. These criteria go far beyond anything specific to any employment relationship between the victim and the alleged discriminator and are in themselves gender (or race or disability) neutral. There is a saving in each of the Acts to exclude 'victims' who have made false allegations or acted in bad faith.

[148] However it is still necessary for the person making a victimisation complaint to show that the discriminator has treated the person victimised 'less favourably than in those circumstances he treats or would treat other persons'. This brings one back to the 'field' provisions and, in the 1975 Act, to s 2(2). The less favourable treatment has to come within one part or another of s 2 and, if it is upon s 2(2) that the complainant relies, the complainant must show the requisite connection between the less favourable treatment complained of and her employment, whether it be prospective, future, current or past, by the alleged discriminator. Again the decision of the European Court of Justice is compelling. The Acts must be construed so as not to amount to the denial of a remedy for victimisation and, in particular, not so as to apply an arbitrary temporal test. Once it can be shown that it is a detriment—a disadvantage—to which the employer does not subject others and it can fairly, in the context of s 2(2), be termed any other detriment, the victimised complainant will have proved what is required in this respect. It is certainly not disproved by the mere fact that the complainant is no longer employed by the discriminator.

[149] Victimisation is an a fortiori case which shows that the application of the Adekeye approach is unacceptable. But essentially the same construction of the provisions defining the 'employment field' is to be adopted in victimisation cases and in ordinary discrimination cases. The case must still come substantively within the provisions defining the 'field'.

THE JURISDICTION QUESTION

[150] In any 'employment field' case there is potentially a jurisdiction question for the employment tribunal. Section 63(1) of the 1975 Act (as amended) provides:

> 'A complaint by any person ("the complainant") that another person ("the respondent")—(a) has committed an act of discrimination against the complainant which is unlawful by virtue of Part II ... may be presented to an employment tribunal.'

There are provisions to the like effect in s 54(1) of the 1976 Act and s 8(1) of the 1995 Act. The tribunals are bodies with limited jurisdiction. Section 2 of the Employment Tribunals Act 1996 empowers them to exercise the jurisdiction given to them by (inter-alia) these Acts. It follows that if the complaint does not fall within the 'employment field' as defined in the relevant Act, the employment tribunal does not have jurisdiction to entertain the complaint and must decline to do so, as did the tribunal in Adekeye's case.

[151] To categorise any question as going to jurisdiction raises procedural problems for the tribunal. At what stage of the proceedings should the tribunal decide the question? Does the actual question go to jurisdiction? Under Adekeye's case this did not raise any real difficulty for the tribunal. The complainant had to say when the act complained of had occurred. The time-based criteria (the time bar and the date of dismissal) could then be mechanically applied. But if, as is my opinion, that a substantive criterion has to be applied, more may need to be known and some investigation may have to take place. There seems to be no escape from the conclusion that the whole of the 'employment field' provision (in the 1975 Act, s 2) is relevant to jurisdiction. The complainant must prove—satisfy the tribunal—that his or her complaint comes within the relevant section. If the complainant fails to do so, then the claim must fail both substantively and as a matter of jurisdiction. This would then preclude any consideration whether or not there was any discrimination contrary to the primary provisions of the relevant Act or any victimisation.

[152] But this tidy dichotomy will rarely exist in practice. The question whether the complainant was subjected to some 'other detriment' overlaps with (but is not the same as) the question whether the claimant was treated 'less favourably'. The tribunal will often find itself in practice in the same position when deciding an issue concerning less favourable treatment as it now does when it has to decide a dispute which turns upon the provisions which define the 'employment field' and will find it advantageous to make use of the same procedures to simplify hearings and separate off those claims which can have no proper basis and those allegations which appear to have no substance in fact. As the cases demonstrate, the tribunal is competent to decide whether it has jurisdiction and any such decision can be the subject of an appeal to the appeal tribunal.

THE INDIVIDUAL CASES

[153] In all the cases under appeal the courts below had treated themselves as bound by Adekeye's case. They accordingly decided them against the present appellants on jurisdictional grounds (and/or time bar) without considering or investigating the merits of the appellants' claims. I have given my opinion that Adekeye's case is not good law; it follows that all the appeals should be allowed and remitted for further hearing unless there is some other factor which justifies not taking that course.

Rhys-Harper

[154] The whole of her complaint involved allegations of less favourable treatment which fell within the ambit of the 'employment field' as being either part of the dismissal process itself or part of the internal review of her dismissal. Her primary problem was that she had not made any claim in the employment tribunal until 18 February 1999. The cut-off date for her was therefore 19 November 1998. She had been dismissed at a disciplinary hearing held on 10 October. She had exercised her right of internal appeal and the hearing was on 9 November. Originally her complaints were confined solely to her being dismissed on the ground of what had occurred on 6 October (the date of the incident involving guests at the swimming pool for which she was being disciplined). However when giving evidence at the hearing of her internal appeal, which was conducted by the respondents' general manager, Mr Adamson, she stated that she been subjected to sexual harassment at an earlier stage of her employment and referred also to other earlier acts of sexual discrimination at earlier dates which she had not complained about at the time. Mr Adamson asked her to give him a written statement concerning the earlier incidents so that he could investigate them himself. (The written statement has not been put in evidence in the present proceedings.) She later told the employment tribunal that 'it was investigated badly'.

[155] On 30 November Mr Adamson sent Miss Rhys-Harper two separate letters. One, headed 'Re Appeal Hearing' consisted of one sentence: 'Following your appeal against your dismissal, having investigated the events the company has found there was sufficient grounds to dismiss and therefore the decision stands.' The other headed: 'Re Allegation of sexual harassment against Ken Osborn.' In it Mr Adamson referred to the allegation of sexual harassment she had made against Mr Osborn, informed her that a full and thorough investigation had been made into the alleged incident (which she had said had occurred at an earlier date when she had gone into the mens' showers and no one else had been present), that staff had been interviewed, including Mr Osborn, that it was confirmed that she had reported the incident but had asked for the information to remain private, that other staff had been unable to substantiate or witness the alleged harassment and that accordingly the company had concluded that there was 'insufficient evidence to establish a case against Mr Osborn'. He ended his letter by stressing that the company did not condone harassment or victimisation and any member of staff found guilty of any form of harassment would be dealt with in accordance with company policy and disciplinary procedures, adding that if additional evidence should become available a further investigation would be held.

[156] In her application to the employment tribunal, she confined her complaint to sexual harassment and (it seems) constructive dismissal. Her particulars of her complaint only referred to alleged incidents of sexual harassment and bullying occurring over a period January 1998 to October 1998 and to the incident which occurred on 6 October 1998 and had led to her dismissal. She alleged that the investigation of the 6 October incident and her complaints about Mr Osborn had not been investigated properly by the company prior to dismissing her. The employment tribunal considered that time could be treated as running from 30 November and that her claims were accordingly in time. Before the tribunal she had appeared in person and the company had been unrepresented and had merely made a short written submission.

[157] Before the EAT ([2000] IRLR 810) both sides were represented, the company by an employee and Miss Rhys-Harper by counsel. Her counsel put her case solely on the basis of sexual discrimination submitting that 'the act complained of' was 'the act of failure to investigate properly and dismissing her complaint' (sic). But it was not part of her case that she had asked Mr Adamson for an investigation, nor has she alleged that in that investigation she was treated unfavourably on the grounds of her sex. The EAT were nevertheless prepared to treat this complaint as referring to a continuing breach still existing on 30 November but they rejected the claim on the basis of Adekeye v Post Office [1997] IRLR 105, [1997] ICR 110. If the EAT was not correct in its conclusion about the time bar point, the claim would have failed anyway; the Adekeye point would be academic.

[158] Your Lordships consider that the case should be remitted to enable the further consideration of her claim unfettered by the decision in Adekeye's case. For myself, I have considerable doubts whether this is an appropriate order to make. There seems to have been a mistaken assumption that under the 1975 Act there was an entitlement to make a free-standing complaint of sexual harassment and to overlook the necessity for establishing a breach within the criteria stated in s 1(1)(a) of the Act and satisfying the substantive requirements of s 6(2)(b) which I have endeavoured to explain. The fact that Adekeye's case was wrong does not mean that s 6(2) is not still relevant to the admissibility of the claim now being put forward. Nor does it mean that the three-month time limit can be forgotten about or that it is unnecessary to do justice as between both parties and to consider whether she had ever made the complaint now relied on prior to its being introduced during the hearing. Since the decision of the House is that the case should be remitted, I trust to a freshly constituted tribunal which will reconsider the whole matter, I will say no more about these points as they will now have to be subject of a decision of an employment tribunal. If her present complaint was time-barred at the time she first made it, it remains time-barred now.

D'Souza

[159] This case too has complexities. In 1992, the appellant had made claims of unfair dismissal, race discrimination and victimisation which were upheld by the employment tribunal which ordered that he be reinstated. In March the following year Lambeth London Borough Council (Lambeth) informed him that he would not be reinstated. On 1 July 1995, the appellant made a complaint of further discrimination and victimisation in respect of the failure of Lambeth to reinstate him. On 10 July 1995, the tribunal found that it had not been reasonably practical to reinstate him and made an appropriate award of compensation taking into account the failure to reinstate him. The tribunal communicated its decisions to the parties on 10 and 14 August. Meanwhile, on 31 July, the appellant had lodged a further application to the tribunal effectively duplicating that of 1 July alleging that the refusal to reinstate was race discrimination and victimisation. It was this application which came before the tribunal on 23 February 1996 and was dismissed on the basis of Adekeye's case.

[160] The problem for the appellant is that his essential complaint remains that he was not reinstated. It is this act which he alleges amounted to discrimination and victimisation. But he has already, pursuant to the earlier decision of the employment tribunal, been compensated by Lambeth for the failure to reinstate and there is nothing further which can form the basis of a claim for compensation. I therefore agree with your Lordships that the appeal in this case ought to be dismissed.

The 1995 Act cases

[161] These four cases also raise some problems. Two of them are concerned with the content of references: Kirker v British Sugar plc and Angel v New Possibilities NHS Trust. A third, Bond v Hackney Citizens' Advice Bureau, concerns an answer given to a mortgage insurance company. The fourth, Jones v 3M Healthcare Ltd, is different and relates to the refusal to return property. They all lie close to the limits of what comes within the boundaries of the 'employment field'. Three of them raise arguable cases of victimisation—Kirker's case, Jones' case and Angel's case—and are thus capable of satisfying the discrimination requirement but still need to satisfy the 'employment field' requirement.

[162] Jones' case is perhaps the simplest case. Mr Jones complains of the refusal to allow him to have back business cards, his personal property, which were left behind at his workplace when he was dismissed. The connection with his employment is clear and not affected by the delay which occurred. I would therefore allow the appeal and order a remission.

[163] Kirker's case and Angel's case are, as I have said reference cases but of a particular kind. They relate to delayed applications for references which were not responded to as favourably as the appellant would have wished. Mr Kirker complains that his employers declined to answer the question whether they would have re-employed him. The person answering a reference is under a duty to the person making the inquiry to give an honest and truthful answer. If the truth is that the referee would not have re-employed the relevant person, the referee must say so even though it may be fatal to that person's job application to the person making the inquiry. The same considerations apply to the complaint of Mrs Angel. If the case of either of them is that the former employer should have given a reference which it did not believe to be factually correct and accurate, the complainant will have to be prepared to allege and prove that the former employer would have given other ex-employees references which it knew were inaccurate or incorrect. This is a difficult case for any complainant to make credibly and, if they cannot, they have no credible case that they have been treated less favourably. Since the answer to this question depends upon facts not in your Lordships' possession on the hearing of these appeals I would therefore allow the appeals and order remission as in the case of Relaxion Group plc v Rhys-Harper.

[164] Finally in the case of Mrs Bond. Her case has a longer history behind it. Her complaints centre on two points. One is that Hackney Citizens' Advice Bureau declined to supply her with references in accordance with a draft which she herself had prepared. The other is that they declined to state to her mortgage insurance company that she had been made compulsorily redundant. It was the bureau's understanding that she had agreed to voluntary redundancy. Following the same logic, I would allow her appeal and order a remission so that the whole matter can be considered afresh.

CONCLUSIONS

[165] For these reasons, which substantially accord with those of my noble and learned friend Lord Nicholls, I would allow the appeals in all the cases except D'Souza and make orders accordingly for remission to an employment tribunal: I would dismiss the appeal in D'Souza.

LORD SCOTT OF FOSCOTE.

[166] My Lords, each of these appeals raises the important question of principle whether discriminatory acts (or omissions) detrimental to an ex-employee but carried out by an ex-employer after the employment has come to an end can give rise to liability under the anti-discrimination legislation at present in force. Although the point of principle arises in each of the appeals, and needs to be considered as a point of principle, the point requires a context for its implications to be fully comprehended. The facts of each appeal have been fully set out in the opinions of my noble and learned friends, Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead and Lord Hope of Craighead. I gratefully adopt their exposition and can confine myself to referring to the essential skeletal details of the respective cases.

RELAXION GROUP PLC v RHYS-HARPER

[167] The appellant's complaint to the employment tribunal began its life as one of sexual harassment and constructive dismissal. She had been accused of misconduct. A disciplinary hearing to inquire into the incident in question was conducted by a Mr Osborn. His decision was that she was to be dismissed and she was given one week's notice, expiring on 22 October 1998. The decision was formally communicated to her by letter of 15 October 1998. Under Relaxion's internal disciplinary procedures she had the right to appeal against the dismissal decision. She decided to exercise this right and appealed. Her appeal was heard by Mr Adamson, Relaxion's general manager. In the course of the appeal hearing, on 9 November 1998, the appellant complained that prior to the events that were the occasion of her dismissal she had been the victim of sexual harassment by Mr Osborn. It is, in my opinion, a fair inference that her complaint about sexual harassment by Mr Osborn was not a free-standing complaint separate from her appeal against dismissal but was put forward as a reason for impugning Mr Osborn's dismissal decision.

[168] On 30 November 1998 the appellant received two letters from Mr Adamson. One letter told her that her appeal against dismissal had failed. The other letter told her that her sexual harassment complaint against Mr Osborn had been the object of a 'full and thorough investigation' and that there was 'insufficient evidence to establish a case against Mr Osborn'.

[169] It is of relevance that the latter letter said that 'members of staff did confirm that you had reported an incident to them and that you had requested that the information remain private'. This comment is consistent with the appellant's evidence to the employment tribunal that she had not previously to 9 November 1998 made any formal complaint about the sexual harassment (see the note of evidence made by the chairman of the tribunal).

[170] The appellant's application to the employment tribunal was made on 18 February 1999. She complained of sexual harassment and unfair dismissal. A preliminary point was taken. The point was whether the application had been made within the prescribed three months. At a preliminary hearing to deal with the point the tribunal concluded (by a majority) that the appellant's employment had continued until 30 November 1998 and that, accordingly, her application was in time. In the course of their extended reasons the tribunal described the appellant's complaint as being 'for a series of incidents of sex discrimination which lasted until early October 1998' but took the view that Mr Adamson's 30 November 1998 decision 'could be in itself a continuing discrimination against her'.

[171] Relaxion's appeal to the Employment Appeal Tribunal (EAT) succeeded: ([2000] IRLR 810). The EAT held, correctly as is now agreed, that the appellant's employment had terminated on 22 October 1998 when the one week's notice had expired. That being so, her application to the employment tribunal, in so far as it related to unfair dismissal or to sexual harassment preceding her dismissal, was out of time. If her sexual discrimination claim was to be viable then, unless she were given an extension of time, she would need to rely on an act of discrimination occurring after 19 November 1998, ie after the termination of her employment on 22 October 1998.

[172] Accordingly, both in the EAT and in the Court of Appeal ([2001] EWCA Civ 634, [2001] IRLR 460, [2001] ICR 1176) the appellant's claim was presented as including a complaint about an act of discrimination consisting of failure by Mr Adamson to investigate properly her complaint of sexual harassment. The EAT (at 810 (para 4)) posed the question whether she had 'a freestanding claim ... in relation to matters occurring after 19 November 1998 even though she had then ceased to be an employee'. In the Court of Appeal Pill LJ described her complaint ([2001] IRLR 460 at [2]) as a 'complaint about sexual harassment'—which is what it had originally been—but Buxton LJ described it (at [39]) as 'solely a failure ... properly to investigate her complaint'—which is what it had had to become.

[173] The EAT held that since the alleged discriminatory conduct had taken place after the appellant's employment had come to an end, her complaint could not be brought within the 1975 Act. Her appeal on this point was dismissed by the Court of Appeal. The point is now before your Lordships.

[174] In summary, the alleged discriminatory conduct was committed by Relaxion, through Mr Adamson, after the appellant's employment had come to an end. The conduct in question was Mr Adamson's alleged failure to deal properly with the sexual harassment complaint made to him as part of the appellant's case that her dismissal by Mr Osborn ought not to be allowed to stand. In failing to deal properly with the complaint Mr Adamson, it is said, discriminated against her.

D'SOUZA v LAMBETH LONDON BC

[175] In this case the alleged discrimination consisted of Lambeth's failure to reinstate the appellant in the job from which he had been dismissed. He was dismissed in January 1990. Following his dismissal he made an application to the employment tribunal complaining of unfair dismissal, race discrimination and victimisation. His application was successful on all three grounds and on 16 November 1992 the tribunal made an order that Lambeth reinstate him by 16 January 1993. Lambeth did not reinstate him. In July 1995 the appellant instituted a fresh application against Lambeth complaining of racial discrimination and victimisation in respect of Lambeth's failure to reinstate him. Lambeth contended that the post the appellant had previously occupied no longer existed and that it was not practicable for them to reinstate him. The tribunal accepted these contentions and, by a decision of 18 October 1995, made an award of compensation in the appellant's favour in respect of his original complaint of unfair dismissal, having regard to the fact that he had not been reinstated. In effect this decision replaced the original order for reinstatement with an award of compensation.

[176] On 14 March 1996 the tribunal held it had no jurisdiction under the 1976 Act to hear the appellant's complaint of race discrimination in respect of Lambeth's refusal to reinstate him because the discriminatory conduct in question took place at a time when the appellant was no longer an employee of Lambeth. The EAT ([2000] All ER (D) 878) and the Court of Appeal ([2001] EWCA Civ 794, [2001] All ER (D) 346 (May)) agreed. The point is now before your Lordships.

[177] In D'Souza's case the important context in which the point arises is not simply that the discriminatory conduct complained of was post-employment but is also that the complaint relates to the statutory remedies for unlawful discrimination. It was the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978, now replaced by the Employment Rights Act 1996, that provided reinstatement as a possible remedy (see s 113 of the 1996 Act; it was the same Act that enabled the employer to seek a determination that reinstatement was not reasonably practicable (see s 116(5) and (6) and s 117(7) of the 1996 Act); it was the same Act which enabled an award of compensation to be made if an order for reinstatement was not complied with (see s 117(1) and (2) of the 1996 Act).

THE DISABILITY DISCRIMINATION APPEALS

[178] There are four cases, in each of which the appellant suffers from a disability and alleges that he has suffered discrimination from an ex-employer on account of the disability. In each, a claim was made under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. Kirker v British Sugar plc concerns references. The appellant was dismissed by British Sugar in March 1997 and successfully claimed that his dismissal involved discrimination on account of his disability. In August 1999 he applied for a position with another company and named British Sugar as a previous employer who could give a reference about him. British Sugar were asked by the prospective employer to supply the reference. They say they did so, but that is in dispute. The appellant's job application failed and he commenced proceedings both against the prospective employer and against British Sugar. The claim against British Sugar alleges discrimination and victimisation in failing to supply the reference. The question arises whether, even if the appellant's claim is factually correct, the discrimination is covered by the 1995 Act. He was an ex-employee seeking a reference from an ex-employer.

[179] In Jones v 3M Healthcare Ltd the appellant was dismissed and brought unfair dismissal and disability discrimination proceedings against his ex-employers. The proceedings were unsuccessful. The appellant then asked his ex-employers to return to him some business cards which he had left in his erstwhile office and, on their failure to do so, successfully sued in the county court for the return of the cards. He then commenced proceedings under the 1995 Act alleging that his ex-employers' failure to return his cards was because he had instituted the discrimination proceedings and was accordingly victimisation. But at the time of the allegedly victimising conduct, the appellant was no longer an employee. Is the discrimination covered by the 1995 Act?

[180] Angel v New Possibilities NHS Trust is another reference case. The appellant was dismissed from her employment with the NHS Trust in July 1998. She claimed that she had been dismissed on account of her disability. Her claim was successful. She sought new employment. The NHS Trust provided a reference about her to the proposed new employers. But she was not offered the job. She then claimed that the NHS Trust had victimised her by giving an adverse reference about her.

[181] Finally, there is Bond v Hackney Citizens' Advice Bureau. The appellant had been employed by the Citizens' Advice Bureau but in 1994 had been made redundant. In November 1999 she made an application to an employment tribunal alleging that she had been discriminated against by the Citizens' Advice Bureau on account of her disability. And in June 2000 she made a further application alleging that the Citizens' Advice Bureau had victimised her by declining to give a reference about her and also by the manner in which they had responded to inquiries made about her in connection with her mortgage repayments. The conduct complained of took place after her employment by the Citizens' Advice Bureau had come to an end.

[182] In each of these appeals the employment tribunal took the view that the complaints were not covered by the 1995 Act for the reason that the discriminatory conduct complained of had taken place after the employment had come to an end. The EAT and the Court of Appeal agreed. The point is now before your Lordships.

THE SCOPE OF THE ANTI-DISCRIMINATION LEGISLATION

[183] It is clear that each of the anti-discrimination statutes, that is to say, the Sex Discrimination Act 1975, the Race Relations Act 1976 and the Disability Discrimination Act 1995, covers discrimination against applicants for jobs and discrimination against current employees. The issue is whether or to what extent the Acts cover discrimination against ex-employees. There are three particular types of case in which alleged discrimination against ex-employees has led to litigation and to consideration being given to the issue by the courts. They are, first, cases in which the alleged discrimination has taken place in the course of domestic appeal procedures; second, cases in which an ex-employee has sought a reference from his or her ex-employer; and, third, cases in which some benefit has been extended by the ex-employer to some but not all ex-employees. There may, of course, be cases which do not fall into any of these categories. Jones v 3M Healthcare Ltd and the ex-employer's retention of his business cards is one such case.

[184] The issue is essentially one of statutory construction. The language used in each of the three Acts suggests, if read literally, that ex-employees are not protected. The 1975 Act refers to 'a woman employed by' the discriminator (see s 6(2)). The 1976 Act refers to 'a person employed by' the discriminator (see s 4(2)). The 1995 Act refers to 'a disabled person whom [the discriminator] employs' (see s 4(2)). This language is indicative of a present relationship rather than a past one. My noble and learned friend Lord Hope of Craighead has, in [44]–[48] of his opinion, referred to a number of textual provisions in the 1975 and 1976 Acts that reinforce the indication of a present relationship. And, as he points out (at [49] and [50], above), the indication of a present relationship is further reinforced by the language used in the 1995 Act.

[185] The conclusion that ex-employees are not protected under these three Acts is consistent with domestic authority. In Nagarajan v Agnew [1994] IRLR 61, [1995] ICR 520 Knox J held that there had to be a 'subsisting employment relationship' for a claim under s 4(2) of the 1976 Act. The Court of Appeal in Adekeye v Post Office [1997] IRLR 105, [1997] ICR 110 came to the same conclusion on the point. Peter Gibson LJ said ([1997] IRLR 105 at 109, [1997] ICR 110 at 118):

> '.... giving the words "in the case of a person employed by him" their ordinary and natural meaning in their context, those words mean, and can only mean, "in the case of a person who is employed by him".'

[186] This conclusion has not, however, met with uniform satisfaction. In Adekeye's case itself Peter Gibson and Pill LJJ said that it was unsatisfactory that the 1976 Act did not give a remedy for discrimination in the handling of an appeal against dismissal by an ex-employee. Morison J in the EAT has twice expressed dissatisfaction with Adekeye's case (see Coote v Granada Hospitality Ltd (No 2) [1999] IRLR 452 at 454–455, [1999] ICR 942 at 949–950 and D'Souza v Lambeth London BC [2000] All ER (D) 878).

[187] It has been urged upon your Lordships to adopt a purposive approach to construction of the relevant language in the three Acts. It must surely, it is said, have been the intention of the legislature to protect an ex-employee from discrimination, and a fortiori from victimisation for having previously complained of discrimination, where the discriminatory acts complained of consist of the unfair handling of appeals against dismissal. In these cases the appellant will, if the appeal succeeds, be reinstated as an employee as though he or she had never been dismissed. How can Parliament have intended that an employer, in reaching a decision as to whether an employee's dismissal should stand or should be set aside, should be free from the restraints on discrimination imposed by the Act? It seems to me that once the question is asked there can be only one answer. Of course Parliament must have intended the Acts to apply to such cases.

[188] On the other hand, where references are concerned the answer to whether Parliament must have intended the Acts to apply seems to me by no means clear. A request for a reference is, in part, a request for an opinion about the individual in question and, in part, a request for a statement of known events concerning that individual. An employer has no general contractual obligation to give a reference about an employee or an ex-employee but, as Lord Slynn of Hadley said in Spring v Guardian Assurance plc [1994] 3 All ER 129 at 161, [1995] 2 AC 296 at 335:

> '... in many cases an employee will stand no chance of getting another job, let alone a better job, unless he is given a reference. There is at least a moral obligation on the employer to give it.'

Lord Woolf went further and expressed the view ([1994] 3 All ER 129 at 179, [1995] 2 AC 296 at 354), that in respect of some types of employment—

> 'it is necessary to imply a term into the contract that the employer would, during the continuance of the engagement or within a reasonable time thereafter, provide a reference at the request of a prospective employer which was based on facts revealed after making ... reasonably careful inquiries ...'

And Lord Goff of Chieveley commented ([1994] 3 All ER 129 at 146, [1995] 2 AC 296 at 319):

> 'The provision of ... references is a service regularly provided by employers to their employees; indeed, references are part of the currency of the modern employment market.'

[189] Their Lordships held in Spring's case that an employer, or ex-employer, would owe a duty not only to the prospective new employer but also to the subject of the reference to take reasonable care that the reference was fair and accurate.

[190] Whether or not there is an implied contractual obligation on an employer, or ex-employer, to give a reference, as there may be in some cases, most employers would, I am sure, usually give a reference if asked to do so. But some might be reluctant to do so, particularly if a long period had elapsed since the object of the reference had been an employee. If the anti-discrimination Acts are held to extend generally to ex-employees as well as current employees, any refusal or failure to supply a reference when asked to do so, no matter what period of years might have elapsed, might attract a discrimination complaint.

[191] Employers would be in a particularly vulnerable position where the possibility of a victimisation complaint were present. Suppose an employee has made one, or more than one, unsuccessful discrimination complaints during the currency of his employment with a particular employer. He then leaves his employment and later asks for a reference in connection with an application for a job with some other employer. Must the first employer inform the prospective employer of the history of discrimination complaints made by the ex-employee? If the first employer refrains from doing so, will he be in breach of his duty to the prospective employer? If he does inform the prospective employer of the fact that the discrimination complaints were made and of their outcome, would that be victimisation? Perhaps not, but to include in the reference the details of the unsuccessful discrimination complaints would surely be damaging to the ex-employee's job prospects. Could it not be represented as constituting less favourable treatment than would have been accorded to an ex-employee who had not made such complaints? Similar problems might, of course, arise in relation to requests for references made by current employees.

[192] The problems about references are demonstrated by some of the disability discrimination cases now before the House. In Kirker v British Sugar plc complaint is made of a failure by British Sugar to provide a reference. Was British Sugar under an obligation to provide a reference? Presumably not. It may be that a reference was in fact provided. But the appellant did not succeed in getting the job applied for. Was that because the reference was unfavourable? If it was unfavourable was that because the appellant had successfully claimed to have been dismissed on account of his disability?

[193] Angel v New Possibilities NHS Trust raises similar questions. Victimisation by the supply of an unfavourable reference is the kernel of the complaint. And in Bond v Hackney Citizens' Advice Bureau, too, victimisation by an ex-employer in failing to supply a reference is the kernel of the complaint.

[194] It is one thing to allow the Acts to apply to references requested about current employees during the currency of the employment. It is quite another thing to allow them to apply without limit of time to all ex-employees. It is clear enough that Parliament did not have these problems in mind. Otherwise some provision would surely have been included in the Acts clarifying the position. But that is not by itself a reason why the Acts, if their language allows it, should not be applied to these cases. The literal language of a statute ought not, however, to be extended so as to cover matters that Parliament did not have in mind unless it is clear from the statute properly construed that Parliament would have intended the extension.

[195] The same problems are associated with post-employment benefits. If ex-employees are led to expect post-employment benefits, such as membership of sports clubs, concessionary travel benefits or the like, it is easy to conclude that, even if their expectation is not strictly contractual, their deprivation of these benefits in circumstances involving discrimination on sex, race or disability grounds should be covered by the relevant Act. If, however, no such expectation has been engendered and an employer decides to offer some extra-contractual benefit to employees and to extend the benefit to some but not all ex-employees, can the excluded ex-employees make a discrimination complaint? A person can decide on which strangers he will bestow his generosity and from whom he will withhold it. Can he not exercise the same freedom to discriminate in relation to those who were in the past his employees but have become strangers? Why should the anti-discrimination Acts apply? The answer to these questions is not, in my opinion, apparent from the Acts themselves.

[196] So how is the line to be drawn. How is the principle to be formulated that would enable ex-employers and ex-employees to judge whether the imposition of a particular detriment, alleged to be discriminatory, was or was not covered by the Act? One answer would be to construe the Acts simply as covering all ex-employees. The participle 'employed' in the 1975 and 1976 Acts would be read as meaning 'has been or is employed', and the word 'employs' in the 1995 Act would be read as meaning 'employs or has employed'. An alternative answer would be to confine the relevant words to their strict literal meaning and exclude ex-employees from protection under the Acts in all circumstances. I would, for my part, reject both these extremes. I would reject the first because it requires a purposive construction that can only be justified by attributing to Parliament an evident intention that, to my mind, is not in the least evident. I would reject the second because it introduces an arbitrary rigidity into the implementation of the Act that is unrealistic and cannot have been intended.

[197] In my opinion, the answer to the conundrum can be found by concentrating on the relationship between the employer and employee that is brought into existence when the latter enters the service of the former. The relationship is, of course, based on contract, express or implied, but does not necessarily come to an end, ipso facto, when the employment comes to an end. The internal appeal procedures that most employers, and all good ones, institute are a good example. Employees are entitled to avail themselves of these procedures. An employee who is dismissed and challenges the dismissal does not because he has been dismissed lose his right to appeal. The relationship between employer and employee, or ex-employee as he may by reason of his dismissal have become, is still in existence. The employee's, or ex-employee's entitlement is not simply an entitlement to lodge an appeal. He or she is entitled also to a fair hearing that is not tainted by discrimination. An obligation to provide such a hearing lies on the employer, or ex-employer. The relationship that is brought into existence when an employee enters an employer's service is not, in my opinion, wholly terminated so long as the internal appeal procedure is on foot. And, in my opinion, the reference to a woman 'employed' in the 1975 Act, to a person 'employed' in the 1976 Act and to a person whom the alleged discriminator 'employs' in the 1995 Act can and should be given a purposive construction so as to cover dismissed employees during the currency of an internal appeal process.

[198] If the opinion I have expressed in the preceding paragraphs is right, Adekeye v Post Office [1997] IRLR 105, [1997] ICR 110 was wrongly decided. The case was one in which the complainant was dismissed by the Post Office but utilised the Post Office's internal appeal procedures to appeal against the dismissal. Her appeal was dismissed. She then instituted proceedings under the 1976 Act contending that the failure of her appeal was on account of racial discrimination. The EAT held ([1995] IRLR 297, [1995] ICR 540) that her complaint was not justiciable because at the time her appeal against dismissal was dealt with she was no longer an employee of the Post Office. The Court of Appeal agreed.

[199] It is of interest that an argument to somewhat of the same effect as that which I have attempted in para 32 was addressed to the Court of Appeal in Adekeye's case. The argument is recorded by Peter Gibson LJ ([1997] IRLR 105 at 109, [1997] ICR 110 at 118):

> '[Counsel for the appellant] argued that the internal appeal is an integral part of the dismissal process and that until the appeal was concluded adversely to the employee, that process continued; the rejection of the applicant's appeal was therefore to be treated as her dismissal at a time when she was employed.'

Peter Gibson LJ characterised this as 'an impossible argument'. He said:

> '... the appeal procedures [do] not turn what was worded as an unconditional dismissal into a conditional one. Further, to argue that the dismissal did not take effect until the conclusion of the appeal is contrary to the decision of this court in J Sainsbury Ltd v Savage ([1980] IRLR 109, [1981] ICR 1).'

I respectfully agree with Peter Gibson LJ's cited remarks about the unconditional nature of a dismissal and its immediate effect in terminating the employment but the thought behind counsel's argument was, in my opinion, valid. The issue was whether the relationship between employer and employee, or ex-employee, during the currency of the appeal procedures was a relationship to which s 4(2) of the 1976 Act applied. It does not follow that because the dismissal was immediate and unconditional the Act could not apply to the relationship that would necessarily continue until the conclusion of the appeal procedures. In my opinion, for the reasons given the Act would continue to apply.

[200] Where references or other post-employment benefits are concerned the question whether the anti-discrimination Acts apply should, in my opinion, similarly depend on whether the relationship between employer and employee brought into existence when the employee entered the employer's service is still in existence. For my part I find it difficult to construct circumstances, other than those arising out of internal appeal procedures, where the relationship would still continue notwithstanding the dismissal, or departure for other reasons, of the employee. Lord Woolf in Spring v Guardian Assurance plc [1994] 3 All ER 129, [1995] 2 AC 296 suggested that employees in certain types of employment might have an implied contractual right to a reference, whether before or after their employment had come to an end. If there were such a case, the continuing responsibility of the ex-employer towards the ex-employee in regard to references might constitute a continuing relationship sufficient to justify the application of the anti-discrimination Acts. Another possible scenario is that of an employee who has been dismissed but is not allowed to return to his office to remove his belongings. Perhaps Jones v 3M Healthcare Ltd is such a case. In my opinion every employee who is dismissed is entitled to expect to be given a reasonable opportunity, under supervision if necessary, to remove his or her belongings from the premises where he or she was employed. The entitlement might be founded on implied contract or merely reasonable expectation but in either case I would regard the relationship between employer and employee as continuing for a reasonable period for that purpose. A discriminatory refusal to allow the ex-employee to remove his or her belongings would not, in my opinion, fall outside the Act.

[201] Special problems arise where the discrimination allegation is, or includes, an allegation of victimisation. Victimisation (see s 4 of the 1975 Act, s 2 of the 1976 Act, and s 55 of the 1995 Act) is not per se unlawful. It is a form of discrimination that becomes unlawful if it takes place in circumstances in which the Act declares it to be unlawful eg in relation to an employed person by subjecting the person to any detriment (see s 6(2) of the 1975 Act). Victimisation does not, therefore, extend the scope of protection against discrimination. It simply requires a different comparison to be made than that which has to be made for other forms of discrimination. If, for example, a reference is refused to an ex-employee as an act of victimisation, the relevant Act is no more, and no less, applicable than it would have been if the discrimination had taken some other form. But where the victimisation claim is brought under the 1975 Act, the position is complicated by the need to take account of European Community law.

[202] The Coote v Granada Hospitality Ltd litigation arose out of the following circumstances. Miss Coote, an employee of Granada, brought sex discrimination proceedings against them. The proceedings were settled and Miss Coote left Granada's employment. She then sought but failed to find employment elsewhere. She brought proceedings against Granada alleging that her failure was because, by way of reprisal for her previous sex discrimination claims, Granada had refused to supply a reference about her. The EAT sought a ruling from the European Court of Justice as to whether Council Directive (EEC) 76/207 (OJ 1976 L39 p 40) (the Equal Treatment Directive) required member states to introduce measures to enable victimised persons in Miss Coote's position to pursue a claim. The European Court held that it did. It said that the directive—

> 'requires member states to introduce into their national legal systems such measures as are necessary to ensure judicial protection for workers whose employer, after the end of the employment relationship, refuses to provide references as a reaction to proceedings brought to enforce compliance with the principle of equal treatment within the meaning of the directive.' (See [1998] All ER (EC) 865 at 876, [1999] ICR 100 at 112, [1998] ECR I-5199 at 5220 (para 19).)

[203] This decision and the directive with which it was concerned apply to sex discrimination cases only. They do not apply to race discrimination or disability discrimination cases. Following the ruling by the European Court, the case returned to the EAT. The EAT held that, in the light of the European Court ruling, the words 'a woman employed by him' in s 6(2) of the 1975 Act should be construed, in conformity with the directive, as covering discrimination against former employees. Morison J declined to follow Adekeye v Post Office [1997] IRLR 105, [1997] ICR 110. He held that the European Court ruling had relieved him of the need to do so. In my respectful opinion it had not. There is no difference between the words used in the 1975 Act and those used in the 1976 Act with which Adekeye's case was concerned. The Court of Appeal decision on the 1976 Act words was just as applicable to the words in the 1975 Act. Moreover, the directive did not have direct effect in the domestic law of this country. It required, if its terms differed from domestic law, to be implemented in domestic law by primary or subordinate legislation. I, of course, accept that domestic legislation intended to implement a directive should, if possible, be construed in a manner consistent with the directive. But the 1975 Act was not passed in order to implement the directive. It preceded the directive. It may be that the government believed that no implementation measure was necessary because the 1975 Act did all that was required to comply with the directive. But the Court of Appeal decision in Adekeye's case, coupled with the European Court decision in Coote's case, showed, in my opinion, that that was not so. I do not think it was open to Morison J to disapply Adekeye's case.

[204] In my opinion, save for cases where the relationship between employer and employee is still continuing notwithstanding the termination of the employment, the conclusions of the Court of Appeal in Adekeye's case were correct and should be followed. The 1976 directive has now been amended by a new directive Council Directive (EC) 2002/73 (OJ 2002 L269 p 15), which must be implemented at latest by 5 October 2005. If and to the extent that domestic law is inconsistent with these directives it is for government and Parliament to provide the remedy and not, in my opinion, for the courts to do so.

[205] I must now return to the individual appeals.

(1) Relaxion Group plc v Rhys-Harper. I would allow the appeal in this case. The appellant complains of sex discrimination in her ex-employer's handling of her appeal against dismissal. A complaint of that character is, in my opinion, covered by s 6(2) of the 1975 Act.

(2) D'Souza v Lambeth London BC. I would dismiss this appellant's appeal for the reasons given by my noble and learned friend, Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead. The statutory remedy of reinstatement is associated with the statutory alternative of compensation if reinstatement can be shown to be impracticable. It was so shown in proceedings to which the appellant was a party and by which he is bound. There is no room for a complementary claim that Lambeth's failure to reinstate him was discriminatory.

(3) In each of Kirker v British Sugar plc, Angel v New Possibilities NHS Trust and Bond v Hackney Citizens' Advice Bureau the alleged acts of discrimination occurred after the relationship between the appellant and his or her ex-employer had come to an end. None of the appellants was, at the time, 'a person whom [the alleged discriminator] employs' (see s 4(2) of the 1995 Act). I would dismiss these appeals.

(4) In Jones v 3M Healthcare Ltd the courts below dismissed the case on the ground that at the time the alleged act of discrimination took place the appellant was no longer a person whom 3M Healthcare Ltd 'employs'. In my opinion, the appellant was entitled to a reasonable opportunity to remove his belongings, including his business cards, from the premises where he was previously employed. The relationship between him and his ex-employer that had been brought into existence when he entered their employ continued for that purpose during that period. If he had sought to remove his cards during that period and had been prevented from doing so as an act of victimisation, the case would in my opinion have been covered by the 1975 Act. But he was dismissed in November 1997, his proceedings for unfair dismissal and disability discrimination were dismissed in August 1998 and he did not request the return of his cards until September 1999. A reasonable time for him to remove his belongings from his ex-employer's premises and to request their return had elapsed long before September 1999. By September 1999 the relationship between the appellant and 3M Healthcare Ltd had long since come to an end. His complaint is not in my opinion covered by the Act and I would dismiss his appeal.

[206] Save that I have formed the view that the applicability of the three Acts should be tied to the continuance of the relationship between employer and employee rather than to the duration of the actual employment, I am in respectful agreement with the views about these appeals and the issues they give rise to that have been expressed by my noble and learned friend, Lord Hope of Craighead.

LORD RODGER OF EARLSFERRY.

[207] My Lords, on one level these appeals raise a short point of construction of the words 'a woman employed by him' in s 6(2) of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975, 'a person employed by him' in s 4(2) of the Race Relations Act 1976 and 'a ... person whom he employs' in s 4(2) of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. In substance, however, the House has to decide whether, as the Court of Appeal have held, in terms of these anti-discrimination Acts it is quite lawful for employers to discriminate against their former employees in circumstances where it would be quite unlawful for them to discriminate against their current employees.

[208] I gratefully adopt the detailed accounts of the facts and issues given by my noble and learned friends, Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead and Lord Hope of Craighead. As they show, allowing for the distinctive features of the 1995 Act, the objectives and, to a greater or lesser degree, the structure and terms of the three Acts are similar. Precisely because of that, it has come to be accepted that an interpretation of the wording of one Act will be a guide to the interpretation of the equivalent wording in another Act. Most notably, in Anyanwu v South Bank Student Union (Commission for Racial Equality, interveners) [2001] UKHL 14 at [2], [2001] 2 All ER 353 at [2], [2001] ICR 391, Lord Bingham of Cornhill said:

> 'Since the 1976 Act is one of a trio of Acts (with the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 and the Disability Discrimination Act 1995) which contain similar statutory provisions although directed to different forms of discrimination, it is legitimate if necessary to consider those Acts in resolving any issue of interpretation which may arise on this Act.'

True to that spirit, in the hearings before the House counsel referred indiscriminately to authorities on the interpretation of the provisions in all three Acts. Nor did they suggest that any approach other than that indicated by Lord Bingham of Cornhill would be realistic or appropriate, even though, of course, the 1975 Act has to be interpreted in the light of Council Directive (EEC) 76/207 (OJ 1976 L39 p 40) (the Equal Treatment Directive), whereas there is at present no equivalent European dimension lying behind the other Acts.

[209] Discrimination can take a variety of forms but all involve treating the person concerned less favourably than others. The law does not attempt to outlaw every form of undesirable discrimination. In Great Britain it concentrates on discrimination on the ground of sex, race and disability and then only in certain circumstances, including the employment field. In Northern Ireland the Fair Employment and Treatment (Northern Ireland) Order 1998, SI 1998/3162 (NI 21) adds discrimination on grounds of religious belief and political opinion. Before sex and race discrimination were made unlawful, employers would sometimes try to preserve the all-male or all-white character of their workforce by simply refusing to take on women or ethnic minority job applicants. Similarly, employers might refuse to employ disabled people in order to avoid having to make even minor adjustments for them. The three anti-discrimination Acts make such tactics unlawful (see s 6(1)(c) of the 1975 Act and s 4(1)(c) of both the 1976 and 1995 Acts). Another form of discrimination was to offer to employ people but on less favourable terms. That is outlawed by para (b) of the same subsections. Moreover, once the person is employed, the employer cannot discriminate by actually affording him less favourable terms of employment (see s 4(2)(a) of both the 1976 and 1995 Acts). In the case of sex discrimination the mechanism is different: s 1 of the Equal Pay Act 1970 implies an equality clause into all contracts of employment. Where these provisions are observed, they go a long way towards ensuring that everyone has access to employment and enjoys the same contractual rights. If the employer fails to comply with his obligations under the contract of employment, the employee concerned has the usual remedies for breach of the contract.

[210] Ensuring that all employees in similar positions have the same contractual rights is only a start. Employment is just as much about opportunities as about rights. Not for nothing was the body which was set up under the 1975 Act called the Equal Opportunities Commission. Employees do not have a contractual right to promotion, but they should have an opportunity to earn it. Similarly, certain types of training, with the prospect of a better job, may only be available to employees selected by the employer. The selection should be made fairly. The employer may run a social or recreational club which employees can apply to join. Again everyone should have an equal opportunity to join if they want to. If an employer were free to discriminate in these areas, which do not involve contractual rights as such, then those affected would be marginalised and unable to achieve their full potential. So one important purpose of the anti-discrimination Acts is to prevent employers from exercising their freedom of choice in such matters so as to discriminate against employees on the ground of their sex, race or disability. That is achieved by the provisions which lie at the heart of these appeals. In the case of the 1975 Act the relevant provision is s 6(2), but it is convenient to set out sub-s (1) also:

> '(1) It is unlawful for a person, in relation to employment by him at an establishment in Great Britain, to discriminate against a woman—(a) in the arrangements he makes for the purpose of determining who should be offered that employment, or (b) in the terms on which he offers her that employment, or (c) by refusing or deliberately omitting to offer her that employment.
>
> (2) It is unlawful for a person, in the case of a woman employed by him at an establishment in Great Britain, to discriminate against her—(a) in the way he affords her access to opportunities for promotion, transfer or training, or to any other benefits, facilities or services, or by refusing or deliberately omitting to afford her access to them, or (b) by dismissing her, or subjecting her to any other detriment.'

As sub-s (2) shows, the anti-discrimination Acts are not really concerned with employees' rights under their contracts of employment. So, for instance, where a contract of employment is tainted by illegality, an employee may none the less complain that her employer discriminated against her on the ground of her sex by dismissing her, since both the Equal Treatment Directive and the 1975 Act are designed to provide effective relief in respect of discriminatory conduct 'rather than relief which reflects any contractual entitlement which may or may not exist': see Hall v Woolston Hall Leisure Ltd [2000] 4 All ER 787 at 806, [2001] ICR 99 at 119 (para 67) per Mance LJ. As Peter Gibson LJ put it ([2000] 4 All ER 787 at 799, [2001] ICR 99 at 113 (para 46)):

'It is the sex discrimination that is the core of the complaint, the fact of employment and the dismissal being the particular factual circumstances which Parliament has prescribed for the sex discrimination complaint to be capable of being made.'

Mummery J had made the same point when, in giving the judgment of the Employment Appeal Tribunal (EAT) in Leighton v Michael [1996] IRLR 67 at 69, [1995] ICR 1091 at 1098, he said that the claim of sex discrimination 'does not involve enforcing, relying on or founding a claim on the contract of employment'. Employees invoke the Acts not to enforce their contractual rights but to enforce their statutory rights not to suffer discrimination 'in the employment field', inter alia in respect of the opportunities to which the employer affords access.

[211] Therefore, although being employed is one of the keys which unlocks access to the rights and remedies conferred by the anti-discrimination Acts, to a considerable extent those Acts are actually concerned with discrimination in relation to the various kinds of opportunities that employees may enjoy in addition to any contractual rights. Of course, not even all contractual rights end on the termination of employment: an employee may still have both rights and obligations under the contract. Most obviously, an employee may have a right under his contract to be paid a pension or to continue to enjoy free medical insurance, while he may also be bound by a restrictive covenant in the contract. Not only an employee's rights and obligations under the contract of employment can continue after the employment itself comes to an end: an employer may continue to afford his former employees opportunities to enjoy some of the additional non-contractual benefits, such as access to sports or other recreational and social facilities. Since the anti-discrimination Acts are not tied to contractual rights and obligations, there is in principle no reason why the Acts should cease to have effect in respect of these continuing opportunities. I therefore have difficulty in seeing why Parliament, however cautious its approach, would ever have intended that it should be lawful for an employer to discriminate against a former employee in these respects. The idea, for instance, that Parliament intended that, after the 1976 Act was in force, an employer should still be able to bar a black former employee from entering the employer's social club while allowing white former employees to continue to enjoy the facility strikes me as untenable.

[212] The same applies to the provision of references. In some cases the employee may have a contractual right, whether express or implied, to be supplied with a reference. But even where that is not so, since an employee or former employee will often stand little chance of getting a new job without a reference, an employer will recognise at least a moral duty to provide one (see Spring v Guardian Assurance plc [1994] 3 All ER 129 at 161, [1995] 2 AC 296 at 335 per Lord Slynn of Hadley). And in providing the reference he owes a duty of care to his employee or former employee. Again, I have the greatest difficulty in believing that Parliament could have intended that it should be unlawful for an employer to discriminate in giving or withholding references for existing employees but perfectly lawful for him to do so in the case of ex-employees. Parliament often has to draw lines—and indeed does so explicitly in various ways in the anti-discrimination Acts, eg by limiting their application in the case of domestic employment. It is not hard to see the reason for that. It is very much harder to see why Parliament would have chosen to draw an arbitrary line through the continuing effects of the employment relationship rather than leave the ban on discrimination to expire as and when those effects themselves were spent. In particular, I am not impressed by the spectre of the supposed difficulties for employers if proceedings could be brought for discrimination in failing to provide a reference or in providing an unsatisfactory reference some time after the employee had left his employment. If such proceedings were brought, there is little reason to suppose that the difficulties for the employer would be significantly greater than those entailed in defending a negligence claim in relation to a request for a reference made at about the same time. And, of course, in any such proceedings the applicant will have to show that the former employer treated him or her less favourably than other former employees in similar circumstances.

[213] As an argument against holding that the Acts make it unlawful to discriminate against former employees, it is pointed out—correctly—that the pre-legislative materials make no mention of discrimination against them. Moreover, it is said, if the draftsman of s 6 of the 1975 Act, for instance, had intended to cover former employees, he might have been expected to do so specifically in a separate sub-s (3), to mirror sub-s (1) dealing with job applicants. These arguments, which are interlinked, really amount to saying that the lack of any positive sign that Parliament considered the position of former employees shows that it did not in fact intend to make discrimination unlawful in the case of former employees. So in Rhys-Harper v Relaxion Group plc [2001] EWCA Civ 634, [2001] IRLR 460, [2001] ICR 1176 the Court of Appeal were correct to interpret sub-s (2) as they did.

[214] At first sight the argument may appear quite persuasive, on mature reflection less so. For the reasons I have given, I do not find the lack of discussion of the particular position of former employees significant. What would have been significant, not to say remarkable, would have been any hint that the government of the day, or Parliament itself, ever contemplated that it was to remain lawful for employers to discriminate against former employees on, say, racial grounds. So far as the drafting of the sections is concerned, if discrimination against job applicants was to be outlawed, a separate provision was obviously necessary since on no view can they fall within sub-s (2). That subsection is drafted to deal with the very different situation of people who have gone a step further and have actually been employed. Former employees are different from job applicants in this respect. Some of the kinds of discrimination listed in sub-s (2)—eg failing to offer opportunities for promotion or dismissing someone—are such that only a current employee can be subjected to them. Others could apply to both current and former employees. It is not suggested that there is some other class of conduct by employers that would have to be made unlawful solely in the case of former employees. Therefore, the provision as drafted, making it unlawful for employers to discriminate against employees in various ways, could in principle operate perfectly satisfactorily in respect of former employees without there being any need either to discuss their position separately or to make separate provision for them in a further subsection. Everything thus depends on whether the wording of the provision in sub-s (2) is capable of covering both current and former employees—which is simply the point at issue.

[215] The words in s 6(2) of the 1975 Act which are said to confine the provision to current employees are 'a woman employed by him at an establishment in Great Britain'. They comprise the noun phrase 'a woman' and the non-finite clause 'employed by him at an establishment in Great Britain' which modifies the noun phrase. In that clause 'employed' is a passive participle and, as such, it is inherently ambiguous. Discounting any other possibility, the words may be the equivalent of 'a woman who is employed by him at an establishment in Great Britain' or 'a woman who is or was employed by him at an establishment in Great Britain'. One cannot tell how the participle is to be interpreted from looking at these words alone: it must be interpreted in the context of the provision as a whole. Often the wider context in which the participle is used will point definitely one way or the other. So, for instance, if I say 'John is very worried about productivity in his firm and is inviting everyone employed by him to a meeting to discuss improvements', the obvious meaning is that the invitation is addressed to current employees. On the other hand, sometimes the context may not fully resolve the matter. If I say 'John, who has been in business for 20 years, is inviting everyone employed by him to a party to celebrate', someone listening to me might not be sure what to expect but he would not be unduly surprised to find former as well as current employees at the party. Similarly, in my view, the context of the words within the legislative sentence in s 6(2) leaves the matter open: looked at merely in that context, the passive participle could be interpreted in either way. Although most of the opportunities listed in para (a) may be relevant only to current employees, the examples that I have already given are enough to show that the paragraph could sensibly apply to the situation of former employees, while in para (b) the notion of 'subjecting someone to a detriment' is so broad that, indisputably, it could apply to refusing a reference to a former employee, for instance. Unlike s 6(2), s 4(2) of the 1976 Act uses the word 'employee' but, as Pill LJ noted in Rhys-Harper v Relaxion Group plc [2001] IRLR 460 at [13], the presence or absence of that term cannot be critical to the interpretation of these provisions. In what is largely a matter of impression, I am respectfully unable to share the view of Peter Gibson LJ in Adekeye v Post Office [1997] IRLR 105 at 109, [1997] ICR 110 at 118 that in s 4(2) of the 1976 Act the crucial words can only mean 'in the case of a person who is employed by him'. Since that is not the only possible meaning in either the 1975 or 1976 Act, the wider considerations discussed above persuade me that the provisions should be interpreted as making it unlawful to discriminate against former employees as well as current employees if there is a substantive connection between the discriminatory conduct and the employment relationship. In other words the former employer must discriminate qua former employer. I find nothing in the other provisions on employment in the statutes to invalidate that interpretation. Despite the difference in language, there is no indication that Parliament intended the 1995 Act to be different in this respect. Therefore, given the similarity of the general aims of the anti-discrimination Acts, I would interpret the words 'a ... person whom he employs' in s 4(2) in the same way. The House is not called on in these appeals to decide whether the duty in s 6 of that Act also applies in the case of former employees.

[216] I should add that, even if I had not been disposed to construe s 4(2) of the 1976 Act in this way, I should in any event have concluded that the decision in Adekeye's case was wrong on the basis of the narrower line of reasoning adopted by my noble and learned friend, Lord Scott of Foscote. Unfortunately, in an organisation where racial discrimination is practised an employee is just as liable to encounter it in the internal appeal as in the original dismissal. Reluctantly, the Court of Appeal felt obliged to hold, however, that, while it would have been unlawful for the Post Office to discriminate against Ms Adekeye when dismissing her, it would have been perfectly lawful for them to do so when determining her internal appeal from that self-same dismissal. The result is so startling as in itself to cast doubt on the construction. And indeed, even on a fairly strict construction, it would not have been difficult to regard the applicant as 'a person employed by' the Post Office in terms of s 4(2). After all, at the time of the internal appeal the employment relationship was not severed irrevocably: if the appeal had succeeded, the applicant would have been reinstated as an employee. Only a rather literal, as opposed to a purposive, reading of the words 'a person employed by him' would lead to the conclusion that someone in that twilight zone was no longer 'employed' and had lost her rights under s 4(2). For the reasons I have given, however, I prefer to approach the matter on the footing that, even if Ms Adekeye was indeed to be regarded as a former employee at the time of her internal appeal, she was still within the scope of s 4(2).

[217] Compelling support for the interpretation of s 6(2) of the 1975 Act which I prefer is to be found in the Community law background. The 1975 Act, which was passed while the Equal Treatment Directive was in preparation, was not subsequently amended when the directive came into force. In that situation, of course, as was explained by the European Court of Justice in Marleasing SA v La Comercial Internacional de Alimentación SA Case C-106/89 [1990] ECR I-4135 at 4159 (para 8), when interpreting the 1975 Act, any tribunal or court in this country—

> 'is required to do so, as far as possible, in the light of the wording and the purpose of the directive in order to achieve the result pursued by the latter and thereby comply with the third paragraph of Article 189 of the Treaty.'

In Coote v Granada Hospitality Ltd (No 2) [1999] IRLR 452, [1999] ICR 942 the applicant first brought a claim against her employers alleging that they had discriminated against her on the ground of her sex by dismissing her because she was pregnant. That claim was settled but she later brought further proceedings complaining that she was unable to obtain new employment because, in retaliation for her previous proceedings against them, her employers had consistently failed to provide references when asked to do so. More particularly, her complaint was that, in terms of ss 4(1) and 6(2)(b) of the 1975 Act, it had been unlawful for her employers to discriminate against her by subjecting her to the detriment of failing to provide her with references when they would have provided them to persons who had not previously complained of sex discrimination. For present purposes what matters is that, in order to succeed, the applicant, who was no longer employed by the employers at the time of the alleged discrimination, had none the less to be regarded as 'a woman employed by' Granada Hospitality for the purposes of s 6(2). Consideration of this point in turn raised an issue as to the effect of the Equal Treatment Directive which the EAT referred to the European Court of Justice in November 1996, just a week after the Court of Appeal had given judgment in Adekeye v Post Office [1997] IRLR 105, [1997] ICR 110.

[218] Article 5(1) of the Equal Treatment Directive provides:

> 'Application of the principle of equal treatment with regard to working conditions, including the conditions governing dismissal, means that men and women shall be guaranteed the same conditions without discrimination on grounds of sex.'

Articles 6 and 7 are in these terms:

'Article 6

Member States shall introduce into their national legal systems such measures as are necessary to enable all persons who consider themselves wronged by failure to apply to them the principle of equal treatment within the meaning of Articles 3, 4 and 5 to pursue their claims by judicial process after possible recourse to other competent authorities.

Article 7

Member States shall take the necessary measures to protect employees against dismissal by the employer as a reaction to a complaint within the undertaking or to any legal proceedings aimed at enforcing compliance with the principle of equal treatment.'

Despite the specific reference to retaliation by way of dismissal in art 7, in Coote v Granada Hospitality Ltd Case C-185/97 [1998] All ER (EC) 865 at 877–878, [1999] ICR 100 at 113, [1998] ECR I-5199 at 5222 (paras 27 and 28), the European Court of Justice held that, having regard to the objective of the directive and the fundamental nature of the right to effective judicial protection—

'art 6 of the directive requires member states to introduce into their national legal systems such measures as are necessary to ensure judicial protection for workers whose employer, after the employment relationship has ended, refuses to provide references as a reaction to legal proceedings brought to enforce compliance with the principle of equal treatment within the meaning of the directive.'

The EAT then had to apply the guidance given by the European Court of Justice to the interpretation of s 6(2) of the 1975 Act. They were faced with an argument by the employers that the proper construction of that provision had in effect been settled by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Adekeye's case on the interpretation of s 4(2) of the 1976 Act. The EAT rejected that argument, in the end because they considered that they had to apply the decision of the European Court. Having examined the language of s 6(2), and in order to achieve the result pursued by art 6 of the directive as interpreted by the European Court, the EAT found it possible to hold, and did indeed hold, that the words 'a woman employed by him' were apt to cover a former employee, such as the applicant, complaining of victimisation: see Coote v Granada Hospitality Ltd (No 2) [1999] IRLR 452, [1999] ICR 942. The employers did not appeal.

[219] In Rhys-Harper v Relaxion Group plc [2001] IRLR 460 at [23]–[26], Buxton LJ sharply criticised the decision of the EAT in Coote's case on the ground that it had not been open to them to do other than apply Adekeye's case. Unlike Lord Scott of Foscote, I am very doubtful whether that criticism was justified, given the duty imposed on the EAT by art 249 (ex 189) of the EC Treaty and by the Marleasing line of authority. The European Court of Justice had indeed restated that duty in Coote v Granada Hospitality Ltd Case C-185/97 [1998] All ER (EC) 865 at 876, [1999] ICR 100 at 111–112, [1998] ECR I-5199 at 5219 (para 18). It is unnecessary, however, to go into the question on this occasion since any supposed constraint imposed by Adekeye's case falls away once that decision is itself seen to have been incorrect. As I have noted already, in the context of s 6(2) the words 'a woman employed by him' are ambiguous. In that situation I consider that in Coote's case Morison J was correct to hold that the EAT could, and therefore should, interpret them in such a way that s 6(2) would apply to a former employee who complained of victimisation. I note that—before Buxton LJ's comments—in Hall v Woolston Hall Leisure Ltd [2000] 4 All ER 787 at 803, [2001] ICR 99 at 116 (para 59), Mance LJ, with whom Moore-Bick J agreed, cited the decision of the EAT in Coote's case as an illustration of the kind of approach to interpretation that the decision in the Marleasing case required of a court.

[220] As Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead has pointed out, the interpretation of the critical words in s 6(2) which is required by the ruling of the European Court in Coote's case cannot be confined to cases of victimisation. The words of the subsection cannot mean one thing in victimisation cases and something else in other cases. What constitutes discrimination for purposes of s 6(2) is to be found in Pt I of the Act, including both ss 1 and 4. So, if it is unlawful for an employer to 'discriminate' against a former employee in terms of s 6(2) by victimising her under s 4(1), it must equally be unlawful for the employer to 'discriminate' against a former employee in terms of s 6(2) by treating her less favourably on the ground of her sex under s 1(1). This confirms the conclusion, reached on an examination of the domestic law, that s 6(2) applies generally so as to make it unlawful to discriminate against former as well as current employees. The equivalent words in the other Acts fall to be interpreted in the same way.

[221] For these reasons, and for those given by Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead, I respectfully agree with his interpretation of the relevant provisions in the three Acts. I also agree both with the way he would apply that interpretation in the individual appeals and with what he says about the separate issue in D'Souza v Lambeth London BC. I would accordingly refuse that appeal but allow the others.

Rhys-Harper, Jones, Kirker, Angel and Bond appeals allowed. D'Souza appeal dismissed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

Sheridan v Stanley Cole (Wainfleet) Ltd

[2003] EWCA Civ 1046

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
WARD, BUXTON AND MANCE LJJ
15 MAY, 25 JULY 2003

Human rights – Right to a fair hearing – Decision of tribunal – Employment tribunal's decision referring to authorities which parties had had no opportunity to address – Proper approach for determining whether hearing rendered unfair in such circumstances – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 6.

An employment tribunal upheld a complaint by the respondent employee of unfair constructive dismissal. The employer applied to the tribunal for a review of the decision. At the hearing, the employer was not legally represented. Neither party referred to any authorities and the tribunal did not refer them to any. In giving its decision, however, the tribunal referred to two authorities, and proceeded to dismiss the application. On its appeal to the Employment Appeal Tribunal (EAT), the employer relied on the tribunal's failure to draw the authorities to the attention of the parties. The EAT dismissed the appeal, holding that, even if the parties had been alerted to the authorities, there was no reasonable prospect that a tribunal, properly directed, would have taken a different view. The employer appealed to the Court of Appeal, contending that the authorities referred to by the tribunal were relevant, significant and material to its decision; that the hearing had been rendered unfair by the tribunal's failure to ensure that the parties had an opportunity to consider and make representations on the authorities; that there was no need to show that there had been a material injustice; and that in the circumstances there had been a breach of the employer's right to a fair hearing under art 6[a] of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). In dealing with that submission, the court considered the approach to be adopted in such a case.

Held – Where it was alleged that proceedings had been unfair because a tribunal had referred in its decision to an authority which the parties had not had the opportunity to address, that authority had to be shown to have been central to the decision and not peripheral to it. It had to have played an influential part in shaping the judgment. The authority had to have altered or affected the way the issues had been addressed to a significant extent, so that it could truly be said by a fair-minded observer that the case had been decided in a way which could not have been anticipated by a party fixed with such knowledge of the law and procedure as it would be reasonable to attribute to him in all the circumstances. That was not, however, intended to be an all-encompassing test. It was impossible to lay down a rigid rule as to where the boundaries of procedural irregularity lay, or when the principles of natural a Article 6, so far as material, provides: '1. In the determination of his civil rights and obligations ... everyone is entitled to a fair ... hearing ...'

justice were to apply, or what made a hearing unfair. Everything depended upon the subject matter and circumstances of each case. The proper approach was not limited to establishing the centrality of the authority to the decision in question. A hearing would not have been unfair if it had caused no substantial prejudice to the party claiming to be aggrieved. It therefore also had to be shown that a material injustice had resulted. In the instant case, one of the authorities referred to by the tribunal had not been central to its decision. The other authority should have been brought to the employer's attention, but no reasonable tribunal, directing itself properly, would in the circumstances have accepted the submission that the employer would have made had it been aware of the authority. The unfortunate manner in which the judgment had been delivered did not, therefore, amount to a serious irregularity or a denial of the employer's right to a fair hearing. Accordingly, the appeal would be dismissed (see [31]–[34], [37]–[39], [42], [44], [49]–[51], below).

Albion Hotel (Freshwater) Ltd v Maia E Silva [2002] IRLR 200 considered.

Notes

For natural justice and fairness and for the convention right to a fair trial, see respectively 1(1) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn) (2001 reissue) para 95 and 8(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 134.

For the Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 6, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 554.

Cases referred to in judgments

Albion Hotel (Freshwater) Ltd v Maia E Silva [2002] IRLR 200, EAT.

Flint v Eastern Electricity Board [1975] IRLR 277, [1975] ICR 395.

General Council of British Shipping v Deria [1985] ICR 198, EAT.

Lindsay v Ironsides Ray & Vials [1994] IRLR 318, EAT.

Nelson v Carillion Services Ltd [2002] All ER (D) 216 (Jun), EAT; affd [2003] EWCA Civ 544, [2003] IRLR 428.

Nielsen v Denmark (1989) 11 EHRR 175, [1988] ECHR 10929/84, ECt HR.

Appeal

The appellant, Stanley Cole (Wainfleet) Ltd, appealed with permission of the Employment Appeal Tribunal (Mr Recorder Langstaff QC, A Gallico and SM Springer MBE) from its decision promulgated on 25 October 2002 ([2003] IRLR 52) dismissing the company's appeal from the decision of an employment tribunal sitting at Boston on 1 November 2001 dismissing the company's application for a review of the tribunal's decision on 15 June 2001 upholding a complaint by the respondent, Mrs Sheridan, that she had been unfairly constructively dismissed by the company. The facts are set out in the judgment of Ward LJ.

The company appeared through one of its directors, Dr Malcolm Cohen.

Damian McCarthy (instructed by Roiter Zucker) for Mrs Sheridan.

Cur adv vult

25 July 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

WARD LJ.

THE ISSUE

[1] This appeal raises the short but interesting point identified by Mr Recorder Langstaff QC, the chairman of the Employment Appeal Tribunal (EAT), when giving permission to appeal:

> 'The Court of Appeal may wish to consider the scope of the test to be applied to determine whether failure by a court or tribunal to alert advocates to a material, significant and relevant authority is such that an appeal on that ground should succeed.'

THE BACKGROUND

[2] Mrs Sheridan, the respondent to this appeal, was employed by the appellant, Stanley Cole (Wainfleet) Ltd, a manufacturing company, from 14 August 1995 until she resigned, that resignation being treated as taking effect on 28 July 2000. She made a complaint to the employment tribunal sitting at Nottingham alleging that she had been unfairly constructively dismissed.

[3] The tribunal found that on Friday, 14 April 2000, she was one of four working in the customer services department. She was approached by Mr Holyer, a recently promoted quality manager, about an order for one of her usual customers. There was a heated discussion. Mr Holyer raised his voice but was not abusive. None the less Mrs Sheridan felt threatened, and felt so physically ill that she left the office. After an absence of about an hour-and-a-half, part of which spread over her lunch break, she returned and spoke to her superior, a Mr Leigh. She was upset, in tears and emotional and Mr Leigh advised her to go home. She saw her doctor during the weekend and was certified unfit to work for two weeks due to stress. She remained away from work providing medical certificates to similar effect for the remainder of her employment.

[4] On 27 April she was seen at home by the personnel manager and gave her account of the events of 14 April. On 17 May Mr Leigh conducted a disciplinary inquiry and found that she had unreasonably left work without permission 'thereby committing an act of gross misconduct which could result in summary dismissal'. She was given a final written warning for misconduct.

[5] She appealed to the managing director, Mr Cole, and attended a meeting before him on 16 June. He wrote to Mrs Sheridan on 21 June upholding the final warning. She resigned a month later on 21 July stating in her letter dated that day:

> 'Thank you for your letter of 21st June 2000 following our meeting on 16th June 2000. You will appreciate that I am profoundly disappointed and upset at the decision you reached. I cannot believe that after five years of loyal and devoted hard work to the firm you were prepared to back up the decision made on the 17th May to give me a final warning for a single incident which was in any case not my fault. I cannot understand how a single occasion on which I was away from the office "without permission" can be construed as Gross Misconduct ... As a result of all the stress and worry I have as you will know been unable to work. My doctor describes my condition as stress, anxiety and depression of which I am still being treated. I had hoped to return to work with the stain on my record removed. Since you are not prepared to do so I am sorry to say that I consider myself to have been constructively dismissed. I shall be taking advice as to any action that I may take for this constructive unfair dismissal.'

The company treated the letter as giving one week's notice of termination and so her employment ended on 28 July 2000. She duly lodged her complaint with the employment tribunal.

THE EMPLOYMENT TRIBUNAL HEARING

[6] The hearing took place over two days. In its written decision promulgated on 15 June 2001 the tribunal directed itself on the law as follows:

'In order to establish constructive dismissal an employee must firstly show that she terminated the contract, that is common ground, see the letter of resignation 21 July ... Secondly, it was in response to the employer's breach of contract, thirdly that the breach of contract constituted a significant breach going to the root of the contract and fourthly that the employee acted promptly in terminating the contract.' (My emphasis.)

[7] It is not necessary for the purposes of this appeal to decide on the correctness of that direction, especially on the need for or perhaps relevance of acting promptly, or perhaps, more accurately, failing to act promptly.

[8] On the facts, the tribunal concluded that the incident with Mr Holyer was relatively minor. They held:

'In our view it falls clearly outside the band of reasonable responses having regard also to Mrs Sheridan's record and length of service. The imposition of such a disproportionate penalty is in our view a breach either of an implied term of trust and confidence or an implied term that the disciplinary procedure will be used fairly and without oppression. It is also in our view a significant breach going to the root of the contract therefore entitling Mrs Sheridan to resign.'

[9] The tribunal did however add:

'We have been somewhat more exercised by the delay between the notification of the confirmation of the final written warning and the letter of resignation. Such a delay would normally not be acceptable but in this case we find that by reason of Mrs Sheridan's illness which is supported by medical certificates and her evidence that she took time to take advice in those particular circumstances we find that her resignation was carried out in time.'

[10] The tribunal was satisfied that she was justified in treating her employment at an end by reason of the employer's breach and that the dismissal in all the circumstances was unfair. Having found in her favour a remedy hearing was fixed for 13 July 2001. Simply for the sake of revealing the outcome of this case, I note that the tribunal eventually awarded her £3,500 and that comparatively modest sum is the amount at stake in this appeal.

THE REVIEW

[11] Mrs Sheridan, with the help of the Citizens' Advice Bureau, prepared a schedule of loss for the remedy hearing. This disclosed that she had commenced employment with Butlins and worked for them for 14 weeks from 2 August to 7 November 2000. This information set the company on a train of inquiry. On looking through the 80-page bundle of documents which had been before the tribunal, Dr Cohen, a director of the company, paid closer attention to documents 70 and 71. The first was a letter from Butlins dated 24 July 2000, a date after Mrs Sheridan's letter of resignation. Butlins wrote:

> 'The above named person [Mrs Sheridan] has applied for employment with our company. The engagement is subject to receipt of satisfactory references and we would, therefore, ask you to complete the attached form and return it to us ...'

That form (as completed by the company) was document 71, and gave a favourable reference. It recorded that Mrs Sheridan had been employed from 14 September 1995 to '28.7.00'. In answer to the question how her employment ended the company stated through 'resignation'.

[12] In response to further inquiries from the company Butlins supplied the following information:

> 'Mrs Sheridan submitted her application (for employment) with a covering letter on 25th June 2000. We do not have a record of the date she attended an interview, although there are notes on her file to suggest that the interview was held on 16th July 2000. The offer of employment was dated 19th July 2000. Mrs Sheridan was employed from 2nd August to 7th November 2000.'

[13] That led to the company applying on 25 June 2001 for a review of its decision on grounds falling within r 13 of the employment tribunal's rules of procedure as set out in Sch 1 to the Employment Tribunals (Constitution and Rules of Procedure) Regulations 2001, SI 2001/1171 which provide:

> '(1) ... a tribunal shall have power ... to review any decision on the grounds that ... (d) new evidence has become available since the conclusion of the hearing to which the decision relates, provided that its existence could not have been reasonably known of or foreseen at the time of the hearing; or (e) the interests of justice require such a review.'

[14] The new evidence which the company sought to introduce was the fact of Mrs Sheridan's employment with Butlins and the information contained in Butlins' letter of 4 July. The company submitted in its written application:

> 'This evidence is relevant to two central issues in this case as well as raising an important question as to [Mrs Sheridan's] credibility. The two central issues are as follows: (a) whether [Mrs Sheridan's] delay in resigning her employment with the [company] constituted a waiver of any repudiatory breach of contract; (b) what was the real reason for [Mrs Sheridan's] resignation?'

[15] The company submitted:

> '6. The [company] is not legally represented in these proceedings. The employment tribunal are meant to provide a relatively informal forum in which employment disputes can be resolved and where legal representation is not necessary. There were a large number of documents in this case. Pages 70–71 of the bundle did not seem to the [company] to be very important and we never focussed on the date on p 70. Had we noticed this date, then we would have followed through as we subsequently did.

7. It is not reasonable to expect a non-legally represented litigant to act as a forensic expert. The reality is that the evidence was not available at the close of the hearing and the [company] did exercise reasonable diligence in preparing its case. In these circumstances the criteria [are] satisfied.

The interests of justice

8. The rules allow the tribunal a broad discretion to allow a review in circumstances where the interests of justice would be served by doing so. The [company] submits that this is such a case. Even if the tribunal decides to adopt a restrictive approach to the issues of new evidence, it would not be in the interests of justice to deprive the [company] of the opportunity to argue the merits of the review.

9. The review involves reasonably narrow issues …'

[16] In its decision dated 1 November 2001 the tribunal held as follows:

'3. The first issue we have to determine is whether that evidence is new. In our view it is not. Although both documents to which we have referred post-date the hearing dates of March and May 2001 the evidence i e the fact that Mrs Sheridan was seeking work was available at the date of the hearing. We say that because it is common ground that documents 70 and 71 in the original bundle were available at the hearing though never referred to. Document 70 is a request by Butlins for a reference and document 71 is a standard form of reply by Stanley Cole duly signed by Mr Leigh in response to that request.

4. Even if we are wrong on that point, in our view the evidence itself was clearly foreseeable given the existence of documents 70 and 71 of the original bundle in that it is clear that Mrs Sheridan was seeking employment at some point around the date the receipt of document 70 which was 28 July 2000. Therefore, in our view, the evidence should have been known of and was reasonably foreseeable at the date of our hearing. We, therefore, conclude that the application based on ground (d) must fail.'

[17] Dealing with the interests of justice, the tribunal held:

'5. … Dr Cohen's application is based on the same facts namely that Mrs Sheridan was seeking employment. Neither party has, in fact, referred us to authority in this context. We feel that we must be guided by the case of General Council of British Shipping v Deria [1985] ICR 198. I will quote the headnote: "Held, allowing the appeal, that where a review of an industrial tribunal decision was precluded under rule [13(1)(d)] on the ground that the new evidence had been available, a review based on the new evidence should only be granted under rule [13(1)(e)] where there was some circumstance or mitigating factor which related to the failure to bring the matter within rule [13(1)(d)], and not to the nature of the dispute at large, making it such that the interests of justice required a review ..."

6. What then is the circumstance or mitigating factor which would require us to grant a review under para (e)? We turn to Dr Cohen's submissions and, in fact, to paras 6 and 7 of those submissions. I hope that in paraphrasing them I have done them justice but it seems to us that Dr Cohen is saying that because he is not legally qualified the tribunal should not expect a non-legally represented litigant to act as a forensic expert. However, again unfortunately for Dr Cohen, there is again authority on the point in question and we refer to the case of Lindsay v Ironsides Ray & Vials [1994] IRLR 318. In that case the EAT held that an industrial tribunal had erred in law in holding that it had jurisdiction to grant a review of its decision because the employee's case had not been properly argued at the preliminary hearing as a result of her representative's shortcomings. The EAT went on to conclude that it would not be in the interests of justice for there to be a review on such grounds. They held that even though the interests of justice ground of review is in very wide terms it is a power which must be cautiously exercised. Further they hold that failings of a representative will not generally constitute a ground for review because that would risk encouraging a disappointed applicant to seek to re-argue his case by blaming his representative for the failure of his claim. Again we feel that we are bound by the guidance of the EAT in that case. It must, therefore, follow in our view that since as Dr Cohen has conceded it was his own shortcoming that led to the existence of Mrs Sheridan's application for employment not being pursued we have no alternative but to refuse the application for review on this ground.'

[18] The company is aggrieved at the way in which that review hearing was conducted. Dr Cohen, who appeared before the tribunal on the company's behalf as he appears before us, set out in an affidavit what happened:

'3. The hearing on 26 October commenced at Boston at approximately 10.50 am. I represented the appellant and Mrs Victoria Miller of the Citizens' Advice Bureau represented the respondent.

4. The tribunal decided that it would first hear submissions from the parties as to whether or not they should allow the review to be considered on its merits. All of the witnesses were present. Witness statements had been exchanged that morning and both parties were ready to proceed to a hearing on the merits of the review.

5. The submissions of the parties were brief and did not involve references to case law. The tribunal did not raise any issues or cases with us and never invited any comments or submissions on any case law. The tribunal retired to consider its decision at around 11.15 am.

6. The tribunal returned at around 11.45 am and the chairman dictated the decision and extended reasons into a tape recorder in the presence of the parties. He had photocopies of two cases with him, certain passages were highlighted and he read extracts of these during the course of his decision. Although I cannot be absolutely certain, I believe that the chairman had both of these photocopies in front of him from the beginning of the hearing. These cases were General Council of British Shipping v Deria [1985] ICR 198 and Lindsay v Ironsides Ray & Vials [1994] IRLR 318.

7. I was extremely surprised when the chairman referred to these cases. He had given us no intimation that he was intending to rely on them and gave me no opportunity to comment or make any submissions on them. In any event, I had never seen or heard of these cases and it was only after the hearing that I obtained copies and could form an opinion.

8. If I had been given an opportunity to comment, I would have sought to persuade the tribunal that the facts of this case were substantially different from those in Lindsay's case and that the guidance given by the EAT in that case did not compel the tribunal to refuse the review on ground 13(1)(e) as particularised in the ground of appeal.

9. I therefore believe that the [company] was seriously and unfairly prejudiced by the failure of the tribunal to afford me an opportunity to comment on the cases referred to in the tribunal's decision.'

[19] The tribunal has accepted that paras 1–6 inclusive of that affidavit are accurate but the chairman has written:

'Dr Cohen omits to mention that the tribunal did outline the tasks of the tribunal as to both grounds of the review, and as to the application under r 13(1)(e), said that such an application would not normally succeed if based on the same facts as the application under r 13(1)(d).'

[20] Dr Cohen does not recollect that and, I hope without doing injustice to the tribunal, I approach this matter accepting for this purpose that no help was given to Dr Cohen as to the way in which tribunals have applied r 13(1)(e).

THE APPEALS TO THE EMPLOYMENT APPEAL TRIBUNAL

[21] The company appealed both the decision promulgated on 15 June 2001 and the decision of 1 November 2001. The first appeal, described as the 'merits appeal', raised issues as to the correct approach to determining a claim of constructive dismissal and as to whether the imposition of a final written warning may be capable of amounting to repudiatory conduct on the part of the employer. The second appeal raised issues of the correct approach by an employment tribunal to authorities and the test which it is appropriate to apply to an authority which the tribunal wishes to rely on in reaching its decision but which it has not invited the parties to address. There was, however, no appeal against the adverse findings made against the company on the r 13(1)(d) ground.

[22] In a decision promulgated on 25 October 2002 ([2003] IRLR 52) the EAT, presided over by Mr Recorder Langstaff QC, dismissed the merits appeal and there is rightly no further appeal to us.

[23] The second appeal, the 'review appeal', was also dismissed. The tribunal concluded (at 59 (para 120)):

'... as a matter of legal principle, we should not accede to an appeal simply upon the basis that an authority, however material, significant and relevant, has not been drawn to the attention of parties as undoubtedly it should be.'

[24] In their view (at 59 (para 117))—

> 'the question must be whether or not there is any reasonably arguable case that if the parties had been alerted to the authority relied upon by the tribunal, they would, or might, have made submissions which would, or might, have produced a different result, or ... might have examined the evidence in a different and more extensive way.'

[25] Having approached the matter in that way, they rejected the appeal saying (at 60 (paras 143, 147)):

> 'We do not think that there was any reasonable prospect at all of persuading a tribunal, properly directed, to take any different view in respect of the application under 13(1)(e) than that which it did. There was here nothing which was capable, as we see it, of amounting to a mitigating factor or circumstance such as referred to in the Deria case ... no material injustice was caused to the appellant or, put colloquially, there is no reasonable argument that the decision would have been any different.'

THE COMPANY'S CASE

[26] To précis Dr Cohen's submissions: (i) The decision of the employment tribunal in refusing to remit was unjust because of the serious procedural irregularity and was a breach of his right to a fair hearing enshrined in art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). (ii) His primary case is that since the authorities followed by the tribunal 'could be viewed as somewhat esoteric', but were none the less central in the sense of their being 'relevant, significant and material' to the decision, the failure to ensure that the parties had an opportunity to consider and make representations upon them rendered the hearing unfair. (iii) That test of centrality derived from the judgment of Judge Serota QC in Albion Hotel (Freshwater) Ltd v Maia E Silva [2002] IRLR 200. That test was not qualified by the need to show a 'material injustice' as Judge Peter Clark held in Nelson v Carillion Services Ltd [2002] All ER (D) 216 (Jun), a decision of the Employment Appeal Tribunal promulgated on 26 June 2002. (iv) It is, therefore, wrong to consider whether his knowledge of the principles in Deria's case and Lindsay's case would have made a difference to the original decision. Furthermore, if this question does arise, it is only the original tribunal that is able to determine whether or not it would have made a difference to it. (v) If the appellate tribunal or appellate court is able to deal with that question, then it should hold that there was a good mitigating circumstance, namely the failure on the part of Mrs Sheridan to comply with the tribunal's directions. Had she filed a witness statement and served a schedule of her loss as she should have done before the first hearing, he would have been able to raise in time the matters upon which he now wishes to rely. (vi) Although the fact that he is not legally qualified is not a mitigating circumstance of itself, it is relevant to considering the reasonableness of the explanation he proffers for not adducing the evidence at the first hearing. (vii) If material injustice is a necessary ingredient, the appellant has suffered it.

MRS SHERIDAN'S CASE

[27] Mr Damian McCarthy, who now appears on Mrs Sheridan's behalf, submits that the appellant has to establish a material injustice. It is, therefore, necessary for the appellate tribunal or court to consider what difference it would have made had he been aware of the authorities concerned. Lack of professional qualification or experience can never be a mitigating circumstance. The receipt of additional indications of Mrs Sheridan's employment would not mitigate the fact that the point could reasonably have been taken on the material that was available at the time.

CONCLUSIONS

[28] Not to be afforded a fair hearing would be an obviously serious procedural irregularity sufficient to allow the appeal. The real question is, however, whether what happened was seriously irregular and unfair.

[29] It is not contended, and rightly so, that there is a serious irregularity simply because a judge (and for present purposes that includes the tribunal) cites in his or her judgment decided cases which had not been referred to in the course of the hearing. Judicial research would be stultified if that were so and if the parties had to be given the opportunity to address each and every case eventually set out in the judgment.

[30] The test applied by Judge Serota in the Albion Hotel case was (at 203):

> '34 ... In our opinion the right to a fair hearing requires notice of all material matters of fact and law to be given to the parties, if the employment tribunal wishes to make determinations on points not argued by the parties. The consideration of the three authorities to which we have referred by the employment tribunal in the present case was material to their decision. Even though no complaint was made as to the principle to be deduced from these authorities, the application of that principle to the facts was highly material to the decision. The parties were not able to make submissions as to the relevant acts that were material ...
>
> 35 In our opinion, where an employment tribunal considers that an authority is relevant, significant and material to its decision but has not been referred to by the parties, it should refer that authority to the parties and invite their submissions before concluding its decision. This is more than mere good practice. Failure to do so may amount to a breach of natural justice and of the right to a fair hearing.' (My emphasis.)

[31] Dr Cohen sums up that test of relevance, significance and materiality as meaning that the authority must be central to the decision. In my judgment I can accept those epithets in so far as they convey the meaning that the authority must be shown to be central to the decision and not peripheral to it. It must play an influential part in shaping the judgment. If it is of little or no importance and serves only to underline, amplify or give greater emphasis to a point that was explicitly or implicitly addressed in the course of the hearing, then no complaint can be made. If the point of the authority was so clear that a party could not make any useful comment in explanation, then it matters not that the authority was not mentioned.

[32] Thus, it seems to me, the authority must alter or affect the way the issues have been addressed to a significant extent so that it truly can be said by a fair-minded observer that the case was decided in a way which could not have been anticipated by a party fixed with such knowledge of the law and procedure as it would be reasonable to attribute to him in all the circumstances.

[33] There is, however, an important caveat. This is not intended to be an all-encompassing test. It is, in my judgment, impossible to lay down a rigid rule as to where the boundaries of procedural irregularity lie, or when the principles of natural justice are to apply, or what makes a hearing unfair. Everything depends on the subject matter and the facts and circumstances of each case.

[34] I cannot accept Dr Cohen's submission that the proper approach is limited to establishing the centrality of the decided authority to the decision in question. That is the first stage of the inquiry. As Judge Serota said, failure to give a party the chance to address the authority may, not must, amount to a breach of natural justice. The hearing will not have been unfair if it has caused no substantial prejudice to the party claiming to be aggrieved. It must, therefore, also be shown, as Judge Peter Clark held in Nelson v Carillion Services Ltd [2002] All ER (D) 216 (Jun), that a material injustice has resulted. In his view 'Judge Serota was not stating a new proposition of law' in setting out the tribunal's opinion in his judgment in Albion Hotel (Freshwater) Ltd v Maia E Silva [2002] IRLR 200 at 203 (para 35) which I have cited above. In Nelson's case, it was clear from their reasoning that the tribunal considered that the authority of which the appellant was unaware was relevant because they cited it in their reasons. He held: 'The real question, it seems to us, is whether that case significantly added to the learning which had been cited by the parties.' He held that it was not and: 'In these circumstances we are not persuaded that the tribunal's own recourse to that authority in fact caused any material injustice to the appellant.'

[35] Applying that approach, I ask first whether General Council of British Shipping v Deria [1985] ICR 198 was 'central' to the tribunal's decision. In Deria's case Bristow J followed the judgment of Phillips J in Flint v Eastern Electricity Board [1975] IRLR 277, [1975] ICR 395 where the question was whether, and if so in what circumstances, where what is now r 13(1)(d) precluded a review on the ground that new evidence was available, a review based on the availability of fresh evidence might be open under r 13(1)(e). It is important to note that the success of the application for a review depended upon that new evidence being admitted. So it does in the case before us. It was in those circumstances that the application of r 13(1)(e) had to be considered 'keeping an eye' on the terms of r 13(1)(d). Phillips J held ([1975] IRLR 277 at 281, [1975] ICR 395 at 404 (para 28):

> 'But I do think that it is necessary, in a case which otherwise falls within paragraph (d) ... to find some other circumstance, some mitigating factor, to make it such that the interests of justice require such a review.'

[36] I can accept that at first blush the ground provided under (e) is a broad, free-standing ground not linked to the separate ground under (d) and that it is reasonable so to understand it. It may not be immediately apparent, as Bristow J held in Deria's case (at 202) that—

> 'in logic and in law this [that which is in the interests of justice] has to be geared to the rule [13(1)(e)] provisions and not to the nature of the dispute at large.'

[37] In my judgment this is a refinement and gloss upon the ordinary wide meaning of the words in (e) of such a kind that the tribunal ought to have directed Dr Cohen's attention to it. There is force in his submission that the omission was all the more surprising in view of the fact that, on the facts we are assuming to be accurate, the tribunal had the report before them with the relevant passages already underlined. Dr Cohen's submissions had been broadly based when a narrower focus was required in view of the fact that his case was essentially dependent upon the new facts being admitted in evidence.

[38] The vital question, in my judgment, is whether it would have made any difference to the outcome if Dr Cohen had been armed with this authority. That is a question for this court to answer. It is not a matter we must refer back to the original tribunal.

[39] Not having appealed against the decision refusing to remit on the grounds set out in r 13(1)(d), Dr Cohen has to accept the findings made in that regard namely that it was clearly foreseeable given the existence of documents 70 and 71 that Mrs Sheridan was seeking employment at some point around the date of the receipt of the request for a reference on 28 July 2000. He had, therefore, to establish some exceptional circumstance or some mitigating factor 'to temper in [his] favour ... the rigour of the terms of rule [13(1)(d)]' (see Deria's case at 202). Had he known that is how the court would approach r 13(1)(e) he would have sought to mitigate his failure to spot the point hidden in the 80-page bundle of documents by drawing attention to Mrs Sheridan's own failings to comply with the tribunal's directions. Particular emphasis is laid in this connection upon Mrs Sheridan's failure to serve her schedule of loss until after the hearing before the employment tribunal. As the company's skeleton argument puts it:

> '... the [company] failed to appreciate the importance of the documents in the bundle on the issue of liability because it never saw [Mrs Sheridan's] schedule of loss until after the main hearing.'

But all that the schedule disclosed was that Mrs Sheridan had received reduced salary from the company up to 28 July 2000, and earnings from Butlins for the 14 weeks from 2 August to 9 November 2000. Accordingly, in my judgment, no reasonable tribunal directing itself properly would in these circumstances have accepted Dr Cohen's submission. The EAT dismissed it saying ([2003] IRLR 52 at 60 (para 141)):

> '... it [Dr Cohen's submission] is asserting that there would have been notice if certain steps had been taken. But that assertion is irrelevant in the light of a finding by the employment tribunal that there already was such notice, which should have caused a reasonable advocate, enquirer or representative to find and produce the new evidence. The fact that there might have been further indications to the same effect cannot take away from, or mitigate the failure to take notice in the first case.'

[40] If the facts could have been discovered with reasonable diligence, remission will be refused. If the evidence could have been obtained, it should have been obtained and it is no sufficient excuse to mitigate that consequence to assert that the facts would have been more easily revealed if Mrs Sheridan had complied with her obligations. The hearing proceeded despite Mrs Sheridan's failure and it is too late to use that failure to excuse his own shortcomings.

[41] Dr Cohen is driven, therefore, to add his lack of forensic skill to the mitigation he seeks to advance. That leads me to deal with Lindsay v Ironsides Ray & Vials [1994] IRLR 318.

[42] I am not persuaded that Lindsay's case was central to the decision. Drawing attention to it during the course of the argument would not have altered or affected the way in which this part of the case was being presented. It served to show that the argument being advanced by Dr Cohen was wrong. If he had been told that his forensic shortcomings were no excuse, nothing he could have said would have made any difference to that point and his position could never have been improved. A generous latitude of indulgence may be afforded litigants in person as part of the court's or tribunal's endeavour to maintain a level playing field for all litigants, but as Mummery J held in Lindsay's case (at 322 (para 24)): 'Failings of a party's representatives, professional or otherwise, will not generally constitute a ground for review.'

[43] The interests of justice do not demand that any shortcomings in a litigant in person's presentation of his or her case should be overcome by affording the litigant the indulgence of the chance to do better second time round. I am satisfied that there was no serious procedural irregularity in referring to Lindsay's case without it having been disclosed to him and the hearing was not rendered unfair by the omission to refer to it during the course of the hearing.

[44] I pay tribute to Dr Cohen's presentation of his case. He presented his arguments skilfully and concisely backed by immaculately prepared documents. I regret that he labours under this sense of injustice. I am, none the less, satisfied that the unfortunate manner in which judgment was delivered does not amount to a serious irregularity or a denial of his right to a fair hearing. In my judgment this appeal should be dismissed.

BUXTON LJ.

[45] I respectfully agree with Ward LJ's analysis of the question set out in [1], above, that was posed to this court by the Employment Appeal Tribunal (EAT). As the appeal progressed, however, I came increasingly to doubt whether that question was necessary for decision in order to dispose of the appeal.

[46] The employment tribunal, in its extended reasons of 1 November 2001, made a finding, not challenged before us, that the schedule of loss and the letter from Butlins were not 'new' evidence. That, as I understand it to be agreed, disposed of any ground of review under r 13(1)(d) of the employment tribunal's rules of procedure as set out in Sch 1 to the Employment Tribunals (Constitution and Rules of Procedure) Regulations 2001, SI 2001/1171. Further, granted that finding, and leaving entirely out of account any general principle to be deduced from General Council of British Shipping v Deria [1985] ICR 198, it is difficult or impossible to see what other ground there could be for reopening the original hearing under r 13(1)(e). The only possible ground was that which is quoted by Ward LJ at [15], above, Dr Cohen's handicap in not being a professional advocate. It scarcely needed authority, in the shape of Lindsay v Ironsides Ray & Vials [1994] IRLR 318 or otherwise, to reject that contention. True it is, as Dr Cohen reminded us, that tribunals permit, even perhaps encourage, lay representation; but that gives no more licence than where professional advocates are engaged to attempt to re-argue the case if on reflection the representative thinks that it could have been better put.

[47] That is particularly so where, as here, no specific error can be attributed to the nature of the advocacy. I appreciate that Dr Cohen says before us that, armed with the new evidence, he would have rigorously cross-examined Mrs Sheridan as to her credibility; but that overlooks the tribunal's finding that the 'new' evidence did not add to what was already before the tribunal and available to the cross-examiner, professional advocate or not.

[48] The latter difficulty also affects Dr Cohen's argument before us that the 'mitigating circumstance' that caused the interests of justice to require a review was, not merely his general inability as an advocate to identify the significance of the material that was available at the trial, but also and in particular Mrs Sheridan's failure in the late service of the schedule of loss. Had she kept the rules, Dr Cohen would have had the new documents at the trial, their significance would have immediately have impressed themselves upon him, and he would have used them as already indicated. It appears from the grounds of appeal before us that this point was indeed taken at the review hearing. The tribunal did not refer to it, and were right not to do so. The significance of the documents was not as documents, but as to the state of affairs that they revealed. The tribunal found that that was already known to the employers at the time of the hearing. I appreciate that Dr Cohen urges before us that the new information was different from and more significant than that which was apparent from his company's own correspondence: but that is not what the tribunal found. Granted that finding as to the employers' knowledge, justice cannot possibly require a review because there was another means to the same knowledge that was kept from them.

[49] In truth, the main point of this appeal, and indeed almost the whole content of the grounds of appeal, is the failure of the chairman to put to the parties at the review hearing the two cases that he referred to in his ruling. That is said to have deprived the employers of their 'absolute right' to a fair trial, in breach of art 6 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). If Judge Serota QC intended, in his judgment in Albion Hotel (Freshwater) Ltd v Maia E Silva [2002] IRLR 200 at 203 (para 34), to say that any failure to refer parties to material authority rendered the proceedings necessarily unfair (and I very much doubt whether he did so intend), then I am unable to agree. It is central to the procedural provisions of art 6 that an assessment must be made of the fairness of the proceedings as a whole. One authority amongst many to that effect is Nielsen v Denmark (1989) 11 EHRR 175. A procedural failure, even one such as the present, will not lead to the proceedings being quashed or set aside unless substantial unfairness has occurred. I am satisfied, as was the EAT, that the outcome would not have been different had the chairman taken the course that Dr Cohen urges. That is not only because of the considerations relied on by the EAT, but also for the more fundamental reason set out above that, once the tribunal had found as it did as to the 'new' evidence, there was as a matter of fact, not just of law, no room for recourse to r 13(1)(e).

[50] It would of course have been a lot better had the chairman told the advocates of the authorities that he intended to cite, if for no other reason than to avoid the subsequent extensive use of court time over a dispute in which some £3,000 is in issue. But his failure to do so cannot possibly justify the allowing of the appeal. It may also be noted that the only effect of such a decision would be remission of the case to a further inquiry in which, because of the unchallenged findings already made by the tribunal, the outcome would inevitably be the same.

MANCE LJ.

[51] I agree with both judgments.

Appeal dismissed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

R (on the application of Davies and others) v Financial Services Authority

[2003] EWCA Civ 1128

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

KENNEDY, MUMMERY AND CARNWATH LJJ

12 JUNE, 30 JULY 2003

Financial services – Financial Services Authority (FSA) – Powers – Prohibition order – Whether FSA having power to make prohibition order in disciplinary proceedings – Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, ss 56, 66.

The respondent, the Financial Services Authority (the FSA) was the independent regulator of the financial services industry under the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000. It was required to discharge its statutory responsibilities in accordance with the provisions of the 2000 Act and its handbook of rules and guidance. The applicants were, at the relevant time, employed by a member of the London Metal Exchange and subject to the regulation of the Securities and Futures Authority (the SFA) under the Financial Services Act 1986. Following an investigation the SFA brought disciplinary proceedings against the applicants. Before those proceedings could be determined, the 1986 Act was superseded by the 2000 Act and the SFA ceased to have jurisdiction. Under s 66[a] of the 2000 Act, the FSA had power to take disciplinary action for misconduct, but could not do so as by then proceedings against the applicants under s 66 were time-barred. However, if it appeared to the FSA that an individual was not a fit and proper person to perform functions in relation to a regulated activity carried on by an authorised person, s 56 of the 2000 Act empowered it to make an order prohibiting him from performing any one or more specified functions. The FSA issued the applicants with statutory notices warning them that it proposed to make prohibition orders against them under s 56. In its handbook, the FSA stated that it might exercise its power under s 56 where it considered that an individual presented such a risk to the market generally that it was necessary to prevent him carrying out any function. The applicants sought permission to apply for judicial review. The judge refused permission, holding, inter alia, that the FSA was not acting incompatibly with its own published guidance as the handbook did not require it to establish as a fact, before commencing proceedings under s 56 of the 2000 Act, that the individuals concerned intended to carry on the functions to be prohibited. The applicants appealed, contending, inter alia, that s 66 contained punitive powers and procedures relating to past misconduct and s 56 contained preventive ones relating to future activities; that the proposed use of the s 56 power was therefore improper as it would use a power conferred for one specific purpose for a different purpose; and that the issue of the warning notices was ultra vires and an abuse of process as the FSA had not established that the applicants intended to participate in any of the activities proposed to be prohibited.

a Section 66, so far as material, is set out at [15], below

Held – The procedures in both s 56 and s 66 were regulatory. There was no clear and sharp divide between them with the one section looking only forward to the prevention of future activities and the other section looking only backward to punishment of past misconduct. Section 56 enabled the FSA to take prohibition proceedings in respect of past misconduct in order to afford the necessary future protection of the public. There was no requirement that, in order to be legally entitled to give a warning notice, the FSA had to satisfy itself that the individuals concerned had a present or future intention to work in the financial services industry. The fact that the applicants in the instant case appeared to the FSA to be unfit persons was sufficient to justify the giving of the warning notice setting out the proposed prohibition order. The judge had rightly rejected the submissions on the handbook and had been correct to conclude that the applicants' grounds were unarguable. Accordingly, the appeal would be dismissed (see [21]–[24], [35]–[37], below).

Decision of Lightman J [2003] 1 All ER 859 affirmed.

Per curiam. Only in the most exceptional cases should the Administrative Court entertain applications for judicial review of the actions and decisions of the FSA, which are amenable to the procedures for making representations to the FSA, for referring matters to the Financial Services and Markets Tribunal, and for appealing direct from that tribunal to the Court of Appeal (see [31], [36], [37], below).

Notes

For prohibition orders, see Supp to 32 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 385.

For the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000, ss 56, 66, see 18 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 126, 135.

Case referred to in judgments

Lo-Line Electric Motors Ltd, Re [1988] 2 All ER 692, [1988] Ch 477, [1988] 3 WLR 26.

Appeal

The applicants, Vivian John Davies, Rawdon Quentin Vevers and Colin Mark Gamwells appealed, with permission of Laws LJ granted on 27 February 2003, from the decision of Lightman J on 18 December 2003 ([2002] EWHC 2997 (Admin), [2003] 1 All ER 859) refusing their application for permission to apply for judicial review of the decision of the respondent, the Financial Services Authority, to issue notices under s 57 of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 warning the applicants of its intention to make prohibition orders under s 56 of the 2000 Act. The facts are set out in the judgment of Mummery LJ.

Michael Beloff QC and Pushpinder Saini (instructed by Denton Wilde Sapte) for the applicants.

Javan Herberg (instructed by the Financial Services Authority) for the authority.

Cur adv vult

30 July 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

MUMMERY LJ (giving the first judgment at the invitation of Kennedy LJ).

[1] This is an appeal from the refusal of Lightman J on 18 December 2002 ([2002] EWHC 2997 (Admin), [2003] 1 All ER 859, [2003] 1 WLR 1284), after an inter partes oral hearing of a renewed application, to grant permission for judicial review of warning notices given to the applicants by the Financial Services Authority (the Authority) under s 57 of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000. Laws LJ granted permission to appeal. The issue on the appeal is whether Lightman J was right in holding that the grounds on which the applicants sought judicial review were unarguable.

THE AUTHORITY

[2] The appeal raises some points of practical importance on the exercise of the regulatory powers of the Authority and the appropriate procedures for challenging its decisions and actions. It is the first occasion on which the Court of Appeal has had to consider the points.

[3] The Authority is the independent, non-governmental regulator of the financial services industry under the 2000 Act. It is required to discharge its statutory responsibilities in accordance with the provisions of the 2000 Act and its Handbook of Rules and Guidance.

[4] The Authority must maintain arrangements designed to enable it to determine whether persons, on whom requirements are imposed by or under the 2000 Act, are complying with them. There is a general prohibition on a person carrying on a regulated activity in the United Kingdom, unless he is an authorised person or an exempt person. The Authority has powers of authorisation, supervision and enforcement. It has defined, regulatory objectives: market confidence, public awareness, the protection of consumers and the reduction of financial crime. (It is not alleged that the applicants have been involved in criminal activities.) The Authority, which is responsible for maintaining confidence in the financial system, must act compatibly with its objectives and in a way which it considers most appropriate for the purposes of meeting them.

[5] The Authority has disciplinary powers. It may use them to take action against a person, who appears to the Authority to be guilty of misconduct. There is a time limit for taking action. The Authority may not take action under those powers after the end of two years from the date on which it first knew of the misconduct, unless proceedings in respect of it against the person concerned were begun before the end of that period.

[6] The Authority also has specific powers to make orders (prohibition orders) prohibiting an individual from performing functions. If the Authority proposes to make a prohibition order, it must first give the individual concerned a warning notice setting out the terms of the prohibition. If the Authority then decides to make a prohibition order, it must give the individual concerned a decision notice setting out the terms of the order. There is nothing to prevent any person who would be affected by the Authority's decisions from corresponding with or making representations to the Authority.

[7] A person against whom a decision to make a prohibition order is made may refer the matter to the Financial Services and Markets Tribunal (the tribunal). The Authority also has power to vary or revoke a prohibition order. If it refuses to do so, the applicant may refer that matter to the tribunal.

[8] The tribunal is independent of the Authority. Its function is to hear and determine references from decisions of the Authority. The tribunal conducts a de novo review of the matters referred to it. It may consider evidence whether or not it was available to the Authority at the material time. It may decide points of law, including disputes about the limits of its own jurisdiction and the lawfulness of the decisions and actions of the Authority.

[9] A party to a reference may (with permission) appeal to the Court of Appeal on a point of law arising from the decision of the tribunal disposing of the reference. The prohibition notice is not enforced pending the determination of the tribunal or of the Court of Appeal. The 2000 Act is silent on the availability of judicial review of the decisions and acts of the Authority.

THE APPLICATION

[10] The applicants wish to challenge, by way of judicial review, the lawfulness of the decision of the Authority under s 57 of the 2000 Act to issue warning notices to them. In the notices the Authority, acting through its Regulatory Decisions Committee, warned the applicants of its proposals to make prohibition orders against them under s 56 of the 2000 Act on the ground that they are not fit and proper persons to perform specified functions relating to regulated activities. The application was issued on 6 September 2002.

THE BACKGROUND FACTS

[11] The applicants were formerly employed by Brandeis (Brokers) Ltd (BBL), a ring dealing member of the London Metal Exchange (the LME). In late 1997 one of BBL's largest customers, Mr Herbert Black, made serious complaints against BBL about the mispricing of Mr Black's accounts and customers and the misuse of confidential information by its employees. In early 1998 BBL reported the complaints to the Securities and Futures Authority (the SFA). At that time the SFA was the self-regulatory organisation responsible for the regulation of its member firms operating on the LME. It had been established under the Financial Services Act 1986.

[12] The SFA had power to institute proceedings if a registered person committed an act of misconduct, or if he ceased to be a fit and proper person. The SFA conducted its own investigations into the conduct of the applicants. On 31 July 2001 it started proceedings against the applicants. (The Authority had power to make a disqualification direction under s 59 of the 1986 Act against an individual, who was not a fit and proper person, but it did not see occasion to do so while the SFA was proceeding with its charges.) Before the SFA proceedings were determined and before any substantive hearing had taken place, the 2000 Act came into force. It replaced the 1986 Act. The SFA ceased to have any jurisdiction to proceed with its charges. Accordingly the proceedings were discontinued. In December 2001 the regulatory jurisdiction of the SFA over its member firms operating on the LME passed to the Authority. There were no relevant transitional provisions enabling the Authority to be substituted for the SFA in the existing proceedings.

[13] The Authority was unable to use its powers to take disciplinary proceedings against the applicants for misconduct under s 66 of the 2000 Act, as the two-year time limit imposed by s 66(4) had expired. The investigations by the predecessor SFA had started four years previously.

[14] On 24 June 2002 the Authority issued the warning notices against the applicants under s 57 of the 2000 Act. The Authority warned them that it proposed to make prohibition orders against them under s 56 of the 2000 Act on the grounds that they were not fit and proper persons to perform certain functions relating to regulated activities.

THE STATUTORY PROVISIONS

[15]The arguments on the appeal turn principally on whether the Authority was acting lawfully in seeking to use its powers against the applicants under s 56 of the 2000 Act when, as is agreed, it was no longer entitled to use its powers against them under s 66. It is accordingly necessary to set out the provisions of those sections. The disciplinary powers conferred on the Authority by s 66 provide:

> '(1) The Authority may take action against a person under this section if—(a) it appears to the Authority that he is guilty of misconduct; and (b) the Authority is satisfied that it is appropriate in all the circumstances to take action against him.
>
> (2) A person is guilty of misconduct if, while an approved person—(a) he has failed to comply with a statement of principle issued under section 64; or (b) he has been knowingly concerned in a contravention by the relevant authorised person of a requirement imposed on that authorised person by or under this Act
>
> (3) If the Authority is entitled to take action under this section against a person, it may—(a) impose a penalty on him of such amount as it considers appropriate; or (b) publish a statement of his misconduct.
>
> (4) The Authority may not take action under this section after the end of the period of two years beginning with the first day on which the Authority knew of the misconduct, unless proceedings in respect of it against the person concerned were begun before the end of that period.
>
> (5) For the purposes of subsection (4)—(a) the Authority is to be treated as knowing of misconduct if it has information from which the misconduct can reasonably be inferred; and (b) proceedings against a person in respect of misconduct are to be treated as begun when a warning notice is given to him under section 67(1).
>
> (6) "Approved person" has the same meaning as in section 64.
>
> (7) "Relevant authorised person", in relation to an approved person, means the person on whose application approval under section 59 was given.'

[16] The power to make prohibition orders was conferred on the Authority in the following terms by s 56. The exercise of the powers had to be preceded by the giving of a warning notice under s 57:

> '(1) Subsection (2) applies if it appears to the Authority that an individual is not a fit and proper person to perform functions in relation to a regulated activity carried on by an authorised person.
>
> (2) The Authority may make an order ("a prohibition order") prohibiting the individual from performing a specified function, any function falling within a specified description or any function.
>
> (3) A prohibition order may relate to—(a) a specified regulated activity, any regulated activity falling within a specified description or all regulated activities; (b) authorised persons generally or any person within a specified class of authorised person.
>
> (4) An individual who performs or agrees to perform a function in breach of a prohibition order is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale.'

[17] As already indicated it is common ground that the Authority was not entitled to use its powers under s 66 to take action against the applicants, as the two-year time limit had expired by the time that the Authority took over the jurisdiction of the SFA over the LME. The critical issue is whether the Authority could lawfully take the action that it has given notice that it proposes to take against the applicants under s 56.

THE APPLICANTS' SUBMISSIONS

[18] The applicants challenged the lawfulness of the warning notices on a number of grounds, principally that the issue of them was improper and an abuse of process, as it was proposed to use the prohibition procedure under s 56 for disciplinary purposes in respect of alleged past misconduct in order to avoid the time bar imposed on the Authority bringing such proceedings under s 66.

[19] Mr Michael Beloff QC, who appeared on behalf of the applicants, focused on three points. He contended that, at the very least, they were reasonably arguable at the permission stage. This court should therefore reverse the judge and grant permission for judicial review.

[20] In summary the applicants' main submissions in the court below and on the appeal were as follows. (1) The Authority proposed to use its s 56 power to make prohibition orders in order to circumvent the statutory time bar in s 66(4) applicable to disciplinary proceedings for past misconduct. It was making virtually identical charges to those previously made by the SFA in the proceedings which had been discontinued. The Authority was no longer entitled to pursue those charges because of the time bar. The proposed use of the s 56 power was improper. A power conferred for a specific purpose, namely the future protection of the public by prohibiting and preventing the applicants' activities, was proposed to be used for a different purpose, namely in order to punish the applicants by disciplinary action for alleged misconduct in the past. In other words, the only reason underlying the Authority's proposed use of the 'prevention route' was that the 'punishment route' adopted by the SFA was blocked by the statutory limitation period. (2) In support of a claimed clear and sharp distinction between preventive and punitive powers and procedures Mr Beloff relied on the analogy of proceedings for the disqualification of directors, which have been characterised as fundamentally preventive and for the protection of the public, rather than penal (see Re Lo-Line Electric Motors Ltd [1988] 2 All ER 692 at 696–697, [1988] Ch 477 at 486). (3) The issue of the warning notices was ultra vires and an abuse of process, as the Authority had not established that the applicants intended to participate in any of the activities proposed to be prohibited. The applicants have no 'immediate plans' to work in a regulated industry. There was no need to take steps to protect the public from activities which are not going to take place. (4) The warning notices were an abuse of process, as the Authority failed to consider and apply its own criteria, as published in its Handbook (Enforcement Manual ('ENF')) for initiating proceedings (ENF, paras 8.1 and 8.4). The Authority was unable to show the necessary risk to confidence in the market from past activities of the applicants. The applicants had no intention of being in the market. It would be inappropriate to make an order targeted on the future, which was based on past misconduct and in the absence of any future risk.

THE JUDGMENT BELOW

[21] Lightman J ([2003] 1 All ER 859, [2003] 1 WLR 1284) concluded that the grounds were unarguable. I agree with his reasons for refusing permission and add some of my own. It is unnecessary to cite authority, as the relevant legal principles were not in dispute. The dispute centred on their application to the particular facts of this case.

[22] Although there are different statutory criteria for invoking the procedures in ss 56 and 66, there is no clear and sharp punitive/preventive divide between them, the one looking only forwards to the prevention of future activities and the other looking only backwards to punishment of past misconduct. Both procedures are regulatory. Section 56 is available in cases of past misconduct, enabling the Authority to take prohibition proceedings in respect of it in order afford the necessary future protection of the public. Section 66, under which action was time barred, is not the only provision in the 2000 Act available to the Authority in respect of past misconduct.

[23] The Authority's proposal to use of s 56 was not barred by the applicants' protestations that they do not intend to carry out the functions, which the prohibition order might forbid. The fact that the applicants appeared to the Authority to be unfit persons was sufficient to justify the giving of the warning notice setting out the proposed prohibition order. There was no requirement that, in order to be legally entitled to give a warning notice, the Authority had to satisfy itself that the applicants had a present or a future intention to work in the financial services industry. The applicants' assertions that they have no present plans is not an adequate substitute for or alternative to a prohibition order. Present plans and future intentions are factual points on which the applicants would be entitled to make representations to the Authority or, failing that, to the tribunal on a reference to it.

[24] Lightman J rightly rejected the submission that the Authority was acting incompatibly with its own published guidance in the Handbook, because it could not show the necessary risk to confidence in the market. I agree with Lightman J's judgment at [10], [11].

[25] In view of his conclusions on the substantive points, with which I agree, the judge did not find it necessary to deal with the procedural objection that the application was premature and should be rejected on the ground that there was a satisfactory alternative procedure provided by the Act itself, namely to make representations and to refer the matter to the tribunal. I would, however, add some comments on the further reasons advanced by the Authority for rejecting the application and dismissing the appeal.

NATURE OF SFA PROCEEDINGS

[26] I agree with Mr Herberg, who made excellent submissions on behalf of the Authority, that the applicants' submissions do not correctly characterise the nature of the previous SFA proceedings in describing them as disciplinary proceedings for past misconduct. They are also wrong in asserting that the Authority is seeking to continue the SFA's 'disciplinary proceedings' as prohibition proceedings aimed only at future conduct.

[27] Examination of the SFA proceedings reveals that they were never purely 'disciplinary proceedings' for past misconduct. There was a forward-looking element in the proceedings. The SFA was alleging that the applicants were not fit and proper persons. It sought expulsion of them from the SFA's registers. In accordance with r 7.24A of the rules, under which the SFA acted, the proceedings set out not only the alleged acts of misconduct, but also the reasons why the applicants had ceased to be fit and proper persons.

[28] The Authority was not simply seeking to continue time barred 'disciplinary proceedings' by different means. Like the SFA, the Authority was seeking expulsion on the ground that the applicants were not fit and proper persons. Section 56, not s 66, of the 2000 Act was the appropriate procedure available to the Authority to take action, which involved virtually identical charges brought with the same objective. The same considerations applied to both. I would add that, although it is true that there are different statutory criteria for making prohibition orders and for taking disciplinary action, both are available to the Authority in order to send out messages to the financial services industry and to the public about unacceptable conduct in the financial markets and in order to deter others.

ALTERNATIVE REMEDY

[29] Although Mr Herberg did not contend that there was a lack of jurisdiction to entertain an application for judicial review, he invoked the general principle that judicial review is a remedy of last resort. This means that, in the absence of exceptional circumstances, it should not be used, unless the applicant has first exhausted available procedures for objecting to, or appealing against, the decision sought to be judicially reviewed.

[30] The application in this case would, if granted, bypass the comprehensive statutory scheme. It was specially set up by the 2000 Act. It enabled persons against whom decisions are made and actions taken to refer the matter to the specialist tribunal, with a right of appeal on points of law direct from the tribunal to the Court of Appeal. Even if the only point raised was a point of law on the lawfulness of the decision or action of the Authority, that could be dealt with by the tribunal. It was unnecessary to apply for judicial review to resolve it. There are no exceptional circumstances in this case, in which the grounds of challenge to the warning notice are not restricted to purely jurisdictional grounds.

[31] The legislative purpose evident from the detailed statutory scheme was that those aggrieved by the decisions and actions of the Authority should have recourse to the special procedures and to the specialist tribunal rather than to the general jurisdiction of the Administrative Court. Only in the most exceptional cases should the Administrative Court entertain applications for judicial review of the actions and decisions of the Authority, which are amenable to the procedures for making representations to the Authority, for referring matters to the tribunal and for appealing direct from the tribunal to the Court of Appeal.

[32] I am unable to accept Mr Beloff's submission that exceptional circumstances exist in this case, which would justify following the judicial review route rather than leaving the applicants to invoke the statutory procedure. He contended that, if the application were rejected on the 'alternative remedy' ground, the applicants would be forced to defend themselves at great expense against the allegations of misconduct in proceedings which, on the applicants' case, the Authority could not lawfully bring against them. They should not, he said, be subjected to the regulatory statutory machinery at all. For the reasons already advanced, the regime under ss 56 and 57 was simply not applicable to their cases.

[33] In my judgment, the points raised in the grounds on which judicial review is sought could and should, if pursued, be the subject of representations to the Authority, or of submissions to the tribunal. The statutory course could be taken without substantially increasing the expenses already incurred in preparations to defend the discontinued proceedings brought by the SFA. It would be open to the applicants to ask the tribunal to deal with their contentions on the lawfulness of the Authority's decisions and actions as preliminary issues. An application by way of judicial review is, in all the circumstances of this case, unjustified.

PREMATURITY

[34] Mr Herberg also submitted that the application for judicial review was premature and that permission should be refused for that reason. There is force in this submission. The only decision taken by the Authority against the applicants was to issue the warning notices. Standing alone the notices have no legal effect or adverse consequences for the applicants. Further action is required under s 56 before a decision notice is issued. I would not, however, decline to entertain the application on that ground alone. It is reasonable to suppose that, in the circumstances of this case, the giving of the warning notices under s 57 is likely to be followed by decision notices under s 56 and by the making of prohibition orders.

RESULT

[35] I would dismiss the appeal and order the applicants to pay the costs of the respondent to be subject to a detailed assessment, if not agreed.

CARNWATH LJ.

[36] I agree.

KENNEDY LJ.

[37] I also agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Dilys Tausz Barrister.

Hackney London Borough Council v Driscoll

[2003] EWCA Civ 1037

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

KENNEDY, BROOKE LJJ AND HOLMAN J

16 JULY 2003

County court – Practice – Notice of trial date – Defendant having knowledge of proceedings but not receiving notice of trial date –Whether order made at trial to be set aside – CPR 39.3(5).

The defendant owned premises in Hackney which were mortgaged to the claimant authority. Arrears accrued under the mortgage and the authority issued proceedings claiming possession. The court served the claim form on the defendant at the Hackney address but he had let the premises and was no longer living there. In due course the defendant became aware of the proceedings and attended court for procedural hearings, however, he did not receive notice of the trial date. At trial in November 1996 an order for immediate possession was made in the defendant's absence. In 1997 the defendant heard that the authority had evicted his tenants and recovered possession but by that time he was suffering from a severe mental illness and remained under hospital care until August 1999. In January 2001 he applied for an order setting aside the possession order. Both the district judge and the circuit judge refused his application, finding that he did not satisfy the first and third criteria in CPR 39.3(5)[a] which provided that where an application to set aside a judgment was made by a party who had failed to attend the trial, the court could grant the application only if the applicant: (a) had acted promptly when he found out that the court had exercised its power to enter judgment against him; (b) had a good reason for not attending the trial; and (c) had a reasonable prospect of success. The defendant appealed contending that he should have obtained an order setting aside possession, as of right, because he had not received notice of the trial date.

Held – A distinction was to be made between a case in which a party had no knowledge of the proceedings at all and a case in which he had no knowledge of the date fixed for a hearing. Once a defendant knew about the proceedings and had participated in them, the court had the necessary jurisdiction to make an order affecting him. In the instant case the judge and the district judge had been correct to apply CPR 39.3(5). That rule gave the absent party the opportunity of explaining why he had a reasonable prospect of success. It also gave the party in whose favour the judgment had been given the chance of not having to prove his case all over again, with the expense that that would involve, if a court were satisfied that there was no reasonable prospect that the judgment would be reversed. Accordingly, the appeal would be dismissed (see [24], [26]–[30], below).

White v Weston [1968] 2 All ER 842, Willowgreen Ltd v Smithers [1994] 2 All ER 533 and Al-Tobaishi v Aung [1994] CA Transcript 233 considered.

a CPR 39.3, so far as material, is set out at [9], below

Per curiam. The criteria set out in CPR 39.3(5)(a) and (b) merely reproduce the effect of the former county court practice. The criterion set out in sub-r (c) is new, but does not offend any fundamental principle of justice or any principle of Strasbourg jurisprudence (see [27], below).

Notes

For failure to attend trial of claims, see 37 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 1072.

Cases referred to in judgments

Al-Tobaishi v Aung [1994] CA Transcript 233, (1994) Times, 10 March.

Golden Ocean Assurance Ltd v Martin, The Golden Mariner [1990] 2 Lloyd's Rep 215, CA.

R v Appeal Committee of County of London Quarter Sessions, ex p Rossi [1956] 1 All ER 670, [1956] 1 QB 682, [1956] 2 WLR 800, CA.

White v Weston [1968] 2 All ER 842, [1968] 2 QB 647, [1968] 2 WLR 1459, CA.

Willowgreen Ltd v Smithers [1994] 2 All ER 533, [1994] 1 WLR 832, CA.

Introduction

The defendant, Robert Driscoll, appealed with permission of the Court of Appeal from the order of Judge Marr-Johnson in the Mayor's and City of London Court on 15 October 2002 dismissing the defendant's appeal from the order of District Judge Wright on 7 February 2001 refusing to set aside an order for possession in favour of the claimant, Hackney London Borough Council, made on 27 November 1996. The facts are set out in the judgment of Brooke LJ.

Andrew Gumbiti-Zimuto (instructed by Kirk & Partners) for the defendant.

Edmund Robb (instructed by Claer Lloyd-Jones) for the claimant.

BROOKE LJ (giving the first judgment at the invitation of Kennedy LJ).

[1] This is an appeal by the defendant Robert Driscoll against an order made by Judge Marr-Johnson in the Mayor's and City of London Court on 15 October 2002 whereby he dismissed his appeal against the order of District Judge Wright made on 7 February 2001 whereby she had refused to set aside the order for possession made against him on 27 November 1996. This appeal is therefore a second appeal, brought by permission of this court because it raises an important point of practice.

[2] In 1991 the defendant had become the owner of a long leasehold interest in premises at 5 Glendown House, Amhurst Road, Hackney after exercising his rights under a statutory right to buy scheme. The claimant council, who were his former landlords, advanced him a mortgage loan of £30,000. Arrears accrued under the mortgage, and eventually the claimants issued proceedings claiming possession of the premises by reason of the mortgage arrears. The court served the claim form on the defendant at 5 Glendown House, but he was no longer living at that address. In 1995 he had let those premises to a tenant, and he was now living in Plumstead. He maintains that he told the claimants about this move, and they are not in a position to dispute this. The claimants were unable to locate the mortgage deed, so that they were unable to rely on any agreed terms as to service of documents which may have appeared on the deed. Indeed Mr Robb, who appeared for Hackney, told us that it was not his clients' practice to include such a provision in their mortgage deeds.

[3] In due course Mr Driscoll became aware that proceedings had been started against him, and he attended court on 22 July and 15 August 1996 for procedural hearings in connection with the matter. On the latter occasion the claimants obtained an adjournment because they had lost the charge certificate. They then obtained a replacement certificate, and the court gave the parties notice of a new trial date of 27 November 1996 pursuant to CCR Ord 13, r 3. The court sent this notice to him at 5 Glendown House: it is not clear whether the claimants had told the court of the new address. At all events, he did not attend the hearing on 27 November, when an order for immediate possession was made in his absence.

[4] In due course the claimants evicted the defendant's tenants, regained physical possession of the premises, and sold them at a public auction on 10 July 1997 for a sum which for all practical purposes cleared off the mortgage debt.

[5] The defendant heard that the claimants had recovered possession of the premises some time before Easter 1997, but by this time he was suffering from a severe mental illness. He remained under hospital care for his schizophrenia either as an in-patient or as an out-patient until he was discharged from hospital care whilst on leave on 24 August 1999.

[6] He told the judge that although he had a number of telephone conversations with the claimants in 1999 in an attempt to discover what had happened to his property, he was not able to find a solicitor willing to assist him, and the court could not help him if he was unable to provide a case number. A considerable time then elapsed before he found a case number among his papers. Eventually on 26 January 2001 he applied for an order setting aside the possession order. Both the district judge and the circuit judge refused his application, being unwilling to exercise discretion in his favour under CPR 39.3(5). There was a gap of nearly two years between these two hearings because an earlier decision by a circuit judge had been set aside by this court, which directed a rehearing.

[7] The central issue on this appeal is whether Mr Driscoll should have obtained an order setting aside the possession order as of right because he was not given notice of the hearing date. Heavy reliance is placed in this regard on the decision of this court in White v Weston [1968] 2 All ER 842, [1968] 2 QB 647.

[8] It is convenient to start the legal analysis of this case by referring to CPR 3.10 (which applied to this case in 2001: see the practice direction to CPR Pt 51) and CPR 39.3. Rule 3.10 provides:

> 'Where there has been an error of procedure such as a failure to comply with a rule or practice direction—(a) the error does not invalidate any step taken in the proceedings unless the court so orders; and (b) the court may make an order to remedy the error.'

[9] Rule 39.3 provides, so far as is relevant:

> '(1) The court may proceed with a trial in the absence of a party ...
>
> (3) Where a party does not attend and the court gives judgment or makes an order against him, the party who failed to attend may apply for the judgment or order to be set aside ...
>
> (5) Where an application is made under paragraph ... (3) by a party who failed to attend the trial, the court may grant the application only if the applicant—(a) acted promptly when he found out that the court had exercised its power to ... enter judgment ... against him; (b) had a good reason for not attending the trial; and (c) has a reasonable prospect of success at the trial.'

[10] The district judge accepted that the second criterion was satisfied, but she found against Mr Driscoll on the first and third. In particular she said that even if he had attended on 27 November she did not think that the court would have made any other order than the order it did in fact make. Criterion (c) was therefore not satisfied.

[11] After the judge found that he, too, should apply the criterion set out in r 39.3(5), he came to exactly the same conclusion on each point as the district judge. In particular he said:

> 'Having regard to his previous poor payment record I have no doubt that even if the defendant had attended the hearing in November 1996 an outright order for possession of the property would still have been made, and I note that this is also the conclusion of District Judge Wright who is very experienced in these matters. I am unable to conclude therefore that the defendant would have any reasonable prospect of success if the matter were now to be retried.'

[12] If this was all there was to the case, there would have been no question of a second appeal to this court. The reason why we are hearing this appeal is that it is necessary to clear up once and for all the question whether the principles set out by this court in White's case apply not only to a case where a defendant had no notice of the proceedings at all, but also to a case where he knew about the proceedings and had attended court twice in connection with them but received no notice of the date appointed for the trial.

[13] In White's case the county court directed service of the ordinary summons by post to the address where the defendant was believed to be living. In fact he had moved house six months earlier, and the summons was returned to the court some time later. In the meantime a judge had conducted the trial and awarded damages against him. The defendant heard about the judgment by chance, and the question arose whether he was entitled to have the judgment set aside as a matter of entitlement or as a matter of discretion.

[14] Russell LJ found on the facts that the defendant had not been served with the proceedings. He said ([1968] 2 All ER 842 at 846, [1968] 2 QB 647 at 659):

> 'I do not myself attach importance to the question whether it is proper to label a judgment obtained in circumstances such as this as "irregular" or "a nullity". The defect is in my judgment so fundamental as to entitle the defendant as of right, ex debito justitiae, to have the judgment avoided and set aside ... In my view the county court judge misdirected himself in considering that he had any power to visit, even contingently, on the defendant the plaintiff's costs of a hearing that, as against this defendant, should never have taken place at all, and to which he was a stranger.'

[15] Sachs LJ, for his part, reminded himself at the outset of his judgment ([1968] 2 All ER 842 at 846, [1968] 2 QB 647 at 660) of the well-known dictum of Denning LJ in R v Appeal Committee of County of London Quarter Sessions, ex p Rossi [1956] 1 All ER 670 at 674, [1956] 1 QB 682 at 691:

> '[I]t is a fundamental principle of our law that no one is to be found guilty or made liable by an order of any tribunal unless he has been given fair notice of the proceedings so as to enable him to appear and defend them.'

[16] Like Russell LJ, he approached the case on the basis that the plaintiff had obtained judgment despite the fact that there had been no service of process on the defendant, and he agreed that in those circumstances the defendant was quite plainly entitled to have the judgment set aside ex debito justitiae (see [1968] 2 All ER 842 at 848, [1968] 2 QB 647 at 662). He distinguished the different situation where a summons was sent by post to the wrong address but it reached the defendant 14 clear days before the return day.

[17] In White's case the court did not have to consider whether the result would have been different if the defendant had waited a very long time between hearing about the judgment and taking effective steps to have it set aside: in other words whether the court could exercise its discretion not to grant him relief because he had delayed so long that there could no longer be as fair a trial as before because witnesses had died or disappeared, documents had been destroyed, or memories had faded.

[18] Modern examples of the application of the rule in White's case are to be seen in the decision of this court in Willowgreen Ltd v Smithers [1994] 2 All ER 533, [1994] 1 WLR 832 and Al-Tobaishi v Aung [1994] CA Transcript 233, (1994) Times, 10 March).

[19] The second of these cases is particularly instructive in the present context. The plaintiff lived in Senegal, and his English solicitors effectively came off the record on 16 July 1991. On 24 June 1991 the defendant's solicitors served on them a summons seeking an 'unless' order following a failure to supply copies of documents identified on their client's list. The 'unless' order was made on 26 July 1991 and judgment was duly entered on the counterclaim when the plaintiff failed to comply with it within the period set out in the order or at all. The plaintiff was unaware of what had happened until February 1992 when he acted promptly to have the judgment set aside.

[20] Stuart-Smith LJ, with whom Kennedy LJ agreed, held on the facts that the order dated 26 July 1991 had never been served on the plaintiff. After quoting from White's case and the Willowgreen Ltd case he said:

> 'Whether it is entirely right to say that there is no discretion in the matter or whether, as it seems to me, the Court of Appeal in White v Weston [1968] 2 All ER 842, [1968] 2 QB 647 said that there may be a discretion but it can only be exercised one way, is I think immaterial. If it is an exercise of discretion, where there has been no service at all, the discretion can only be exercised in one way as appears to have been the view of the court in Golden Ocean Assurance Ltd v Martin, The Golden Mariner [1990] 2 Lloyd's Rep 215.'

[21] In my judgment the answer in that case was obvious, and it could be reached without reference to White's case. If an order is made which contains a sanction if it is not complied with, and the other party has no knowledge of that order and was never served with it, then of course the sanction cannot take effect in the event of non-compliance with the order.

[22] During the course of the hearing we were reminded of the wording of RSC Ord 2, rr 1 and 2 and CCR Ord 37, r 2, which were in a certain sense the lineal predecessors of CPR 37.3. The former abolished the old distinction between a step in the proceedings which was a nullity and a step which was an irregularity. Any failure to comply with the requirement of the rules 'whether in respect of time, place, manner, form or content or in any other respect' was to be treated as an irregularity (RSC Ord 2, r 1(1)). The court had power to set aside the irregularity 'on such terms as to costs or otherwise as it thinks just' (RSC Ord 2, r 1(2)), provided that the relevant application was made 'within a reasonable time' (RSC Ord 2, r 2(1)). The comparable county court rule

(CCR Ord 37, r 2(1)) which related to 'setting aside judgment given in party's absence' was very much simpler:

> 'Any judgment or order obtained against a party in his absence at the hearing may be set aside by the court on application by that party on notice.'

A long note in the old County Court Practice headed 'Discretion to set aside' set out the principles to be derived from the relevant case law.

[23] Mr Gumbiti-Zimuto submitted that the judge had been wrong to make a distinction between a case in which a party had no knowledge of the proceedings at all and a case in which he had no knowledge of the date fixed for a hearing. He said that exactly the same principle was in issue in each case. This was the principle articulated by Denning LJ in Ex p Rossi (see [15], above). He accepted that the court would be entitled to dismiss an application to set aside a judgment in these circumstances if a defendant had delayed so long after hearing about it that he could be said to have affirmed it (although he did not accept that the application of this principle should penalise his present client). But he argued strenuously that if the application did not fall foul of that principle, and if there was a good reason (as there was here) why the defendant did not attend the hearing, then the court was not entitled to go on to consider whether he had a reasonable prospect of success at the trial. He was entitled to have his 'day in court' even if he had no reasonable prospect of success.

[24] Mr Gumbiti-Zimuto did not submit that r 39.3(5)(c) was ultra vires in the present context or adduce any arguments under the Human Rights Act 1998 to try and persuade us to give that sub-rule a distinctive interpretation. He simply argued that the principle enunciated by this court in White v Weston [1968] 2 All ER 842, [1968] 2 QB 647 was so powerful that in a case where the court had proceeded with a trial in the absence of a party because that party had not been notified of the hearing date, then a judge should not regard himself as bound to take into account all the criteria set out in r 39.3(5). Provided that the applicant had acted promptly and he had a good reason for not attending the trial, then he should be entitled to have the judgment set aside as of right.

[25] For my part I would prefer to express no views about the correct legal analysis when a 'defendant' avers that he had no notice of the proceedings against him at all, so that he might be regarded as a 'stranger' to them (see the quotation from Russell LJ's judgment in White's case in [14], above). The resolution of that issue will have to await another day. I consider, however, that the judge was correct to make the distinction which Mr Gumbiti-Zimuto challenges. Once a defendant knows about the proceedings and participates in them, the court has the necessary jurisdiction to make an order affecting him. This judgment is therefore concerned only with the latter situation.

[26] We asked Mr Gumbiti-Zimuto whether he was submitting that even if the failure to give notice was the fault of the court and not of the claimant, and the claimant had attended court with his lawyers and all his witnesses and proved his case, the court was nevertheless obliged to set aside the judgment as a matter of the defendant's entitlement even if it considered the defendant's prospects of success to be only 'fanciful', so that the claimant would be put to the expense of proving his case all over again. He said 'Yes' unequivocally. When we asked him who should pay the costs thrown away on the first occasion when the error had been made by the court, we did not receive a very clear answer. It is not easy to see why the taxpayer should pay this bill when the defendant by definition has no reasonable prospect of success at the rehearing that has to be arranged.

[27] In my judgment the judge and the district judge were right to apply r 39.3(5) to the solution of this problem. The criteria set out in sub-rr (a) and (b) merely reproduce the effect of the former practice. The criterion set out in (c) is new, but I do not consider that it offends any fundamental principle of justice or any principle of Strasbourg jurisprudence. The rule gives the absent party the opportunity of explaining why he had a reasonable prospect of success, and if he fails to persuade a lower court judge, he can seek permission to appeal against that ruling if it appears to be perverse. It also gives the party in whose favour the judgment was given the chance of not having to prove his case all over again, with all the attendant expense that this will involve (which will very often be irrecoverable in practice), if a court is satisfied that there is in truth no reasonable prospect that the judgment would be reversed.

[28] For these reasons I would dismiss this appeal.

HOLMAN J.

[29] I agree.

KENNEDY LJ.

[30] I also agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Dilys Tausz Barrister.

Giambrone and others v JMC Holidays Ltd (formerly Sunworld Holidays Ltd) (No 2)

[2003] EWHC 2619 (QB)

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION AT BIRMINGHAM

JUDGE MACDUFF QC

3 MARCH, 1 MAY 2003

Damages – Personal injury – Carer services – Gratuitous carer services provided to claimant by relative living in same household – Whether claimant in personal injury action able to recover damages in respect of gratuitous care – Whether claimant having to pass certain threshold before being able to recover damages – Approach to assessing awards.

The defendant company provided holidays at a hotel in Majorca. Many of their customers developed gastro-enteritis or similar illness as a result of food eaten within the hotel. Those customers brought a group action against the company. The company admitted liability. The claimants' cases were those selected as lead cases. Five of the claims involved children between the ages of 17 months and 8 years old. The sixth involved an adult. In all six cases there was a claim for the value of care after the claimants returned home. That included nursing and other care and attendance provided by the parents in the case of the first five claimants, and the spouse in the case of the sixth. The company rejected the claims for damages for care as a matter of principle. It relied on Court of Appeal authority submitting that before such an award could be made the claimants had to satisfy three stages. First, that the claimant would have otherwise required nursing care. Secondly, that the care provided went distinctly beyond that which was part of the ordinary regime of family life, and thirdly, that it was a very serious case. The defendant argued that the instant claims did not cross that threshold.

Held – (1) There was no rigid test, involving the fixing of some arbitrary threshold or watershed. Provided the evidence established that the illness or injury was sufficiently serious to give rise to a need for care and attendance above and beyond the normal call of ordinary family life and that it was significantly so, compensation, properly assessed, should be awarded. It was not a condition precedent to an award of damages that actual nursing care, requiring technical expertise, as opposed to loving attendance, was required. Nor could it be said that it was part of the regime of ordinary life for parents to spend their time looking after sick children. Moreover, there was no requirement that it should be a very serious case; a carer would be entitled to be compensated when an illness became sufficiently serious to require significant extra care. In the instant cases, the claims for care, gratuitously provided, had to be allowed (see [41], [42], [44] and [49]–[50], below); Mills v British Rail Engineering Ltd [1992] PIQR Q130 explained.

(2) Where a parent of a young child was providing a mixture of love, support, and care, it would be artificial to adopt the traditional approach to assessing damages. It was not possible to separate out the extra hours or minutes superimposed on the normal daily round by the illness. Rather, a proportionate and proper award should be reached by considering the type and severity of the child's illness; the length of time for which care was necessary; the fact that the child was getting better for part of the time; whether the claim included child minding where the child was unable to go to school or nursery and could not be left; and the nature of the additional burden on the parent. Taking those factors into account in relation to the first five claimants, and in the case of the sixth claimant, the care his spouse had provided, damages would be awarded to all the claimants (see [55]–[57], below); Evans v Pontypridd Roofing Ltd [2001] All ER (D) 131 (Nov) considered.

Cases referred to in judgment

Best v Samuel Fox & Co Ltd [1952] 2 All ER 394, [1952] AC 716, HL.
Cunningham v Harrison [1973] 3 All ER 463, [1973] QB 942, [1973] 3 WLR 97, CA.
Donnelly v Joyce [1973] 3 All ER 475, [1974] QB 454, [1973] 3 WLR 514, CA.
Evans v Pontypridd Roofing Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 1657, [2001] All ER (D) 131 (Nov).
Housecroft v Burnett [1986] 1 All ER 332, CA.
Hunt v Severs [1994] 2 All ER 385, [1994] 2 AC 350, [1994] 2 WLR 602, HL.
Lowe v Guise [2002] EWCA Civ 197, [2002] 3 All ER 454, [2002] QB 1369, [2002] 3 WLR 562.
Mills v British Rail Engineering Ltd [1992] PIQR Q130, CA.

Case referred to in skeleton arguments

Nash v Southmead Health Authority [1993] PIQR Q156.

Claims

The defendant, JMC Holidays Ltd (formerly Sunworld Holidays Ltd) admitted liability in a group action brought against it by Anita Giambrone and 651 others for personal injury as a result of developing gastro-enteritis while on holidays provided by the defendant. Twenty-five of the cases selected as lead cases settled. In the remaining six cases, the claimants, Sean Paul Mason, Lauren Ilic, Emma Farrar, Molly Woodier, Lauren Hunt and Patrick Brennan, sought awards of damages for the value of care after their return home. Patrick Brennan also sought damages for value of services. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Andrew Spink QC (instructed by Irwin Mitchell, Birmingham) for the claimants.
Charles Haddon-Cave QC and John Russell (instructed by Field Fisher Waterhouse) for the defendant.

Cur adv vult

1 May 2003. The following judgment was delivered.

JUDGE MACDUFF QC.

[1] In 1997 and 1998 these defendants provided holidays at the Club Aguamar in Majorca. Many of their customers developed gastro-enteritis or similar illness as a result of food eaten within the hotel. Six hundred and fifty two of those customers have had the good fortune to obtain representation from Irwin Mitchell of this city, and have brought claims against the defendants.

[2] This is part of the group action brought by those claimants. I have case managed the case throughout. At an early stage, the defendants admitted liability. Also, a number of cases were selected as lead cases, with the intention that decisions would be made in those cases, which would facilitate settlement of the others. Of the 652 cases, some 401 have settled, including 25 of the 31 lead cases. Thus 251 of the 652 cases are still to be decided or settled, including 6 remaining lead cases. a [3] This is the final determination of the quantum of those six lead cases.

[4] Many, indeed most, of these many claims, are of relatively modest value. Fortunately, most claimants suffered symptoms for only a short time, or their symptoms were not severe beyond the initial stages. That is true of all the six cases with which I am concerned. b

[5] Sean Paul Mason was three years old at the time of his holiday in the summer of 1998. His symptoms, regular vomiting, lasted about three weeks, although he was improving gradually over that time. The details may be found in his mother's witness statement.

[6] Lauren Ilic was aged seven years at the time of her holiday in the summer of 1997. Her symptoms lasted a little longer. She suffered from diarrhoea and sickness. There is an account of Lauren's illness in her mother's statement. c

[7] Emma Farrar was eight years old in 1998, when she visited the Club Aguamar. Her illness is recounted in her father's witness statement. Her symptoms lasted for two or more months, although she was gradually improving over that period. She had to have time off school after returning to the United Kingdom. d

[8] Molly Woodier was ill for several months. She was a toddler, only 17 months old, at the time of her holiday in June 1998. Her illness is described in the witness statements of her parents. She was ill for around six months.

[9] Lauren Hunt was seven years old when she visited the Club Aguamar in May and June 1998. Her main symptom was diarrhoea. Although she returned to school after the holiday, she continued to suffer from stomach cramps until early 1999 (mother's statement). e

[10] Patrick Brennan was born in February 1967 and is a sales office manager. He took seven days off work after returning from his holiday in 1998. He describes how, although improving, he continued to have symptoms, for many months. f

[11] These are the six claimants whose claims are to be determined, in part, by me. I say 'in part' because most heads of damage have already been agreed. In all these 652 cases, claims have been brought under several heads: pain and suffering, special damages (medical expenses and the like), loss of enjoyment of holiday, diminution in value of holiday and so on. All heads of claim have been the subject of negotiation, and, in respect of these six claimants, all heads of damage have been agreed (subject to approval in the first five cases) save for one. In all six cases there is a claim for what has been called 'the value of care'. This is only the value of care after the return home; the parties have settled the care claims for the period when the claimants were still on holiday. In all six cases, the claim is modest. But these claims for care are entirely rejected by the defendants as a matter of principle; the defendants submit that they cannot succeed in law. g h

[12] Although these six individual claims for care are not large, I am told that there is a wider significance. Many of the outstanding claims also include claims for care, and the potential total damages may be large. Also, quite apart from this group of cases, there are many other group claims making their way through the courts, and my decision may affect those cases also. j

[13] A word or two about this head of damage. These are claims for the cost or value of care, that is the cost (or value) of making provision for the needs of the claimant. This includes nursing and other care and attendance. These are needs of the claimant which arise because of his injury, and are those damages usually labelled 'care and attendance' or 'gratuitous care', and with which we are concerned in this case. The authorities demonstrate that, in general, a claimant is entitled to recover a sum representing the value of that which has been provided, so that the provider may be reasonably remunerated for that which he has gratuitously provided.

[14] There is also a similar head of damage, underpinned by similar principles. It permits the recovery of the cost of undertaking tasks, previously performed by the claimant, but which he can no longer do. This involves placing a value on those tasks, where they are performed gratuitously. Where a claimant, as a consequence of his injuries, is unable to perform some task (eg gardening, household chores or decorating etc) which he used to perform, and pays a third party to do it for him, that cost may be recovered. That has long been the law. Where he does not pay for the gardening or other task to be done by a third party, he may nevertheless recover the reasonable value of the work which he can no longer do. This head of damage is often referred to as 'the cost of services'. There is a claim in the case of Mr Brennan for what I call 'the cost of services', but I will deal with this separately, towards the end of this judgment.

[15] But otherwise, we are concerned with care claims, not services claims. This is an area of the law which has developed radically in the last thirty or so years, and which is still developing. Before Cunningham v Harrison [1973] 3 All ER 463, [1973] QB 942 and Donnelly v Joyce [1973] 3 All ER 475, [1974] QB 454 were decided, it was thought that a claim for care and attendance could only succeed to the extent that the claimant had actually expended money (or contracted to do so) for the nursing services which he needed. This led to the unedifying spectacle of a claimant contracting with a spouse, on lawyer's advice, to pay so much per hour or week for the care which that spouse was providing. This enabled the court to award damages for care as an item of special damage. This process had to be followed because of the principle established in Best v Samuel Fox & Co Ltd [1952] 2 All ER 394, [1952] AC 716: the third party owed no duty to the care provider and, unless the claimant had a legal obligation to pay for the care, he could not recover on behalf of the provider who had provided the service gratuitously.

[16] But Cunningham's and Donnelly's cases established that the claimant could recover the value of gratuitous care. The jurisprudence in those two cases was different, but the result was the same. Over the years, some jurists have preferred the route in Cunningham's case (as propounded by Lord Denning MR) and others have preferred the route in Donnelly's case (per Megaw LJ). I do not need, in this judgment, to explain the two different approaches, the two different routes by which the same result was achieved. There have been detailed analyses of the two cases in numerous later decisions, both in the Court of Appeal and in the House of Lords. The difference of approach has been considered on many occasions, notably by O'Connor LJ in Housecroft v Burnett [1986] 1 All ER 332 at 342 and by the House of Lords in Hunt v Severs [1994] 2 All ER 385, [1994] 2 AC 350. The House of Lords preferred the reasoning in Cunningham's case; this included that the injured claimant should hold these damages on trust for the voluntary carer.

[17] The history of the development of this area of law has been recounted and explained recently in two decisions of the Court of Appeal namely Lowe v Guise [2002] EWCA Civ 197, [2002] 3 All ER 454, [2002] QB 1369 and Evans v Pontypridd Roofing Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 1657, [2001] All ER (D) 131 (Nov). I do not propose to embark on a similar exercise, if only because I would just be duplicating unnecessarily the analysis and explanations of eminent Lords Justices. Strictly speaking Lowe's case was concerned with what I have called a 'services claim'. It was concerned with the services which the injured claimant had previously provided to his family, and which, because of his injury, he could no longer provide. It was not concerned with the cost of providing care and attendance for him, or valuing the care which he reasonably required. In fact, the injured claimant was claiming the value of the care which he had gratuitously provided for his brother.

[18] In respect of care claims in general, I would venture the following general principles. (a) Where a claimant, as a consequence of his injuries, expends money on paid help (whether nursing care or some other 'care') so that he can be properly looked after, that expenditure may be recovered from the tortfeasor. This has ever been the law. (b) Where he does not pay for the 'care' under (a), above, and it is provided freely by another, usually a spouse or other relative, that care is to be valued, and the value is recoverable. (c) Where the carer loses wages in order to make the provision, the value of the services/care is calculated with reference to the provider's lost earnings, subject to the test of reasonableness. (d) The value of the 'care' is not just to be calculated with reference to the nursing 'work' (the fetching, carrying, food and medicine providing, and so on). Attendance on the claimant, providing company, support, and comfort (again provided it is reasonable), has a recoverable value. Thus, for example, a claimant in an appropriate case would be entitled to recover in respect of visits by a relative or friend to hospital (provided the visits were beneficial, not excessive, and reasonable) notwithstanding that all his nursing requirements were being provided. (e) In recent times, the value of care and attendance provided by, eg, a spouse has usually been calculated by a multiplier and multiplicand approach. This involves making an assessment of the number of hours per day or per week which the spouse has devoted to the care and attendance, then taking an hourly rate, which might be charged by a professional carer for the type of care provided, and applying a discount, perhaps of one-third or one-quarter, to reflect the fact that there are savings where the provision is made gratuitously.

[19] I propose to deal first with the five infant claimants. Mr Brennan's case raises different issues, and I will defer my decision in his case until the end of this judgment. The infant claims fall firmly within the first of the two heads of damage. They are 'care claims' as opposed to 'services claims'. The claims may be divided into two parts. First, there is the personal care provided by a parent, looking after an ill child. This may involve what, for want of a better description, might be called 'nursing care'—helping with dressing or washing or visiting the lavatory, helping with feeding, and so on. But it would also involve the parent's attending on the child, sitting at the bedside, providing comfort, company and support, including attending on the child if he or she woke in the night. Secondly, in some but not all of the cases, there is an element of extra child minding, for example when the child was too ill to go to school and was looked after at home.

[20] In all these claims, the care (be it 'nursing' care and attendance, or child minding) was provided by a parent and not by some third party for payment. In all these claims, the claim is for the value of that which the parent provided. I do not think there is any distinction to be drawn between these different categories (nursing care and child minding). They are part and parcel of the same need—to look after the child during his/her illness. The 'care' may attract different labels. It may be child minding: attending the child when, but for the illness, it would not be necessary. It may be nursing care in the narrow sense: helping to the lavatory, administering medicine, changing the bedding, or cleaning up after an accident. It may be care (or attendance) in the wider sense: being at the bedside, to provide comfort and support to an ill child. These different roles all fall within the generic term 'care and attendance' or (where the provision is by a parent and not a professionally engaged carer) 'gratuitous care'.

[21] It is necessary to look briefly at the five claims. According to the particulars, Sean Mason, aged three, needed care for a period of two weeks. He spent a day in hospital on his return to the United Kingdom. He was repeatedly sick and not well enough to go to his nursery/playgroup. He needed reassurance and comfort, and could not be left alone at night until he was asleep. The evidence, not contested, is within the statement of Anne Mason. There is some support for the care claim in a letter from Dr Miller.

[22] The care claim in respect of Lauren Ilic is made over a period of approximately two weeks, between 30 September and 10 October 1997. She was seven years old at the time. The relevant evidence, again not challenged, is in the mother's statement. There is a child minding element within this claim because Lauren was off school for two weeks.

[23] Emma Farrar. Care was provided between 8 and 19 June 1998. There is some support for this level of care from the medical expert. The care and attendance provided by the parents is described in the father's statement. It included carrying Emma to the lavatory, taking food and drink to her, changing the bedding, and generally looking after her in a way which would not have been necessary if she had not been ill. It also included just 'being with her' and providing comfort and company. In addition, Emma was unable to attend school, because of the illness, for some two weeks, and she spent much of this time in bed. This, of course, meant that someone had to remain in the house, so that the claim also includes an element of additional child care.

[24] Molly Woodier was only about 17 months old. In her case, the care claim covers a longer period. The need for care is described within the statements of her father and of her mother.

[25] The care claim of Lauren Hunt is made in respect of a period of approximately two weeks, between 7 June and 21 June 1998. She was seven years old at the time. The relevant evidence is to be found in the mother's statement.

[26] In all these cases it is accepted that the claim can only be for the extra parental input which was caused by the illness. There would have been a certain amount of fetching and carrying, changing of bedclothes and the like, if the children had been well. What has to be valued (if these are well-founded claims at all) is the extra care and attendance resulting from the illness.

[27] At first blush, it would seem that, in principle, these claimants should be able to recover the value of the care which their parents provided during their illnesses. Some might find it slightly distasteful that a parent, nursing a sick child after a nasty bout of diarrhoea and vomiting, would say to the defendant: 'I provided care and support for my child through the illness. I had to get up in the night. I had to fetch and carry. I estimate that I gave her about four extra hours a day on average than I would normally give her, and I would like compensation of £200 (or whatever sum).' But, in principle, there seems no reason why the parent should not do so. The defendant is responsible for the illness. As a consequence there is a need for care and child minding. It is a reasonable need, caused by the tortious act. If the parent fills that need, it should be valued and compensated. In one sense, it is a straightforward matter of breach of duty and causation of damage. a [28] The defendants contend that these cases are not sufficiently serious to merit an award in respect of gratuitous care. They submit that there is, at law, a threshold to be passed before such a claim will lie. None of these cases reaches that threshold. They rely upon Mills v British Rail Engineering Ltd [1992] PIQR Q130. It is a decision of the Court of Appeal. In that case the Court of Appeal b upheld a claim for gratuitous care by a terminally ill claimant who had an asbestos-related disease. The claimant was receiving long-term care from his wife. It is submitted that there is a three-stage test, and that, in order to qualify for an award, the claimant must satisfy each of the three stages.

[29] The three stages of the test are as follows. First, that the claimant 'would otherwise require nursing care' (attributed to Dillon LJ at 136–137). Second, that c the care provided should go 'distinctly beyond that which is part of the ordinary regime of family life' (per Staughton LJ at 138). And, thirdly, taken in the round, 'it must ... only be in a very serious case that an award is justified' (per Dillon LJ at 137).

[30] The facts of that case were as follows. The claim was brought under the d Fatal Accidents Act 1976 by the widow of Mr Mills. He had inhaled asbestos in his earlier life, had suffered lung cancer, which had led to his death. Liability was admitted. The first symptoms of his illness occurred at the very end of 1989, when he was 60 years old. The early symptoms consisted of a cough which would not go away. He was referred for medical investigation in early 1990. He e underwent a bronchoscopy in February 1990 and was diagnosed with lung cancer in March. He was treated by chemotherapy in March and April, with two further short treatments in August and September. Although he suffered from increasing breathlessness, particularly towards the end of 1990, he suffered little or no pain until the end of November. He died in January 1991.

[31] There was a claim for the care which the widow had provided. It was f calculated in the following way. A claim was made for the whole of the 14-month period, November 1989 to January 1991. It was contended that the widow provided the equivalent of approximately two hours of care per day in the first two months. In January 1990, the claim increased to three hours per day. In February 1990, care was claimed at four hours per day. The cancer was g diagnosed in March. From March to October, the claim was put at ten hours per day. From November 1990 to January 1991, it was 14 hours per day. The hourly rate claimed was the rate of a professional carer.

[32] It seems that these calculations were accepted by the judge, subject to a reduction of one-third (this being gratuitous care rather than commercial care) and subtracting the extra charges which an agency would have required to supply h the carer. Using that formulation, he awarded the sum of £8,000.

[33] The Court of Appeal reduced the award to £5,000 (per Dillon LJ at 138):

> 'To my mind however, if one looks at [the] schedule for a wife's care beyond what she would anyhow have been doing for her husband in her part of the household tasks and cooking, it comes out too high ... I take the view j that the figure that the judge awarded, having regard to the way [the] schedule is made up and the extent to which it goes back, was too high.'

[34] It is clear, from a reading of the judgments, that Dillon, Neill and Staughton LJJ were satisfied that, in the first few weeks and months, the deceased, apart from his cough, suffered little or no disability which would justify the provision of care for two, three or four hours per day. Secondly, although the wife took on significant additional duties throughout the remainder of the period, when he was becoming increasingly breathless, her 'care' was being charged, subject to the discount, as a full-time resident carer. This ran from March (when the disability would have been fairly minor) through to death. In effect, a further discount needed to be applied to reflect two things: that Mrs Mills would have been providing care for him, in any event, as part of her housewifely duties; and that the nature of the illness did not justify the need for full-time care for the whole period from March to the date of death. Without doing a precise calculation, the Court of Appeal reduced the award from £8,000 to £5,000.

[35] At face value, that decision would appear to do no more than emphasise that awards for gratuitous care must be carefully scrutinised, and supported by the evidence. Incidentally, it was accepted that the provision of love, affection and support formed part of the 'care' for which damages were to be awarded.

[36] But the defendants rely upon specific passages in the report. The relevant part of the headnote (at 130–131), it is said, accurately summarises the ratio of the case.

> '... in relation to the award for the widow's nursing services a court can properly award a sum of damages to enable a sufferer or his estate to make a reasonable recompense to a relative in respect of nursing care provided to the sufferer or deceased which would otherwise have required the services of a trained nurse. An award can be made even where the carer has not lost wages of her or his own in order to look after the patient. There can be no justification in principle differentiating between full-time care needing a trained nurse and full-time care needing a carer giving love and affection to a dying person to a far greater degree than would be expected in any ordinary way of life, but an award is only justified in a very serious case and in recompense for care by the relative well beyond the ordinary call of duty. In the circumstances of the case an award under this heading was appropriate. Although it was not possible to make a really precise calculation the judge's award was too high and should be reduced to £5,000.'

[37] The defendant's specifically rely upon the words 'a far greater degree than would be expected in any ordinary way of life' and 'an award is only justified in a very serious case' and 'in recompense for care ... well beyond the ordinary call of duty'.

[38] These features of the headnote can be extrapolated, it is said, from the judgments. The defendants rely upon the following passage (per Dillon LJ at 137):

> 'To my mind there can be no justification in principle for differentiating between full-time care needing really a trained nurse and full-time care needing a carer giving love and affection to the patient, the dying person, to a degree far more than would be expected in any ordinary way of life. In principle it must be, in my judgment, a matter for an award only in recompense for care by the relative well beyond the ordinary call of duty for the special needs of the sufferer. The basis ... is that the court will make an award to enable the sufferer or his estate to make reasonable recompense to the relative who has cared so devotedly. So it must indeed only be in a very serious case that an award is justified—where, as here, there is no question of the carer having lost wages of her or his own to look after the patient.' (My emphasis.)

Neill LJ agreed with this judgment.

[39] Reliance is also placed upon a passage from Staughton LJ (at 138).

> 'It seems to me that a plaintiff would naturally wish to pay some reward or compensation, if he had the money to do so, for care and attendance by a relative, which goes distinctly beyond that which is part of the ordinary regime of family life; and, where his disability has been caused by the fault of the defendant, it is right that he should be provided with the money to do so.' (My emphasis.)

[40] It is from these passages that the defendants say the three-stage test can be divined. They say further that this is the ratio decidendi of the case (or this part of the case), that it is a decision of the Court of Appeal, and that I am bound to follow it. They say that none of the five infants' claims passes the watershed, and that the claims for care must be dismissed.

[41] I have reached the conclusion, for reasons which I will set out, that the Court of Appeal was not intending to impose some rigid test, involving the fixing of some arbitrary threshold or watershed. In any event, it seems clear to me that the particular phrases, upon which the defendants rely, were obiter only, and were not part of the ratio of the case. They were not an essential part of the decision which was made; the decision was no more than the upholding of an appeal that the damages were too high, and that the judge had erred in his approach to the evidence. It was no part of the actual decision that only serious cases should be compensated; Mills v British Rail Engineering Ltd [1992] PIQR Q130 was a serious case. Moreover, even if I were wrong about that, I am satisfied, on a proper reading of Mills' case, that, at all three stages of the so-called threshold, these infant claims satisfy the test.

[42] It seems to me that a careful analysis of the case does not lead to the interpretation for which the defendants contend. Let us look at the three stages of the supposed test. First, reliance is placed on a passage said to lie in the judgment of Dillon LJ (at 136–137). It is contended that, before the claim can be allowed, it must be shown that the claimant required 'nursing care'. Apart from a concession made by counsel for the defendant (at 136)—'a court can properly award a sum of damages to compensate a relative in respect of nursing care provided to the deceased which would otherwise have required the services of a trained nurse'—and which is hardly to the point, I can see no justification in that passage for the assertion. Nowhere, as it seems to me, does Dillon LJ suggest that it is a condition precedent to an award of damages, that actual nursing care (as opposed to loving attendance, for example) is required. Still less does it appear that he is stating that professional nursing care is a requirement (although this has found its way into the defendants' skeleton argument). I have been unable to find the short quotation attributed to Dillon LJ ('would otherwise require nursing care'). Nor does it seem to me that that quotation is an accurate summary of anything else which he said at any point in his judgment. Maybe I have missed something. In so far as the case headnote may be thought to lend support to such a proposition, it is not supported, as it seems to me, by the judgments. But, in any event there is no magic in the concept of nursing care. The verb 'to nurse' is defined in the Oxford Dictionary as including 'to attend to a sick person'. It seems to me that all these five children needed to be nursed during their illnesses. Nursing care cannot be divorced from 'attendance upon a sick person'. It seems that there is, implicit in the defendants' argument, an assumption that 'nursing' imports some technical expertise, or some minimum amount of professional-type care, and that, in some way, the fetching, carrying, cleaning, and comforting which these parents dispensed does not qualify as true 'nursing'. I reject that implicit submission.

[43] But, even if it were so, I disagree with the defendants' suggestion that none of the children in these cases did in fact require nursing care. Consider Molly Woodier and the statement of her father. Molly was, at times, suffering from a temperature. She was suffering recurrent diarrhoea, so that, for one period, her nappy needed changing every 30 minutes. The period of her acute illness may have been relatively short, but it is difficult to imagine a situation in which the need for nursing care could be greater. If the parents had not been available to look after this little girl, during the day and during the night, and if a trained nurse or care assistant had been employed, it is difficult to see how the claim for the costs of the nurse/carer could have been refused. Where a child is ill, for example during the night, and is repeatedly vomiting and suffering from diarrhoea, and running a temperature, and requiring medication, it is axiomatic that he/she requires nursing care; whether that care is provided professionally or by a parent is, as it seems to me, irrelevant.

[44] Secondly, the defendants contend that there is a requirement that the care provided should go 'distinctly beyond that which is part of the ordinary regime of family life' (the words of Staughton LJ at 138) or, 'to a degree far more than would be expected in any ordinary way of life' (the words of Dillon LJ at 137). What does that mean? In my judgment, it can only mean 'ordinary regime of family life when no one is ill or injured to a degree where he/she needs to be looked after/nursed'. It is not part of the regime of ordinary life that parents spend their time looking after sick children, running to and from the lavatory, clearing up the mess, administering medicine, and child minding when the child is unfit to go to school. In 'ordinary life' children are not sick and they go to school.

[45] As I understand the defendants' argument, it is contended that children are unwell from time to time. When they are unwell, their parents look after them. This is all part and parcel of life's tapestry—'the ordinary regime of family life'.

[46] If that were true of these cases, it would also be true of Mills' case. Spouses are ill from time to time. It is, in that sense, part of the normal pattern of life that the other spouse will provide the care and comfort which is needed. If Mr Mills had been unwell some months earlier, unrelated to his asbestos inhalation, Mrs Mills would have cared for him. Why could the defendants not say, in that case, that looking after a sick husband was part of the ordinary regime of family life? Why should sick husbands be different from sick children?

[47] In my judgment, Dillon and Staughton LJJ were saying no more than that the care provided must be significantly different from the care which would have been provided if the husband had been well. At a time when he was only coughing mildly, his wife would have treated him little differently than when he was well. It is only when the illness becomes sufficiently serious to require significant extra care that the carer is entitled to be compensated. On that analysis, the cases of these five children pass the threshold.

[48] The defendants contend for a third strand to the test. '[I]t must ... only be in a very serious case that an award is justified' (per Dillon LJ at 137). They say that these five cases are not very serious.

[49] How is seriousness to be judged? Why is it not serious if a young child is so ill that he/she requires the sort of care which I have described above? The defendants are right to say that the illnesses lasted for a mercifully short time. But, in my judgment, these claimants were, albeit for that short time, seriously ill. Putting that another way, these are serious cases, notwithstanding that total damages may not be great. Why, then was it necessary to include these words ('it must ... only be in a very serious case that an award is justified') in the judgments? It seems to me that those words do no more than to emphasise that the illness/injury must be sufficiently serious to give rise to a need for care and attendance significantly over and above that which would be given anyway, in the ordinary course of family life.

[50] In those circumstances, I find nothing in the judgment in Mills' case to lead me to the conclusion that, as a matter of principle, these claims for care, gratuitously provided, should not be allowed. Provided the evidence establishes that the parents provided care and attendance above and beyond the normal call of ordinary family life and that it was significantly so, compensation, properly assessed, should be awarded.

[51] Subject to quantification (and subject to dealing with the claim of Mr Brennan) that would be sufficient to dispose of these cases. But, out of deference to the argument which has been put before me, I propose to make a few further short comments.

[52] Mr Haddon-Cave QC told me that he had done a thorough search of all reported cases concerned with the provision of care, and that every single reported case was a large and (on any view) serious case. I do not find that surprising. One might expect that the larger cases would be the ones to be reported, the ones to establish the relevant principles of law. Although the reported cases are all cases of severe illness or injury, it is, perhaps, surprising that there is no mention in any of them (and many of them do give a detailed exposition of the development of this area of law) of this supposed principle in Mills' case.

[53] I obtain further comfort from the fact that, as a matter of practice, these claims are regularly made and regularly allowed. I know this to be the case from my own experience of trying and case managing these cases, both in the High Court and in the county court.

[54] In the course of argument, I asked Mr Haddon-Cave why the Court of Appeal would wish to impose such a rule to regulate the circumstances in which such a claim could be brought. The answer was that it could only be a policy decision, to prevent small unverifiable claims from being brought in a host of claims. I confess that I do not find that to be a persuasive argument. No such limit is placed on other heads of damage, and the courts may surely be relied upon to police these claims, and to make proportionate and sensible awards, in accordance with the evidence.

[55] I have been referred to the case of Evans v Pontypridd Roofing Ltd [2001] All ER (D) 131 (Nov). I note that, in a detailed examination of the way in which this head of damage has developed over the years, including a detailed statement of the current state of the law, as well as an appraisal of how these damages are to be approached and assessed, May LJ made no mention of any threshold test. Mr Haddon-Cave says that that is not surprising; that was a case concerned with quantification, and not with the principle of recoverability. That, he says, was a case in which the threshold was patently reached, and the question did not arise. There is force in that submission, and I agree that it is of no great assistance to me, a one way or the other, that Mills v British Rail Engineering Ltd [1992] PIQR Q130 made no appearance in the judgment. But I do draw assistance from the case. The Court of Appeal took the opportunity to emphasise that a judge of first instance should not be put into a straitjacket when assessing this head of damage. In many cases, it might be inappropriate to adopt the traditional approach (assessing a number of hours input per day or week, applying a commercial b hourly rate, and then discounting, in the way described earlier in this judgment). It is open to a judge to assess the value of the care, very much as he might assess general damages for pain and suffering, by having regard to what the carer has done and fixing appropriate compensation. In this case it seems to me that such an approach is the correct one. It is artificial to adopt what I have called the conventional approach where a parent of young children is providing a mixture c of love, support, and care. It is just not possible to separate out the 'extra' hours or minutes superimposed on the normal daily round by the illness. It is possible to understand the general nature of the extra burden placed upon the parent, and to make a proportionate and proper award. That is how I propose to assess the damages in these cases. I should emphasise that I have read the judgment d carefully, and have found the general guidance helpful. Mr Spink QC, on behalf of the claimants, referred me, in particular, to [18], [22]–[25], and [30]. It seems to me that the judgment supports the approach which I am adopting, but also lends support to the decision which I have already made—that there is no threshold, that each case is to be determined on its own facts, and that the guiding principle is that, however limited or however extensive the care, 'the court has to e assess proper recompense' which will 'obviously depend on the circumstances of each case' and the care services to be compensated 'should not exceed those which are properly determined to be care services consequent upon the claimant's injuries' (per May LJ at [30]).

[56] I turn to the individual assessments. Although modestly pleaded, it was f conceded by counsel on behalf of the claimants that the sums claimed fell to be reduced by some discount, as the amounts claimed were calculated on full commercial care rates (albeit the lowest rates for personal care support). That is of small significance in view of the fact that I intend, as I have said, to adopt a more broad brush approach. I have read the evidence of the parents carefully. I have read the medical evidence, because it seems to me that the nature and g severity of the child's illness is a relevant factor. I have noted the number of days or weeks over which care was said to be necessary. I have taken account of the fact that, for part of the time, the claimant was getting better and that the need for care would, at that time, reduce. I have taken account of whether or not the claim incorporates a claim for 'child minding' (where the claimant was unable to h go to nursery or school and needed to be attended) and I have taken account, in each case, of the nature of the additional burden, as described by the parent. My awards for care in the five cases involving infant claimants are: Sean Mason, £150; Lauren Ilic, £175; Emma Farrar, £175; Molly Woodier, £275; and Lauren Hunt, £150.

j [57] That leaves the sixth claimant, Patrick Brennan. His is a mixed claim for both care and services. I have read his evidence carefully. He had some days off work after his return home. But this part of the claim is (a) for the care and attendance provided by his wife after the return home and (b) the value of the daily tasks which, because he was ill, he was unable to perform. It does not seem to me that, on any view, the services claim under (b), above can possibly be 'caught' by the decision in Mills' case. But, in any event, I am satisfied that damages are recoverable under both. In summary, during this illness, Mrs Brennan provided care (fetching and carrying, helping with bathing, and purchasing vitamins and so on). Also Mr Brennan was unable to take his full share of child minding duties and housework. This part of the claim is undoubtedly for the value of services, as opposed to care. I do not propose to distinguish between the two, and, having regard to the relatively short period involved, and the very modest amount of care provided by Mrs Brennan, I assess Mr Brennan's claim at £120.

Order accordingly. Permission to appeal granted.

Martyn Gurr Barrister.

Amalgamated Metal Trading Ltd v City of London Police Financial Investigation Unit and others

[2003] EWHC 703 (Comm)

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (COMMERCIAL COURT)

TOMLINSON J

16 JANUARY, 3 APRIL 2003

Proceeds of crime – Declaratory relief – Claimant informing police of suspect transactions – Claimant seeking consent of police to transfer related moneys – Police refusing consent – Claimant seeking declaration that moneys not proceeds of crime – Whether appropriate for claimant to seek declaration – Criminal Justice Act 1988, s 93A.

The claimant provided trading services to the second defendant company. It developed concerns about the integrity of the second defendant, in particular about receipt of large sums of money from companies connected to two entities, A Ltd and R plc. Both those entities had collapsed with significant losses, leading to litigation in which a massive fraud was alleged and in which the second defendant was implicated. After the claimant raised its suspicions with the second defendant, all remaining positions were closed out by agreement, resulting in a credit balance of approximately $US 450,000 (the balance) in favour of the second defendant. The claimant sought the consent of the first defendant, the City of London Police, implicitly under s 93A(3)(b)(i)[a] of the Criminal Justice Act 1988, for the transfer of the balance to the second defendant. The police declined to give such consent, which would have provided the claimant with a defence to any prosecution under s 93 of the 1988 Act for being concerned in an arrangement facilitating the retention or control by another of the proceeds of crime. The police stated that they had reasonable cause to believe that the second defendant had been involved in fraudulent actions with A Ltd and R plc. The claimant issued proceedings seeking a declaration as against the first defendant that the balance was not the proceeds of crime. On the same day, it also issued an application notice seeking an interim declaration to the same effect. The interim application was subsequently rejected, following which the second defendant was joined and particulars of claim served, seeking the same declaratory relief as against the first defendant. On being joined, the second defendant issued an application for the first defendant to provide full particulars of its suspicion or belief that the balance was the proceeds of crime, and for an order that the money be paid into court. The proceedings were later stayed against the first defendant and an order made to join the Serious Fraud Office (SFO) in its place, since the SFO had taken over the criminal investigation. The instant proceedings were concerned with a restored hearing for directions and an application by the SFO for the proceedings against it to be stayed. The second defendant applied to introduce a counterclaim seeking payment of the money by the claimant.

a Section 93A is set out at [8], below

Held – (1) The court could not regard the course which the claimant had adopted as appropriate, nor was that course sanctioned by authority. It had never been appropriate for the claimant to seek a declaration against the police that the balance was not the proceeds of criminal conduct. Whether the balance represented such proceeds was never an issue between those parties and there was no occasion for the creation of a lis between them directed to determination of that point. The only question which the police had been asked was whether they consented to the payment being made. Had they given consent, the claimant would have had a defence under s 93A of the 1988 Act to any prosecution under that section. Section 93A would manifestly be unworkable if the police could only justify the withholding of consent if they could demonstrate their satisfaction, to whatever might be the appropriate standard, that the funds were in fact derived from or used in connection with criminal conduct. It was clear from s 93A as a whole that the existence of a suspicion was sufficient to ground a proper refusal of consent. It would be odd if a legitimate withholding of consent which could be justified on grounds of suspicion were to lead to the situation in which the police had to defend proceedings directed towards determination of a question wholly different from that which they had been asked, namely, the ultimate question of whether the funds had in fact derived from criminal conduct. Nor in such circumstances should the court grant interim declaratory relief on that ultimate question. Moreover, the granting of declaratory relief on the ultimate question as against the police, whether on an interim or a final basis, could prejudice future criminal prosecutions. Accordingly, the action against the SFO fulfilled no useful or legitimate purpose and would be stayed (see [24], [27], [28], [31], below); Governor and Company of the Bank of Scotland v A Ltd [2001] 1 All ER (Comm) 1023 distinguished.

(2) The instant case had been transformed by the second defendant's application to introduce a counterclaim, since such a claim would at last result in issue being joined between the two parties in contention. As matters stood, the claimant was simply seeking declaratory relief against the second defendant which had no interest in opposing it. Permission would therefore be granted for the second defendant to serve a defence and counterclaim. Since that rendered the claim wholly redundant, if asked to do so, the court would consider permitting the claimant to withdraw its claim entirely, and directing that the second defendant be claimant in the action and the claimant the sole defendant (see [30], below).

Notes

For money laundering and other offences, see 12(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 541B.

For the Criminal Justice Act 1988, s 93A, see 12 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 986. Section 93A has been repealed by the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, s 457, Sch 11, paras 1, 17((2)(a), save where the conduct constituting an offence under the section began before 24 February 2003 and ended on or after that date.

Cases referred to in judgment

F v Riverside Mental Health NHS Trust [1994] 2 FCR 577, Fam D and CA.

Governor and Company of the Bank of Scotland v A Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 52, [2001] 1 All ER (Comm) 1023, [2001] 1 WLR 751.

Applications

The claimant, Amalgamated Metal Trading Ltd (AMT), issued on 31 May 2002 a claim form seeking a declaration that a sum of money received from companies connected to, inter alia, RBG Resources plc (RBG), was not the proceeds of criminal conduct, and also issued an application notice seeking an interim declaration to that effect. The first defendant was the City of London Police Financial Investigation Unit (FIU). The interim application was rejected by Ouseley J on 7 June 2002, who permitted the joinder of the second defendant, Wavesmetco LLC, and service on it out of the jurisdiction. On being joined, Wavesmetco issued an application for the FIU to provide full particulars of its suspicion or belief that the sum held by AMT was the proceeds of crime, and for an order that the money be paid into court. On 18 September 2002, Andrew Smith J stayed the proceedings against the FIU and ordered the joinder of the third defendant, the Serious Fraud Office (SFO), on the SFO taking over the criminal investigation from the FIU. The instant hearing was a restored hearing for directions, to which was added the application of the SFO for the proceedings against it to be stayed. Wavesmetco also applied to introduce a counterclaim seeking payment of the money by AMT. The liquidators of RBG attended by counsel as a courtesy to the court. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Paul Downes (instructed by Wragge & Co) for AMT.
Richard Bendall (instructed by the Corporation of London) for the FIU.
Sudhanshu Swaroop (instructed by Morgan Walker) for Wavesmetco.
James Eadie (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the SFO.
Clive Jones (instructed by Lovells) for the liquidators of RBG.

Cur adv vult

3 April 2003. The following judgment was delivered.

TOMLINSON J.

[1] The applications before the court have once again highlighted some of the practical problems faced by financial institutions in the light of the provisions dealing with money laundering and other offences introduced into Pt VI of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 by the Criminal Justice Act 1993 and the Proceeds of Crime Act 1995.

[2] The claimant, to which I will refer as 'AMT', is a ring dealing member of the London Metal Exchange. From about 1997 AMT provided metal trading services to the second defendant, a Dubai company to which I will refer as Wavesmetco.

[3] Evidence before the court suggests that Wavesmetco is wholly beneficially owned and controlled by Mr Ravindra Rastogi. He himself so told Mr Latcham, AMT's managing director, trading, in the course of a telephone discussion on 28 March 2002. The notes to the accounts of Wavesmetco for the year ended 31 December 2001 prepared by independent auditors AGN MAK record that 'the management and control of the company is vested with (sic) Mr Ravindra Rastogi'. The same notes show that the share capital of Wavesmetco is owned as to 51% by an United Arab Emirates (UAE) national, Mr Abdul Rahman Ahmed Mohammed Hassan, and as to 49% by Mr Ravindra Rastogi. However, yet further evidence before the court demonstrates that it is a requirement of the law of the United Arab Emirates that a majority of the shares in any limited liability company should be held by a citizen of the UAE, and that it is likely that Mr Hassan is merely a nominee with no direct interest in the management of the company or in its profits.

[4] AMT has had concerns about the integrity of its customer Wavesmetco since at least April 2000. In particular amongst other matters there was concern about receipt of large sums of money from companies connected to Allied Deals Pty Ltd and RBG Resources plc to which I will refer hereafter simply as 'Allied Deals' and 'RBG'. Allied Deals and RBG are groups of companies in which members of the Rastogi family have or had substantial interests. In particular Mr Virendra Rastogi, brother of Ravindra, was chief executive officer of RBG, now in liquidation. A yet further brother, Narendra, was involved in Allied Deals. Both Virendra and Narendra Rastogi have as I understand it been arrested in the United States on suspicion of defrauding financial institutions. Ravindra Rastogi has been charged in India with offences involving substantial duty fraud against the Indian government. One of the earliest concerns of AMT concerned large margin calls being funded by Wavesmetco with money which had possibly been taken out of India.

[5] The Allied Deals and RBG groups have collapsed with massive losses. Particulars of claim served by the liquidators of RBG in an action brought against the former directors of that company, including Virendra Rastogi, allege that that came about as a result of a massive fraud. In brief summary, the fraud involved a worldwide network of bogus trading counterparties used to create bogus trades for the purpose of extracting funds from financiers. One of the counterparties identified by the liquidators is Wavesmetco. The benefit of the bogus deals, the receivables, was or were sold to the financiers in return for cash which was then misappropriated. Some $US 440m of receivables were sold/assigned in this way, of which, on the liquidators' initial assessment, only $US 40m related to genuine trades.

[6] So far as AMT were concerned, matters came to a head when PriceWaterhouse resigned as auditors of RBG in February 2002 and that fact was published to the London Metal Exchange in March of that year. That triggered questions to Wavesmetco from AMT about its current relationship with RBG and associated companies. AMT was not convinced as to the accuracy of the answer received. It may be that AMT would have been well advised to couch the question in terms not just of current but also past dealings with RBG. However that may be, the provisional liquidators' investigations show that there has been very substantial trading or purported trading between RBG and Wavesmetco and in particular that between April 1999 and September 2000 RBG paid $US 42m to Wavesmetco. Documents unearthed by the liquidators evidence a mixing of funds from RBG to and between various counterparties, including Wavesmetco, which counterparties it is alleged were all involved in perpetrating or assisting in the fraud in respect of which the above-mentioned proceedings have been brought. It is the view of the liquidators that the trading funds or working capital of Wavesmetco are likely to be or to have been funds which can be traced back to RBG and the frauds alleged.

[7] AMT having raised their suspicions with Wavesmetco, it was agreed between them that all remaining positions should be closed out. That was done on or about 17 May 2002 resulting in a credit balance in AMT's books in favour of Wavesmetco in the sum of approximately $US 450,000. The concerns of AMT were such that they sought the consent of the first defendant, the City of London Police Financial Investigation Unit, to whom I shall refer hereafter as the 'FIU', to their paying out this balance to Wavesmetco.

[8] Without specifically mentioning it, AMT was seeking consent pursuant to s 93A(3)(b)(i) of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 as amended. Section 93A provides:

'93A.—(1) Subject to subsection (3) below, if a person enters into or is otherwise concerned in an arrangement whereby—(a) the retention or control by or on behalf of another ("A") of A's proceeds of criminal conduct is facilitated (whether by concealment, removal from the jurisdiction, transfer to nominees or otherwise); or (b) A's proceeds of criminal conduct—(i) are used to secure that funds are placed at A's disposal; or (ii) are used for A's benefit to acquire property by way of investment, knowing or suspecting that A is a person who is or has been engaged in criminal conduct or has benefited from criminal conduct, he is guilty of an offence.

(2) In this section, references to any person's proceeds of criminal conduct include a reference to any property which in whole or in part directly or indirectly represented in his hands his proceeds of criminal conduct.

(3) Where a person discloses to a constable a suspicion or belief that any funds or investments are derived from or used in connection with criminal conduct or discloses to a constable any matter on which such a suspicion or belief is based—(a) the disclosure shall not be treated as a breach of any restriction upon the disclosure of information imposed by statute or otherwise; and (b) if he does any act in contravention of subsection (1) above and the disclosure relates to the arrangement concerned, he does not commit an offence under this section if—(i) the disclosure is made before he does the act concerned and the act is done with the consent of the constable; or (ii) the disclosure is made after he does the act, but is made on his initiative and as soon as it is reasonable for him to make it.

(4) In proceedings against a person for an offence under this section, it is a defence to prove—(a) that he did not know or suspect that the arrangement related to any person's proceeds of criminal conduct; or (b) that he did not know or suspect that by the arrangement the retention or control by or on behalf of A of any property was facilitated or, as the case may be, that by the arrangement any property was used, as mentioned in subsection (1) above; or (c) that—(i) he intended to disclose to a constable such a suspicion, belief or matter as is mentioned in subsection (3) above in relation to the arrangement, but (ii) there is reasonable excuse for his failure to make disclosure in accordance with subsection (3) (b) above.

(5) In the case of a person who was in employment at the relevant time, subsections (3) and (4) above shall have effect in relation to disclosures, and intended disclosures, to the appropriate person in accordance with the procedure established by his employer for the making of such disclosures as they have effect in relation to disclosures, and intended disclosures, to a constable.

(6) A person guilty of an offence under this section shall be liable—(a) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or to both; or (b) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding fourteen years or a fine or to both.

(7) In this Part of this Act "criminal conduct" means conduct which constitutes an offence to which this Part of this Act applies or would constitute such an offence if it had occurred in England and Wales or (as the case may be) Scotland.'

I need not set out any further part of this group of sections. In particular I should emphasise that I am not, for obvious reasons, on the facts of this case, concerned with the 'tipping-off' provisions in s 93D of the 1988 Act as the FIU itself pointed out when responding to AMT declining to give its consent to the payment. The FIU said it had reasonable cause to believe that Wavesmetco had been involved in fraudulent actions with the RBG and Allied Deals companies.

[9] The criminal investigation into the affairs of RBG is wide-ranging, extensive, and in its early stages. The Serious Fraud Office, to which I will refer hereafter as the 'SFO', is working closely with the prosecuting authorities in the United States and with the provisional liquidators of RBG as well as with other investigating and prosecuting authorities elsewhere. The nature of that exercise, and the reasons why the SFO is concerned not to be required to take part in these proceedings, are set out in the following passages from a witness statement of Claire Louise Shaw, a case controller at the SFO:

'6. The SFO is working closely with the prosecuting authorities in the United States of America and with the Provisional Liquidators of RBG, namely Malcolm Shierson and Kevin Mawer of Grant Thornton, as well as other investigating and prosecuting authorities elsewhere. The investigation will entail further substantial and extensive co-operation with overseas investigating and other authorities around the world. In order for such co-operation to exist, and in order for the SFO to obtain intelligence which can legally be used in the course of the investigation and which will result in admissible evidence at any subsequent trial, complex diplomatic protocols and procedures have to be followed.

7. Some of the enquires are on a police to police basis and are intelligence led. Other assistance, requiring specific intervention by the appropriate judicial authority in the jurisdiction concerned is governed by a number of possible means. The model followed for co-operation between EU member states can be found in the European Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters, 1959. Other mutual assistance is provided under the terms of the Criminal Justice (International Co-operation) Act 1990. Other assistance, usually with remoter jurisdictions, is often obtained by careful negotiation and diplomacy based on equal benefit to both authorities.

8. Whichever route is pursued, it is a common factor that, as part of that co-operation, the Serious Fraud Office gives undertakings to those authorities that information divulged to the SFO will not be used for any purpose other than a criminal investigation and trial. There are therefore policy considerations to consider—if other jurisdictions thought that information obtained from them was being used for a purpose other than that for which it was provided, there is a real risk those authorities would be likely to be less forthcoming on future occasions.

9. The SFO is very concerned not to do anything which would risk jeopardising actual or potential lines of enquiry. It is extremely difficult, and in some cases impossible, to be sure about whether disclosure of a particular matter would or might risk doing so. That is particularly so when the investigation is in its early stages. The disclosure of operational information to the Court in any hearing at which the Second Defendant is present or represented would potentially be extremely damaging and prejudicial to the SFO's investigation, and indeed to investigations which are proceeding in other jurisdictions. As the Second Defendant is a company owned in no small part by one of the brothers of the main suspect in SFO's enquiry, Virendra Rastogi, it is clear that there is a real risk of operational material finding its way to him.

10. The SFO is concerned to complete its inquiry without delay. If the SFO were to be required to take part in these proceedings valuable time and resources would inevitably be taken up to the detriment of the efficient and effective progress of the criminal investigation. Each piece of material would need to be sifted and considered to see whether it was relevant, whether it could properly be disclosed and if so on what basis.'

I should also record that Claire Louise Shaw makes the point that the SFO makes no claim to the funds or debt the subject of the action and that it could not at this stage seek to restrain them. She continues, 'The SFO makes no positive case at this stage as to whether the obvious suspicion dealt with in DS Reeman's statement is or is not fact'. Detective Sgt Reeman is the officer from the FIU from whose witness statement I have taken most of the information which I have summarised above as to the source of the liquidators' suspicions regarding RBG and Wavesmetco. Detective Sgt Reeman has in turn relied heavily upon the information supplied to him by the liquidators.

[10] On 31 May 2002 AMT launched this action by issuing a claim form which at that stage named only the FIU as the sole defendant to the action. The relief claimed in the action was 'a declaration that the sum of $US 453,110·20 held by the claimant is not the proceeds of criminal conduct.' I read that as an invitation to the court finally to determine, at trial, as between the parties to the action, that the credit balance is not the proceeds of criminal conduct. However, on the same day AMT issued an application notice giving notice of their intention to apply, pursuant to CPR 25.2(1)(b), for an 'interim declaration that the sum of $US 453,110·20 held by the claimant is not the proceeds of criminal conduct'. That application was supported by a witness statement from AMT's head of compliance which stated:

'I can confirm that there are no facts within my knowledge that cause me to believe or suspect that the credit balance being held by AMT on behalf of Wavesmetco are the proceeds of crime.'

It is right to point out that that witness statement preceded service by the FIU of the witness statement of Det Sgt Reeman to which I have already referred. Presumably the intended reference in AMT's application notice was to CPR 25.1(1)(b) which provides: 'The court may grant the following interim remedies—an interim declaration.' It used to be the case that 'interim declaratory relief is unknown to English law, and consequently the court has no jurisdiction to grant an interim declaratory order'—see the decision of the Court of Appeal in F v Riverside Mental Health NHS Trust [1994] 2 FCR 577. It remains to be worked out what are the circumstances in which it might be appropriate to resort to this new jurisdiction. For my part I find it difficult to conceive that the court would ever be prepared to grant an 'interim declaration' of the type here sought. Either the relevant sum is the proceeds of crime or it is not. Whilst the question could only be decided as between the parties before the court, and on the basis of such evidence as they chose to place before it, the court would surely only be prepared to pronounce upon the question, if at all, on a final basis, not upon the basis that whatever is the position today may by further or different evidence tomorrow be shown to be different.

[11] The application for an interim declaration came before the vacation judge, Ouseley J, on 7 June 2002. Unsurprisingly, as I think, he rejected it. He pointed out that—

> 'it is not enough in order to persuade a court to exercise its discretionary jurisdiction for AMT to say that it has no evidence to the effect that Wavesmetco has been engaged in criminal conduct and to contend that the suspicions of the police have not yet ripened into firm evidence. The absence of criminality must be proved by positive evidence, rather than by the absence of evidence from Wavesmetco dealing with obvious suspicions being used alone to justify an assertion that criminality has been disproved.'

However, Ouseley J was also concerned that the court should, so far as possible, afford to AMT some degree of pragmatic protection. He pointed out that one possible course of action was simply to dismiss the proceedings and leave Wavesmetco to sue AMT. On balance he concluded that the interests of justice and the affording of protection to AMT were best served and achieved by allowing the proceedings to continue and by permitting Wavesmetco to be joined as a second defendant. Accordingly, although there were strictly speaking no relevant applications before him, he granted permission both for the joinder of Wavesmetco and for service upon it out of the jurisdiction. Finally Ouseley J indicated his own view that the issue was going to have to be tried, by which he meant I think determined at trial rather than on an interlocutory application. He also observed that he for his part would decline to grant the declaration sought without a very clear explanation from directors from Wavesmetco as to the source of their funds, in the absence of which an order for cross-examination of the directors or a stay of the proceedings might be ordered. Plainly, Ouseley J did not envisage that the court would be prepared to exercise its discretionary jurisdiction simply upon the basis of an absence of evidence proving that the money is the proceeds of criminal conduct. With that approach I respectfully agree.

[12] Wavesmetco was duly joined and particulars of claim served. The particulars of claim seek the same declaratory relief as in the claim form together with a declaration that the claimant, ie AMT, is entitled to deduct its reasonable costs and expenses from the credit balance.

[13] Wavesmetco, on being joined, issued an application that the City Police provide full particulars of its suspicion or belief that the $US450,000 was the proceeds of crime, and that the money be paid into court. This was supported by a witness statement from Wavesmetco's solicitor. Since the solicitor's source of knowledge was said to be his conduct of 'this dispute' on Wavesmetco's behalf, rather than information supplied by any natural person, it is not surprising that his witness statement contains argument but little if any evidence, at any rate none that takes matters forward.

[14] On 10 September 2002 Mr Abdul Rahman Ahmed Mohammed Hassan made a witness statement. I have already referred at [3], above, to his likely role and status in relation to Wavesmetco. In his witness statement he says that he is a major shareholder and partner in Wavesmetco. He says that 'the facts and matters which I set out [in] this witness statement are derived from my work at Wavesmetco' although he does not say what that work is. I cannot give any very substantial weight to this evidence but in any event Mr Hassan gives no adequate explanation as to the source of Wavesmetco's working capital used to fund the trading through AMT.

[15] On 18 September 2002 the matter came back before Andrew Smith J on Wavesmetco's application for provision of particulars and payment in. On being told by FIU that the investigation had been taken over by the SFO and at the suggestion of both AMT and FIU he stayed the proceedings against the City Police and ordered the joinder of the SFO in their place. The judge was not told that the SFO had been given no notice of either the hearing or the suggestion that they should be joined. Andrew Smith J also set out a future timetable as follows: (a) AMT was to serve on the SFO and Wavesmetco within 14 days a schedule of sums received by AMT from Wavesmetco; (b) within 28 days of the service of that Schedule Wavesmetco and the SFO were to set out particulars of their cases as to the source of the funds and any facts relied on by the SFO in support of the allegation that the funds were the proceeds of crime, beyond those set out in a letter of 6 June 2002 from Lovells acting for the provisional liquidators of RBG; (c) Lovells were to be informed of the order and told that the SFO had leave to include in their particulars any observations which RBG wished to draw to the attention of the court. Finally, Andrew Smith J directed that the application was to be restored before the Commercial Court for further directions on the first available date after 4 November 2002, if possible to be listed before himself.

[16] AMT provided a schedule setting out receipts from and payments to Wavesmetco.

[17] On 3 November 2002 Mr Hassan made a second witness statement in which he states:

> 'To the best of my knowledge and belief, the sums paid into the accounts by Westmetco (as described above) are NOT the source of criminal conduct. All such sums were remitted out of our trading proceeds which is part of our working capital. To the best of my knowledge our trading proceeds and working capital are entirely legitimate and are not at all the proceeds of criminal conduct. Unless someone puts forward a positive case identifying the alleged crime and the funds said to be generated by that crime, it is difficult for me to be more specific.'

Again, no proper source of knowledge and belief is put forward, nor is any evidence as to the actual source of Wavesmetco's working capital.

[18] On 23 December 2002 the SFO, rather than comply with the order of Andrew Smith J made in their absence, issued an application seeking an order that the proceedings against them be stayed. As Mr Eadie put it on their behalf, in reliance in part upon the witness statement of Claire Shaw, the SFO have carefully considered whether they are in any position to act on the information currently before the court, including in particular the information and material in and exhibited to the statement of Det Sgt Reeman, and the latest information from the liquidator of RBG, represented by Lovells, which was provided on 10 January 2003. They have concluded that they are not. The reference to the further material from the liquidator is to a further report from Mr Mawer, one of the joint liquidators, dated 10 January 2003. That was circulated to all parties in advance of the hearing which took place before me on Thursday 16 January 2003.

[19] The hearing before me was the restored hearing for directions, to which was added the application of the SFO for the proceedings against them to be stayed. However, Mr Eadie for the SFO also suggested that the proper course was in any event that the proceedings, however cast, should be stayed in their entirety pending the outcome of any criminal prosecution or of the civil proceedings brought by the liquidators of RBG. a [20] Mr Downes, for AMT, was neutral on the SFO's application that the proceedings as against them should be stayed and neutral as regards the suggestion that the entire proceedings should be stayed. He submitted that it would be unfair should the court simply dismiss the proceedings as misconceived, as I indicated I was considering, since he suggested that the court had already gone down the road of giving directions which were aimed towards allowing the action to proceed to a final trial. He emphasised, however, that AMT was no longer pursuing its claim for interim declaratory relief. It was also his position that AMT, who had nothing to say on the issue whether the money is the proceeds of crime, would 'welcome a direction that it be permitted to take no further part in the proceedings until after the issue of whether the balance represents the proceeds of crime has been determined'. He also added that 'the Claimant would expect its costs to be paid by the losing party'. b c

[21] Mr Swaroop for Wavesmetco, although he had no application before the court, asked for a final declaration that the moneys do not represent the proceeds of crime. He pointed out that that is an order sought by two of the parties before the court, the claimant and the second defendants. He also suggested that the FIU and/or the SFO should pay Wavesmetco's costs of the action on the ground that they had acted unreasonably. In the alternative he submitted that it would be unsatisfactory to stay the action and he sought leave to serve a defence and counterclaim, a draft of which was placed before the court. d

[22] The suggestion that the FIU should pay the costs of the action caused them also to be represented before me, notwithstanding the action against them stood stayed. e

[23] Finally the liquidators of RBG also attended by counsel as a matter of courtesy to the court in case further assistance might be provided. I am grateful to them for the very considerable assistance which they have given to the court. f

[24] Naturally I understand the dilemma in which AMT, a reputable financial institution, has found itself. It is axiomatic that the court will do everything which it properly can to assist. With the best will in the world, however, I cannot regard as appropriate the course which AMT has adopted, and I do not consider that it has been sanctioned by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Bank of Scotland v A Ltd [2001] EWCA Civ 52, [2001] 1 All ER (Comm) 1023, [2001] 1 WLR 751. That was a case concerned with the tipping-off provisions. The dilemma which the bank there faced, anticipating as it did the proceedings which could be expected if it refused to honour the instructions of its customer, was as to the extent of the information upon which it could properly rely. It is true that Lord Woolf CJ spoke ([2001] 1 All ER (Comm) 1023 at [43]) of cases where there is a dispute as to whether a payment can be made or disclosure made by the bank as being those which could be the subject of an application for interim declaratory relief in the way the court had earlier suggested. But the earlier discussion, at [40], in fact related only to a declaration setting out upon what information it would be proper for the bank to rely. Moreover it was stressed that 'the life of the interim declaration would probably be short since in the majority of cases it would only be necessary to conceal the existence of the investigations for a fairly limited period'. Furthermore Lord Woolf CJ continued: 'The issue as to what information could be disclosed having been resolved, the bank could then decide what course it wished to adopt.' (My emphasis.) Lord Woolf CJ observed (at [43]): 'If proceedings are brought by a customer of the bank, the bank will have to take g h j a a commercial decision as to whether to contest the proceedings or not.' Finally, I note that Lord Woolf CJ said:

> '[46] ... The "tipping-off" legislation which was the source of the problem with which this appeals deals, gave extensive powers to the police. Properly used they were beneficial. Misused they could create unintended consequences. It is of the greatest importance that use of those powers is confined to situations where it is appropriate. Institutions such as banks need to be able to ensure that they are not affected adversely unnecessarily because of the existence of the police's powers. The ability of the court to grant interim advisory declarations achieves this purpose. The fact that the courts now have these powers, must not, however, be regarded as a substitute for financial institutions taking the decisions which should be their commercial responsibility. The court's powers are discretionary and only to be used where there is a real dilemma which requires their intervention.
>
> [47] The use of the court's power to grant interim declarations in proceedings involving the SFO will protect a bank from criminal proceedings but it will not automatically provide protection for the bank against actions by customers or third parties.'

[25] When read as a whole, rather than focusing on individual passages without regard to the context, I do not detect in Lord Woolf CJ's judgment in the Bank of Scotland case any support for the approach which AMT has here adopted. On the contrary, in a case like this where tipping-off was never an issue, it is implicit in what Lord Woolf CJ said that a bank or other financial institution will have to take a commercial decision as to whether to contest proceedings if they are brought.

[26] The essential futility of AMT's proceedings is underscored by the position which it has now adopted. These are proceedings in which AMT seeks declaratory relief, yet it seeks to drop out of the proceedings, unprepared to place before the court material upon the basis of which the court might be able to consider granting the relief claimed. Furthermore AMT no longer seeks interim relief. Once the pursuit of interim relief against the police is out of the picture, it is axiomatic that the proceedings as originally constituted against the police alone can have no further purpose. They can be saved only by joinder of other parties. That does not mean that they were not misconceived when launched.

[27] As to that, it was never in my judgment appropriate for AMT to seek as against the police a declaration that the moneys are not the proceeds of criminal conduct. It was never an issue between those parties whether the moneys were such proceeds, and there was and is no occasion for the creation of a lis between them directed to determination of that point. The only question which the police ('the constable' in the language of the statute) were asked was whether they consented to the payment being made. Had they given their consent, AMT would have a defence under s 93A. The 1988 Act is, however, silent as to the basis upon which consent is to be given or refused. The provision would manifestly be unworkable if the constable could only justify the withholding of consent if he could demonstrate his satisfaction, to whatever might be the appropriate standard, that the funds are in fact derived from or used in connection with criminal conduct. It seems clear from the section as a whole that the existence of a suspicion is sufficient to ground a proper refusal of consent. It is important to note that there has here been no public law challenge to the propriety of the exercise by the constable of his discretion. It would surely be odd if a legitimate withholding of consent which can be justified on grounds of suspicion were to lead to the situation in which the police must defend (and perhaps pay the costs of) proceedings directed towards determination of a question wholly different from that which they were asked, viz the ultimate question whether the funds are in fact derived from or used in criminal conduct. I cannot think that either Parliament or the Court of Appeal envisaged that this would be the procedure to be followed consequent upon a proper withholding of consent. Such a procedure places an undue and inappropriate burden upon the police, effectively requiring them to litigate at public expense what are in truth private disputes between financial institutions and their customers. The arising of such disputes is one of the ordinary commercial risks which any financial institution faces. I also think it most unlikely that the Court of Appeal can have had in mind that the court would in such circumstances grant interim declaratory relief on the ultimate substantive question whether the funds are derived from criminal conduct. Such a question only permits of a final answer, not a temporary answer, and it is only appropriate to answer it as and when it arises, and then as between the parties between whom it arises. Then it is decided, if it is necessary so to do, upon the basis of such evidence as the parties place before the court, and having regard to the incidence of the burden of proof. Finally the granting of declaratory relief on this ultimate question as against the police whether on an interim or a final basis could prejudice future criminal prosecutions.

[28] For all these reasons, therefore, the action against the SFO must in my judgment be stayed. It fulfils no useful or legitimate purpose.

[29] It is plain to me from the transcript of the proceedings before Andrew Smith J that he like me had difficulty in seeing how the court could conduct a trial in order to resolve whether AMT should have the declaration which it seeks, a difficulty which is magnified by the suggestion now made by AMT that they themselves have no desire to be involved in such a trial. As the FIU was able to point out that it was no longer involved in the investigation Andrew Smith J did not have the benefit of submissions of the sort which have been placed before me by Mr Eadie for the SFO. By the time the matter came before Andrew Smith J Wavesmetco was before the court, seeking interlocutory orders, although seeking no relief in the action. Andrew Smith J conducted essentially a holding exercise to discover how precisely the battle lines were drawn before giving further directions. As Mr Downes aptly put it, he ordered the next round of pleadings.

[30] The situation is now, however, transformed by Wavesmetco's application to introduce a counterclaim seeking payment of the money by AMT. If I grant permission for that counterclaim to be introduced then at last issue will be joined between the two parties in contention. As matters stand AMT is simply seeking declaratory relief against Wavesmetco which Wavesmetco has no interest in opposing. Indeed, for obvious reasons it supports the granting of such relief. Mr Downes did not resist the application to introduce the counterclaim, although he would wish to address me further on the steps which AMT may wish to take before serving a defence to counterclaim. Accordingly I grant permission to Wavesmetco to serve a defence and counterclaim substantially in the form of a draft which was placed before the court. It seems to me that that in fact renders wholly redundant AMT's claim and indeed its particulars of claim save in so far as they contain an admitted recital of events. If asked to do so, I would consider permitting AMT to withdraw its claim entirely, directing that henceforth Wavesmetco shall be the claimant in this action and AMT the sole defendant. If there is any procedural advantage in being defendant rather than claimant, it should be enjoyed by AMT rather than by Wavesmetco. The natural order should be restored.

[31] I should indicate, in so far as it is not already apparent, that I reject as wholly inappropriate Wavesmetco's suggestion that I should now make a final declaration to the effect that the moneys are not the proceeds of criminal conduct. For the reasons I have already given that is an order of a type which the court could only consider making after trial of the issue. Furthermore Wavesmetco has done nothing whatever to rebut the inferences which can be drawn from the material placed before the court by the liquidators. If anything, its conspicuous failure to grapple with the issues has made the inferences more compelling. In any event the issue now is not whether there should be made a declaration that the moneys are not the proceeds of criminal conduct but rather whether Wavesmetco has an enforceable claim to payment by AMT. In that regard I would merely remind Wavesmetco of Lord Woolf CJ's observations in the Bank of Scotland case. He there observed ([2001] 1 All ER (Comm) 1023 at [41]):

> 'The commencement of proceedings [against the bank] would no doubt be closely followed by an application for summary judgment under Pt 24.2. Under Pt 24.2, the court will only give judgment to a claimant if the bank has no real prospect of successfully defending the claim or issue and there is no other compelling reason why the case or issue should be disposed of at a trial. Where the circumstances are as suspicious as they were in this case they could well provide very good reason for the court not being prepared to grant summary judgment.' (My emphasis.)

[32] As I have indicated above I am not unsympathetic to the dilemma in which AMT finds itself. I recognise that financial institutions do not wish to have judgments entered against them. There are also increasing regulatory constraints upon their action. However, there will be circumstances, as envisaged by the Court of Appeal in the Bank of Scotland case, in which the court simply cannot assist, and the bank will have to take a commercial decision whether to contest proceedings or not. It is to my mind inconceivable that there could be criminal proceedings brought under s 93A against a bank or other financial institution which has taken such steps as are reasonable in all the circumstances to resist proceedings but has nonetheless been ordered by the court to pay over money which subsequently is proved to be the proceeds of criminal conduct. Consultation and liaison with the police is obviously always prudent. Every case will depend upon its own facts, but I cannot think that the court will require financial institutions to run defences which in the view of their responsible legal advisers are unsustainable on the basis of the evidence reasonably available to them.

[33] In the course of the argument I was told by Mr Downes that in two cases, both heard in private, Commercial Court judges had made 'show cause' orders against the police which had ultimately resulted in payment being made to the customer. The first of those two cases undoubtedly involved a 'tipping-off' issue—as Mr Downes pointed out a refusal to comply with a customer's instruction may itself tip off the customer as to the existence of an investigation. I was myself the judge in the second case. I suspect that it too involved a tipping-off problem, which is no doubt why it was held in private. Cases such as these raise considerations different from those which obtain in this case.

[34] Nothing I have said in this judgment bears on the circumstances which will obtain where the 'tipping-off' provisions are potentially engaged, in which cases banks and other financial institutions must of course pay careful regard to the guidance given by the Court of Appeal in the Bank of Scotland case. a

[35] In so far as there may have been discussion, in these cases heard in private, as to the extent to which the court might be able to grant interim declaratory relief either to the effect that a bank has insufficient grounds for suspicion that money may be the proceeds of crime or more positively to the effect that money is not the proceeds of crime, I am satisfied, in the light of the full contested argument which I have now heard, that in a case such as the present it would be inappropriate to grant such relief. b

Order accordingly. c

James Wilson Barrister (NZ).

R (on the application of Khan) v Secretary of State for Health

[2003] EWCA Civ 1129

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
BROOKE, WALLER AND CLARKE LJJ
11, 12 SEPTEMBER, 10 OCTOBER 2003

Human rights – Right to life – State's obligation to investigate death in circumstances where state arguably in breach of substantive obligation under convention right to life – Whether state's investigatory obligation requiring public inquiry with participation of deceased's family – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 2.

Human rights – Right to life – NHS hospital trust admitting liability for death of child in hospital before coming into force of human rights legislation – Availability of relief for breach of convention right in national courts – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 2.

The claimant's daughter, who was aged three, died from a heart attack while undergoing haemodialyis in hospital in 1999. A police investigation took place during which the police asked the hospital trust not to communicate with the claimant's family. An expert report prepared during the police investigation indicated that the nursing sister on duty and the trust as a whole had been grossly negligent. The trust also carried out its own investigation but did not pass any information on to the child's family. In 2001 the Crown Prosecution Service told the claimant that no criminal proceedings would be taken arising out of his daughter's death. The claimant instructed a solicitor who requested funding from the trust and the NHS Litigation Authority for the claimant to be legally represented at the inquest as he was by that time suffering from a psychiatric illness, in consequence of his daughter's death, and would be unable to participate effectively himself. The authority replied that it could not assist towards the costs of an inquest but made a full and complete admission of liability. The inquest opened and adjourned in February 2002. The solicitor wrote to the defendant requesting funding for legal representation for the claimant at the inquest when it resumed, or that there be a separate public non-statutory inquiry. In July 2002, the defendant replied that he had no power to provide funding and that he was not prepared to hold a separate inquiry. The claimant applied for judicial review. The judge considered the defendant's procedural duties under art 2[a] of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) to investigate deaths where arguably there had been a breach of the right to life contained in art 2. He held that, despite the fact that the claimant and his wife had taken no part in either investigation, the combination of the police investigation and the inquiries undertaken by the trust had been sufficient to comply with the state's procedural obligations under art 2, coupled as they were by an admission of liability by the trust. He further ruled that as the claimant's daughter had died before the 1998 Act came into force, the state did not have any art 2 obligations that were a Article 2 provides, so far as material: 'Everyone's right to life shall be protected by law ...'

enforceable by the claimant as a matter of national law. The claimant appealed. The Court of Appeal addressed, inter alia, the questions: (i) what was the state's art 2 obligation in the instant case; (ii) had that obligation already been performed; (iii) if not, could the holding of the inquest satisfy that obligation if the claimant could not play an effective part in it himself; (iv) if not, did the 1998 Act apply, allowing the claimant to obtain relief in a national court?

Held – (1) Where the agents of a state bore potential responsibility for the loss of a human life, the state's obligation under art 2 of the convention was to provide a procedural mechanism whereby the cause of death could be investigated and responsibility for the death ascertained, through an investigation held in public which had to be both judicial and effective. The families of the deceased should be involved in the procedure to the extent that was necessary to safeguard their interests. A flexible approach to what was required by way of an investigation was needed, which was responsive to the dictates of the facts. But a coroner's inquest would furnish the natural occasion for the effective judicial inquiry into the cause of a death which art 2 of the convention required. In the instant case the state's art 2 obligation had not yet been performed. The holding of the inquest would not satisfy that obligation, as the claimant was in no fit state to take part in it himself, unless the claimant had legal representation (see [62], [63], [67], [69]–[72], [74], [75], below); R (on the application of Amin) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, R (on the application of Middleton) v West Yorkshire Coroner [2002] 4 All ER 336 applied; Powell v UK App No 45305/99 (4 May 2000, unreported), Sieminska v Poland App No 37602/97 (29 March 2001, unreported), Calvelli v Italy [2002] ECHR 32967/96, Edwards v UK (2002) 12 BHRC 190 considered.

(2) The claimant was entitled to relief in a national court under the 1998 Act. The claimant's daughter's right to life was at the centre of the instant case. Her parents acted as her proxy in requiring effective investigation by the state to take place and her death in 1999 did not provide any effective bar to the relief which had first been sought in 2002, after the coming into force of the 1998 Act. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [84]–[86], below).

Notes

For the right to life, see 8(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 123.

For the Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 2, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 553.

Cases referred to in judgment

Calvelli v Italy [2002] ECHR 32967/96, ECt HR.
Crédit Suisse v Waltham Forest London BC [1996] 4 All ER 176, [1997] QB 362, [1996] 3 WLR 943, CA.
Edwards v UK (2002) 12 BHRC 190, ECt HR.
Gül v Turkey [2000] ECHR 22676/93, ECt HR.
Güleç v Turkey (1999) 28 EHRR 121, [1998] ECHR 21593/93, ECt HR.
Jordan v UK (2001) 11 BHRC 1, ECt HR.
Mastromatteo v Italy [2002] ECHR 37703/97, ECt HR.
Ögur v Turkey (2000) 31 EHRR 912, [1999] ECHR 21594/93, ECt HR.
Oneryildiz v Turkey App No 48939/99 (18 June 2002, unreported), ECt HR.
Osman v UK (1998) 5 BHRC 293, ECt HR.
Powell v UK App No 45305/99 (4 May 2000, unreported), ECt HR.

R (on the application of Amin) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, R (on the application of Middleton) v West Yorkshire Coroner [2002] EWCA Civ 390, [2002] 4 All ER 336, [2003] QB 581, [2002] 3 WLR 505.

R (on the application of Green) v Police Complaints Authority [2002] EWCA Civ 389, [2002] All ER (D) 397 (Mar).

R (on the application of Hurst) v HM Coroner for the Northern District of London [2003] EWHC 1721 (Admin), [2003] All ER (D) 80 (Jul), DC.

R (Wagstaff) v Secretary of State for Health, R (Associated Newspapers Ltd) v Secretary of State for Health [2001] 1 WLR 292, DC.

Sacker v West Yorkshire Coroner [2003] EWCA Civ 217, [2003] 2 All ER 278.

Sieminska v Poland App No 37602/97 (29 March 2001, unreported), ECt HR.

Appeal

The claimant, Mohammed Farooq Khan, appealed from the decision of Silber J on 17 June 2003 ([2003] EWHC 1414 (Admin), [2003] All ER (D) 220 (Jun) dismissing his application (i) for judicial review of the decision of the defendant, the Secretary of State for Health, to refuse to fund legal representation for the claimant at the inquest into the death of his infant daughter, Naazish Farooq Khan; or (ii) in the alternative, for an independent non-statutory public inquiry into her death. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Philip Havers QC (instructed by Freeth Cartwright, Nottingham) for Mr Khan.

Nigel Giffin QC (instructed by the Solicitor for the Department of Health) for the Secretary of State.

Cur adv vult

10 October 2003. The following judgment of the court was delivered.

INDEX

| PART NO | | | PARA NO |
|---|---|---|---|
| | (1) | INTRODUCTORY: THE FACTS | [1] |
| | (2) | THE POLICE INVESTIGATIONS | [10] |
| | (3) | MR BALEN'S ACTIVITIES | [15] |
| | (4) | THE TRUST'S INVESTIGATIONS | [26] |
| | (5) | THE JUDICIAL REVIEW PROCEEDINGS: THE RESPONDENTS' EVIDENCE | [29] |
| | (6) | THE IMPORTANCE OF INVOLVING THE DECEASED'S FAMILY | [40] |
| | (7) | THE JUDGMENT IN THE COURT BELOW AND THE ISSUES ON THE APPEAL | [45] |
| | (8) | QUESTION (1): WHAT IS THE CONTENT OF THE STATE'S ART 2 OBLIGATION IN THE PRESENT CASE? | [47] |
| | (9) | QUESTION (2): HAS THE STATE'S ART 2 OBLIGATION IN THIS CASE ALREADY BEEN PERFORMED? | [68] |

(10) QUESTION (3): IF THE STATE HAS NOT YET FULFILLED ITS ART 2 OBLIGATION, CAN THE HOLDING OF THE INQUEST SATISFY THAT OBLIGATION IF MR KHAN CANNOT PLAY AN EFFECTIVE PART IN IT HIMSELF? [73]

(11) QUESTION (4): IF THE ANSWER TO QUESTION (3) IS NO, DOES THE 1998 ACT APPLY, SO THAT MR KHAN MAY OBTAIN RELIEF IN A NATIONAL COURT? [78]

(12) QUESTION 5: WHATEVER THE ANSWER TO THE FIRST FOUR QUESTIONS, DOES THE SECRETARY OF STATE HAVE POWER TO MAKE THE NECESSARY FUNDING AVAILABLE? [87]

BROOKE LJ.

(1) INTRODUCTORY: THE FACTS

[1] This is a sad and disturbing case.

[2] The applicant Mohammed Farooq Khan came to England from Pakistan when he was a child. He graduated at Bradford University, and in September 1999 he had a good job as new products controller at a firm in Leeds which specialised in making video transmission products. He was intelligent, articulate in both Urdu and English, and was heading for a senior management post in the firm.

[3] He and his wife Safia had six children, and the only real cloud in their married life had been the death of one of their daughters at St James's Hospital, Leeds in 1994. They were very concerned about the quality of the treatment their daughter had received there before she died.

[4] In the summer of 1999 their fifth daughter Naazish Farooq Khan, aged three, began to complain of earache and a discharge from her ear. Her condition failed to respond to treatment and she was eventually admitted to St Luke's Hospital, Bradford on 20 September 1999. It was discovered that her lymph nodes and her spleen had become enlarged. By 24 September 1999, her condition had deteriorated and she was suffering from some respiratory difficulties. She was transferred to St James's Hospital, Leeds. A biopsy was carried out, and she was transferred to the intensive care unit. A provisional diagnosis of B cell lymphoma was in due course confirmed. She began a course of chemotherapy on 5 October 1999.

[5] In anticipation of the need for chemotherapy, and in order to guard against any damage to her kidneys in the course of that treatment, haemodialysis had started on 25 September 1999. This treatment included the administration of potassium in such quantities as were required to maintain the appropriate potassium level. Potassium chloride was infused through the dialysis machine by means of a mixture of fluids run in from a bag of fluids. Every time the infusion bag was changed, a blood analysis should have been carried out in order to obtain, among other things, an accurate reading of the potassium level. If the level was too low, more potassium was added to the next bag. If it was too high, less potassium was added. The prescription for potassium was attached to her bed, and it stated the specific quantity of potassium that had to be given for each level on the blood analysis reading.

[6] Because potassium is a heavy solution, the bag containing the potassium and the diluent had to be shaken vigorously in order to mix it properly.

Otherwise the potassium would lie at the bottom of the bag where the line entered the bag, and the patient would receive a bolus dose of potassium. This was to be avoided at all costs because an excessive infusion of potassium can cause heart problems, heart attacks, and eventually death.

[7] Shortly after Naazish's chemotherapy treatment began, in the early hours of 8 October 1999, something went catastrophically wrong with the administration of potassium. A blood gas analysis carried out at 00.17 hrs that morning appears to have showed an appropriate level of potassium in the blood. At about 02.30 hrs a fresh bag was put up containing what was apparently a grossly excessive amount of potassium. A police report suggests that one of the reasons why this happened was because no blood gas test was carried out before the bag was made up, the nurse failed to mix the bag properly when she added potassium to it, and her actions were then not checked by another nurse, as they should have been. An independent medical expert was later to castigate this series of omissions as having been grossly negligent (see [13], below).

[8] Naazish suffered a heart attack about an hour-and-a-half later. Attempts were then made to revive her, and during the course of these efforts a blood gas reading was taken. This disclosed an alarmingly high potassium reading of 18·9. This can be compared with a normal therapeutic level of 3·5–5. A level of 9–10 would be high enough to cause death. Twenty minutes later, a second blood gas test disclosed a potassium level of 13·4. Although this represented a significant reduction, it was still far too high a level, and Naazish died soon after that second test was taken. A doctor at the hospital discussed the situation with her parents at some length, but it is said that he regarded the very high potassium levels as an artefact and made no reference to them at all.

[9] Nor did anybody at the hospital say anything to the coroner's officer about these potassium levels. The cause of death was certified by the hospital staff as 'cardio-respiratory attack and B Cell Lymphoma', and Naazish's body was released for burial. She was buried within 24 hours of her death in accordance with Muslim law. Although he has read the evidence collected in the investigations that have so far taken place, Mr Khan's solicitor is of the view that the circumstances surrounding the defective notification of death in this case 'cry out' for exhaustive inquiry, if for no other reason than to overturn the perception that there was a medically-orchestrated cover-up of the cause of Naazish's death, which led to all the distressing consequences we now describe.

(2) THE POLICE INVESTIGATIONS

[10] On the following Monday the police started to investigate Naazish's death, and at an early stage of their investigations they applied to the coroner for her body to be exhumed. The very idea that his daughter's body should be dug up caused the greatest possible distress to her father. He believed passionately that nobody should tamper with his daughter's body after it had been buried. He made desperate, but unsuccessful, attempts to contact the coroner between 8 pm on 2 November 1999, when he was told of the proposed exhumation, and 4 am the following morning when the exhumation was carried out. He was later to tell a psychiatrist that he went through absolute hell from that day until his daughter's body was released for reburial a year later. He became deeply depressed and was off work for a year. He then returned to a much more junior post with his old firm. This was all he was able to manage.

[11] After the exhumation, a post-mortem was carried out. The pathologist, Dr Milroy, concluded:

> 'Taking the findings of a high potassium at collapse, combined with the post-mortem findings and the experiments performed on 25 November 1999, described by Professor Forrest, in my opinion death is consistent with potassium poisoning.'

[12] The police inquiries were extensive. Their aim was to consider if any criminal charge could be brought in respect of any of the acts and omissions that led to Naazish's death. A case might have been established to the effect that one or more of the members of the hospital staff responsible for Naazish's care had been guilty of manslaughter by gross negligence. The police asked the hospital trust (the trust) not to contact Naazish's family or to conduct any investigations of their own while the police investigation was under way. They wished any communication with the family to be channelled through them, and not through the trust. Mr Khan was not in the event involved in the police investigations in any way.

[13] In due course they prepared a detailed report on the results of their investigation. This report extended to 84 pages, and its substantial exhibits included witness statements, copies of medical notes and medical reports. One of those reports had been prepared for them by Dr Mark Bradbury, a consultant paediatrician and paediatric nephrologist at the Manchester Children's Hospital. Dr Bradbury was of the opinion that the most likely cause of Naazish's death was an excessive infusion of potassium from the dialysis solution. He considered that both the sister on duty and the trust as a whole had been grossly negligent.

[14] It appears that there were a number of possible reasons for the cardiac arrest which preceded Naazish's death. These included tumourlysis (caused by her cancerous tumour), respiratory failure, haemolysis, an incorrect dosage of potassium chloride, the potassium chloride being not mixed properly with the haemofiltration fluid, the potassium levels in her blood not being adequately monitored, and faults in the haemofiltration equipment itself. As a result the view has been taken both by the prosecuting authorities and by the NHS authorities that it may not be possible to determine the precise cause of her death with any certainty. The reason for this is said not to stem from the fact that not enough steps have been taken to determine the cause of death, but because in all the circumstances, and particularly because of the lack of blood measurements during the evening before her death and the very nature of her serious illness, it is now very difficult to find the evidence to prove what precisely happened.

(3) MR BALEN'S ACTIVITIES

[15] In May 2001 the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) told Mr Khan that no criminal proceedings would be taken arising out of his daughter's death. Mr Khan's brother then approached Mr Balen, a partner in the solicitors' firm Freeth Cartwright, who has thereafter acted for Mr Khan. No praise can be high enough for the efforts Mr Balen has made on his client's behalf.

[16] At a very early date Mr Khan and Mr Balen met a senior police officer, now retired, who had taken part in the police investigations and who expressed surprise at their eventual outcome. Mr Balen then contacted the coroner, who gave him a copy of the post-mortem report, and said he would contact him again once his own inquiries were complete.

[17] Mr Balen and his client next had a meeting with the branch Crown prosecutor from the CPS's casework directorate. He explained to them in some detail why there was insufficient evidence to prosecute anybody for the events leading to Naazish's death. They were given the opportunity to ask questions about the matters that had emerged from the police investigation, but Mr Balen did not at that time ask any questions about Naazish's treatment or about the police investigation into it. During the next three months he was engaged in obtaining all the relevant hospital notes and records.

[18] By November of that year he had completed his study of this material, and he then inquired of the trust whether it would admit liability and causation. He received no reply. On 3 December the coroner told him that his inquiries were now complete, and that the inquest would be held in just under three months' time. The coroner enclosed with his letter a list of witnesses and copies of the statements he had obtained. On 10 December Mr Balen told the trust that it would be clearly right for his client to be legally represented at the inquest. He asked whether the trust itself or the Department of Health would provide an indemnity for his legal costs. He received no reply. Three chasing letters similarly went unanswered.

[19] On 13 February he repeated his request to the chief executive of the NHS Litigation Authority. His client had told him that his means were marginally over the financial limit for publicly-funded legal representation at an inquest, and Mr Balen feared that the cost of representation could easily swallow up the sum of £7,500, which was then the value attributed to a claim for the loss of a child's life.

[20] The response to this approach, in contrast to the non-response of the trust, was both immediate and sympathetic, but he was told that the authority could not assist towards the costs at an inquest. Before the inquest took place he received from the same source a full and complete admission of liability for Naazish's death.

[21] On 22 February the trust at long last broke cover. Its solicitors told Mr Balen that the best deal their clients could offer was that they would not be legally represented at the inquest if Mr Khan was not. Mr Balen turned this offer down, since if it were accepted it would mean that no proper inquiry would be held at all.

[22] The inquest opened on 25 February 2002. The coroner at first refused to adjourn the inquest to enable Mr Balen to continue his quest for funding. He was then told that the doctors and nurses insisted on legal representation, and in those circumstances he acceded to Mr Khan's personal request for an adjournment. Mr Khan had told him that this was the second of his children to die in questionable circumstances at this hospital. All the family wished to know were the facts. They had not wanted the exhumation or the post-mortem. After further adjournments, the inquest has now been fixed to start in November of this year.

[23] This breathing space allowed Mr Balen to pursue his quest for funding. Pro bono help was not available because of the length and complexity of the inquest, and on 26 March 2002 he wrote to the Secretary of State for Health himself. He asked for funding, alternatively for a separate public non-statutory inquiry. He said:

'To expect our clients to pay for the Health Service's admitted actions leading to their daughter's death, to pay to discover what happened, and to pay for lessons to emerge from such a tragedy is, we are sure you will agree, entirely unacceptable. Since their daughter's death, no one from the hospital has been in touch with the family; no legal admission of liability was made until two days before the inquest and then not by the hospital or its lawyers; and no response made to a whole series of letters from ourselves on the family's behalf.'

[24] Two-and-a-half years had now elapsed since Naazish's death. By this time Mr Khan and his wife had withdrawn into themselves. Mrs Khan had effectively become a hermit, and Mr Khan was suffering from what was later diagnosed as a psychiatric illness. He did not open letters, and he allowed county court judgments to be entered against him by default as a consequence. He felt unable to deal with people. The junior post he now held with his firm did not involve this necessity, and his solicitor sometimes experienced difficulty and delay in obtaining instructions. In particular he was quite unable to obtain instructions about his client's precise means.

[25] On 8 July 2002 Mr Balen received the Secretary of State's substantive reply to his letter. He was told that there was no power to provide the funding he sought, and that the Secretary of State was not prepared to hold a separate inquiry. The trust had conducted a number of separate investigations of its own. The Regional Director for Public Health had now been asked to review the adequacy of these investigations, and he would then be willing to meet Mr and Mrs Khan in order to discuss his findings and answer any inquiries they might make. In the event no such meeting was suggested at any time before these proceedings were started against both the Secretary of State and the trust in November 2002.

(4) THE TRUST'S INVESTIGATIONS

[26] The trust had indeed been making its own fairly intensive investigations into the cause of Naazish's death and the way in which such tragedies might be averted in future, but it does not seem to have occurred to anyone to tell her parents what was going on.

[27] All these investigations were undertaken by people who were not directly involved in providing care for Naazish, but they were nevertheless employees of the trust. The trust's head of health and safety examined certain aspects of Naazish's care and treatment in the hospital and made recommendations aimed at reducing the likelihood of a similar incident ever occurring again. The assistant chief nurse made a number of recommendations in relation to the administration of potassium to patients. A consultant in paediatrics, anaesthesia and intensive care produced a report in which he considered the cause of Naazish's death and also made recommendations for changes. Three members of the staff of the department of medical physics and engineering produced their own report which dealt with the equipment in operation when Naazish was being treated.

[28] These reports, together with Dr Bradbury's report, considered wider issues relating to Naazish's treatment. These included the design and maintenance of equipment, the keeping of records, the training and development of staff, the supervision of staff, the development and use of protocols and procedures, medical prescribing practices and the establishment of a critical incident team. They provided a comprehensive account of the care and treatment provided to Naazish when she was receiving treatment at the hospital, and included an analysis of the practices for administering potassium, and of the design and maintenance of equipment.

(5) THE JUDICIAL REVIEW PROCEEDINGS: THE RESPONDENTS' EVIDENCE

[29] From the perspective of the issues raised in this litigation, however, all this activity contained a serious inherent flaw. Nobody had taken any steps at all to tell Naazish's parents what was going on and to involve them in it.

[30] In these proceedings Mr Khan sought an order quashing the defendants' refusal to fund legal representation for Naazish's family at the inquest and a mandatory order requiring them to do so. Alternatively he sought an independent non-statutory public inquiry. In the event, the claims against the trust were not pursued, and the Secretary of State was the only effective respondent at the hearing before Silber J ([2003] EWHC 1414 (Admin), [2003] All ER (D) 220 (Jun)).

[31] The trust's involvement at the outset of these proceedings led to their disclosing to Mr Khan for the first time the reports they had commissioned. They also explained the steps they had taken to try and prevent the recurrence of such a tragedy. Dr Sugden, the trust's associate medical director, said that the clinicians involved with Naazish's care initially had contact with the family, but when the police came on the scene the trust was told that more than one line of communication would be confusing for the family.

[32] Dr Sugden said that by pursuing an admission of liability Mr Khan had put himself outside the scope of the trust's complaint procedures, which included the possibility of independent review. He said he was willing to provide answers to 30 questions posed by Mr Balen in his second witness statement: in the event, the trust has done nothing at all to follow up that offer. Dr Sugden said that he had not realised that the results of the trust's own investigations had not been passed on to the Khan family by the police.

[33] His witness statement contained the following passages:

> 'As a general principle, my approach to providing information to bereaved families is that every effort will always be made to answer questions or concerns but I would not generally send information to a family uninvited, because that information may be distressing, disturbing, or otherwise not appreciated or welcome. Given the knowledge I now have of the family's concerns I can see it might have been possible to communicate more effectively with them, although there were significant impediments. The family themselves did not trigger other opportunities for dialogue. Quite apart from the outcome of the specific investigations into Naazish's death, lessons learned from the communication difficulties referred to above have been taken on board by the trust. The investigations looked at a wide range of issues, actions to improve the delivery of the service were recommended and have been taken or are being worked on. A key result is that if Naazish's death was due to the administration of too much potassium, the protocols now in place very significantly reduce that risk. Further lessons can be learned from the regrettable breakdown in communications with the family, which occurred for a variety of reasons.'

[34] Evidence on behalf of the Secretary of State was furnished by Professor Johnstone, who was appointed to the post of Regional Director of Public Health for Yorkshire and the Humber on 15 July 2002. He did not explain why the meeting foreshadowed in the letter dated 8 July 2002 did not take place until after these proceedings were instituted. On 9 January 2003 he wrote to Mr and Mrs Khan to suggest a meeting, and such a meeting eventually took place in early April 2003, with Mr Balen and representatives of the trust also present.

[35] For his part, Professor Johnstone said that when he was appointed to his present position, he wished to consider a number of matters concerning the investigations into Naazish's death. He wished to find out whether the investigators were truly independent of the clinical team which had been directly involved in providing care to Naazish, how promptly the investigations were conducted, the extent to which there was public scrutiny, whether the next of kin were involved in the investigations, whether the care and treatment provided to Naazish was considered, whether wider systems factors were considered, whether the reports contained clear recommendations, and whether follow-up action was clearly identified and effective arrangements put in place to monitor the implementation of those recommendations.

[36] He thought that a number of lessons had been learnt. Proposals had been made for actions to remedy system deficiencies identified in the various reports. These had been brought together in an action plan prepared by the trust's head of health and safety in January 2001. His view was that the investigations carried out by the trust and the West Yorkshire police, which benefited from independent expertise where appropriate, had provided an effective, thorough and reasonably prompt scrutiny of the care and treatment of Naazish and wider deficiencies within the trust. He doubted whether any further investigations would identify any additional facts.

[37] Professor Johnstone had also considered a report prepared by the trust on 10 December 2002, which set out the progress that had been made on implementing some of the recommendations. He considered that in most respects the trust had taken the necessary action needed to remedy the deficiencies identified. He observed that there were still some areas in which he was dissatisfied with the progress that had been made towards implementing the recommendations.

[38] He said that he was liaising closely with the West Yorkshire Strategic Health Authority to ensure that the remaining outstanding recommendations for change were implemented within appropriate timescales. He added that the dangers associated with intravenous administration of potassium were well recognised. Indeed, the new National Patient Safety Agency had issued its first patient safety alert in July 2002 on this very topic. He said that issues raised as a result of Naazish's death were being considered in the context of the development of both the new Renal Services National Service Framework and the module of the Children's National Service Framework relating to medicine for children.

[39] Mr Balen had prepared a list of queries 'based on a relatively cursory glance through the police statements surrendered to the coroner'. Professor Johnstone considered that only a small number of them related to the care and treatment of Naazish. He said that those relating to entries made in Naazish's medical records, the print-outs of her blood gas levels, and the results of the laboratory tests, and the reporting of her death to the coroner's office were matters which the coroner might wish to consider at the inquest. He expressed the opinion that Mr Balen had not raised any further questions of substance which would necessitate a further NHS investigation. He believes that Mr Balen's other inquiries, which related to the wider context within which Naazish's care had been given, had been answered either in the trust's investigation reports or in clinical good practice now adopted by the trust.

(6) THE IMPORTANCE OF INVOLVING THE DECEASED'S FAMILY

[40] Mr Balen's response to this evidence is epitomised in the following passages of his third and final witness statement:

> 'In my experience, [relatives'] involvement in these tragic cases is beneficial, not only to the relatives, but also to the health care workers concerned. Many relatives have important contributions to make to the improvement of health care through lessons learnt from tragedies. They want to know why the system failed their relative; what actually happened; who were responsible and what disciplinary or retraining steps were taken and what steps have been implemented to prevent such a tragedy happening again. Participation in such processes is of the utmost importance to the relatives. The benefit to the health of the relatives dealing with the reaction to the bereavement and the circumstances of the bereavement is considerable. When the opposite takes place and there is no communication and no involvement, damage to the health of the relatives is often in my experience substantial and that appears to be the position in this case. I note Professor Johnstone's expectation of the main contribution given by a bereaved family in such circumstances. This however is only part of the picture in my experience. Bereaved families may have an enormous contribution to make, not only to an understanding of what went wrong, but how improvements can be implemented. Professionals working in this field—both legal and medical—widely recognise in my experience that families have a real contribution to make in such circumstances. But the importance of their contribution also works the other way. As I have indicated, it is of enormous importance for the family to be involved. It benefits them to understand the processes involved; that lessons have been learnt and that their loved one's life may not have been in vain. To remove participation generally in my experience leads to a breakdown in the trust between relatives and the medical services and frequently ... a breakdown or deterioration in health.'

[41] A little later in his statement, after expressing his own view that it was far too early to say whether the investigations so far carried out had been effective, Mr Balen observed that one of the purposes of holding an inquest or an inquiry was to explore the lessons to be learned on such occasions from such incidents. The Department of Health's paper called Building A Safer NHS for Patients (2001) impliedly accepted the criticism of ad hoc investigations commissioned by trusts and the fact that patients and carers should have a role in the procedures following adverse events. Its paper An Organisation with a Memory (2000) recognised that internal reviews were often not trusted by patients as sufficiently impartial or searching.

[42] Mr Balen's views are supported by the experience of those who have recently conducted public inquiries in circumstances where the families of the deceased had encountered institutional resistance to the idea that an inquiry into the cause of the death or deaths that have caused them such distress should be held in public by an independent arbiter. In Ch 2 of his recent report into events at the Bristol Royal Infirmary (Learning from Bristol: The Report of the Public Inquiry into Children's Heart Surgery at the Bristol Royal Infirmary 1984–1995 (July 2001) (Cm 5207) Professor Sir Ian Kennedy suggested that such an inquiry fulfilled the following four purposes: (1) it restored public confidence because a full, fair and fearless investigation was being carried out into the events that had led to the death or deaths; (2) its object was to identify the lessons to be learned, and then to frame recommendations designed to give effect to those lessons, again for the purpose of restoring public confidence; (3) it should be a means—and Professor Kennedy suggested that this might be as much a duty as a purpose of the inquiry—whereby those affected by the events in question could feel that their concerns had been aired, and that life could move on; (4) it offered an opportunity on a public stage for: (a) those in authority to be held to account; and (b) the public venting of anger, distress and frustration.

[43] Professor Kennedy summed up the position by saying that the process of inquiry could serve at least four functions: learning, discipline, catharsis and reassurance. Everyone who could assist should be enabled to do so. They should be seen as 'participants' in the process of seeking to understand the matters into which inquiry was being made.

(7) THE JUDGMENT IN THE COURT BELOW AND THE ISSUES ON THE APPEAL

[44] It is evident that this process has not really started in the present case, although nearly four years have elapsed since Naazish's death. The question we have to determine is whether Silber J was right to hold that no fuller inquiry is now required by human rights law than that which has already taken place, or whether that law demands something more, and if so, what.

[45] The judge dismissed Mr Khan's application in a careful and thoughtfully reasoned judgment ([2003] All ER (D) 220 (Jun)), to which we would pay tribute. He considered that the state had complied with its adjectival duties under art 2 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). Even if it had not, he did not consider that art 2 obliged the state to fund Mr Khan's legal representation at his daughter's inquest. In any event, since she died before the 1998 Act came into effect, the state did not have any art 2 obligations that were enforceable by Naazish's family as a matter of national law.

[46] It is convenient to address the legal issues on this appeal by asking five questions: (1) What is the content of the state's art 2 obligation in the present case? (2) Has that obligation already been performed? (3) If the state has not yet performed that obligation, can the holding of the inquest satisfy that obligation if Mr Khan cannot play an effective part in it himself? (4) If the answer to question (3) is No, does the 1998 Act apply, so that Mr Khan can obtain relief in a national court? (5) Whatever the answer to the first four questions does the Secretary of State have power to make the necessary funding available?

(8) QUESTION (1): WHAT IS THE CONTENT OF THE STATE'S ART 2 OBLIGATION IN THE PRESENT CASE?

[47] To answer the first question, it is necessary to consider recent case law both in Strasbourg and in this jurisdiction.

[48] We were shown a number of cases decided in recent years by the European Court of Human Rights (the European Court) which cast some light on the issues we have to decide. The first is Powell v UK App No 45305/99 (4 May 2000, unreported). A ten-year-old boy had died from Addison's disease. No inquest took place, because the coroner decided that the boy had died of natural causes. By the time the case reached Strasbourg, where it was declared inadmissible, the boy's parents, who had also been very seriously affected by what had taken place, had accepted £80,000 in compensation from the local health authority. They had thereupon discontinued a similar claim for damages for negligence against some of the doctors at their local health centre, and a claim against those doctors in respect of alleged falsification of records had been struck out.

[49] Their real grievance, which they took to the Strasbourg court, related to the falsification of these records. They faced the difficulties, however, in the eyes of the Strasbourg court that they had abandoned an appeal against a decision of a local NHS Medical Services Committee with which they were dissatisfied, and they had not pursued their negligence claim against the doctors to trial. The facts of that case were so far removed from the present case that little of value can be derived from the court's conclusions.

[50] What is important about this decision is that the judgment of the court contains the first clear identification of what Lord Woolf CJ described in R (on the application of Amin) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, R (on the application of Middleton) v West Yorkshire Coroner [2002] EWCA Civ 390, [2002] 4 All ER 336, [2003] QB 581 as the state's adjectival duty under art 2 of the convention in a case which did not involve an allegation of an intentional killing.

[51] The genesis of such a duty was discussed in the judgment of the European Court in Osman v UK (1998) 5 BHRC 293 at 320, 321 (paras 113, 116). Since these paragraphs are quoted in full by Lord Woolf CJ in Amin's case (at [31]) we need not repeat them here. In Powell v UK the court distinguished the cases where a duty might evolve on a law enforcement agency to take preventional operative measures to protect someone's life, and then continued:

> 'The issue before the court in the present case is an entirely different one in terms of both the context and scope of the obligation. Admittedly the first sentence of art 2 enjoins the state not only to refrain from the intentional and unlawful taking of life, but also to take appropriate steps to safeguard the lives of those within its jurisdiction ... The court accepts that it cannot be excluded that the acts and omissions of the authorities in the field of health care policy may in certain circumstances engage their responsibility under the positive limb of art 2. However, where a contracting state has made adequate provision for securing high professional standards among health professionals and the protection of the lives of patients, it cannot accept that matters such as errors of judgment on the part of a health professional or negligent co-ordination among health professionals in the treatment of a particular patient are sufficient of themselves to call a contracting state to account from the standpoint of its positive obligations under art 2 of the convention to protect life. In the court's opinion, the events leading to the tragic death of the applicants' son and the responsibility of the health professionals involved are matters which must be addressed from the angle of the adequacy of the mechanisms in place for shedding light on the course of those events, allowing the facts of the case to be exposed to public scrutiny—not least for the benefit of the applicant. The court has attached particular weight to the procedural requirement implicit in art 2 of the convention ... The court considers that the procedural obligation as described cannot be confined to circumstances in which an individual has lost his life as a result of an act of violence. In its opinion, and with reference to the facts of the instant case, the obligation at issue extends to the need for an effective independent system for establishing the cause of death of an individual under the care and responsibility of health professionals and any liability on the part of the latter.' (Our emphasis.)

[52] In Sieminska v Poland App No 37602/97 (29 March 2001, unreported) the applicant's husband died of natural causes in hospital, but after his death she complained that the ambulance which had taken him to hospital had not been equipped with the necessary resuscitation devices. Under Polish law she had a right (which she exercised) to appeal against decisions of the prosecuting authorities not to bring criminal proceedings. She could also bring a civil action or initiate disciplinary proceedings against the medical practitioners concerned. The court not surprisingly declared her application inadmissible on the grounds that there was no indication that there had been any failure to provide a mechanism whereby the criminal, disciplinary or civil responsibility of persons who might be held answerable could be established.

[53] The case is important for its restatement of the relevant obligation of the state in these terms:

'The court recalls that the first sentence of art 2 obliges the states not only to refrain from "intentionally" causing death but also to take adequate measures to protect life. The court considers that art 2 of the convention imposes that, even in cases such as the present one, in which the deprivation of life was not the result of the use of lethal force by agents of the state but where agents of the state potentially bear responsibility for loss of life, the events in question should be subject to an effective investigation or scrutiny which enables the facts to become known to the public and in particular to the relatives of any victims ... In particular, the positive obligation a state has to protect life under art 2 of the convention includes the requirement for hospitals to have regulations for the protection of their patients' lives and also the obligation to establish an effective judicial system for establishing the cause of a death which occurs in hospital and any liability on the part of the medical practitioners concerned. The procedural element contained in art 2 of the convention imposes the minimum requirement that where a state or its agents potentially bear responsibility for loss of life, the events should be subject to an effective investigation or scrutiny which enables the facts to become known to the public, and in particular to the relatives of any victims.' (Our emphasis.)

[54] Calvelli v Italy [2002] ECHR 32967/96 was a decision of a Grand Chamber of the European Court. The case arose out of the death of a two-year-old baby in a private clinic in February 1987. There were very long delays in the prosecution of the subsequent criminal proceedings. Eventually a retrial had to be ordered, but the case was then struck out as time-barred. Because the criminal court declined to award provisional compensation to the civil parties, civil proceedings were then started, but the applicants were willing to enter into a settlement with the insurers of the clinic and the responsible doctor, and the civil proceedings were ultimately struck out, too.

[55] In Strasbourg the applicants placed great weight on the fact that the state had not pursued the criminal proceedings effectively. The court was influenced, however, by the fact that in settling their civil claim the applicants had lost their opportunity to obtain an order against the doctor for the payment of damages, and possibly the publication of the judgment in the press. A judgment in the civil court could also have led to disciplinary action against the doctor.

[56] One needs to be very wary of the applicability of the conclusions reached by the court in the context of a legal system which is so different from our own. Relevant passages of the judgment that set out the court's approach to a case of this kind are as follows:

> '48. The court reiterates that the first sentence of art 2 ... enjoins the state not only to refrain from the "intentional" taking of life, but also to safeguard the lives of those within its jurisdiction ...
>
> 49. These principles apply in the public health sphere too. The aforementioned positive obligations therefore require states to make regulations compelling hospitals, whether public or private, to adopt appropriate measures for the protection of patients' lives. They also require an effective independent judicial system to be set up so that the cause of death of patients in the care of the medical profession, whether in the public or the private sector, can be determined and those responsible made accountable ...
>
> 51. ... [I]f the infringement of the right to life ... is not caused intentionally, the positive obligation imposed by art 2 to set up an effective judicial system does not necessarily require the provision of a criminal law remedy in every case. In the specific sphere of medical negligence the obligation may for instance also be satisfied if the legal system affords victims a remedy in the civil courts, either alone or in conjunction with a remedy in the criminal courts, enabling any liability of the doctors concerned to be established and any appropriate civil redress, such as an order for damages and for the publication of the decision, to be obtained. Disciplinary measures may also be envisaged ...
>
> 55. [Because the applicants entered into a settlement agreement] [t]he court accordingly considers that the applicants denied themselves access to the best means—and one that in the special circumstances of the instant case, would have satisfied the positive obligations arising under art 2—of elucidating the extent of the doctor's responsibility for the death of their child.'

[57] Edwards v UK (2002) 12 BHRC 190 was a very different case. A psychiatrically disturbed prisoner had been placed in a prison cell with another prisoner who was displaying symptoms of bizarre behaviour, and he was killed by him as a result of their being locked up together. The state authorities appointed a distinguished panel, headed by a QC, to conduct a private non-statutory inquiry. Although the European Court praised the thoroughness and sensitivity of the inquiry report, it held that there had been a violation of art 2 because the panel had no power to compel two of the prison officers to give evidence to them, and because the deceased's parents were excluded from the inquiry except when they were giving evidence.

[58] The court concluded on the facts of that case that because the deceased was a vulnerable individual who had lost his life in a horrendous manner due to a series of failures by public bodies and servants who bore a responsibility to safeguard his welfare, the public interest attaching to the issues thrown up by the case was such as to call for the widest exposure possible. It ended this part of its judgment in these terms (at 213 (para 84)):

'The applicants, parents of the deceased, were only able to attend three days of the inquiry when they themselves were giving evidence. They were not represented and were unable to put any questions to witnesses, whether through their own counsel or, for example, through the inquiry panel. They had to wait until the publication of the final version of the inquiry report to discover the substance of the evidence about what had occurred. Given their close and personal concern with the subject-matter of the inquiry, the court finds that they cannot be regarded as having been involved in the procedure to the extent necessary to safeguard their interests.' (Our emphasis.)

[59] This passage contains an echo of what the court said in the earlier case of Jordan v UK (2001) 11 BHRC 1 at 31 (para 109):

'For the same reasons, there must be a sufficient element of public scrutiny of the investigation or its results to secure accountability in practice as well as in theory. The degree of public scrutiny required may well vary from case to case. In all cases, however, the next of kin of the victim must be involved in the procedure to the extent necessary to safeguard his or her legitimate interests (see [Güleç v Turkey (1999) 28 EHRR 121 at 165 (para 82)], where the father of the victim was not informed of the decisions not to prosecute; [Ögur v Turkey (2000) 31 EHRR 912 at 945 (para 92)], where the family of the victim had no access to the investigation and court documents; [Gül v Turkey [2000] ECHR 22676/93]).' (Our emphasis.)

[60] Mr Giffin QC, who appeared for the Secretary of State, drew our attention to two later judgments of the European Court in cases of intentional killing where the court referred briefly to its approach in clinical negligence cases. Thus in Oneryildiz v Turkey App No 48939/99 (18 June 2002, unreported) the court said that the positive obligation under art 2 to set up an effective judicial system might be satisfied if the legal system afforded victims a remedy in the civil courts, either alone or in conjunction with a remedy in the criminal courts. And in Mastromatteo v Italy [2002] ECHR 37703/97 the court said that the form of investigation might vary according to the circumstances. In the sphere of negligence a civil or disciplinary remedy might suffice. The court went on to say that in an investigation for which state agents or authorities are allegedly responsible, it is necessary for the persons responsible for the investigation to be independent from those implicated in the events. This meant hierarchical or institutional independence and also practical independence.

[61] It is noteworthy, however that in the first of these cases the court concluded that the case of Mr Oneryildiz bore no comparison with that of the applicants Calvelli and Ciglio (see Calvelli v Italy [2002] ECHR 32967/96) due, among other things, to the fact that the repercussions of the risk in question were likely to affect more than one individual and to the tragic nature of the events which had occurred. Neither of these two cases, in any event, were concerned to make any new law in this area: they merely summarised the effect of the earlier decisions to which we have referred.

[62] It is possible to derive from these Strasbourg cases the following principles. (1) Where agents of a state bear potential responsibility for the loss of a human life, the state should provide a procedural mechanism whereby the cause of death may be investigated, and responsibility for the death ascertained, through an investigation held in public which must be both judicial and effective. (2) The convention is not prescriptive about the manner in which this investigation should take place, but the more serious the events that call for inquiry, the more intensive should be the process of public scrutiny. In such cases the families of the deceased should be involved in the procedure to the extent that is necessary to safeguard their interests.

[63] For reasons that may appear obvious, the present case cannot be simply categorised as one involving errors of judgment on the part of a health professional or negligent co-ordination among health professionals (see the passage in Powell v UK App No 45305/99 (4 May 2000, unreported) cited in [51], above). This is a case in which the conduct of those responsible for Naazish's care has already been stigmatised by an independent expert as 'grossly negligent', and where the family's solicitor is not unreasonably concerned that there may have been a medically-orchestrated cover-up which caused his clients the additional heart-breaking distress to which we have referred in [10], above.

[64] The leading authority in this jurisdiction on some of the issues raised in this case is the judgment of Lord Woolf CJ, giving the judgment of the court in R (on the application of Amin) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, R (on the application of Middleton) v West Yorkshire Coroner [2002] 4 All ER 336, [2003] QB 581 (see [44], above). That case was concerned with the adequacy of the state's investigations of two deaths in prison custody, but in [32] appear some observations on art 2 that are of general relevance:

> 'Against this framework of obligations created by art 2, it is useful ... to make some general observations about the nature of the procedural duty to investigate. Plainly there is no duty on the face of the convention to investigate a death. It is clear that such a duty has been constructed or developed by the court at Strasbourg out of a perception that, without it, the substantive rights conferred by art 2 would or might in some cases be rendered nugatory or ineffective. Thus the duty to investigate is adjectival to the duty to protect the right to life, and to the prohibition of the taking of life. It follows that by its nature it cannot be a duty defined by reference to fixed rules. It only has life case by case; contingent upon what is required in any individual instance for the substantive right's protection. Across the spectrum of possible art 2 violations, there are classes of case which can readily be distinguished. One class is that of allegations of deliberate killing—murder—by servants of the state. A second is that of allegations of killing by gross negligence—manslaughter—by servants of the state. A third is that of plain negligence by servants of the state, leading to a death or allowing it to happen. In the context of any of these classes, there exists the lamentable possibility that the State has concealed or is concealing its responsibility for the death. That possibility gives rise to the paradigm case of the duty to investigate. The duty is in every instance fashioned to support and make good the substantive art 2 rights. We shall see, as we go through the movements of the argument, that this approach sits with the Strasbourg jurisprudence, whose character has always been essentially pragmatic.' (Our emphasis.)

[65] The court asked itself (at [45]):

> 'How far may the nature and quality of any investigation embarked upon in satisfaction of the art 2 adjectival duty vary according to the context and subject matter of the case? Are such requirements such as publicity and family participation, and other virtuous procedures, constant?

[66] It gave its answer (at [62]):

> 'Accordingly, this part of the case cannot be satisfactorily resolved by a process of reasoning which sticks like glue to the Strasbourg texts. Just as, in our view, on question (2) [counsel for the Crown] originally adopted too rigid an approach to the European Court of Human Rights' jurisprudence in submitting that the duty to investigate was only triggered in cases of the use of unlawful force by state agents, so also on question (3) [counsel for the claimants] makes the same error in submitting that there are fixed requirements of publicity and family participation, uniformly applicable to every investigation. What is required will vary with the circumstances. A credible accusation of murder or manslaughter by state agents will call for an investigation of the utmost rigour, conducted independently for all to see. An allegation of negligence leading to death in custody, though grave enough in all conscience, bears a different quality from a case where it is said the state has laid on lethal hands. The procedural obligation promotes these interlocking aims: to minimise the risk of future like deaths; to give the beginnings of justice to the bereaved; to assuage the anxieties of the public. The means of their fulfilment cannot be reduced to a catechism of rules. What is required is a flexible approach, responsive to the dictates of the facts case by case. In our judgment the Strasbourg authorities including Edwards v UK are perfectly consistent with this. And it is an approach which embraces what we will say in Middleton's appeal about the coroner's jurisdiction and inquest verdicts of neglect.'

[67] While this court is now bound to take into account the decisions of the court at Strasbourg, it is bound by the force of precedent by its own earlier judgments. From the judgment in Amin's case (on which we are now awaiting the decision of the House of Lords) one can derive the following principles. (1) A case involving, as this one does, an allegation of gross negligence by a servant or servants of the state falls in the middle of the spectrum that extends from allegations of deliberate killing by a servant of the state to allegations of plain negligence by such servants that lead to a death or allow it to happen. (2) The 'lamentable possibility' that the state might have concealed its responsibility for the death, as is alleged in the present case, may arise at any point on this spectrum. (3) The procedural obligation introduced by art 2 has three interlocking aims: to minimise the risk of future like deaths; to give the beginnings of justice to the bereaved; and to assuage the anxieties of the public. (4) What is required by way of an investigation cannot be reduced to a catechism of rules; a flexible approach is needed, responsive to the dictates of the facts, case by case.

(9) QUESTION (2): HAS THE STATE'S ART 2 OBLIGATION IN THIS CASE ALREADY BEEN PERFORMED?

[68] Silber J considered ([2003] All ER (D) 220 (Jun)) that the combination of the thorough police investigation and the thorough inquiries undertaken by the trust were sufficient in themselves to comply with this obligation, coupled as they were by an admission of liability by the trust. He reached this conclusion even though Mr and Mrs Khan had played no part in either investigation. They were merely told of the results and invited to ask questions about them after they were all over. The judge categorised the failure to involve the family as regrettable and unfortunate, but he thought that this could not gainsay the fact that thorough investigations had taken place. The fact that the trust had admitted liability satisfied in his mind one of the main purposes of the requisite investigation, namely to ascertain who was to blame for the death, and he considered that the duty to investigate in this case was pitched at a lower level than in a case of a death in custody.

[69] We do not agree with the judge's conclusion. Subject to what we say in [76], below, under our law it is the coroner's inquest, when it takes place, which furnishes the natural occasion for the effective judicial inquiry into the cause of a death that the convention requires. The police investigation, in which the family played no part, and which culminated in a decision not to prosecute, could not act as a substitute. Nor could the investigations carried out privately by the trust, in which again the family played no part, particularly as the trust could not be regarded as having the requisite independence.

[70] In our judgment the judge seriously underestimated the gravity of this case. It is, as we have said, a case in which allegations of gross negligence have been made by an independent expert, and these are compounded by the events that led the family's solicitor to express concern about a medically-orchestrated cover-up. So far as the latter is concerned, this case is a long way from the case of Powell v UK where the alleged falsification of records was discrete and separate from the negligent omissions with which the doctors were charged. Here the alleged cover-up was close to the centre of the events into which the coroner will be inquiring, and the evidence as to what really happened could cast light on the credibility of the trust's witnesses in this respect.

[71] Nor do we consider that in this case the admission of liability takes matters very much further. The trust has not formally identified the acts or omissions which it considers to have been negligent, and this blanket admission leaves the family not very much the wiser. This is not a case where a single act of negligence is alleged against a single person, and it is dangerous to extrapolate from the facts of one case to the facts of another. We would add that both the Strasbourg court in Edwards v UK (2002) 12 BHRC 190 at 211 (para 74) and this court in Amin's case [2002] 4 All ER 336 at [57] made it clear that there was no obligation on the deceased's family to initiate civil proceedings in order to find out what happened in a case like this. The state itself must initiate the necessary inquiry. The idea that the family should be obliged to initiate disciplinary proceedings against any of the nurses or the doctors in order to ascertain the facts of their daughter's death is not one that can be seriously entertained on the facts of the present case.

[72] For these reasons we do not consider that the state has yet fulfilled the obligation imposed on it by art 2.

(10) QUESTION (3): IF THE STATE HAS NOT YET FULFILLED ITS ART 2 OBLIGATION, CAN THE HOLDING OF THE INQUEST SATISFY THAT OBLIGATION IF MR KHAN CANNOT PLAY AN EFFECTIVE PART IN IT HIMSELF?

[73] We have described how the response required of a state by art 2 varies with the seriousness of the subject matter. Although this of course is not a case in which a servant of the state is charged with intentional killing, it is high up in the second category of cases identified by Lord Woolf CJ in Amin's case. A little girl has died in circumstances where gross negligence has been imputed to the hospital staff, and the case has the other distressing features we have described in [3], [10] and [24], above.

[74] If the public judicial investigation required by art 2 is to be an effective one—and by 'effective' we mean an investigation that satisfies the purposes described in [40]–[43], above, reinforced as they are by the third principle we have derived from Lord Woolf CJ's judgment in Amin's case (see [67], above)—the inquest will not be an effective one unless Naazish's family can play an effective part in it. The evidence shows (see [24], above) that they are in no fit state to play that part themselves. Although the function of an inquest is inquisitorial, and in the overwhelming majority of cases the coroner can conduct an effective judicial investigation himself without there being any need for the family of the deceased to be represented, every rule has its exceptions, and this, in our judgment, is an exceptional case. We note that the authors of the recent Report of a Fundamental Review into Death Certification and Investigation in England, Wales and Northern Ireland (June 2003) (Cm 5831) share our view, in Ch 9 of their report, that in an exceptional case something more is needed.

[75] In particular, the evidence is so complex that the coroner has enlisted the services of an independent medical expert to assist him. The trust and its doctors and nurses will have the benefit of legal representation at public expense, and the family are likely to wish to explore the prospects of a verdict of neglect and/or a report by the coroner pursuant to r 43 of the Coroners Rules 1984, SI 1984/552. Mr Khan clearly could not manage this on his own.

[76] In the recent case of Sacker v West Yorkshire Coroner [2003] EWCA Civ 217 at [24]–[25], [2003] 2 All ER 278 at [24]–[25] Pill LJ expressed some scepticism about the suitability of a coroner's inquest, in its present form, as a vehicle for carrying out a state's obligations under art 2. Those considerations may accentuate the need for an overdue improvement in the arrangements for inquests: it cannot in our judgment serve as a valid excuse for effectively excluding a family from participating in them in a case of this seriousness.

[77] For the sake of completeness we would add that we do not consider that the judgments of this court in R (on the application of Green) v Police Complaints Authority [2002] EWCA Civ 389, [2002] All ER (D) 397 (Mar), to which Mr Giffin referred us, cast any useful light on the matters we have to decide in the present case. We therefore consider that the answer to question (3) is No.

(11) QUESTION (4): IF THE ANSWER TO QUESTION (3) IS NO, DOES THE 1998 ACT APPLY, SO THAT MR KHAN MAY OBTAIN RELIEF IN A NATIONAL COURT?

[78] The provisions of the convention formed no part of our national law until 2 October 2000. Before that date citizens of this country who believed their convention rights had been violated had to exhaust their opportunities of obtaining a remedy in our courts before they could seek relief in Strasbourg. The 1998 Act changed all that. Now anyone who seeks redress for the violation of a convention right can obtain relief in the courts of this country. Naazish, however, died in September 1999, and there is a difference of opinion in the lower courts as to whether the family of someone who died before 2 October 2000 may rely on their right to enforce the state's obligation under art 2 if that obligation remained unsatisfied when the 1998 Act came into force.

[79] Silber J held that they could not. After mentioning other conflicting judgments at first instance and considering Lord Woolf CJ's judgment in Amin's case [2002] 4 All ER 336 at [32], [43] and [81], he concluded that the duty to investigate in art 2 was not an independent duty. It was dependent on whether the main duties expressly stated in that article had arisen. If a death occurred before 2 October 2000, art 2 was not engaged, and as a matter of English law the state's adjectival duty to investigate did not arise, whether by necessary implication or at all.

[80] In R (on the application of Hurst) v HM Coroner for the Northern District of London [2003] EWHC 1721 (Admin), [2003] All ER (D) 80 (Jul) the Divisional Court disagreed. Rose LJ, with whom Henriques J agreed, accepted that the state's duty to investigate a death was adjectival in the sense that it was ancillary to the main right to life recognised by art 2. But he said (at [19]) that it seemed to him that it was none the less a free-standing right. In Hurst's case the coroner had decided in November 2002 and June 2003 not to resume the inquest, and by then the 1998 Act had come into force.

[81] In Amin's case [2002] 4 All ER 336 this point was never argued, although both the deaths in that case had antedated 2 October 2000. Mr Giffin, however, derived a principle from Lord Woolf CJ's judgment (at [32]) to the effect that the state's procedural duty to investigate existed, and existed only, in order to ensure the effectiveness of the substantive rights conferred by art 2. It had no fixed content in itself: 'It only has life case by case; contingent upon what is required in any individual instance for the substantive right's protection.'

[82] We certainly accept that if this case did not have a convention ingredient it might well be legitimate for an English judge to conclude, as Silber J did, that Naazish's right to life could not be relied upon after her death in September 1999. But we do not believe the court at Strasbourg would look on this matter in this way.

[83] In Hurst's case Rose LJ referred to the judgment of the European Court in Jordan v UK (2001) 11 BHRC 1 without expressly citing the passage he had in mind. The relevant passage is at 29–31 (paras 102–109). The court stressed (at para 102) that art 2 ranked as one of the most fundamental values of the convention, enshrining (along with art 3) one of the basic values of the democratic societies making up the Council of Europe. It went on to say:

> 'The object and purpose of the convention as an instrument for the protection of individual human beings also requires that art 2 be interpreted and applied so as to make its safeguards practical and effective …'

[84] It is Naazish's right to life that is at the centre of this case, and the fundamental importance of that right obliges the state to investigate her death judicially and publicly in the manner indicated by Strasbourg case law. Her parents simply act as her proxy in requiring this investigation to take place. They are entitled to say after 2 October 2000, just as much as they were entitled to say before she died, that the state must implement the convention obligations it owed to her. In Jordan v UK paras 102–109 of the judgment contain none of the precision one would expect of a Chancery judgment. The court does not identify the precise moment when a right vested, or the precise legal status of the persons who are entitled to enforce that right after the death of the deceased. The dead Mr Jordan is spoken of as the 'victim'. But the court accepts without the need for any profound analysis that the victim's family is entitled to stand in his shoes after his death and make his right a real one.

[85] In our judgment Naazish had a right to life which the Strasbourg court would have recognised when the 1998 Act came into force, even though by that time her parents had to act as her proxies, and they were limited to a reliance on the state's adjectival duty to investigate her death properly. We do not therefore consider that the fact that Naazish died in September 1999 provides any effective bar to the relief sought by her father in these proceedings. It was in July 2002 that the Secretary of State first denied them the relief they are now seeking, and by then the 1998 Act had been in force for nearly two years. If this decision causes practical difficulties in other cases, the solution to those difficulties will have to be worked out on a case-by-case basis. The answer to question (4) is therefore Yes.

[86] We are therefore giving the following answers to the questions in [46], above. (i) The United Kingdom has not so far discharged its obligation under art 2 of the convention in the present case. (ii) The holding of an inquest will not discharge that obligation if Mr Khan cannot play an effective part in it himself. (iii) The 1998 Act applies, so that Mr Khan is entitled to relief in a national court. We will therefore allow the appeal to this extent at least, and (subject to detailed argument as to their form) make declarations to that effect.

(12) QUESTION (5): WHATEVER THE ANSWER TO THE FIRST FOUR QUESTIONS, DOES THE SECRETARY OF STATE HAVE POWER TO MAKE THE NECESSARY FUNDING AVAILABLE?

[87] It appears to us that the next question now is whether there is any way in which the United Kingdom can discharge its obligation to Mr Khan under art 2. It follows from the conclusions that we have reached so far that the United Kingdom owes Mr Khan a duty to set up an inquiry which will discharge that obligation. As we see it, that could be achieved in one of two ways. The first way would be to provide reasonable funding at an inquest in order to ensure that the Khan family is represented, and the second would be to set up some other type of inquiry at which such funding would be possible.

[88] It would certainly be open to the Secretary of State (whatever views he has previously expressed on the matter) to set up an inquiry under s 84 of the National Health Service Act 1977 and to make provision for the payment of Mr Khan's reasonable legal costs at such an inquiry. We imagine that there may have been many such inquiries at which the interests of the family have been provided out of public funds without their being granted legal aid. It follows that this is not a case in which the United Kingdom cannot discharge its obligations to Mr Khan under art 2.

[89] Mr Havers QC, who appeared for Mr Khan, submitted, on the basis that the Secretary of State has so far declined to hold an inquiry, whether under s 84 or otherwise, that although Parliament has created the Legal Services Commission for the purpose of channelling taxpayers' funds towards the cost of legal representation when circumstances warranted it, the Secretary of State nevertheless has an equivalent power in a case like this pursuant to s 2 of the 1977 Act. This section provides, so far as is material:

> 'Without prejudice to the Secretary of State's powers apart from this section, he has power—(a) to provide such services as he considers appropriate for the purpose of discharging any duty imposed on him by this Act; and (b) to do any other thing whatsoever which is calculated to facilitate, or is conducive or incidental to, the discharge of such a duty.'

Section 1(1) of the Act prescribes the Secretary of State's duty to continue the promotion of a comprehensive health service in England and Wales, and other sections of the Act identify particular facets of that duty.

[90] Silber J did not answer the question whether ss 1(1) and 2 of the Act, read in accordance with the precepts contained in s 3 of the 1998 Act, gave the Secretary of State the requisite power. He cut the Gordian knot by holding that if the effect of art 2 of the convention was that the Secretary of State would be acting unlawfully if he did not provide for the payment of Mr Khan's legal costs, then he was under an obligation under art 2 to make the necessary payments irrespective of whether the 1977 Act gave him power to do so.

[91] This conclusion cannot be right. First principles of parliamentary sovereignty do not permit ministers to make payments out of public funds when Parliament has given them no power to do so, and the courts cannot require ministers to make unlawful payments. Whether the Secretary of State has power to pay a family's costs at an inquest thus depends upon the true construction of s 2 of the 1997 Act in the light of s 3 of 1998 Act.

[92] Mr Giffin submitted in relation to the interpretation of s 2 that the legal representation of a family at an inquest is not calculated to facilitate, and is not conducive to, the provision of medical services. Nor is it incidental to the provision of such services. He said that the purpose of an inquest is to establish how the death of the deceased came about. Its purpose is not to deal with the future provision of medical services. He observed in this context that in R (Wagstaff) v Secretary of State for Health, R (Associated Newspapers Ltd) v Secretary of State for Health [2001] 1 WLR 292 Kennedy LJ considered that the Secretary of State might only lawfully establish a tribunal of inquiry pursuant to s 2(b) of the 1977 Act if its terms of reference were restricted to the operation of the National Health Service and the way in which the functioning of other agencies impacted on that service.

[93] Mr Giffin added that it would be wrong to interpret a general power in a statute in the imaginative way suggested by Mr Havers when Parliament has made a different express provision which is designed to deal comprehensively with public funding of representation at courts and tribunals. In Crédit Suisse v Waltham Forest London BC [1996] 4 All ER 176 at 184, [1997] QB 362 at 374 Neill LJ said:

> '... where Parliament has made detailed provisions as to how certain statutory functions are to be carried out, there is no scope for implying the existence of additional powers which lie wholly outside the statutory code.'

[94] Although we see the force of Mr Giffin's arguments, we consider that it would be premature for us to reach a final view on the interpretation of s 2 of the 1977 Act (bearing in mind our interpretative obligations under s 3 of the 1998 Act) before we have received fuller argument about the alternative ways in which the state might fulfil its obligations under art 2 in this case. We have in mind the possibility that the Secretary of State might now opt to conduct a statutory inquiry under s 84 (notwithstanding his earlier views on the topic) or that he might identify a lawful non-statutory route to the same end. Alternatively the Lord Chancellor might wish to consider, with the Treasury's consent no doubt, relaxing the provisions of the statutory instrument that denies legal aid funding to the parents of a dead child on an occasion like this.

[95] In this context we have been shown how the Lord Chancellor, in the exercise of his powers under s 6(8)(a) and (b) of the Access to Justice Act 1999, has been making more generous provision for legal representation at inquests out of public funds than was open to him before that Act was passed. In particular we have been shown the direction he made in this context pursuant to s 6(8)(a) in November 2001 and the guidance he issued at the same time under s 6(8)(b), with particular reference to representation at inquests.

[96] All the conditions set out in para 7 of the Lord Chancellor's new guidance appear to be satisfied in the present case, save one. The circumstances of Naazish's death certainly seem to be such that funded representation for her family is necessary to assist the coroner to investigate the case effectively and to establish the facts, and this is an inquest which concerns an agency of the state. The one condition that is not satisfied relates to Mr Khan's means. Although he has been unable to take instructions on the matter, because of his client's distressed state, Mr Balen understands that his financial position is marginally above the rigid financial limits prescribed by reg 5(6) of the Community Legal Service (Financial) Regulations 2000, SI 2000/516.

[97] It would be wrong to say very much about these regulations in the absence of a representative of the Lord Chancellor and in the absence of a clearer understanding of Mr Khan's financial position and of his commitments to his family.

[98] If the legal aid route is the state's preferred route towards fulfilling its art 2 obligations in a case like this, it seems to us at present seriously open to question whether a provision which requires someone like Mr Khan to fund the entire cost of his lawyer's appearance at the inquest into his daughter's death entirely out of his own pocket in a case as serious and as complex as this (without any possibility of reimbursement by the state) is compatible with the requirements of the convention. After all, the convention imposes on states the obligation to conduct an effective investigation in a case like this, and without Mr Khan's participation the inquest cannot fulfil that role. With a wife and four other children to support it seems absurd, on the information at present available to the court, that he could reasonably be expected to fund the whole of the cost of his own representation himself in order to enable the state to perform the obligations that rest on it, and not on him.

[99] We must stress that this is an exceptional case, remarkable as it is for the fact that the trust excluded the family completely from the investigations it conducted. But human rights law casts long shadows in exceptional cases. Those who drafted the 2000 regulations do not appear to have appreciated the power of art 2 when they excluded even an exceptional case like this from the category of cases in which legal representation might be made available without a strict and unyielding means test. We were unimpressed by the suggestion made by Mr Giffin that economic exigencies might be called in aid by a state to whittle down its obligations in a case as serious as this.

[100] In these circumstances we propose to hold a further hearing in this appeal on the first open day on or after 27 October in order to give further consideration to the question whether we need to interpret s 2 of the 1977 Act as giving the requisite power by which the state may perform its duties to Mr Khan at the forthcoming inquest, or whether the state suggests some other route to that end. We would benefit greatly on that occasion from the help of counsel instructed by the Lord Chancellor (in relation to his legal aid responsibilities). We would also welcome the assistance of counsel instructed by the Attorney General (representing the government as a whole) so that we may consider the possibilities if it were to be submitted on behalf of both the Secretary of State for Health and the Lord Chancellor that each has no power to fund representation at an inquest in the circumstances of this case. We would then wish to have assistance in order to answer the question how the United Kingdom proposes to discharge the obligation under art 2 which we have held to exist.

[101] It may be, of course, that some satisfactory and lawful means may be found by the government for funding Mr Khan's representation at the forthcoming inquest, so that the difficult issues on which we wish to hear further argument may take place on an occasion uninhibited by external time pressures created by the need not to delay the inquest (which concerns a lot of people other than Mr Khan) any further.

Appeal allowed. Further hearing ordered into the method by which the Secretary of State's obligation under art 2 of the convention could lawfully be discharged.

Dilys Tausz Barrister.

R (on the application of Amin) v Secretary of State for the Home Department

[2003] UKHL 51

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL, LORD SLYNN OF HADLEY, LORD STEYN, LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD AND LORD HUTTON

14–16 JULY, 16 OCTOBER 2003

Human rights – Right to life – State's obligation to investigate death in circumstances where state arguably in breach of substantive obligation under convention right to life – Whether state's investigatory obligation requiring public inquiry with participation of deceased's family – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 2.

M, a prisoner serving a sentence in a young offender institution was killed by his cellmate, S, whose institutional behaviour was known to the Prison Service to be dangerous. Following the death the Prison Service carried out an internal inquiry, led by a senior official in the service. The investigation was conducted in private and the report was not published, although parts of it were made available to M's family. The family were not able to play any effective part in the inquiry. The report was made available to the police and the Commission for Racial Equality (CRE). An inquest into the death was opened and adjourned pending S's trial. The police made investigations into the criminal culpability of S and of the Prison Service. An advice report was produced, and based on that report, counsel advised that there was insufficient evidence to provide any realistic prospect of securing any conviction of anyone other than S. M's family were so informed. S was charged with murder and convicted. His trial was directed solely to establishing his mental responsibility for the killing which he had admittedly carried out. There was no exploration of cell allocation procedures or other events before the murder. After conviction the coroner declined to resume the inquest despite representations inviting her to reconsider. Shortly after S's conviction the CRE announced a formal investigation into racial discrimination in the Prison Service, making specific reference to the circumstances leading to the murder of M. Although the CRE report was published, it was necessarily confined to race-related issues. The CRE inquiry was conducted chiefly in private. M's family were unable to play any effective part in it. The respondent Secretary of State for the Home Department refused to establish the independent public inquiry into M's death requested by his family. The claimant, M's uncle, applied for judicial review of the respondent's refusal. The judge granted a declaration that an independent public investigation had to be held in order to satisfy the obligation imposed on the state by art 2[a] of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) to investigate deaths where there had arguably been a breach of the right to life contained in art 2. The Secretary of State appealed. Allowing the appeal, the Court of Appeal held that a flexible a Article 2, so far as material, is set out at [18], below approach was to be taken to the state's duty to investigate in each case and that, in the instant case, the duty had already been discharged. The claimant appealed.

Held – The state had a duty to take appropriate legislative and administrative steps to protect life. It owed a particular duty to those involuntarily in its custody. When a death occurred in custody the state's duty to investigate was given effect in the United Kingdom by requiring such deaths to be publicly investigated before an independent judicial tribunal with an opportunity for relatives of the deceased to participate. Although there was a measure of flexibility in selecting the means of conducting the investigation, to satisfy art 2 of the convention the investigation had to be independent, effective, reasonably prompt, have a sufficient element of public scrutiny, and involve the next of kin to an appropriate extent. In the instant case the investigations conducted had not, either singly or together, met the minimum standards required to satisfy art 2. Accordingly, the appeal would be allowed (see [30]–[38], [49], [53], [54], [66], below).

R (on the application of Wright) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept (2001) 62 BMLR 16 applied; Edwards v UK (2002) 12 BHRC 190 and Jordan v UK (2001) 11 BHRC 1 considered.

Decision of the Court of Appeal [2002] 4 All ER 396 reversed.

Notes

For the right to life, see 8(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 123.

For the Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt I, art 2, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 553.

Cases referred to in opinions

Edwards v UK (2002) 12 BHRC 190, ECt HR.

Finucane v UK [2003] All ER (D) 25 (Jul), ECt HR.

John v Rees [1969] 2 All ER 274, [1970] Ch 345, [1969] 2 WLR 1294.

Jordan v UK (2001) 11 BHRC 1, ECt HR.

McCann v UK (1996) 21 EHRR 97, [1995] ECHR 18984/91, ECt HR.

Menson v UK [2003] ECHR 47916/99, ECt HR.

Nilabati Behera v State of Orissa [1993] 2 SCR 581, India SC.

Osman v UK (1998) 5 BHRC 293, ECt HR.

R (on the application of Wright) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] EWHC Admin 520, (2001) 62 BMLR 16.

Reeves v Comr of Police of the Metropolis [1999] 3 All ER 897, [2000] 1 AC 360, [1999] 3 WLR 363, HL.

Salman v Turkey (2002) 34 EHRR 425, [2000] ECHR 21986/93, ECt HR.

Yasa v Turkey (1999) 28 EHRR 408, [1998] ECHR 22495/93, ECt HR.

Cases referred to in list of authorities

A (children) (conjoined twins: surgical separation), Re [2000] 4 All ER 961, [2001] Fam 147, [2001] 2 WLR 480, CA.

Airedale NHS Trust v Bland [1993] 1 All ER 821, [1993] AC 789, [1993] 2 WLR 316, Fam D, CA and HL.

Basu v State of West Bengal [1997] 2 LRC 1, India SC.

Botta v Italy (1998) 4 BHRC 81, ECt HR.

Brown v Stott (Procurator Fiscal, Dunfermline) [2001] 2 All ER 97, [2003] 1 AC 681, [2001] 2 WLR 817, PC.

Çakici v Turkey (2001) 31 EHRR 133, [1999] ECHR 23657/94, ECt HR.

East African Asians v UK (1973) 3 EHRR 76, E Com HR.
Ergi v Turkey (2001) 32 EHRR 388, [1998] ECHR 23818/94, ECt HR.
Ertak v Turkey App No 20764/92 (9 May 2000, unreported), ECt HR.
Guerra v Italy (1998) 4 BHRC 63, ECt HR.
Gul v Turkey [2000] ECHR 22676/93, ECt HR.
Güleç v Turkey (1999) 28 EHRR 121, [1998] ECHR 21593/93, ECt HR.
Hilton v UK (1978) 3 EHRR 104, E Com HR.
Ilhan v Turkey [2000] ECHR 22277/93, ECt HR.
Kaya v Turkey (1999) 28 EHRR 1, [1998] 22729/93, ECt HR.
Keenan v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 319, ECt HR.
Kelly v UK [2001] ECHR 30054/96, ECt HR.
Kurt v Turkey (1998) 5 BHRC 1, ECt HR.
McKerr v UK (2002) 34 EHRR 553, [2001] ECHR 28883/95, ECt HR.
McShane v UK [2002] ECHR 43290/98, ECt HR.
Ogur v Turkey (2001) 31 EHRR 912, [1999] ECHR 21594/93, ECt HR.
Plattform 'Ärtze für das Leben' v Austria (1991) 13 EHRR 204, [1988] ECHR 10126/82, ECt HR.
Pretty v UK (2002) 12 BHRC 149, ECt HR.
R (on the application of Alconbury Developments Ltd) v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions [2001] UKHL 23, [2001] 2 All ER 929, [2003] 2 AC 295, [2001] 2 WLR 1389.
R (on the application of Anderson) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] EWCA Civ 1698, [2003] 1 AC 837, [2002] 2 WLR 1143; rvsd [2002] UKHL 46, [2002] 4 All ER 1089, [2003] 1 AC 837, [2002] 3 WLR 1800.
R (on the application of Howard) v Secretary of State for Health [2002] EWHC 396 (Admin), [2003] QB 830, [2002] 3 WLR 738.
R (on the application of Persey) v Secretary of State for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs [2002] EWHC 371 (Admin), [2003] QB 794, [2002] 3 WLR 704, DC.
R v Broadcasting Standards Commission, ex p British Broadcasting Corp [2000] 3 All ER 989, [2000] 3 WLR 1327, CA.
R v DPP, ex p Manning [2001] QB 330, [2000] 3 WLR 463, DC.
R v Governor of Brockhill Prison, ex p Evans (No 2) [2000] 4 All ER 15, [2000] 3 WLR 843, HL.
R v Graham (1905) 93 LT 371.
R v Inner London North District Coroner, ex p Linnane [1989] 2 All ER 254, [1989] 1 WLR 395, DC.
R v Inner South London Coroner, ex p Douglas-Williams [1999] 1 All ER 344, CA.
R v Lyons [2002] UKHL 44, [2002] 4 All ER 1028, [2003] 1 AC 976, [2002] 3 WLR 1562.
R v North Humberside and Scunthorpe Coroner, ex p Jamieson [1994] 3 All ER 972, [1995] QB 1, [1994] 3 WLR 82, CA.
R v Secretary of State for Health, ex p Wagstaff [2001] 1 WLR 292, DC.
R v Southwark Coroner, ex p Hicks [1987] 2 All ER 140, [1987] 1 WLR 1624, DC.
Rapier (decd), Re [1986] 3 All ER 726, [1988] QB 26, [1986] 3 WLR 830, DC.
Sacker v West Yorkshire Coroner [2003] EWCA Civ 217, [2003] 2 All ER 278.
Shanaghan v UK [2001] ECHR 37715/97, ECt HR.
State v Makwanyane [1995] 1 LRC 269, SA Const Ct.
Streletz v Germany (2001) 33 EHRR 751, [2001] ECHR 34044/96, ECt HR.
Tanrikulu v Turkey [1999] ECHR 23763/94, ECt HR.
Timurtas v Turkey (2001) 33 EHRR 121, [2000] ECHR 23531/94, ECt HR.

X and Y v Netherlands (1986) 8 EHRR 235, ECt HR.
Z v UK (2001) 10 BHRC 384, ECt HR.

Appeal

The claimant, Imtiaz Amin, appealed with leave of the Appeal Committee of the House of Lords given on 14 November 2002, from the order of the Court of Appeal (Lord Woolf CJ, Laws and Dyson LJJ) on 27 March 2002 ([2002] EWCA Civ 390, [2002] 4 All ER 396, [2003] QB 581) allowing the appeal of the respondent, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, from the order of Hooper J on 3 September 2001 ([2001] EWHC Admin 719, [2001] All ER (D) 69 (Oct)) granting the claimant a declaration that an independent public investigation into the death of the claimant's nephew, Zahid Mubarek, with his family legally represented, provided with the relevant material, and able to cross-examine the principal witnesses, had to be held to satisfy the obligations imposed by art 2 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). The Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission was granted leave to intervene on 24 June 2003. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Bingham of Cornhill.

Patrick O'Connor QC and Martin Soorjoo (instructed by Imran Khan & Partners) for the appellant.

Jonathan Crow and Martin Chamberlain (instructed by the Treasury Solicitor) for the Secretary of State.

John F Larkin QC and Peter Coll (both of the Northern Ireland Bar) (instructed by JG O'Hare, Belfast) for the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

16 October 2003. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD BINGHAM OF CORNHILL.

[1] My Lords, in March 2000 Zahid Mubarek, a 19-year-old prisoner serving a sentence in Feltham Young Offender Institution, was wantonly murdered by Robert Stewart, with whom he shared a cell. The issue in this appeal is whether the United Kingdom has complied with its duty under art 2 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) to investigate the circumstances in which this crime came to be committed.

THE FACTS

[2] Zahid Mubarek (the deceased) was born on 23 October 1980. He lived in East London. His criminal record was a short one. On 16 January 1997, for an offence of possessing an imitation firearm with intent to cause fear of violence, he was the subject of an attendance centre order. It appears the offence may have been committed in response to provocation and racist abuse. In March 1999 he was cautioned for handling stolen goods. On 17 January 2000 he was sentenced to a total of 90 days' detention in a young offender institution for offences of theft, going equipped for theft and interfering with a motor vehicle. These were offences which he committed, as it seems, to fund a growing heroin addiction. But it seems he had not complied with bail conditions imposed to address his drug problem. He was sent to Feltham, spent his first night there in the induction wing, and on 22 January 2000 was transferred to Swallow Wing where he was accommodated in cell 38, a double cell which he occupied on his own until the arrival of Stewart on 8 February 2000. The evidence suggests that the deceased was a model prisoner who caused no trouble and appeared to have no enemies.

[3] Robert Stewart was born on 4 August 1980 and lived at Hyde in Greater Manchester. Beginning with a conviction of arson when aged 13, he was convicted of 21 further offences before being sentenced for the first time to detention in a young offender institution in August 1995. Further such sentences followed in January 1996, February 1997 (after the making of community service and supervision orders), November 1997, October 1998 and January 2000. Only two of Stewart's convictions were of offences of personal violence (assault occasioning actual bodily harm and common assault). At the end of 1999 he faced charges under the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 which were due to be heard in London. It appears that these offences, or some of them, may have been thought to be racially motivated. His personal security file suggested that while in custody he had been implicated in violence, damage to prison property, escape attempts, hostage holding, the stabbing of other inmates (one of whom had lost his eye), suspected (but unproved) involvement in the murder of another prisoner, arson, the threatening of other inmates with a metal bar and a wooden table or chair leg and threats of violence against prison staff whose addresses he had ascertained. An intercepted letter suggested that he was in possession of a gun and knew the address of a prison governor. It appears that from about January 1999 his behaviour in custody improved, although he was later diagnosed to be suffering from 'a long-standing deep-seated personality disorder' and 'an untreatable mental condition'.

[4] Stewart's first visit to Feltham was on 10 January 2000 for purposes of a court hearing in London. It was judged that he needed to be watched and he was put in a single cell. An intercepted letter written by him was found to contain a reference to 'Niggers'. An officer who read Stewart's security file at this time formed the opinion that Stewart was 'very dangerous and a threat to both staff and other inmates'. He made a note in Stewart's wing file: 'Staff are advised to see the security file on this inmate (held in security). Very dangerous individual. Be careful.' Having made his court appearance, Stewart returned to Hindley Young Offender Institution (from which he had come) on 12 January.

[5] Stewart returned to Feltham on 24 January for a further court appearance. He was accommodated on a different wing, where staff were warned that he was dangerous. He left again on 26 January.

[6] Stewart was transferred to Feltham on a longer-term basis on 7 February 2000. He spent his first night on a wing where he had not been before. On the following day, 8 February 2000, he was placed in cell 38 on Swallow Wing, with the deceased. It is said that the wing had a maximum capacity of 60 prisoners, that there were already 59 before the arrival of Stewart and that the vacant place in cell 38 was the only place available. The allocation decision was made by an officer who had, according to one source, been warned to 'watch [Stewart] as he was dangerous'. The officer himself does not, it appears, recollect such a warning, and did not consult Stewart's security file, or his wing file which did not reach Feltham until later.

[7] Stewart shared cell 38 with the deceased from 8 February to 21 March 2000. During that time he wrote and sent a letter, not intercepted, couched in violent and racist terms. On 19 March Stewart's sentence expired and he was thereafter held on remand pending trial of the outstanding charges, but he was not moved. There is no evidence of hostility or discord between the deceased and Stewart during the time they were sharing cell 38, although the deceased may have expressed a wish to share with someone else. There is evidence that other prisoners regarded Stewart as 'strange' and 'weird' and 'aggressive', partly because of his manner and behaviour, partly because of a cross, with the letters RIP, tattooed on his forehead.

[8] On 21 March 2000 at about 3.35 am Stewart battered the deceased into a coma with a wooden table leg. The deceased was due to be released that day. He never recovered, dying in hospital of brain damage a week later. After the attack Stewart pressed the cell alarm button and, when an officer responded, said that his cellmate had had an accident. When moved to a nearby cell he drew a large swastika on the wall with the heel of his rubber shoe; above it he wrote 'Just killed me padmate' and below it 'RIP'. The Director General of HM Prison Service met the parents of the deceased at the hospital on the day of the attack and, on learning of the death, wrote a letter apologising unreservedly for the failure of the Prison Service to look after the deceased and accepting responsibility for his death. He told them of an internal inquiry he had set up under the leadership of Mr Ted Butt, a serving governor and senior investigating officer of the Prison Service (the Butt Inquiry).

[9] Stewart was charged with murder, and his trial started on 24 October 2000. He admitted the killing. The issue was whether he was guilty of murder or of manslaughter by reason of diminished responsibility. He was convicted of murder. Although the court heard evidence of the circumstances immediately surrounding the killing, including the actions of prison officers at that time, there was no exploration at the trial of cell allocation procedures or other events before the murder.

[10] An inquest into the death of the deceased was formally opened on 31 March 2000 and then adjourned pending trial of the murder charge against Stewart. Following the conviction the Coroner for West London declined to resume the inquest, a decision to which she adhered despite representations inviting her to reconsider it. In an affidavit she has given detailed reasons why the constraints to which coroners and inquests are subject make an inquest an unsuitable vehicle for investigating publicly the issues raised by this case.

[11] The police investigated whether the Prison Service or any of its employees should be prosecuted for manslaughter by gross negligence or under s 3 of the Health and Safety at Work etc Act 1974. The advice of counsel was that there was insufficient evidence to provide a realistic prospect of securing any conviction relating to the death of the deceased. His family were so informed in August 2001.

[12] The terms of reference of the Butt Inquiry were to investigate the circumstances surrounding the murder and in particular to consider the issue of shared accommodation both generally and with particular reference to Stewart, in the light of what was known about his criminal history and institutional behaviour. The family of the deceased were consulted about these terms of reference but were not present at any stage of the investigation and although invited to meet Mr Butt did not avail themselves of this opportunity. Mr Butt's report was in two parts, completed at the end of October and November 2000 respectively. Copies of both parts were made available to the family, save for certain confidential annexes relating to individual prisoners, and no restriction was placed on their use of the report, save for the transcripts of interviews with members of the Prison Service annexed to the first part of the report. The report was made available to the police and the Commission for Racial Equality (the CRE) but was not published. It identified a number of shortcomings at Feltham and made 26 recommendations for change.

[13] On 17 November 2000 the CRE announced that it would be conducting a formal investigation into racial discrimination in the Prison Service. Its terms of reference were wide-ranging and general across the Prison Service but made specific reference to the circumstances leading to the murder of the deceased and any contributing act or omission on the part of the Prison Service. The family were involved in the preparation of the terms of reference and expressed views on the procedures proposed. The family wrote to the CRE asking that they be allowed to participate in its inquiry and for its hearings to be in public, but the CRE refused this request. It stated that the inquiry had to be seen to be impartial and that, although there was to be a 'public component' in its proceedings, it could not conduct the whole inquiry in public. In the event, a public hearing was held on 18 September 2001 when certain high-level policy witnesses made statements and were questioned by counsel for the CRE. Before this hearing the family were offered a meeting with counsel at which they could raise topics which they would like to be covered in the cross-examination. They did not take up this offer and did not attend the public hearing. They had no opportunity to question witnesses. The CRE published its report relating to the deceased (A formal investigation by the Commission for Racial Equality into HM Prison Service of England and Wales. Part 1: The Murder of Zahid Mubarek) in July 2003, very shortly before the hearing in the House. It made a finding of race discrimination against the Prison Service and identified 20 respects in which the administration of Feltham had failed.

[14] Very shortly after the death of the deceased, on 3 April 2000, solicitors for his family wrote to the responsible Minister of State, asking for an independent public inquiry into the death. On 7 and 12 April the minister replied that it was too early to make a decision about a public inquiry pending the police investigation and the Butt Inquiry. At a meeting on 2 November 2000 the minister did not agree to establish a public inquiry. On 31 July 2001 he was asked to reconsider this decision, but he replied that he saw no reason to reverse his earlier decision not to hold such an inquiry.

[15] The appellant, an uncle of the deceased, sought judicial review of (a) the decision of the CRE not to allow the family to participate in the proceedings in any meaningful manner or to hold any significant part of its investigation in public, (b) the decision of the coroner not to resume the inquest and (c) the decision of the Home Secretary not to hold an inquiry in public. Hooper J, before whom these applications came, adjourned the applications against the CRE and the coroner but granted permission to pursue the claim against the Home Secretary. This claim he upheld, ruling that the refusal to hold a public inquiry was a breach of art 2 of the convention. He declared ([2001] EWHC Admin 719, [2001] All ER (D) 69 (Oct) at [92]):

> '... an independent public investigation with the family legally represented, provided with the relevant material and able to cross-examine the principal witnesses, must be held to satisfy the obligations imposed by art 2 of the European Convention on Human Rights.'

The Home Secretary appealed against this decision. In a judgment of the court (Lord Woolf CJ, Laws and Dyson LJJ ([2002] EWCA Civ 390, [2002] 4 All ER 396, [2003] QB 581)) the appeal was allowed and the judge's order set aside. The appellant challenges the ruling of the Court of Appeal and seeks to restore the judge's order.

DOMESTIC LAW

[16] For many centuries the law of England has required a coroner to investigate the death of one who dies in prison. Sewell's Law of Coroner (1843) p 32, referring to the Statute de Officio Coronatoris 1276, put it thus:

> 'It is observable that this statute being wholly directory, and in affirmance of the common law, the Coroner is not thereby restrained from any branch of his power, nor excused from any part of his duty, not mentioned in it, which was incident to his office before; and therefore, though the statute mentions only inquiries of the deaths of persons slain, drowned, or suddenly dead, yet the Coroner ought also to inquire of the death of those who die in prison; to the end that the public may be satisfied whether such persons came to their end by the common cause of nature, or by some unlawful violence, or unreasonable hardships put on them by those under whose power they were confined'.

This duty was recognised by Sir Matthew Hale in History of the Pleas of the Crown (1736) vol 2, p 57 and Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England, Vol 4, Of Public Wrongs (1769) p 274. It found expression in s 11 of the Gaols etc (England) Act 1823, s 48 of the Prisons Act 1865, s 56 of the General Prisons (Ireland) Act 1877, s 53 of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1877, s 3 of the Coroners Act 1887, s 13(2)(b) of the Coroners (Amendment) Act 1926 and s 8 of the Administration of Justice (Emergency Provisions) (Northern Ireland) Act 1939. These statutes are not to identical effect. But in all of them deaths in prison are singled out as cases calling for inquiry. All of them require the inquiry to be conducted by an independent judicial officer (in England, Wales, Ireland and Northern Ireland, a coroner, in Scotland, a sheriff or sheriff substitute). Most of them expressly require the inquiry to be before a jury, and some (the Acts of 1823 and 1865 and the Irish Act of 1877) provide that no inmate or officer of the prison where the death occurred shall be a juror. In some it is provided that, if practicable, 'sufficient time shall be allowed before the holding of the inquest to allow the attendance of the nearest relative of the deceased' (see s 56 of the Irish Act of 1877) or that 'sufficient time shall intervene between the day of the death and the day of the holding the inquiry, to allow the attendance of the next of kin of the deceased' (see s 53 of the Scottish Act of 1877).

[17] Section 8(1)(c) of the Coroners Act 1988, applicable in England and Wales, requires a coroner to hold an inquest on being informed that a person has died in prison. Such an inquest must, by s 8(3)(a), be conducted with a jury. By s 8(6), neither a prisoner in the prison where the deceased died nor any person engaged in any sort of trade or dealing with the prison may serve as a juror at the inquest. The inquest must be held in public (see the Coroners Rules 1984, SI 1984/552, r 17). The family may attend and be legally represented (see the 1984 rules, r 20). They or their representative may question witnesses at the hearing. The coroner is however ordinarily required by s 16(1)(a)(i) of the 1988 Act to adjourn the inquest on being informed that a person has been charged with the murder or manslaughter of the deceased and on the conclusion of the criminal proceedings has a discretionary power (conferred by s 16(3)) to resume the adjourned inquest 'if in his opinion there is sufficient cause to do so'. Section 17A(1)(a) provides for the adjournment of an inquest if the coroner is informed by the Lord Chancellor that a public inquiry conducted or chaired by a judge is being or is to be held into the events surrounding the death.

THE CONVENTION

[18] By art 1 of the convention member states bound themselves to secure to everyone within their respective jurisdictions the rights and freedoms defined in s 1 of the convention. The first of those rights, expressed in art 2(1), is the right to life:

> 'Everyone's right to life shall be protected by law. No one shall be deprived of his life intentionally save in the execution of a sentence of a court following his conviction of a crime for which this penalty is provided by law.'

The provisions of art 2(2), relating to the use of necessary force in defence against unlawful violence, to effect an arrest or prevent an escape from lawful detention or to quell a riot or insurrection, have no bearing on this appeal. Article 2(1) has been repeatedly described as 'one of the most fundamental provisions in the Convention' (see McCann v UK (1996) 21 EHRR 97 at 160 (para 147); Salman v Turkey (2002) 34 EHRR 425 at 481 (para 97); Jordan v UK (2001) 11 BHRC 1 at 29 (para 102)). The European Court of Human Rights has made plain that its approach to the interpretation of art 2 must be guided by the fact that the object and purpose of the convention as an instrument for the protection of individual human beings requires its provisions to be interpreted and applied so as to make its safeguards practical and effective (see McCann v UK (1996) 21 EHRR 97 at 160 (para 146); Salman v Turkey (2002) 34 EHRR 425 at 481 (para 97); Jordan v UK (2001) 11 BHRC 1 at 29 (para 102)).

[19] The primary purposes of art 2 were well described by the European Court in Osman v UK (1998) 5 BHRC 293 at 321 (para 115) when it said:

> 'The court notes that the first sentence of art 2(1) enjoins the state not only to refrain from the intentional and unlawful taking of life, but also to take appropriate steps to safeguard the lives of those within its jurisdiction ... It is common ground that the state's obligation in this respect extends beyond its primary duty to secure the right to life by putting in place effective criminal law provisions to deter the commission of offences against the person backed up by law enforcement machinery for the prevention, suppression and sanctioning of breaches of such provisions. It is thus accepted by those appearing before the court that art 2 of the convention may also imply in certain well-defined circumstances a positive obligation on the authorities to take preventive operational measures to protect an individual whose life is at risk from the criminal acts of another individual.'

But the scope of art 2(1) goes beyond the primary purposes thus defined, as the European Commission of Human Rights explained in its opinion in McCann v UK (1996) 21 EHRR 97 at 140 (para 193):

> 'Having regard therefore to the necessity of ensuring the effective protection of the rights guaranteed under the Convention, which takes on added importance in the context of the right to life, the Commission finds that the obligation imposed on the State that everyone's right to life shall be a "protected by law" may include a procedural aspect. This includes the minimum requirement of a mechanism whereby the circumstances of a deprivation of life by the agents of a state may receive public and independent scrutiny. The nature and degree of scrutiny which satisfies this minimum threshold must, in the Commission's view, depend on the circumstances of the particular case. There may be cases where the facts b surrounding a deprivation of life are clear and undisputed and the subsequent inquisitorial examination may legitimately be reduced to a minimum formality. But equally, there may be other cases, where a victim dies in circumstances which are unclear, in which event the lack of any effective procedure to investigate the cause of the deprivation of life could by itself raise an issue under Article 2 of the Convention.'

c

[20] Most of the recent European cases to which reference was made in argument before the House concerned killings deliberately carried out, or allegedly carried out, by agents of the state. Naturally, therefore, such deliberate killings by state agents were the primary, although not the exclusive, subject of the d European Court's attention. The cases clearly establish a number of important propositions.

(1) It is established by McCann v UK, Yasa v Turkey (1999) 28 EHRR 408 at 447–448 (para 98), Salman v Turkey (2002) 34 EHRR 425 at 483 (para 104) and Jordan v UK (2001) 11 BHRC at 39 (para 105) that (as it was put in McCann v UK (1996) 21 EHRR 97 at 163 (para 161))—

e

'The obligation to protect the right to life under [art 2(1)], read in conjunction with the State's general duty under Article 1 of the Convention to "secure to everyone within their jurisdiction the rights and freedoms defined in [the] Convention", requires by implication that there should be some form of effective official investigation when individuals have been f killed as a result of the use of force by, inter alios, agents of the State.'

(2) Where agents of the state have used lethal force against an individual the facts relating to the killing and its motivation are likely to be largely, if not wholly, within the knowledge of the state, and it is essential both for the relatives and for public confidence in the administration of justice and in the state's adherence to g the principles of the rule of law that a killing by the state be subject to some form of open and objective oversight (see the opinion of the Commission at 139–140 (para 192)).

(3) As it was put in Salman v Turkey (2002) 34 EHRR 425 at 482 (para 99):

h 'Persons in custody are in a vulnerable position and the authorities are under a duty to protect them. Consequently, where an individual is taken into police custody in good health and is found to be injured on release, it is incumbent on the State to provide a plausible explanation of how those injuries were caused [footnote omitted]. The obligation on the authorities j to account for the treatment of an individual in custody is particularly stringent where that individual dies.'

Where the facts are largely or wholly within the knowledge of the state authorities there is an onus on the state to provide a satisfactory and convincing explanation of how the death or injury occurred (at 482 (para 100); Jordan v UK (2001) 11 BHRC 1 at 30 (para 103)).

(4) The obligation to ensure that there is some form of effective official investigation when individuals have been killed as a result of the use of force is not confined to cases where it is apparent that the killing was caused by an agent of the state (see Salman v Turkey (2002) 34 EHRR 425 at 483 (para 105)).

(5) The essential purpose of the investigation was defined by the European Court in Jordan v UK (2001) 11 BHRC 1 at 30 (para 105):

> '... to secure the effective implementation of the domestic laws which protect the right to life and, in those cases involving state agents or bodies, to ensure their accountability for deaths occurring under their responsibility. What form of investigation will achieve those purposes may vary in different circumstances. However, whatever mode is employed, the authorities must act of their own motion, once the matter has come to their attention. They cannot leave it to the initiative of the next of kin either to lodge a formal complaint or to take responsibility for the conduct of any investigative procedures ...'

(6) The investigation must be effective in the sense that (at 31 (para 107))—

> 'it is capable of leading to a determination of whether the force used in such cases was or was not justified in the circumstances ... and to the identification and punishment of those responsible ... This is not an obligation of result, but of means.'

(7) For an investigation into alleged unlawful killing by state agents to be effective, it may generally be regarded as necessary (at 30 (para 106))—

> 'for the persons responsible for and carrying out the investigation to be independent from those implicated in the events ... This means not only a lack of hierarchical or institutional connection but also a practical independence ...'

(8) While public scrutiny of police investigations cannot be regarded as an automatic requirement under art 2 (at 34 (para 121)), there must (at 31 (para 109))—

> 'be a sufficient element of public scrutiny of the investigation or its results to secure accountability in practice as well as in theory. The degree of public scrutiny required may well vary from case to case.'

(9) 'In all cases', as the European Court stipulated, 'the next-of-kin of the victim must be involved in the procedure to the extent necessary to safeguard his or her legitimate interests'.

(10) The European Court has not required that any particular procedure be adopted to examine the circumstances of a killing by state agents, nor is it necessary that there be a single unified procedure (at 39 (para 143)). But it is 'indispensable' (at 39 (para 144)) that there be proper procedures for ensuring the accountability of agents of the state so as to maintain public confidence and allay the legitimate concerns that arise from the use of lethal force.

[21] As pointed out above, the propositions I have sought to summarise were, in the main, laid down in cases involving deliberate killing or alleged killing by agents of the state. Edwards v UK (2002) 12 BHRC 190 is of central importance in this appeal because it was not such a case. Factually it bore strong similarities to the present case. Christopher Edwards, who had shown marked signs of mental illness, was remanded in custody and placed in a prison cell with another man, Richard Linford, who was suffering from acute mental illness. During their first night in the shared cell Richard Linford kicked and stamped Christopher Edwards to death. There were factual differences between that case and this. The period for which the two men shared a cell was much shorter. Richard Linford's plea of guilty to manslaughter on grounds of diminished responsibility was accepted by the prosecution, and a hospital order was made, so there was no contested trial. There was no acceptance of responsibility by the Prison Service. There was in that case a long and thorough inquiry conducted by independent Queen's Counsel. But the case is important because, although addressing a case in which there had been no killing or alleged killing by state agents and the responsibility of the state (if any) could only rest on its negligent failure to protect the life of Christopher Edwards, a prisoner in its custody, the European Court applied essentially the same principles as in the cases already considered. In my respectful opinion, the European Court was fully justified in doing so, for while any deliberate killing by state agents is bound to arouse very grave disquiet, such an event is likely to be rare and the state's main task is to establish the facts and prosecute the culprits; a systemic failure to protect the lives of persons detained may well call for even more anxious consideration and raise even more intractable problems.

[22] In its judgment in Edwards v UK (2002) 12 BHRC 190 at 206 (para 54) the European Court repeated the passage in Osman v UK (1998) 5 BHRC 293 at 321 (para 115) quoted at [19], above, and it found a breach of the obligation there defined ((2002) 12 BHRC 190 at 208 (para 64)). It then turned to consider the procedural obligation to carry out effective investigations. Having summarised the parties' competing submissions the European Court made its assessment (at 210–211) which it is necessary to quote:

> '69. The obligation to protect the right to life under art 2 of the convention, read in conjunction with the state's general duty under art 1 of the convention to "secure to everyone within [its] jurisdiction the rights and freedoms defined in [the] Convention", also requires by implication that there should be some form of effective official investigation when individuals have been killed as a result of the use of force ... The essential purpose of such investigation is to secure the effective implementation of the domestic laws which protect the right to life and, in those cases involving state agents or bodies, to ensure their accountability for deaths occurring under their responsibility. What form of investigation will achieve those purposes may vary in different circumstances. However, whatever mode is employed, the authorities must act of their own motion, once the matter has come to their attention. They cannot leave it to the initiative of the next of kin either to lodge a formal complaint or to take responsibility for the conduct of any investigative procedures ...
>
> 70. For an investigation into alleged unlawful killing by state agents to be effective, it may generally be regarded as necessary for the persons responsible for and carrying out the investigation to be independent from those implicated in the events ... This means not only a lack of hierarchical or institutional connection but also a practical independence ...

71. The investigation must also be effective in the sense that it is capable of leading to a determination of whether the force used in such cases was or was not justified in the circumstances ... and to the identification and punishment of those responsible ... This is not an obligation of result, but of means. The authorities must have taken the reasonable steps available to them to secure the evidence concerning the incident, including inter alia eye witness testimony, forensic evidence and, where appropriate, an autopsy which provides a complete and accurate record of injury and an objective analysis of clinical findings, including the cause of death ... Any deficiency in the investigation which undermines its ability to establish the cause of death or the person or persons responsible will risk falling foul of this standard ...

72. A requirement of promptness and reasonable expedition is implicit in this context ... While there may be obstacles or difficulties which prevent progress in an investigation in a particular situation, a prompt response by the authorities in investigating a use of lethal force may generally be regarded as essential in maintaining public confidence in their adherence to the rule of law and in preventing any appearance of collusion in or tolerance of unlawful acts ...

73. For the same reasons, there must be a sufficient element of public scrutiny of the investigation or its results to secure accountability in practice as well as in theory. The degree of public scrutiny required may well vary from case to case. In all cases, however, the next-of-kin of the victim must be involved in the procedure to the extent necessary to safeguard his or her legitimate interests ...'

[23] No light is shed on the present problem by two cases decided since Edwards v UK. Menson v UK [2003] ECHR 47916/99 concerned a racist attack on a victim who was set on fire and killed in the street by assailants who were not agents of the state and who were duly prosecuted, convicted and sentenced. No blame attached to state authorities for the killing and no breach of the state's investigative duty was found. While certain familiar principles were rehearsed, the complaint was held to be manifestly ill-founded. Finucane v UK [2003] All ER (D) 25 (Jul) was a much more difficult and complex case, but it laid down no principles which had not been laid down before.

THE JUDGE'S DECISION

[24] In approaching the present case Hooper J ([2001] All ER (D) 69 (Oct)) had the benefit of a recent judgment of Jackson J in R (on the application of Wright) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] EWHC Admin 520, (2001) 62 BMLR 16. That case concerned a serving prisoner who suffered a severe asthmatic attack in his cell and died. An inquest was held at which the family of the deceased were present, but unrepresented for want of legal aid. There was no inquiry into the quality of the medical treatment the deceased had received in prison. It later emerged that the responsible medical officer had been suspended from duty and had previously been found guilty of serious professional misconduct. In a civil action against the Home Secretary liability was admitted, thus precluding forensic investigation of the case. The family sought judicial review on the grounds, among others, of a failure to protect the life of the deceased and a failure of the procedural obligation arising under art 2 of the convention to investigate the circumstances of the death.

[25] In a succinct and accurate judgment Jackson J reviewed (at [41]) the domestic and Strasbourg case law, deriving from Jordan v UK the requirement that an investigation, to satisfy art 2, must have certain features:

> '(1) the investigation must be independent; (2) the investigation must be effective; (3) the investigation must be reasonably prompt; (4) there must be a sufficient element of public scrutiny; (5) the next of kin must be involved to an appropriate extent.'

From the recent case law Jackson J derived five propositions of which the fourth was (at [43]):

> 'Where the victim has died and it is arguable that there has been a breach of art 2, the investigation should have the general features identified by the court in Jordan v UK ((2001) 11 BHRC 1 at paras 106–109).'

The judge concluded on the facts that there had not been an effective official investigation into the death of the deceased and held that there should be an independent investigation, to be held in public, at which the family should be represented.

[26] Hooper J examined the facts of the present case, so far as they are known, in some detail, reviewed the relevant case law, adopted Jackson J's summary of the features identified in Jordan v UK as necessary if an investigation were to comply with art 2 and accepted the fourth proposition put forward by Jackson J and quoted above. He concluded that the inquiries and investigations which had been conducted did not, singly or cumulatively, satisfy the investigative duty of the United Kingdom under art 2. He said ([2001] All ER (D) 69 (Oct) at [91]):

> 'Zahid Mubarek was murdered in Feltham by a racist cellmate with "an alarming and violent criminal record, both in and out of custody". It is accepted that Zahid Mubarek was put in the same cell as his killer because of "systemic failures". Established procedures were not followed and there is an appalling history at Feltham of failure to comply with earlier recommendations. It seems likely (and it is certainly arguable) that there were serious human failings both at the wing level and at higher levels which have not been publicly identified. On the facts of this case the obligation to hold an effective and thorough investigation can, in my judgment, only be met by holding a public and independent investigation with the family legally represented, provided with the relevant material and able to cross-examine the principal witnesses. Against the background of the material which I have set out at some length, the family and the public are entitled to such an investigation.'

He accordingly made the declaration quoted at [15], above. Neither Jackson J nor Hooper J had the benefit of the European Court's judgment in Edwards v UK.

THE COURT OF APPEAL DECISION

[27] The Court of Appeal outlined its general approach to the investigative duty arising under art 2 ([2002] 4 All ER 396 at [32], [2003] QB 581 at [32]):

> 'Against this framework of obligations created by art 2, it is useful—and here is our third preliminary—to make some general observations about the nature of the procedural duty to investigate. Plainly there is no duty on the face of the convention to investigate a death. It is clear that such a duty has been constructed or developed by the court at Strasbourg out of a perception that, without it, the substantive rights conferred by art 2 would or might in some cases be rendered nugatory or ineffective. Thus the duty to investigate is adjectival to the duty to protect the right to life, and to the prohibition of the taking of life. It follows that by its nature it cannot be a duty defined by reference to fixed rules. It only has life case by case; contingent upon what is required in any individual instance for the substantive right's protection. Across the spectrum of possible art 2 violations, there are classes of case which can readily be distinguished. One class is that of allegations of deliberate killing—murder—by servants of the state. A second is that of allegations of killing by gross negligence—manslaughter—by servants of the state. A third is that of plain negligence by servants of the state, leading to a death or allowing it to happen. In the context of any of these classes, there exists the lamentable possibility that the state has concealed or is concealing its responsibility for the death. That possibility gives rise to the paradigm case of the duty to investigate. The duty is in every instance fashioned to support and make good the substantive art 2 rights. We shall see, as we go through the movements of the argument, that this approach sits with the Strasbourg jurisprudence, whose character has always been essentially pragmatic.'

After addressing other matters not now relevant, the court considered the scope of the duty to investigate and said (at [45]):

'In the terms in which it was articulated by Mr Crow [for the Home Secretary] at the hearing, the focus of this part of the case appeared to be relatively narrow. Building on Jackson J's judgment in Wright's case (2001) 62 BMLR 16 at [41], which we need not set out, Hooper J ([2001] All ER (D) 69 at [81]–[86]) held that for an investigation to satisfy the procedural requirements of art 2 a number of conditions must be met, including these two: (a) there must be a sufficient element of public scrutiny, and (b) the next of kin must be involved to the appropriate extent. Mr Crow submitted that that is a wrong approach. There are not discrete and cumulative requirements of publicity and family participation. Depending on the particular facts, participation by the next of kin may itself satisfy applicable standards of openness without any additional requirement of public hearings. Now, while these two elements are plainly of great potential importance, it seems to us that this part of the case raises a deeper, or at any rate a more general question. How far may the nature and quality of any investigation embarked upon in satisfaction of the art 2 adjectival duty vary according to the context and subject matter of the case? Are such requirements as publicity and family participation, and other virtuous procedures, constant? It was broadly the claimant's position that they are: the duty is essentially a uniform one, whether the death is due to unlawful violence by state servants, or to recklessness or to negligence. In so submitting Mr O'Connor built especially on Jordan v UK (2002) 11 BHRC 1, and now also on Edwards v UK.'

The court then considered the relevant cases, citing passages from the decisions in Jordan v UK, Wright's case and Edwards v UK and expressed clear conclusions:

'[60] In our view Edwards v UK case represents no fresh departure in the Strasbourg jurisprudence, which in this area, as it is generally, is essentially pragmatic. The Jordan requirements are by no means set in stone. Particular considerations—the absent witnesses, the relative exclusion of the family—coloured the court's decision in Edwards v UK, just as they might colour the decision of a common law court.

[61] In light of the arguments on Edwards v UK it is right to draw special attention to two matters in particular. The first is that the procedural duty to investigate does not appear on the convention's face: it is no more nor less than an adjectival duty, imposed as a corollary of the substantive right guaranteed by art 2. Secondly, the task of our courts is to develop a domestic jurisprudence of fundamental rights, drawing on the Strasbourg cases of which by s 2 of the 1998 Act we are enjoined to take account, but by which we are not bound. In this present context, these two features march together. The reason is that the nature and scope of an adjectival duty, which by definition is not expressly provided for in the convention, must especially be fashioned by the judgment of the domestic courts as to what in their jurisdiction is sensibly required to support and vindicate the substantive convention rights.

[62] Accordingly, this part of the case cannot be satisfactorily resolved by a process of reasoning which sticks like glue to the Strasbourg texts. Just as, in our view, on question (2) Mr Crow originally adopted too rigid an approach to the European Court of Human Rights' jurisprudence in submitting that the duty to investigate was only triggered in cases of the use of unlawful force by state agents, so also on question (3) Mr O'Connor makes the same error in submitting that there are fixed requirements of publicity and family participation, uniformly applicable to every investigation. What is required will vary with the circumstances. A credible accusation of murder or manslaughter by state agents will call for an investigation of the utmost rigour, conducted independently for all to see. An allegation of negligence leading to death in custody, though grave enough in all conscience, bears a different quality from a case where it is said the state had laid on lethal hands. The procedural obligation promotes these interlocking aims: to minimise the risk of future like deaths; to give the beginnings of justice to the bereaved; to assuage the anxieties of the public. The means of their fulfilment cannot be reduced to a catechism of rules. What is required is a flexible approach, responsive to the dictates of the facts case by case. In our judgment the Strasbourg authorities including Edwards v UK are perfectly consistent with this. And it is an approach which embraces what we will say in Middleton's appeal about the coroner's jurisdiction and inquest verdicts of neglect.

[63] In all these circumstances we agree with Mr Crow that publicity and family participation are not necessarily discrete compulsory requirements which must be distinctly and separately fulfilled in every case where the procedural duty to investigate is engaged. Further, and somewhat more broadly, we consider that Jackson J's fourth proposition in his judgment in R (on the application of Wright) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept (2001) 62 BMLR 16 at [43] cannot be accepted at face value. For convenience we set it out again: "Where the victim has died and it is arguable that there has been a breach of art 2, the investigation should have the general features identified by the court in Jordan v UK ((2002) 11 BHRC 1 at paras 106–109)." This might seem to suggest something of a universal formula for all investigations undertaken in fulfilment of art 2, and to that extent we disagree with it. In fairness the judge had just indicated, in proposition (3), that "there is no universal set of rules for the form which an effective official investigation must take", and in our judgment that is entirely correct.'

The Court of Appeal accepted the submission, made on behalf of the Home Secretary, that the judge should have held, on the facts of the case, that the procedural obligation of the United Kingdom had been discharged.

[28] In argument before the House Mr O'Connor QC, for the appellant, sought to restore the order of the judge for very much the reasons the judge had given and contended that the Court of Appeal, in departing from the judge's reasoning, had erred. He accepted that it was for member states to decide how the investigative duty arising under art 2 should be discharged and accepted that some cases would call for more intense scrutiny than others. But he argued that Jordan v UK and Edwards v UK specified an irreducible, minimum standard of review, however achieved, and whether by a single means of investigation or several. That irreducible minimum could be met only by an appropriate level of publicity and an appropriate level of participation by the next of kin. In this case there had been neither. The appellant's legal argument was broadly supported by the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission, which was granted leave to intervene.

[29] Mr Crow, for the Secretary of State, supported the reasoning and the decision of the Court of Appeal. The Strasbourg jurisprudence had laid down principles but not rules which could never be departed from. A member state's duty to investigate was shaped by the facts and circumstances of the particular case. There was no single model of investigation which must be applied in all cases. It was for the state to decide what form of investigation would be appropriate in a given case. Public scrutiny and family participation were not separate requirements. Here, the Prison Service had accepted responsibility for the death. A civil action could be begun with an assured prospect of success. The criminal culpability of Stewart and prison staff had been investigated by the police. There had been a contested criminal trial. There had been a detailed investigation by Mr Butt, leading to a full report, severe criticism of the régime at Feltham and many recommendations. There had been a full report by the CRE, which had been published. The family of the deceased had not taken advantage of the opportunities offered to them to participate. There was no reason to think that any further inquiry would uncover any facts not already known or lead to any improvements not already in train.

CONCLUSIONS

[30] A profound respect for the sanctity of human life underpins the common law as it underpins the jurisprudence under arts 1 and 2 of the convention. This means that a state must not unlawfully take life and must take appropriate legislative and administrative steps to protect it. But the duty does not stop there. The state owes a particular duty to those involuntarily in its custody. As Anand J succinctly put it in Nilabati Behera v State of Orissa [1993] 2 SCR 581 at 607: 'There is a great responsibility on the police or prison authorities to ensure that the citizen in its custody is not deprived of his right to life.' Such persons must be protected against violence or abuse at the hands of state agents. They must be protected against self-harm (see Reeves v Comr of Police of the Metropolis [1999] 3 All ER 897, [2000] 1 AC 360). Reasonable care must be taken to safeguard their lives and persons against the risk of avoidable harm.

[31] The state's duty to investigate is secondary to the duties not to take life unlawfully and to protect life, in the sense that it only arises where a death has occurred or life-threatening injuries have occurred (see Menson v UK [2003] ECHR 47916/99). It can fairly be described as procedural. But in any case where a death has occurred in custody it is not a minor or unimportant duty. In this country, as noted at [16], above, effect has been given to that duty for centuries by requiring such deaths to be publicly investigated before an independent judicial tribunal with an opportunity for relatives of the deceased to participate. The purposes of such an investigation are clear: to ensure so far as possible that the full facts are brought to light; that culpable and discreditable conduct is exposed and brought to public notice; that suspicion of deliberate wrongdoing (if unjustified) is allayed; that dangerous practices and procedures are rectified; and that those who have lost their relative may at least have the satisfaction of knowing that lessons learned from his death may save the lives of others.

[32] Mr Crow was right to insist that the European Court has not prescribed a single model of investigation to be applied in all cases. There must, as he submitted, be a measure of flexibility in selecting the means of conducting the investigation. But Mr O'Connor was right to insist that the European Court, particularly in *Jordan v UK*and Edwards v UK, has laid down minimum standards which must be met, whatever form the investigation takes. Hooper J loyally applied those standards. The Court of Appeal, in my respectful opinion, did not. It diluted them so as to sanction a process of inquiry inconsistent with domestic and convention standards.

[33] There was in this case no inquest. The coroner's decision not to resume the inquest is not the subject of review, and may well have been justified for the reasons she has given. But it is very unfortunate that there was no inquest, since a properly conducted inquest can discharge the state's investigative obligation, as established by McCann v UK. It would overcome the problems exposed by this appeal if effect were given to the recommendations made in Death Certification and Investigation in England, Wales and Northern Ireland: The Report of a Fundamental Review 2003 (June 2003) (Cm 5831), and no doubt that report is receiving urgent official attention.

[34] The police investigations into the criminal culpability of Stewart and the Prison Service were, very properly, conducted in private and without participation by the family. The advice report on which counsel based his advice not to prosecute the Prison Service or any of its members was produced in evidence during these proceedings but not before. It is written in an objective and independent spirit, but it raises many unanswered questions and cannot discharge the state's investigative duty.

[35] The trial of Stewart for murder was directed solely to establishing his mental responsibility for the killing which he had admittedly carried out. It involved little exploration, such as would occur in some murder trials, of wider issues concerning the death.

[36] There is no reason to doubt that Mr Butt set about his task in a conscientious and professional way. He explored the facts, exposed weaknesses in the Feltham regime and recommended changes which, it is understood, have been and are being implemented. It is however plain that as a serving official in the Prison Service he did not enjoy institutional or hierarchical independence. His investigation was conducted in private. His report was not published. The family were not able to play any effective part in his investigation and would not have been able to do so even if they had accepted the limited offer made to them.

[37] The CRE report, which was not before the judge or the Court of Appeal, brings additional facts to light (although some of these, such as the discovery of a handmade wooden dagger under Stewart's pillow after the murder, raise many further questions). The report has been published. But the CRE inquiry, conducted under the Race Relations Act 1976, was necessarily confined to race-related issues and this case raises other issues also (as did Edwards v UK, where there was no race issue). Save for a single day devoted to policy issues, the inquiry was conducted in private. The family were not able to play any effective part in it and would not have been able to do so even if they had taken advantage of the limited opportunity they were offered. Whether assessed singly or together, the investigations conducted in this case are much less satisfactory than the long and thorough investigation conducted by independent Queen's Counsel in Edwards v UK, but even that was held inadequate to satisfy art 2(1) because it was held in private, with no opportunity for the family to attend save when giving evidence themselves and without the power to obtain all relevant evidence.

[38] I consider that the judge was right to reach the conclusion and make the order which he did. For the foregoing reasons, and those given by my noble and learned friends Lord Slynn of Hadley, Lord Steyn and Lord Hope of Craighead, I would accordingly allow the appeal and restore his order.

[39] I cannot accept the submission of Mr Crow that any further inquiry is unlikely to unearth new and significant facts. The papers before the House raise questions which any legal representative of the family would properly wish to pursue and the discovery of further new facts of significance may well be probable. But it is true that there are factual areas—for example, the killing itself, and the cause of death—which have already been fully explored and of which little or no further examination is required. Many of the factual findings made by Mr Butt and the CRE can no doubt be taken as read. It will be very important for the investigator to take a firm grip on the inquiry so as to concentrate the evidence and focus the cross-examination on issues justifying further exploration. Reliance should be placed on written statements and submissions so far as may properly be done at a hearing required to be held in public. All those professionally engaged, for any party, should bear in mind their professional duty to ensure that the investigation of this tragic and unnecessary death is conducted in a focused and disciplined way.

LORD SLYNN OF HADLEY.

[40] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill. He has set out in detail the facts and the relevant passages of the opinions of the European Commission of Human Rights and the judgments of the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg. These judgments clearly recognise that art 2 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) is to be read as including not only a duty not to take life, but in some circumstances to take steps to prevent life being taken and as part of that duty an obligation to investigate the circumstances surrounding the death.

[41] The duty to investigate is partly one owed to the next of kin of the deceased as representing the deceased: it is partly to others who may in similar circumstances be vulnerable and whose lives may need to be protected. The significance of this duty to those detained in prison, not least where prisons are crowded and prisoners often dangerous, is obvious. It does not seem to me to be possible to say that there is a clear dividing line between those cases where an agent of the state kills and those cases where an agent of the state or the system is such that a killing may take place. The result of 'an incident waiting to happen' may just as much as an actual killing require detailed and profound investigation, though in some cases the procedure to be adopted may be justifiably different.

[42] The European Court and the Commission have clearly recognised (McCann v UK (1996) 21 EHRR 97 at 140 (para 193)) that—

> 'The nature and degree of scrutiny which satisfies [the] minimum threshold [of a public and independent scrutiny] must, in the Commission's view, depend on the circumstances of the particular case.'

'What form of investigation will achieve those purposes may vary in different circumstances' (see Jordan v UK (2001) 11 BHRC 1 at 30 (para 105). See also Edwards v UK (2002) 12 BHRC 190 at 210 (para 69)).

[43] Such investigation must however be by an independent person, and be 'effective' to satisfy the relevant duty (see Edwards v UK at 210–211 (paras 69–73)). There must be a sufficient element of public scrutiny and the next of kin or the family must be involved to an appropriate extent (see Jordan v UK (2001) 11 BHRC 1 at 31 (para 109)).

[44] Even though there may be room for flexibility in the procedures adopted by different member states, the European Court has insisted on a minimum threshold. In my opinion, even if the United Kingdom courts are only to take account of the Strasbourg court decisions and are not strictly bound by them (see s 2 of the 1998 Act), where the court has laid down principles and, as here, a minimum threshold requirement, United Kingdom courts should follow what the Strasbourg court has said. If they do not do so without good reason the dissatisfied litigant has a right to go to Strasbourg where existing jurisprudence is likely to be followed.

[45] It seems to me that in the present case the judge ([2001] EWHC Admin 719, [2001] All ER (D) 69 (Oct)) did, but the Court of Appeal ([2002] EWCA Civ 390, [2002] 4 All ER 396, [2003] QB 581) did not, give sufficient effect to the judgments of the Strasbourg court.

[46] There were here a number of inquiries of different kinds which went some way to fulfil the minimum threshold duty but for the reasons given by Lord Bingham of Cornhill there were features of each stage of the inquiry which did not achieve the minimum threshold.

[47] I do not for my part criticise those who held the inquiries, such as Mr Butt, since they were carrying out specific tasks no doubt in the way they were intended to do. Nor is it necessarily wrong to show that, if not in one compendious inquiry, through different inquiries, the overall test has been satisfied. But here in my opinion, even looking at all the inquiries, the test overall has not been satisfied either as to the degree of public scrutiny or as to the participation of the next of kin and the relatives.

[48] One is left with a profound sense of unease that this investigation did not adequately investigate the matter in an acceptable way. For example, although it may be accepted that on 8 February 2000 Stewart was placed in cell 38 with the deceased because there was no other place available, there is no real explanation as to why it was necessary to keep him there from 8 February to 21 March 2000 in view of all the circumstances.

[49] I would therefore allow the appeal for the reasons given by Lord Bingham of Cornhill as briefly supplemented in this speech.

LORD STEYN.

[50] My Lords, in my view the Court of Appeal approached the Strasbourg jurisprudence, and in particular the decision in Edwards v UK (2002) 12 BHRC 190, in the wrong way. The Court of Appeal observed ([2002] EWCA Civ 390 at [62], [2002] 4 All ER 396 at [62], [2003] QB 581):

> '... this part of the case cannot be satisfactorily resolved by a process of reasoning which sticks like glue to the Strasbourg texts ... What is required will vary with the circumstances. A credible accusation of murder or manslaughter by state agents will call for an investigation of the utmost rigour, conducted independently for all to see. An allegation of negligence leading to death in custody, though grave enough in all conscience, bears a different quality from a case where it is said the state has laid on lethal hands. The procedural obligation promotes these interlocking aims: to minimise the risk of future like deaths; to give the beginnings of justice to the bereaved; to assuage the anxieties of the public. The means of their fulfilment cannot be reduced to a catechism of rules. What is required is a flexible approach, responsive to the dictates of the facts case by case. In our judgment the Strasbourg authorities including Edwards v UK are perfectly consistent with this.'

The Court of Appeal plainly thought that in the case of acts by state agents causing death in custody there is a more exacting and rigorous duty to investigate than in cases of negligent omissions leading to death in custody. That cases in the former category may be a greater affront to the public conscience than cases in the latter category can readily be accepted. But the investigation of cases of negligence resulting in the death of prisoners may often be more complex and may require more elaborate investigation. Systemic failures also affect more prisoners. The European Court of Human Rights has interpreted art 2 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998) as imposing minimum standards which must be met in all cases. And in the decision in Edwards v UK the European Court applied the same minimum standards to a case of omissions as it had previously applied in Jordan v UK (2001) 11 BHRC 1 to acts by state agents. The distinction drawn by the Court of Appeal infected its analysis of the Strasbourg decisions. Relying on this distinction the Court of Appeal in effect departed from the requirements as explained in Edwards v UK. Given the crucial public importance of investigating all deaths in custody properly, I consider that full effect must be given to the Strasbourg jurisprudence. I prefer the decisions of Jackson J in R (on the application of Wright) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] EWHC Admin 520, (2001) 62 BMLR 16 and Hooper J ([2001] EWHC Admin 719, [2001] All ER (D) 69 (Oct)) in the instant case to the judgment of the Court of Appeal.

[51] If the Court of Appeal had applied the Strasbourg jurisprudence correctly, I consider it unlikely that the Court of Appeal would have concluded (contrary to the view of the trial judge) that the procedural obligation to investigate was in any event discharged in this case. The Butt Inquiry does not have the quality of institutional or hierarchical independence. The CRE inquiry, the report of which (A formal investigation by the Commission for Racial Equality into HM Prison Service of England and Wales. Part 1: The Murder of Zahid Mubarek (2003)) has now become available, was largely conducted in private and the focus was on race-related issues. That leaves only the police investigation and the criminal trial. On that basis it is obvious, and conceded, that there was no adequate inquiry.

[52] The Court of Appeal posed the question: what would be the benefit of a further inquiry? The investigations conducted so far do not, either singly or together, meet the minimum standards required to satisfy art 2. But, in any event, it is vital that procedure and the merits should be kept strictly apart otherwise the merits may be judged unfairly (see Wade and Forsyth Administrative Law (8th edn, 2000) pp 501–503). In John v Rees [1969] 2 All ER 274 at 309, [1970] Ch 345 at 402, Megarry J observed about the argument that 'it will make no difference':

> 'As everybody who has anything to do with the law well knows, the path of the law is strewn with examples of open and shut cases which, somehow, were not; of unanswerable charges which, in the event, were completely answered; of inexplicable conduct which was fully explained; of fixed and unalterable determinations that, by discussion, suffered a change.'

This observation is apposite to the assumption that, although there has not been an adequate inquiry, it may be refused because nothing useful is likely to turn up. That judgment cannot fairly be made until there has been an inquiry.

[53] For the reasons given by Lord Bingham of Cornhill, as well as my brief reasons, I would also allow the appeal and restore the order of Hooper J.

LORD HOPE OF CRAIGHEAD.

[54] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speeches of my noble and learned friends Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Steyn. I agree with them, and for the reasons which they have given I too would allow the appeal and restore the order of Hooper J. I should like however to add a few words by way of a supplement to Lord Bingham's review of the domestic law on the investigation of deaths in prison.

[55] There is no coroner in Scotland. The system in Scotland for the investigation of sudden deaths depends instead on the sheriff and the public prosecutor. To a large extent the question whether an investigation is needed is left to the discretion of the procurator fiscal of the area where the death occurred. In the performance of that function he is answerable to the Lord Advocate. But in some cases the holding of a public inquiry is mandatory, and it has for a long time been recognised in Scotland that it is in the public interest for a public inquiry to be held into the death of a person who at the time of the death was being held in legal custody. Section 53 of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1877, to which Lord Bingham of Cornhill has referred, was replaced by s 25 of the Prisons (Scotland) Act 1952. In the event of the death of a prisoner it was the duty of the governor under that section to give immediate notice to the procurator fiscal in whose area the prison was situated and, where practicable, to the prisoner's nearest relative. It was the duty of the procurator fiscal then to hold a public inquiry into the death before the sheriff and, where practicable, to allow sufficient time for the prisoner's next of kin to attend the inquiry.

[56] The legislation on this subject was consolidated and amended by the Fatal Accidents and Sudden Deaths Inquiry (Scotland) Act 1976. It comprised the Fatal Accidents Inquiry (Scotland) Act 1895, which provided for a compulsory inquiry into any death resulting from an accident sustained during industrial employment or occupation, the Fatal Accidents and Sudden Deaths Inquiry (Scotland) Act 1906, which gave the Lord Advocate discretion to order an inquiry into any sudden or suspicious death where he considered this to be expedient in the public interest, and s 25 of the 1952 Act. The system which was introduced by the 1895 Act was for an investigation to be held in public by a sheriff and jury, whose verdict set forth when and where the accident and the death took place and the cause of death (see s 4(7)). Section 2 of the 1906 Act required the jury's verdict to deal also with the cause of the accident, the person if any who was responsible for it, the precautions if any by which it might have been avoided and any other facts disclosed by the evidence which in the opinion of the jury were relevant to the inquiry. In practice, the verdict of the jury was usually dictated by the sheriff and in many cases the jury simply returned a formal verdict.

[57] As the law in Scotland now stands, following the amendments introduced by the 1976 Act, juries are no longer used for these inquiries. The system instead is for the procurator fiscal to investigate the circumstances of the death, and for the inquiry (known as a fatal accident inquiry or, more colloquially, an FAI) to be held in public by the sheriff. It is held at a time and place which has been intimated to the nearest known relative and of which public notice has also been given. It is the duty of the procurator fiscal to adduce evidence at the inquiry as to the circumstances, and it is the sheriff's task to make a determination setting out the circumstances so far as they have been established to his satisfaction by the evidence.

[58] The statute provides that the circumstances which are to be set out in the sheriff's determination must include (a) where and when the death and any accident resulting in the death took place, (b) the cause or causes of the death and any such accident, (c) the reasonable precautions, if any, whereby the death and any accident resulting in the death might have been avoided, (d) the defects, if any, in any system of working which contributed to the death or any accident resulting in the death and (e) any other facts which are relevant to the circumstances of the death. The holding of an FAI in the case of the death of a person who, at the time of his death, was in legal custody is mandatory (see 1976 Act, s 1(1)(a)(ii)). For the purposes of that provision he is in legal custody if he is detained in a prison, remand centre or young offenders institution, in a police station, police cell or other similar place or is being taken to or from any such place (see s 1(4)). The procurator has power to compel witnesses to give him information which is within his knowledge regarding any matter relevant to the investigation (see s 2(2)). The inquiry is open to the public (see s 4(3)). The rules of evidence, the procedure and the powers of the sheriff to deal with contempt of court and to enforce the attendance of witnesses at the inquiry are as nearly as possible the same as those which he has when he is sitting in an ordinary civil cause (see s 4(7)).

[59] An example of the flexibility of this system and its ability to deal with complex and difficult issues is provided by the fatal accident inquiry which was held in 1996 by Sheriff Sir Stephen Young in the sheriff court at Paisley into the crash of the RAF Chinook helicopter into the Mull of Kintyre on 2 June 1994 which killed all those who were on board the aircraft. The evidence for the Crown was presented by counsel. The families of the two pilots were separately represented, as were the families of all the deceased other than the pilots and the manufacturer of the helicopter. The inquiry involved the hearing of evidence and submissions over some 16 days, and the sheriff's determination which extended to 123 pages contained a detailed and careful analysis of the evidence (see Report from the Select Committee on Chinook ZD 576 (HL Paper 25(iii) (2001–2002)) paras 19–21).

[60] I mention these details because there is no doubt that the procedure which would have had to have been followed under the 1976 Act if at the time of his death the deceased had been in legal custody in Scotland satisfies the procedural obligation to carry out an effective investigation which is imposed on the United Kingdom by art 2 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998). In Edwards v UK (2002) 12 BHRC 190 at 212–213 (para 83) the European Court of Human Rights said:

> 'The government argued that the publication of the report secured the requisite degree of public scrutiny. The court has indicated that publicity of proceedings or the results may satisfy the requirements of art 2, provided that in the circumstances of the case the degree of publicity secures the accountability in practice as well as theory of the state agents implicated in events. In the present case, where the deceased was a vulnerable individual who lost his life in a horrendous manner due to a series of failures by public bodies and servants who bore a responsibility to safeguard his welfare, the court considers that the public interest attaching to the issues thrown up by the case was such as to call for the widest exposure possible.'

The circumstances which have resulted in the death of a prisoner while he is in custody are capable of being given the widest exposure by this system, which is conducted in the public interest by the public prosecutor. The fact that it involves a public hearing in which the prisoner's next of kin are entitled to participate provides an ample opportunity for the circumstances to be subjected to public scrutiny, and the sheriff's determination is an effective vehicle for ensuring that those whom the evidence shows are responsible for deaths occurring under their responsibility are made accountable.

[61] The Court of Appeal ([2002] EWCA Civ 390 at [61], [2002] 4 All ER 396 at [61], [2003] QB 581) described the procedural duty to investigate as no more or less than an adjectival duty. They observed that, as this duty was by definition not expressly provided for in the convention, it must be fashioned by the judgment of the domestic courts as to what in their jurisdiction is sensibly required to support and vindicate the substantive convention rights. They added (at [62]) that this issue could not be satisfactorily resolved by a process of reasoning which stuck like glue to the Strasbourg texts. What was needed was a flexible approach, responsive to the dictates of the facts case by case. I would not quarrel with these propositions. But I disagree with the conclusion which the court drew from them. This was that an allegation of negligence leading to death in custody bears a different quality from a case where it is said that the prisoner's death resulted from the laying of lethal hands on him by the state.

[62] In my opinion failures by the Prison Service which lead to a prisoner's death at the hands of another prisoner are no less demanding of investigation, and of 'the widest exposure possible', than lethal acts which state agents have deliberately perpetrated. Indeed there is a strong case for saying that an even more rigorous investigation is needed if those who are responsible for such failures are to be identified and made accountable and the right to life is to be protected by subjecting the system itself to effective public scrutiny. Some form of effective investigation is, of course, needed when prisoners have been killed as a result of force by, inter alios, agents of the state (see McCann v UK (1996) 21 EHRR 97 at 163 (para 161)). But, as the words 'inter alios' indicate, the obligation to safeguard the lives of prisoners is not confined to those who are at risk from the acts of state agents. It extends with equal force to all those whose lives are at risk from the criminal acts of another individual (see Osman v UK (1998) 5 BHRC 293 at 321 (para 115)).

[63] The court has made it clear that a fatal accident inquiry according to the Scottish model is not the only option. The choice of method is essentially a matter for decision by each contracting state within its own domestic legal order. The court also accepts that the form of investigation which will achieve the purposes of the convention may vary in different circumstances (see Edwards v UK (2002) 12 BHRC 190 at 210 (para 69)). Mr O'Connor QC said that in principle a coroner's inquest would satisfy the requirements of art 2. But he submitted that there must at best be a considerable doubt as to whether it would do so in this case in the light of its unusual facts and circumstances.

[64] For reasons which she has explained in her affidavit the, Coroner for West London, in the exercise of her discretion, declined to reconvene the inquest into Zahid Mubarek's death which was formally opened and then adjourned to await the prosecution of Robert Stewart for murder. As she pointed out, a number of practical problems are posed by the workload and availability of the coroner which would have made it very difficult for her to commit the time and resources that would have been needed to conduct the investigation that is required in this case. She accepts that the conditions of the office would be no answer if it was plain that the holding of an inquest was the appropriate remedy. But there are other, more fundamental, reasons for not taking this course. These are to be found in the legal restraints which are provided by the Coroners Act 1988 and the Coroners Rules 1984, SI 1984/552. The coroner is restricted to a simple short verdict. She cannot make recommendations, and many of the issues which still need to be investigated in public as indicated in Hooper J's judgment ([2001] EWHC Admin 719, [2001] All ER (D) 69 (Oct)) would be beyond the scope of her inquest.

[65] I agree that the various investigatory processes into Mr Mubarek's killing which have been conducted so far fall well short of providing the effective public scrutiny that is needed in a case of this kind. Substantial changes in the existing system for the investigation of deaths by coroners have been proposed (see Death Certification and Investigation in England, Wales and Northern Ireland: The Report of a Fundamental Review 2003 (June 2003) (Cm 5831)). But they will require legislation, and it must be assumed that these changes will not be applied retrospectively to deaths which have already occurred. The only alternative in these circumstances is for the Secretary of State to order the holding of an independent public inquiry into the circumstances which led to Mr Mubarek's death. Subject to the observations at the end of Lord Bingham of Cornhill's speech with which I am in full agreement and to the fact that the person who conducts it will lack the powers which could only be given by statute, I suggest that the conduct and scope of this inquiry should be as close to the Scottish model as possible.

LORD HUTTON.

[66] My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in draft the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Bingham of Cornhill. I agree with it, and for the reasons which he gives I too would allow this appeal.

Appeal allowed.

Dilys Tausz Barrister.

Football Association Premier League Ltd and others v Panini UK Ltd

[2003] EWCA Civ 995

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

BROOKE, MUMMERY AND CHADWICK LJJ

30 APRIL, 11 JULY 2003

Copyright – Infringement – Defence – Incidental inclusion of copyright material – Test to be applied – Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988, s 31(1).

The defendant company distributed for sale within the United Kingdom collectible stickers depicting well-known football players. Each sticker had, on its face, a photographic image of one player and his name. For the most part the players were shown wearing their club 'strip' which bore the individual club badge and the premier league emblem. The first claimant (FAPL) licensed the production of an official sticker and album collection. By that licence FAPL, acting on behalf of the premier league clubs, granted the licensee exclusive rights to use and reproduce official team crests and logos in the production of stickers and albums. Proceedings were brought by FAPL, the licensee and certain of the premier league clubs seeking an injunction restraining the infringement of their copyright by the inclusion of copies on stickers and in the album published and distributed by the defendant. The defendant argued that it could rely on the provisions in s 31[a] of the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988 which provided that copyright in a work was not infringed by its incidental inclusion in an artistic work. The judge ruled that the word 'incidental' in s 31 bore the meaning as something casual or of secondary importance. He granted the injunction having held that the inclusion of the badge was self-evidently not incidental as it was an integral part of the artistic work which comprised the photograph of the professional footballer in his kit. That was what the defendant intended and without the badge, it would not have the complete picture which it wished to produce. The defendant appealed.

Held – The relevant question for the purposes of testing 'incidentality' in the context of s 31(1) of the 1988 Act was why had the work in relation to which copyright was said to be infringed (work 'A') been included in the photograph (work 'B'), which was said to constitute the infringement. That question had to be answered by making an objective assessment of the circumstances in which work 'B' was created. It did not depend on any inquiry into the subjective intent of the individual employee who created the image or of the photographer who took the picture from which the image was derived. However, in addressing that question there was no reason why consideration could not be given to the commercial reason why work 'A' had been included in work 'B' as well as to any aesthetic reason. It was obvious, when subsections (1) and (3) of s 31 were read together, that 'incidental', in the context of subsection (1), was not confined to unintentional, or non-deliberate, inclusion. If it were, subsection (3), which dealt with the particular case of incidental, or background, music in a film or broadcast, a Section 31 is set out, so far as material, at [18], below for example, would be unnecessary. But in the instant case since the objective, when creating the image of the player as it appeared on the sticker or in the album was to produce something which would be attractive to a collector, namely an image of a player appearing in his authentic club strip, and the authenticity of that image depended on the inclusion in that image of the individual club badge and FAPL emblem in which copyright subsisted, it was impossible to say that the inclusion was incidental. Accordingly the appeal would be dismissed (see [24], [26]–[28], [39], [40], below).

Notes

For incidental inclusion of copyright material, see 9(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 340.

For the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988, s 31(1), see 11 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2000 reissue) 446.

Case referred to in judgments

IPC Magazines Ltd v MGN Ltd [1998] FSR 431.

Appeal

The defendant, Panini UK Ltd, appealed with permission of Arden LJ granted on 31 December 2002, from the order of Peter Smith J given on 13 December 2002 ([2002] EWHC 2779 (Ch), [2003] FSR 698) whereby he granted an interim injunction to the claimants, the Football Association Premier League Ltd, Topps Europe Ltd and 14 of the 20 clubs that were members of the premier league, restraining the defendant from infringing the claimants' copyright by the inclusion of copies on stickers and in the album published and distributed by the defendant bearing any copy of the whole or any part of the premier league logo or of any club badges of 11 of the clubs listed in the schedule to the order. The facts are set out in the judgment of Chadwick LJ.

Mark Platts-Mills QC and James St Ville (instructed by McCormicks, Leeds) for the defendant.

Martin Howe QC and Iona Berkeley (instructed by Dechert) for the claimants.

Cur adv vult

11 July 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

CHADWICK LJ.

[1] This is an appeal from an order made on 13 December 2002 by Peter Smith J ([2002] EWHC 2779 (Ch), [2003] FSR 698) in copyright proceedings brought against the appellant, Panini UK Ltd. The principal issue raised in the proceedings was whether the appellant could rely on the provisions in s 31 of the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988 which relate to the incidental inclusion in an artistic work of other work in which copyright subsists. The judge held, on facts as to which there was no material dispute, that the appellant could not do so. The question on this appeal is whether the judge was right to reach that conclusion.

THE UNDERLYING FACTS

[2] Panini UK Ltd distributes for sale within the United Kingdom collectible stickers depicting well-known football players. The stickers are sold in conjunction with an album, also distributed for sale by Panini. The album provides a designated space for each sticker in the collection; so that, when the album is full, the collection is complete. Stickers are sold in packets of five. They are packaged in such a way that the stickers within each packet are not identifiable at the point of sale; thereby introducing an element of chance which—it must be assumed—adds interest to the task of completing the collection. It is clear from the evidence before the judge that there is a well-established and active market for product of this nature, particularly amongst the young. The evidence shows, also, that (as might be expected) a secondary market in 'swaps' has developed amongst collectors.

[3] The sticker collections for which Panini is distributor include 'Panini's Football 2003 Sticker Collection', which was launched at the end of last year. The album comprises 64 pages, within covers. Ten of those pages are devoted to 'World Superstars', one to 'Hotshots' and there is one introductory page. The remaining 52 pages are for the 20 clubs which play in the Barclaycard Premiership competition (the 'premier league'). The majority of those clubs are given a double page spread; but there are six (Arsenal, Chelsea, Leeds, Liverpool, Manchester United and Newcastle United) which are given two double pages. Each double page spread provides spaces for the insertion of 12 stickers; and includes, in addition, photographic images of two of the club's players.

[4] The sticker collection (excluding World Superstars and Hotshots) comprises 312 club players. If World Superstars (78) and Hotshots (6) are included, the number rises to 396. Each sticker is about 2·5 inches by 2 inches in size and has, on its face, a photographic image of one player and his name. On the reverse there is a distinctive number, corresponding to a numbered space in the album. For the most part the players are shown in action and in club 'strip'. There are exceptions to that general rule—for example, two of the Aston Villa players are shown in their international strip—but those exceptions are few. It is plain that the stickers have been produced on the basis that one of the attractions to the collector will be that players are pictured in the appropriate club strip. That is emphasised by the fact that the club strip—or 'colours'—is described in each of the relevant sections of the album; and that the photographs in the album itself are also of players in their club strip.

[5] Each of the premier league clubs has a distinctive strip—shirt, shorts and socks—in its own colours. Typically the shirts include the name or logo of the manufacturer and the team sponsor—for example, the Chelsea strip includes the well-known 'Umbro' logo and the words 'Fly Emirates'. Those are likely to be trade marks, but no complaint is made about that. The probability is that the owners of the marks are content that their name or logo should be displayed in the context in which it appears in the Panini sticker collection and album. Nor is any complaint made, in this action, as to infringement of copyright or design right in the strip as a whole. The complaint is based on two particular features of the strip: the individual club badge and the premier league emblem.

[6] Each premier league club has its own distinctive badge or crest. These range from the club's initials in the form of a logo (Chelsea, Fulham), to quasi-heraldic devices (Liverpool, Manchester City, Newcastle United). Typically the badge appears on the shirt over the left breast; but there are cases (Bolton Wanderers, Charlton Athletic, Liverpool) where it appears in the centre of the chest. A photographic image of a player in action in club strip will almost invariably include the club badge. It must do so unless the badge is obscured (say, by the player's hand or arm) or the angle of the photograph is such that it does not show a clear front view of the player. The overwhelming majority of the stickers in the Panini 2003 collection do show the club badge; as do almost all the photographs in the album itself.

[7] The premier league emblem is an heraldic lion passant with one foot or paw on a football. A number of the premier league clubs include that emblem on their strip, in addition to the individual club badge. It can be seen plainly on both sleeves of the Everton, Liverpool, Manchester City and West Ham shirts. It appears also on the captains' armbands. In those cases where the premier league emblem is a part of the club strip, it is as likely as not that a photographic image of a player in action in club strip will include that emblem as well as the individual club badge. Whether it does turns on the angle from which the photograph has been taken.

[8] The premier league was instituted in 1992. The league is organised by the Football Association Premier League Ltd (FAPL) under agreements with the participating clubs. In each season since the inception of the league FAPL has licensed the production of an official sticker and album collection. In a witness statement made by the company secretary of FAPL it is explained that the licensed product is aimed mainly at children, and that it is important that the players appear in authentic club strip:

> 'The purpose is to set up a situation where children buy and swap stickers with a view to completing the album ... I believe that the product is rendered very much more attractive to its customers because the players are depicted in the authentic strip of the Clubs they represent, including the Club crest and other images marked on the strip.'

As I have said, that may fairly be taken to be Panini's view also.

[9] In each year since 1994 the licensee has been Topps Europe Ltd (formerly known as Merlin Publishing International Ltd). When these proceedings were commenced the current licence was that granted on 28 February 2001, following a competitive tendering process in which Panini (amongst others) had taken part. By that licence FAPL, acting on behalf of the premier league clubs, granted Topps exclusive rights 'to use and reproduce official team crests and logos' in the production of stickers and albums. That was a licence for which Topps paid a substantial sum. Panini's participation in the tender process indicates that it took the view that an exclusive licence was of value. Nevertheless, Panini now claims to be entitled to distribute stickers and an album without having obtained a licence from FAPL or the premier league clubs. Panini is careful to describe its album as 'Unofficial': that word appears on the cover of the album. By contrast, the Topps product is described as 'The Official F.A. Premier League Sticker Collection 2003'.

THESE PROCEEDINGS

[10] These proceedings were brought by FAPL, Topps and 14 of the 20 clubs that are members of the premier league. FAPL and the clubs claimed to be owners of the copyright in the FAPL emblem and the individual club badges; Topps claimed as exclusive licensee. The relief sought in the proceedings was an injunction restraining infringement of the claimants' copyright by the inclusion of copies on stickers and in the album published and distributed by Panini, an inquiry as to damages or an account of profits and interest, and delivery up of the infringing material. Application was made, under CPR Pt 23, for an interim injunction until after the trial of the action.

[11] That application came before Peter Smith J on 12 December 2002. He took the view that the issue raised by the application could be resolved, under the provisions of CPR Pt 24, without the need for a trial; and he approached the application on that basis. It is clear from the judgment which he gave on the following day ([2003] FSR 698) that he did not see this as a case for an interim remedy—to be granted or withheld by reference to considerations of uncompensatable disadvantage or, as it is commonly put, on the balance of convenience. He thought that this was a case in which the appropriate remedy was a final order.

[12] Nevertheless, the order which he made on 13 December 2002 was an interim order restraining the appellant 'until after judgment in this action' from offering for sale, selling, distributing or issuing to the public any album, sticker collection or stickers bearing any copy of the whole or any part of the premier league logo or of any club badges of the 11 clubs listed in the schedule to that order. He accepted that, in respect of the other three clubs, ownership of copyright in the individual club badges had not been made out on the material before him and raised issues which should go to trial. The judge gave liberty to the parties to apply for substitution of a final order. He refused permission to appeal to this court.

[13] Permission to appeal was granted by this court (Arden LJ) on 31 December 2002. When granting that permission she ordered a stay on the substitution of a final order for the interim order which the judge had made. So it is that the appeal now before this court is, in form, an appeal against an interim order. None the less, the appeal has been argued on the basis that the court can and should decide the issue whether s 31 of the 1988 Act provides a defence to the claims to infringement of copyright in this case as if the order under appeal were a final order.

[14] The probability must be that, with the passage of time, there is now little or no market for the Panini 2003 collection. But the issue raised by this appeal (if not determined by the court) is likely to arise, again, in relation to a 2004 collection in the autumn of this year. The point is not academic; and this court can properly be asked to decide it.

THE 1988 ACT

[15] The 1988 Act was enacted for the purpose, amongst others, of amending and restating the law of copyright, formerly set out in the Copyright Act 1956. Section 1(1) provides that copyright is a property right, subsisting in accordance with the provisions in Pt I of the Act in work within the following descriptions (so far as material): (a) original literary, dramatic, musical or artistic works, and (b) sound recordings, films, broadcasts or cable programmes. In that context 'literary work' means any work, other than a dramatic or musical work, which is written, spoken or sung (and, in particular, includes a table or compilation) (see s 3(1)(a)) and 'artistic work' includes 'a graphic work, photograph ... irrespective of artistic quality' (see s 4(1)(a)). The author of a literary or artistic work is the first owner of any copyright in it—save that, where the work is made by an employee in the course of his employment, his employer is the first owner, subject to any agreement to the contrary (see s 11). Ownership of copyright may, of course, be transferred to another by the first owner, or by any succeeding owner.

[16] Part I, Ch II of the 1988 Act sets out the rights of the copyright owner. In particular, s 16(1) gives to the owner of the copyright in a work the exclusive right to copy the work and to issue copies of the work to the public. Those acts (and others, not material in the present case) are 'acts restricted by the copyright'. Subject to the following provisions in Pt I, Ch II copyright in a work is infringed by a person who, without the licence of the copyright owner does, or authorises another to do, any of the acts restricted by the copyright. 'Copying', in relation to a literary or artistic work, means reproducing the work in any material form (see s 17(2)). An article is 'an infringing copy' if its making constituted an infringement of the copyright in the work in question (see s 27(2)) or if it has been or is proposed to be imported into the United Kingdom and its making in the United Kingdom would have constituted an infringement of the copyright in the work in question (see s 27(3)).

[17] Sections 22–26 are directed to what is described as 'secondary infringement'. Copyright in a work is infringed by a person who, without the licence of the copyright owner, imports into the United Kingdom (otherwise than for his private and domestic use) an article which is, and which he knows or has reason to believe is, an infringing copy of the work (see s 22). Copyright is also infringed by a person who, without the licence of the copyright owner, (a) possesses in the course of business, (b) sells or offers for sale, or (c) in the course of a business distributes, an article which is, and which he knows or has reason to believe is, an infringing copy of the work (see s 23).

[18] Part I, Ch III of the 1988 Act contains provisions which 'specify acts which may be done in relation to copyright works notwithstanding the subsistence of copyright' (see s 28(1)). Those provisions include s 31, which (so far as material) is in these terms:

> '(1) Copyright in a work is not infringed by its incidental inclusion in an artistic work, sound recording, film, broadcast or cable programme.
>
> (2) Nor is the copyright infringed by the issue to the public of copies ... of anything whose making was, by virtue of subsection (1), not an infringement of the copyright.
>
> (3) A musical work ... or so much of a sound recording, broadcast or cable programme as includes a musical work ... shall not be regarded as incidentally included in another work if it is deliberately included.'

[19] The provisions now found in Pt I, Ch III of the 1988 Act were previously contained (in part and in a different form) in s 9 of the 1956 Act. Section 9(5) of the 1956 Act was in these terms:

> '... the copyright in an artistic work is not infringed by the inclusion of the work in a cinematograph film or in a television broadcast, if its inclusion therein is only by way of background or is otherwise only incidental to the principal matters represented in the film or broadcast.'

There are obvious differences between s 9(5) of the 1956 Act and s 31 of the 1988 Act. First, s 9(5) provided a defence only in cases where the copyright which would otherwise have been infringed was 'copyright in an artistic work'. Section 31 is not so restricted. Second, s 9(5) provided a defence only where what would otherwise have been an infringement of copyright was the inclusion of the work in 'a cinematograph film or in a television broadcast'. Section 31 extends to the inclusion in 'an artistic work, sound recording, film, broadcast or cable programme'. But the two sections have in common the requirement that the inclusion of work A (the work in which copyright subsists and, but for the section, would be infringed) in work B (the work which, but for the section, would give rise to the infringement) must be 'incidental'. a

[20] That common feature is relied upon both in support of a submission that the concept of 'incidental inclusion', for the purposes of s 31 of the 1988 Act, is essentially the same as the concept described by the rather fuller expression in s 9(5) of the 1956 Act—'by way of background or ... otherwise only incidental to the principal matters represented in ...'; and in support of a submission that the b change in language should lead to the conclusion that, in the context of s 31 of the 1988 Act, the concept of 'incidental inclusion' is wider than merely 'by way of background'. For my part, I doubt whether the difference in language would lead to a difference of result in a case (which is not this case) in which the two sections would, successively, have been in point. In that context it would be pertinent to have in mind s 172(2) of the 1988 Act: c

> 'A provision of this Part [I] which corresponds to a provision of the previous law shall not be construed as departing from the previous law merely because of a change of expression.'

Be that as it may, I am not persuaded that the result in the present appeal turns d upon an analysis of the linguistic differences between s 9(5) of the earlier Act and s 31 of the 1988 Act.

THE JUDGMENT BELOW

[21] The judge directed himself, correctly, that the issue before him turned on whether the inclusion of the FAPL emblem and the individual club badges in the e photographic images on the Panini stickers and in the Panini album was 'incidental' within the meaning to be given to that word in s 31(1) of the 1988 Act. He reminded himself of the definition of the word in the Shorter Oxford English Dictionary as: '(2) occurring as something casual or of secondary importance; not directly relevant to; following as a subordinate circumstance.' He referred to a f passage in Copinger and Skone James on Copyright (14th edn, 1999) vol 1, p 508 (para 9–26) which, in effect, adopts the dictionary definition: '"Incidental" is not further defined, but presumably it bares its ordinary meaning of "something casual or of secondary importance".' The passage appears in the same terms in the 15th edition, 2003. The judge referred, also, to the other leading textbook—Laddie, Prescott and Vitoria The Modern Law of Copyright and Designs g (3rd edn, 2000) vol 1, p 758 (para 20.17):

> 'The Act contains no definition of "incidental" but this is an ordinary English word with connotations of what is casual, not essential, subordinate, merely background, etc. It is submitted that while what is "incidental" is a question of fact and degree, an important consideration would appear to be whether h the taking [semble, what has been copied] enables the work to compete with or act as a substitute for the work that is included.'

The judge noted that Mr Richard McCombe QC, sitting as a deputy judge of the High Court in IPC Magazines Ltd v MGN Ltd [1998] FSR 431, had adopted (at 441) the approach in Laddie, Prescott and Vitoria, treating 'incidental' as meaning j 'casual, inessential, subordinate or merely background'.

[22] The judge said ([2003] FSR 698 at [19]):

> 'It seems to me that the word "incidental" in the section [s 31] (and nobody has suggested to the contrary) has the meaning attributed to it in the Oxford English Dictionary, which was adopted by McCombe J. I have to decide whether or not the inclusion of the badge is incidental. To my mind, it is self-evidently not incidental. It is an integral part of the artistic work comprised of the photograph of the professional footballer in his present-day kit. That is the intent behind the reproduction of the photograph. That is what the defendant intended, and without the badge they would not have the complete picture which they wish to produce, which is, as I say, the footballer as he plays now.'

Accordingly, he held that the reproduction of the FAPL emblem and the individual club badges on the stickers and in the album distributed by Panini infringed copyright in those works.

THE APPELLANT'S CONTENTIONS ON THIS APPEAL

[23] The appellant submits that the judge was wrong in the conclusion which he reached for one or more of the following reasons: (i) that there is no true dichotomy between 'integral' and 'incidental'—the emblem and badges could be 'an integral part of the artistic work', as the judge held, and yet be incidental to that work; (ii) that the test whether the inclusion of the emblems and badges is incidental must be answered in the light of the circumstances at the time when the 'photograph in issue is made'—the judge should not have taken into account the characteristics of a notional customer of Panini's product; (iii) that the 'incidentality' of the inclusion must be judged (or judged primarily) with regard to artistic considerations—again, the judge should not have taken into account the characteristics of a notional customer; and (iv) that the legislative policy to which s 31 of the 1988 Act was intended to give effect is revealed by a consideration of the debates in Parliament—the judge should have informed himself of that policy by reference to the extracts from Hansard put before him.

[24] The fourth of those grounds can be disposed of shortly. The Copyright, Designs and Patents Bill was introduced in the House of Lords. We were taken to the debate on the second reading in that House. It is plain that the decision to leave the word 'incidental' undefined was intentional. As the minister responsible for the progress of the Bill (Lord Beaverbrook) put it (491 HL Official Report (5th series) col 123 (8 December 1987)): 'What is incidental will depend on all the circumstances of each case and it would be impossible to provide a satisfactory definition for all circumstances.' It is plain, also, that 'incidental' was not intended to mean 'unintentional'. That is clear, not only from the debate in the House of Lords but also from the explanation which was given to the House of Commons (HC Official Report SC E (Copyright, Designs and Patents Bill), 19 May 1988, col 218) in respect of the provision which has become s 31(3) of the 1988 Act. But it is unnecessary to have resort to proceedings in Parliament in order to reach that conclusion. It is obvious, when sub-ss (1) and (3) of s 31 of the Act are read together, that 'incidental', in the context of sub-s (1), is not confined to unintentional, or non-deliberate, inclusion. If it were, sub-s (3)—which deals with the particular case of incidental, or background, music in (say) a film or broadcast—would be unnecessary. There is, in my view, nothing else in the material which we were shown which throws light upon what Parliament meant by the word 'incidental'; and, for my part, I doubt whether there was any proper basis upon which that material could have been put before the judge. Be that as it may, we may, perhaps, take some comfort from the evident intention of the promoter of the Bill that 'What is incidental will depend on all the circumstances of each case ...'; and his recognition that 'it would be impossible to provide a satisfactory definition for all circumstances'. The relevant question, as the judge pointed out, is whether, in the circumstances of this case, the inclusion on the stickers and in the album of the FAPL emblem and the individual club badges is or is not incidental. a [25] Nor, as it seems to me, is there any substance in the submission that the test whether the inclusion of the emblems and badges is incidental must be answered in the light of the circumstances at the time when the 'photograph in issue is made'—if, by that, it is intended to refer to the time at which the image is b impressed upon the photographic film or plate, or (in the case of a digital camera) encoded. The work, or 'thing', of which copies are issued to the public, for the purposes of s 31(2) of the 1988 Act, is the image of the player as it appears on the sticker or in the album. On the basis that the image of the player as it appears on the sticker is an 'artistic work' for the purposes of the 1988 Act (which is not, I think, contentious)—and assuming, but without deciding, that the fact that the c album, taken as a whole, is a compilation (and so a literary work) does not lead to the conclusion that the image of the player as it appears in the album is not, itself, also an artistic work—the effect of s 31(2) is that the issue of copies of that image to the public—by the distribution of stickers and the album—does not infringe copyright in the FAPL emblem or the individual club badges if, but only d if, the making of the image, as it appears on the sticker or in the album, was not itself an infringement of that copyright. The relevant question is whether the making of the image as it appears on the sticker or in the album was, by virtue of s 31(1) of the Act, no infringement of the copyright in the FAPL emblem or the individual club badge. That question is not to be answered by considering what e might have been in the mind of the photographer at the time when he took the photograph from which the image of the player, as it appears on the sticker or in the album, has been derived. It is to be answered by considering the circumstances in which the relevant artistic work—the image of the player as it appears on the sticker or in the album—was created.

[26] I would accept that, in principle, there is no necessary dichotomy f between 'integral' and 'incidental'. Where an artistic work in which copyright subsists appears in a photograph because it is part of the setting in which the photographer finds his subject it can properly be said to be an integral part of the photograph: if it is part of the setting in which the photographer finds his subject, it will, necessarily, appear in the photograph unless edited out. In that sense the g work in relation to which copyright is said to be infringed (work A) is integral to the photograph (work B) which is said to constitute the infringement. But that does not lead to the conclusion that the inclusion of work A in work B is, or is not, 'incidental' for the purposes of s 31(1) of the Act. That, as it seems to me, turns on the question: why—having regard to the circumstances in which work B was created—has work A been included in work B? And, in addressing that question, h I can see no reason why, if the circumstances so require, consideration should not be given as well to the commercial reason why work A has been included in work B as to any aesthetic reason. In particular, in a case (such as the present) where work B is created, primarily if not exclusively, to serve a commercial purpose, it seems to me wholly artificial to test the 'incidentality' of the inclusion j of work A by reference (or primarily by reference) to artistic considerations—if, by that is meant aesthetic considerations. It is, I think, pertinent to keep in mind that, for the purposes of the 1988 Act, 'artistic works' are not confined to works of artistic quality (see s 4(1)(a) of the Act).

[27] If, as I would hold, the relevant question, for the purposes of testing 'incidentality' in the context of s 31(1) of the 1988 Act, is why has work A been included in work B, the answer, in the present case, is indeed (as the judge thought) self-evident. The objective, when creating the image of the player as it appears on the sticker or in the album, was to produce something which would be attractive to a collector. That conclusion does not depend on any inquiry into the subjective intent of the individual employee who created the image—or (as I have said) of the photographer who took the photograph from which that image was derived. It depends on an objective assessment of the circumstances in which the image was created. It is not, I think, a matter about which there can be any doubt. Nor can there be any doubt that it was of importance, in order to achieve that objective, that the player should appear in the appropriate club strip; and that the club strip be authentic. An image of a player in strip which an informed collector would recognise as not authentic would not achieve that objective. But if the strip were to be authentic it must include the club badge and (where appropriate) the FAPL emblem. That, as it seems to me, is what the judge had in mind when he described the inclusion of the badge as 'an integral part of the artistic work comprised of the photograph of the professional footballer in his present-day kit'. The authenticity of the image of the player as it appears on the sticker or in the album (work B) depends on the inclusion in work B of the individual badge and the FAPL emblem (work A) in which copyright subsists. It is impossible to say that the inclusion of the individual badge and the FAPL emblem is 'incidental'. The inclusion of the individual badge and the FAPL emblem is essential to the object for which the image of the player as it appears on the sticker or in the album was created.

CONCLUSION

[28] I would dismiss this appeal.

MUMMERY LJ.

[29] I agree with Chadwick LJ that this appeal should be dismissed. I wish to add a few comments on a point of construction, which arose in the course of the hearing.

[30] I questioned whether the incidental inclusion defence could apply to the albums, in respect of which an injunction is claimed. The unlicensed and unofficial 'Panini's Football 2003 Sticker Collection' albums are probably not within the categories of work specified in s 31(1) (ie artistic works, sound recordings, films, broadcasts and cable programmes), in which the incidental inclusion of copyright material is a permitted act. The albums appear to be 'compilations' within s 3(1)(a) of the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988. A compilation is a 'literary work'. The s 31(1) defence does not apply in any circumstances to the inclusion of copyright material in literary works.

[31] Each football sticker album consists of 64 pages. Each page contains photographic action shots of players in their club strips, as well as the blank spaces to which the appropriate individual photographic stickers are to be affixed by the collectors. Each page of the albums also contains a considerable amount of printed tabulated information about the different football clubs and individual players.

[32] The claim for infringement of artistic copyright in the club crests and the premier league badge appearing on the playing kit worn by the football players is made in respect of the sticker albums themselves, not just in respect of each individual sticker. My provisional view is that, although each individual sticker is a distinct artistic work, being a photograph within s 4(1)(a), the albums, into which the stickers are to be affixed, are compilations of material and are properly treated as literary works for the purposes of the 1988 Act. If that is correct, inclusion of copies of the club crests and the premier league badge in the albums falls outside the acts permitted by s 31(1). I should explain that works are properly treated as compilations and therefore as literary works, even though the material compiled is largely artistic in character. Atlases, books of street maps, catalogues and art gallery and exhibition guides are obvious examples of artistic materials assembled in the material form of a compilation.

[33] In the court below and in the skeleton arguments submitted to this court the submissions on both sides assumed that all the relevant works in which the club crests and premier league badge have been reproduced are artistic works. The argument has focused on the question whether the inclusion of the copyright club crests and the badge in the stickers was incidental or not. If, however, the albums, which include many instances of infringing artistic material quite apart from the stickers, are literary works, the only defence to liability for infringement raised by Panini would not apply. Panini would be infringing the artistic copyright by committing acts of indirect infringement, with the requisite knowledge and without the appropriate consents ie by importing into the United Kingdom and supplying, or offering to supply, to distributors infringing copies for them to issue to the public, and by authorising the distributors to commit infringing acts. It should be noted that the claims against Panini are not for acts of direct infringement by (a) photographing the football players wearing their club strips or (b) reproducing and editing the action photographs on the stickers.

[34] My views on this point must remain provisional for two reasons: first, the court has not had the benefit of any detailed legal argument on the point from either side; and, secondly, it is possible to dispose of the appeal without deciding the point, as the defence under s 31(1) fails in any event. The inclusion of the infringing material in the stickers and the albums is not 'incidental' for the reasons given by Chadwick LJ.

[35] When invited by the court to make submissions on the 'literary work' point Mr Mark Platts-Mills QC, who appeared on behalf of the Football Association Premier League Ltd (FAPL), said that he was instructed not to run that point, adding that it was, in any event, a bad point. Without venturing into detail, which might violate his instructions, he indicated that the suggested construction was incorrect, because it would produce the startling result that a defence available under s 31(1) in respect of the making of the individual photographic stickers would cease to be available when they were affixed in the album.

[36] Mr Martin Howe QC, who appeared for Panini UK, simply said that the point had not been raised by the FAPL below or in this court. Naturally he agreed with Mr Platts-Mills's adverse reaction to it.

[37] The position is far from satisfactory. The only substantial point raised for decision in the proceedings is a question of law on the scope of s 31(1). In the absence of full argument to assist it, the court cannot confidently offer a full opinion on the scope of the section. For their own undisclosed reasons the parties wish to limit the scope of the court's decision.

[38] In my judgment, it is right to identify the point of construction, even though it must be left unresolved in this case, in order to bring it to the attention of the profession and of the courts, which may have to decide it on a future occasion. I would add that I am by no means satisfied that the response of Mr Platts-Mills to the literary work point is correct. In considering any defence raised to an allegation of copyright infringement it is always necessary to identify the particular infringing act in respect of which the defence is raised and the circumstances in which the infringing act was committed. Even if s 31(1) were available in respect of the individual photographic stickers made in Italy, so that they were not infringing copies when imported into the United Kingdom for distribution here, it by no means follows that the defence would also be available in respect of the distribution of the albums, which contain on each page photographic action shots of the players wearing their club strips.

[39] As to the 'incidental inclusion' point I agree with Chadwick LJ's full judgment on it. The question whether the inclusion of copyright material in an artistic work is 'incidental' is not answered by rushing to dictionaries or by searching the Internet for substitute words and expressions; or by inquiring into the subjective intentions, motives, views or states of mind of the makers, distributors or collectors of the stickers and albums; or by the use of a non-statutory check list of possible indicators; or by recourse to s 9(5) of the Copyright Act 1956 or to Hansard reports of the parliamentary debates preceding the enactment of the 1988 legislation; or by working conscientiously through the range of hypothetical situations ingeniously devised by Mr Howe. 'Incidental' is an ordinary descriptive English word. Parliament chose not to give it any special meaning. There is no need for the courts to define it. The range of circumstances in which the word 'incidental' is commonly used to describe a state of affairs is sufficiently clear to enable the courts to apply it to the ascertainable objective context of the particular infringing act in question. For the reasons given by Chadwick LJ the circumstances of this case (in particular, the commercial context and purpose of the marketing of the stickers and the albums reproducing the club crests and the premier league badge and the relationship between those copyright works and the subject matter of the stickers and albums) justify the overall assessment of the judge that it was self-evident that the inclusion of them in the stickers and in the albums is not incidental. I see no reason to differ from his conclusion.

BROOKE LJ.

[40] I agree that this appeal should be dismissed for the reasons given by Chadwick LJ.

Appeal dismissed.

Dilys Tausz Barrister.

SmithKline Beecham plc v Generics (UK) Ltd
BASF AG v SmithKline Beecham plc

[2003] EWCA Civ 1109

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
ALDOUS, CHADWICK AND LATHAM LJJ
8, 24 JULY 2003

Discovery – Collateral use of information obtained – Undertaking not to use disclosed documents for collateral or ulterior purpose – Different proceedings – Restriction or prohibition on use of disclosed documents – Litigant applying to use documents subject to restriction order in different proceedings – Whether documents 'disclosed' voluntarily – Approach to lifting of restriction order – CPR 31.22(2).

SB was the proprietor of a United Kingdom patent. It commenced proceedings against G for infringement of the patent. G denied infringement and alleged that the patent was invalid. Around the same time, B commenced proceedings against SB to revoke the patent upon similar grounds to those raised by G in its attack on validity. The two sets of proceedings were not consolidated, but were heard at the same time. On the first day of the trial, SB settled its claim against G. SB thereafter sought permission to use certain documents (the documents), which had been disclosed by G in the proceedings which had been settled, in the proceedings brought by B. The documents were technical protocols originating from third parties which had been referred to in an expert's report. The judge admitted the documents on terms that they would be dealt with in private, by making an order over trial under CPR 31.22(2)[a], which gave the power to make an order restricting or prohibiting the use of a document which had been disclosed. In CPR Pt 31, 'disclosure' was defined as meaning that a party disclosed a document by stating that the document existed or had existed. Shortly after the judgment in the proceedings brought by B, G sought an order under CPR 31.22(2) that further use of the documents should be permanently prohibited. Meanwhile, SB had started proceedings against A, alleging infringement of the patent. A, like B, contended that the patent was invalid. Before the judge had given judgment on G's application, SB applied for an order permitting it to use the documents in the proceedings against A. However, before the hearing of that application the judge gave judgment on G's application, continuing the order made under CPR 31.22(2) indefinitely. The judge subsequently dismissed SB's application to use the documents in the proceedings against A. SB appealed against both orders. In the first appeal, it argued that as the documents had been produced voluntarily and had been referred to in the report of an expert witness instructed by G, they were not documents which had been 'disclosed', so that the court had not possessed the power to restrict their use under CPR 31.22(2) and they were available for use in all proceedings. In the second appeal, it sought to use the documents under conditions of confidence in the proceedings against A.

a CPR Pt 31, so far as material, is set out at [27], below

Held – (1) The definition of disclosure in CPR Pt 31 drew no distinction between documents obtained from third parties and other documents and placed no limitation on the way that the statement of their existence was made. A reference by a party to a document in a witness statement was therefore a statement that the document existed. It followed, in the first appeal, that the documents had been disclosed, and that the court had had the power to restrict their use under CPR 31.22(2). The judge had, moreover, been right to have at the forefront of his consideration the interests of both the public and the third parties from whom the documents originated, and the requirements to do justice, and thereafter to have concluded that it was not necessary that the documents should be disclosed. Accordingly, the first appeal would be dismissed (see [29], [30], [33], [45], [46], below); Lilly Icos LLC v Pfizer Ltd (No 2) [2002] 1 All ER 842 applied.

(2) When considering whether to lift an order made under CPR 31.22, it was important to have in mind the overriding principles of the CPR. The most important consideration was the interest of justice, which involved considering the interest of the party seeking to use the documents and that of the party protected by the order. Each case would depend upon its own facts, but a material consideration was whether the documents could have been obtained under CPR 31.17, which enabled the court to order disclosure from third parties if the documents were likely to support the applicant's case and disclosure was necessary in order to dispose fairly of the claim. In the second appeal there was a a real argument that the documents would be discoverable under CPR 31.17 and that refusal of use could reflect adversely on the administration of justice. The interests of the owners of the documents could be protected by an appropriate order. Accordingly, the second appeal would be allowed and the documents would be released from the CPR 31.22(2) order for use in the proceedings against A with an order on terms that they be dealt with in private (see [37], [40], [43]–[46], below).

Notes

For subsequent use of disclosed documents, see 37 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 565.

Cases referred to in judgments

Barings plc (in liq) v Coopers & Lybrand [2000] 3 All ER 910, [2000] 1 WLR 2353, CA.

Bonzel v Intervention Ltd (No 2) [1991] RPC 231.

Cobra Golf Inc v Rata, Taylor Made Golf Co Inc v Rata & Rata (a firm) [1996] FSR 819.

Crest Homes plc v Marks [1987] 2 All ER 1074, [1987] AC 829, [1987] 3 WLR 293, HL.

Derby & Co Ltd v Weldon (1988) Times, 20 October.

Eagle Star Insurance Co Ltd v Arab Bank plc (unreported, 25 February 1991).

Halcon International Inc v Shell Transport and Trading Co [1979] RPC 97, CA.

Home Office v Harman [1982] 1 All ER 532, [1983] 1 AC 280, [1982] 2 WLR 338, HL.

Lilly Icos LLC v Pfizer Ltd (No 2) [2002] EWCA Civ 02, [2002] 1 All ER 842, [2002] 1 WLR 2253.

Prudential Assurance Co Ltd v Fountain Page Ltd [1991] 3 All ER 878, [1991] 1 WLR 756.

Scott v Scott [1913] AC 417, [1911–13] All ER Rep 1, HL.

SmithKline Beecham Biologicals SA v Connaught Laboratories Inc [1999] 4 All ER 498, CA.

Sybron Corp v Barclays Bank plc [1985] Ch 299, [1984] 3 WLR 1055.

Appeals

The appellant SmithKline Beecham plc (SB), appealed against the orders of Pumfrey J of 27 June 2003 and 30 June 2003, made upon applications in two sets of patent proceedings against the respondents Generics (UK) Ltd, and BASF AG respectively, whereby the judge (1) allowed an application by Generics Ltd for an order under CPR 31.22(2) that further use of certain documents should be permanently prohibited (the first appeal) and (2) dismissed the appellant's application to use those documents in proceedings against another party (the second appeal). The facts are set out in the judgment of Aldous LJ.

Justin Turner and Geoffrey Pritchard (instructed by Simmons & Simmons) for SB.
Simon Thorley QC and Thomas Hinchliffe (instructed by SJ Berwin) for Generics.
BASF AG was not represented.

Cur adv vult

24 July 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

ALDOUS LJ.

[1] There are before the court two appeals against orders of Pumfrey J which had the effect of preventing SmithKline Beecham plc (SB) from using certain documents in their case against Apotex which is currently before the judge. Before coming to the issues raised in the appeals it is necessary to set out the background.

[2] SB are the patentees of UK patent no 2247550 relating to a process for producing paroxetine hydrochloride anhydrate (PHA). That is a pharmaceutical sold in large quantities by SB.

[3] Back in 2001 SB started proceedings against Generics (UK) Ltd for infringement of the patent. Generics denied infringement and alleged that the patent was invalid. Around the same time BASF AG commenced proceedings to revoke the patent upon similar grounds to those raised by Generics in their attack upon validity.

[4] One of the main contentions of BASF and Generics was that the patent lacked novelty and was obvious having regard to the disclosure in the SB application no 85-26407 (407). Example 1 of 407 contained details of how to produce PHA and it was contended that that example made available to the public the invention claimed in claim 11 of the patent or made available a process of production which, if altered in an obvious way, would result in PHA. SB contended that if you carried out example 1 of 407, PHA was not obtained and that the alteration needed to produce PHA was not obvious.

[5] Example 1 of 407 set out a recipe for obtaining PHA. It included the instruction that the 'acetate salt was dissolved in isopropanol (2·4 litres) and treated with a mixture of hydrochloric acid (75 ml) and more isopropanol'. The main dispute between the parties revolved around how much 'more isopropanol' the skilled person would add if he sought to carry out example 1. BASF and Generics, for reasons that I need not go into, submitted that about 2 litres of isopropanol would be added. SB's case was that the amount would be well below 1 litre.

[6] In his judgment ([2002] EWHC 1373 (Ch), [2002] All ER (D) 205 (Jul)), the judge accepted the submission of SB and held that if the notional skilled person carried out example 1 of 407 he would not obtain PHA and therefore example 1 of 407 did not make available to the public claim 11 of the patent. Thus claim 11 did not lack novelty. He also held that claim 11 was not obvious having regard to the disclosure in 407. This court upheld those decisions of the judge (see [2003] EWCA Civ 872, [2003] All ER (D) 327 (Jun)).

[7] The proceedings against Generics and by BASF were not consolidated, but they came on for hearing at the same time. On the first day of the trial, SB and Generics settled their differences and the case was adjourned to enable the papers to be rearranged. On the second day SB sought permission to use two sets of documents which had been disclosed by Generics in the BASF proceedings. I will refer to those documents as the Sumika and Darmstadt documents respectively. I will come later to the relevance of those documents and the decision of the judge to allow the documents to be used, but first must explain how they came to be produced by Generics.

[8] The Darmstadt documents had initially been referred to in certain emails that had been disclosed in Generics's list of documents. They were requested by SB's solicitors by letter dated 20 December 2001. Production was resisted because they were not in the possession of Generics. They were however obtained from an associated company of Generics and then produced on about 21 January 2002. They were produced under a cloak of confidence to those in the 'confidentiality club'. They were also referred to in the expert report of Professor Mullin who was to be called as a witness by Generics. He said:

> '96. Finally I have been asked to comment on certain experimental runs performed, I understand, in a laboratory in Darmstadt in Germany. I attach a translation of the experiment's notebooks as exhibit JWM 4.'

[9] He went on to make a general comment upon the disclosure in the documents and expressed an opinion on one point.

[10] The Sumika documents were also referred to in Professor Mullin's report. In para 65 of his witness statement he said that the exact manner in which an addressee might perform example 1 of 407 was not possible to predict. There were many minor variations in techniques that different skilled addressees, applying their ordinary general knowledge, might apply. It was his view that it was not feasible to say what the skilled addressee would have done, but only what he might have performed. In para 66 he recounted how he had been asked initially to suggest a reasonable starting point for putting example 1 of 407 into practice. His view was set out in an annex to his report. He said that it represented his opinion as to the likely way that the skilled addressee at the relevant date might have started seeking to produce PHA in accordance with example 1 of 407. He said his view represented but one logical starting point and it would not have surprised him if his protocol did not produce PHA in significant quantities or, possibly, at all. He said that the development of protocols of this type was part of the routine work of the skilled addressee, but it took time. He continued:

> 'I was therefore shown a draft protocol which I was told by SJ Berwin [Generic's solicitors] had already been worked up to the produce the anhydrate. This is in substance the protocol contained in GUK's notice of experiments (the GUK protocol). I was asked to consider the differences between it and my protocol. Because of the brief nature of example 1, it would have been very unlikely if I had chosen precisely the same protocol as

GUK. However for reasons which I set out below, I believe the GUK protocol represents the type of routine development from my protocol which the addressee might have devised to perform example 1 if initial experiments had resulted (wholly or partially) in the production of the hemihydrate.'

[11] Upon receipt of the witness statement of Professor Mullin, SB's solicitors wrote seeking under CPR 31.14 the documents referred to by Professor Mullin. They were provided in February 2002 and were in substance the Sumika documents. To make them complete certain emails were supplied as requested. Those documents were also provided by Generics under a cloak of confidence and were therefore only available to those in the 'confidentiality club'.

[12] The judge heard SB's application to be able to rely upon the documents in the BASF action. It was resisted. In his judgment he said that his decision depended upon a number of factors. First, whether they would have been obtainable on an application for discovery against a third party; second, the materiality of the documents; third the strength of the case of confidentiality and fourth, fairness on the party whose documents they were. He concluded that the interests of the owners of the documents could be preserved by ensuring the documents were kept confidential. As to materiality he said:

'To rebut the inference which superficially arises on such facts may require a large number of small bricks. I do not know—and it would not be right to speculate any further than that at this stage. I would therefore be unwilling to exclude a priori any use of these documents provided I was satisfied that the interests of the owners of those documents were adequately protected. I believe that I can adequately protect the interests of the owners of these documents in the way I have indicated and therefore I am going to give leave for them to be used.'

[13] He therefore admitted SB's documents on terms that they would be dealt with in private. He made an order over trial under CPR 31.22(2). They were subsequently used in cross-examination which took place in private. He referred to them in of his judgment handed down after trial. He said:

'[61] SB also relied on certain experiments which had been put in by Generics before the action between them and SB settled. These also, Mr Waugh QC said, had been carefully "worked up" so as not to represent a fair repetition. The clear evidence is that the experimenter responsible for working up these experiments had found that he had obtained the hemihydrate if concentrated hydrochloric acid was used. He appears to have started by using comparatively small quantities for "more isopropanol". There was also evidence of experiments conducted in Germany by associates of Generics which had the same result.'

[14] Shortly after the judgment in the BASF action, Generics sought on 17 July 2002 an order that further use of the Sumika and Darmstadt documents should be permanently prohibited by an order under CPR 31.22(2) and also that copies should be delivered up to Generics. That application came before the judge on 25 July 2002 when SB submitted that no such order should be made. Despite a letter to him reminding him of the need to give judgment, no judgment was delivered in 2002.

[15] Whilst the proceedings against BASF were proceeding, SB started proceedings against Apotex Ltd alleging infringement of the patent. Apotex denied infringement and alleged that the patent was invalid. Like BASF they contended that the patent lacked novelty and was obvious having regard to the disclosure in 407. SB say that when they saw the witness statements provided by Apotex on 23 May 2003 they realised the importance of the Sumika and Darmstadt documents to the issues in the Apotex proceedings. That prompted them to write again to the judge on 30 May 2003 explaining the position and that they considered that it might be necessary for them to make an application in the Apotex proceedings to allow them to admit the Sumika and Darmstadt documents. The judge was away when the letter was received and therefore SB decided it was necessary to make an application for an order that they should be allowed to use the documents in the Apotex proceedings. That application was adjourned to come on for hearing on Monday 30 June 2003. However on 27 June 2003 the judge delivered his judgment on the Generics application to permanently prevent use of those documents.

[16] In his judgment of 27 June 2003 the judge concluded that it was not necessary that the documents should be disclosed and in the circumstances he continued the order made under CPR 31.22(2) indefinitely. There followed a hearing on SB's application to be allowed to use the documents in the Apotex proceedings. Judgment was given on 30 June 2003 giving reasons as to why they should not be used. He then dismissed the application.

[17] Although both appeals are concerned with the ability of SB to use the documents, different considerations apply. In the first appeal SB contend that restrictions on use imposed by the judge under CPR 31.22(2) should not have been made. If they are right, the documents are available for use in proceedings in all countries. In the second appeal use is only sought under conditions of confidence for use in the Apotex proceedings.

THE FIRST APPEAL

[18] The judge in his judgment of 27 June referred to the provisions of CPR Pt 31 and then stated, 'I prefer to deal with the question of the use of these documents as an exercise of my discretion under CPR 31.22(2) on the principles enunciated by the Court of Appeal in Lilly Icos LLC v Pfizer Ltd (No 2) [2002] EWCA Civ 2 at [25], [2002] 1 All ER 842 at [25], [2002] 1 WLR 2253'.

[19] In the Lilly Icos case the patentee had disclosed to the defendants material in documents designated as confidential and in consequence it was by agreement between the parties kept confidential and only seen by those in the confidentiality club. The disclosed material included a two page schedule showing on its first page the sales figures for the patentee's product and on the second page the patentee's advertising expenditure since the product was launched. The documents were intended to be used to support the patentee's claim that the invention had been a commercial success. After the trial, all of which had been in public, the patentee made an unopposed application for an order under CPR 31.22(2) to maintain confidentiality in respect of the second page of the schedule.

[20] The judge concluded that since the issue of the validity of the patent was of general public importance, the party seeking to withhold material from disclosure had to make out a case that there was a necessity for such an order. He concluded that no such case had been made out and he refused to make the order. The patentee appealed. This court concluded that the test applied by the judge was not appropriate. At the outset this court made these general observations (see [2002] 1 All ER 842):

'[7] Although the principle of the orality of the English trial remains untouched, practice has moved greatly in the direction of the presentation of evidence and arguments in writing; the use of documents by reference to them in those writings rather than by their being read out in open court; and the consideration by the judge of a large part of that material before the trial opens, so that it is not necessary to make specific reference to it during the trial itself. In SmithKline Beecham Biologicals SA v Connaught Laboratories Inc [1999] 4 All ER 498 this court pointed out that the intent of (as it was then) RSC Ord 24, r 14A would be substantially frustrated if the rule were literally restricted to what had physically happened in open court. The rule was passed in the interests of the publicity properly attaching to the administration of justice, and of the interests of the recipient of the document under art 10 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (see [1999] 4 All ER 498 at 510). To achieve those ends under modern practice it was necessary to take as falling under CPR 31.22(1)(a) any document pre-read by the judge, or referred to in for instance witness statements taken to stand as evidence, even if the document or the witness statement was not actually read out in court. Some further details of that regime may be mentioned, and then some comments offered.

[8] First, there are taken to fall under the rule certain categories of document, in particular those coming within the pre-reading of the judge. It does not have to be established that the judge has actually read the documents: once the category is established, it is for a party alleging that they have not in fact been read to establish that fact, something that has to be achieved without inquiry of the judge (see Barings plc (in liq) v Coopers & Lybrand [2000] 3 All ER 910 at 922, [2000] 1 WLR 2353 at 2367). Second, it therefore follows that not everything that is disclosed or copied in court bundles falls under this rule: the Connaught approach is restricted to documents to which the judge has been specifically alerted, whether by reference in a skeleton argument or by mention in the "reading guide" with which judges are now provided at least in patent cases. Third, since the Connaught approach is based upon the assumed orality of a trial, documents, however much pre-read by the judge, remain confidential if no trial takes place, but the application is, for instance, dismissed by consent, albeit by a decision announced in open court (see the Connaught case [1999] 4 All ER 498 at 509).

[9] The central theme of these rules is the importance of the principle that justice is to be done in public, and within that principle the importance of those attending a public court understanding the case. They cannot do that if the contents of documents used in that process are concealed from them: hence the release of confidence once the document has been read or used in court. As this court recognised in the Connaught case, there may be some artificiality about that approach. That is because full access to documents deemed to have been read or used in court may give third parties at least the possibility of much more fully studying and understanding the case and the issues in it than if they merely heard the documents read aloud. Nevertheless, that paradox helps to underline this court's concern that economical means of using and referring to the documents, understood amongst the lawyers, should not exclude the spectators from comprehension of the case.'

[21] This court went on to note (at [12]) that the particular document had been disclosed to a confidentiality club, but that when making its decision under CPR 31.22(2) at the end of the proceedings, the court, '... will not be constrained by, any such confidentiality agreement (see the Connaught case [1999] 4 All ER 498 at 511)'. The court's approach was set out at [25]:

'It may be convenient to set out a number of considerations that have guided us. (i) The court should start from the principle that very good reasons are required for departing from the normal rule of publicity. That is the normal rule because, as Lord Diplock put it in Home Office v Harman [1983] 1 AC 280 at 303, [1982] 1 All ER 532 at 537 citing both Jeremy Bentham and Lord Shaw of Dunfermline in Scott v Scott: "'Publicity is the very soul of justice. It is the keenest spur to exertion and the surest of all guards against improbity. It keeps the judge himself while trying under trial.'" The already very strong English jurisprudence to this effect has only been reinforced by the addition to it of this country's obligations under arts 6 and 10 of the Convention. (ii) When considering an application in respect of a particular document, the court should take into account the role that the document has played or will play in the trial, and thus its relevance to the process of scrutiny referred to by Lord Diplock. The court should start from the assumption that all documents in the case are necessary and relevant for that purpose, and should not accede to general arguments that it would be possible, or substantially possible, to understand the trial and judge the judge without access to a particular document. However, in particular cases the centrality of the document to the trial is a factor to be placed in the balance. (iii) In dealing with issues of confidentiality between the parties, the court must have in mind any "chilling" effect of an order upon the interests of third parties (see [5] above). (iv) Simple assertions of confidentiality and of the damage that will be done by publication, even if supported by both parties, should not prevail. The court will require specific reasons why a party would be damaged by the publication of a document. Those reasons will in appropriate cases be weighed in the light of the considerations referred to in sub-para (ii) above. (v) It is highly desirable, both in the general public interest and for simple convenience, to avoid the holding of trials in private, or partially in private. In the present case, the manner in which the documents were handled, together with the confidentiality agreement during trial, enabled the whole of the trial to be held in public, even though the judge regarded it as justified to retain confidentiality in respect of a significant number of those documents after the trial was over. The court should bear in mind that if too demanding a standard is imposed under CPR 31.22(2) in respect of documents that have been referred to inferentially or in short at the trial, it may be necessary, in order to protect genuine interests of the parties, for more trials or parts of trials to be held in private, or for instance for parts of witness statements or skeletons to be in closed form. (vi) Patent cases are subject to the same general rules as any other cases, but they do present some particular problems and are subject to some particular considerations. As this court pointed out in SmithKline Beecham Biologicals SA v Connaught Laboratories Inc [1999] 4 All ER 498, patent litigation > is of peculiar public importance, as the present case itself shows. That means that the public must be properly informed; but it means at the same time that the issues must be properly explored, in the sense that parties should not feel constrained to hold back from relevant or potentially relevant issues because of (legitimate) fears of the effect of publicity. We venture in that connection to repeat some words of one of our number in Bonzel v Intervention Ltd (No 2) [1991] RPC 231 at 234: "... the duty placed upon the patentee to make full disclosure of all relevant documents (which is required in amendment proceedings) is one which should not be fettered by any action of the courts. Reluctance of this court to go into camera to hear evidence in relation to documents which are privileged which could be used in other jurisdictions, would tend to make patentees reluctant to disclose the full position. That of course would not be in the interest of the public." In our view, the same considerations can legitimately be in the court's mind when deciding whether to withdraw confidentiality from documents that are regarded by a party as damaging to his interests if used outside the confines of the litigation in which they were disclosed.'

[22] The judge in his judgment looked at the considerations referred to in the Lilly Icos case and concluded, as I have said, that the balance came down in favour of permanent restriction upon their use.

[23] Mr Turner, who appeared for SB, submitted that CPR 31.22(2) did not apply to the documents as they had been produced voluntarily and were referred to in the report of Professor Mullin. The judge had failed to appreciate that documents produced in that way were not disclosed documents within CPR 31.22(2). The position under the CPR was the same as existed under the RSC as explained in Derby & Co Ltd v Weldon (1988) Times, 20 October, Prudential Assurance Co Ltd v Fountain Page Ltd [1991] 3 All ER 878, [1991] 1 WLR 756 and Eagle Star Insurance Co Ltd v Arab Bank plc (unreported, 25 February 1991). Mr Turner also submitted that the judge had made material errors in the way that he had applied the considerations referred to in the Lilly Icos case.

[24] Mr Turner's first submission starts from the regime that applied pre-CPR. It was settled law that documents produced on discovery were subject to an implied undertaking that they would only be used for the purposes of the proceedings in which they were disclosed. A rationale was that discovery was an interference with the right of privacy and therefore the invasion of that right should be limited to use of the documents in the proceedings.

[25] The cases referred to in [23], above established that voluntary disclosure in the course of proceedings did not come within the rationale for applying the implied undertaking. Documents included in affidavits and documents produced pursuant to an order made under RSC Ord 24 rr 10 and 11 were not subject to the implied undertaking. Further although there was a restriction upon the use of witness statements of witnesses of fact not called, there was no such restriction under Ord 38 in respect of experts' reports.

[26] It followed, Mr Turner submitted, that pre-CPR, the expert report of Professor Mullin and the documents referred to in it were not subject to the implied undertaking and therefore were in the public domain. Further the Darmstadt documents had been obtained by Generics from a third party and in consequence had been produced voluntarily with the consequence that the implied undertaking did not apply.

[27] Mr Turner then took us to the CPR. He submitted that CPR Pt 31 expressed the old law in modern terms. His submission involved an analysis of the relevant parts of CPR Pt 31 which are as follows:

'31.2 Meaning of disclosure

A party discloses a document by stating that the document exists or has existed.

31.3 Right of inspection of a disclosed document

(1) A party to whom a document has been disclosed has a right to inspect that document except where—(a) the document is no longer in the control of the party who disclosed it; (b) the party disclosing the document has a right or a duty to withhold inspection of it; or (c) paragraph (2) applies ...

31.4 Meaning of document

In this Part—"document" means anything in which information of any description is recorded; and "copy", in relation to a document, means anything onto which information recorded in the document has been copied, by whatever means and whether directly or indirectly.

31.5 Disclosure limited to standard disclosure

(1) An order to give disclosure is an order to give standard disclosure unless the court directs otherwise.

(2) The court may dispense with or limit standard disclosure.

(3) The parties may agree in writing to dispense with or to limit standard disclosure.

(The court may make an order requiring standard disclosure under rule 28.3 which deals with directions in relation to cases on the fast track and under rule 29.2 which deals with case management in relation to cases on the multi-track)

31.6 Standard disclosure—what documents are to be disclosed

Standard disclosure requires a party to disclose only—(a) the documents on which he relies; and (b) the documents which—(i) adversely affect his own case; (ii) adversely affect another party's case; or (iii) support another party's case; and (c) the documents which he is required to disclose by a relevant practice direction ...

31.14 Documents referred to in statements of case etc

(1) A party may inspect a document mentioned in—(a) a statement of case; (b) a witness statement; (c) a witness summary; or (d) an affidavit.

[At time of application the rule included at (e) experts' reports. This was revoked and (2) inserted.]

(2) Subject to rule 35.10(4), a party may apply for an order for inspection of any document mentioned in an expert's report which has not already been disclosed in the proceedings.

31.15 Inspection and copying of documents

Where a party has a right to inspect a document—(a) that party must give the party who disclosed the document written notice of his wish to inspect it; (b) the party who disclosed the document must permit inspection not more than 7 days after the date on which he received the notice; and (c) that party may request a copy of the document and, if he also undertakes to pay reasonable copying costs, the party who disclosed the document must supply him with a copy not more than 7 days after the date on which he received the request. (Rule 31.3 and 31.14 deal with the right of a party to inspect a document) ...

31.17 Orders for disclosure against a person not a party

(1) This rule applies where an application is made to the court under any Act for disclosure by a person who is not a party to the proceedings.

(2) The application must be supported by evidence.

(3) The court may make an order under this rule only where—(a) the documents of which disclosure is sought are likely to support the case of the applicant or adversely affect the case of one of the other parties to the proceedings; and (b) disclosure is necessary in order to dispose fairly of the claim or to save costs.

(4) An order under this rule must—(a) specify the documents or the classes of documents which the respondent must disclose; and (b) require the respondent, when making disclosure, to specify any of those documents—(i) which are no longer in his control; or (ii) in respect of which he claims a right or duty to withhold inspection.

(5) Such an order may—(a) require the respondent to indicate what has happened to any documents which are no longer in his control; and (b) specify the time and place for disclosure and inspection ...

31.22 Subsequent use of disclosed documents

(1) A party to whom a document has been disclosed may use the document only for the purpose of the proceedings in which it is disclosed, except where—(a) the document has been read to or by the court, or referred to, at a hearing which has been held in public; (b) the court gives permission; or (c) the party who disclosed the document and the person to whom the document belongs agree.

(2) The court may make an order restricting or prohibiting the use of a document which has been disclosed, even where the document has been read to or by the court, or referred to, at a hearing which has been held in public.

(3) An application for such an order may be made—(a) by a party; or (b) by any person to whom the document belongs.'

[28] Mr Turner accepted that CPR 31.22 was a complete code. The first 25 words were a substitute for the implied undertaking that applied pre-CPR. CPR 31.22(1)(a), (b) and (c) contained exceptions which also applied pre-CPR. CPR 31.22(2) enabled the court to make a restriction or prohibition order in respect of a document 'which has been disclosed ...'. Such documents are those produced pursuant to the obligation of disclosure under such rules as CPR 31.5 and 31.6. There was a difference between a document which had been disclosed and one which a party had a right to inspect. CPR 31.14 gave a right to inspect documents. At the date of the application the rule included a right to inspect documents referred to in experts' reports. That difference between documents disclosed and those which could be inspected perpetuated the difference which existed under the RSC between documents produced on discovery which were subject to the implied undertaking and those which had to be produced or were produced voluntarily and those which were not. It followed that documents which were produced voluntarily or in experts' reports were not documents 'which have been disclosed' and therefore the court did not have power to restrict their use under CPR 31.22(2).

[29] I agree with Mr Turner that CPR Pt 31 is a complete code, but I reject his submission that that code perpetuated in all respects the distinction between documents disclosed in a list of documents and those that might be disclosed in another way. The obligation to disclose and the ability to inspect are dealt with separately as is the ability to use a document after disclosure. CPR 31.3 is concerned with disclosed documents but reserves an ability to refuse inspection. CPR 31.14 adds to CPR 31.3. In any case the wide definition in CPR 31.2 must be determinative. That states that: 'A party discloses a document by stating that the document exists or has existed.' No distinction is sought to be drawn between documents obtained from third parties and no limitation is placed on the way that the statement is made. In my view a reference by a party to a document in a witness statement is a statement that the document exists. I therefore reject Mr Turner's submission. It follows that the judge was right to consider the application by Generics as an application under CPR 31.22(2). He was also right to conclude that the Lilly Icos case gave guidance as to the considerations he should have in mind.

[30] The basis of the judge's judgment of 27 June was in the last two paragraphs.

> '[27] In carrying out the balancing exercise identified by Buxton LJ in the passage to which I have referred, I take the following into account. First, the subject matter of the documents is confidential. Second, they originate with third parties. Third, they are of peripheral relevance at best to explain the issues in the action. Fourthly, they are not part of the material which is needed to explain the judgment. Fifthly, they are not needed to explain the judgment of the Court of Appeal which does not refer to them. Sixthly, they cannot be explained without considerable context or speculation exposing their makers or the employers of their makers to further requests for further information.
>
> [28] I keep at the forefront of my considerations the interests of public justice. Nevertheless, it seems to me that these documents do not require to be disclosed and in the circumstances I propose to continue the order made under CPR 31.22 indefinitely accordingly.'

[31] Mr Turner criticised each of those considerations. He took us to the documents for the purpose of showing us that the documents did not contain any information which would be of assistance to a third party except in litigation. He may be right, but the documents have the quality of confidence such that a court would restrict disclosure of them.

[32] Mr Turner challenged the judge's conclusion that the documents were of peripheral relevance at best to the issues and were not part of the material needed to explain the judgment. In my view the judge's description of the documents may be apt. However that does not mean that they could not be one element that supported the case of SB. As the judge said in his judgment given on 15 March 2002 when allowing the documents to be used in the BASF proceedings—'To resist the inference which superficially arises on such facts [the facts stated in example 1 of 407] may require a large number of bricks' (see [12], above).

[33] In my view the judge (at [28]) was right in to have in the forefront of his consideration the interests of both the public and the third parties and the requirements to do justice and thereafter to conclude that it was not necessary that they should be disclosed. I believe he was right to make the order under CPR 31.22 that he did.

THE SECOND APPEAL

[34] The parties agree that despite the order made by the judge pursuant to his judgment of 27 June 2003, it was open to him to release them for use in the Apotex proceedings.

[35] Mr Thorley QC who appeared for Generics supported the conclusion and reasoning of the judge. As the judge recorded Mr Thorley put at the forefront of his argument this passage from the judgment of Whitford J in Halcon International Inc v Shell Transport and Trading Co [1979] RPC 97 at 109–110:

> 'However, these authorities to my mind, lead to this conclusion, that the use of a document disclosed in a proceeding in some other context, or even in another proceeding between the same parties in the same jurisdiction, is an abuse of process unless there are very strong grounds for making an exception to the general rule. It does, I think, emerge that some overriding public interest might be a good example, but not the mere furtherance of some private interest even where that private interest arises directly out of or is brought to light as a result of the discovery made.'

[36] At [22] the judge said that the dictum of Whitford J had not, so far as the researches of counsel had been able to reveal, ever been doubted or disapproved. However that statement was not followed by the House of Lords in Crest Homes plc v Marks Lord Oliver of Aylmerton said [1987] 2 All ER 1074 at 1082–1083, ([1987] AC 829 at 860):

> 'Your Lordships have been referred to a number of reported cases in which application has been made for the use of documents obtained under Anton Piller orders or on general discovery for the purpose of proceedings other than those in which the order was made. Examples were Halcon International Inc v Shell Transport and Trading Co [1979] RPC 97 and Sybron Corp v Barclays Bank plc [1985] Ch 299. I do not, for my part, think that it would be helpful to review these authorities for they are no more than examples and they illustrate no general principle beyond this, that the court will not release or modify the implied undertaking given on discovery save in special circumstances and where the release or modification will not occasion injustice to the person giving discovery. As Nourse LJ observed in the course of his judgment in the instant case, each case must turn on its own individual facts.'

[37] The Halcon case was considered by Laddie J together with the other relevant authorities in Cobra Golf Inc v Rata, Taylor Made Golf Co Inc v Rata & Rata (a firm) [1996] FSR 819. The guidance he gave as to the matters the court will include in its considerations is useful. However it is important under the CPR to have in mind the overriding principles when considering whether to lift an order made under CPR 31.22. The most important consideration must be the interest of justice which involves considering the interest of the party seeking to use the documents and that of the party protected by the CPR 31.22 order. As Lord Oliver said each case will depend upon its own facts. But a material consideration must be whether the documents could have been obtained under CPR 31.17. That rule enables the court to order disclosure from the third parties if the documents were likely to support SB's case and disclosure was necessary in order to dispose fairly of the claim.

[38] SB are clear that the documents support their case in rebutting the attack by Apotex on their patent. They pointed to the fact that they were considered by the judge to be of some relevance to SB's case as he referred to them in his judgment (see [13], above). However in a later judgment he said that they were at best of peripheral importance. He went on to say:

> 'I would feel extremely diffident about placing any great reliance upon those documents and the experiments they report without having heard, as witnesses, the people who were responsible for them. The documents are potentially embarrassing and their probative value is limited for that reason.'

[39] In that passage the judge seems to accept that some reliance could be placed on the documents as a support even though their probative value was limited. That was consistent with the view that he had already expressed. It is also consistent with [61] of his judgment in the BASF action (see [13], above). I am not sure why the judge concluded that the documents were potentially embarrassing. He did not make that point in his judgment in the BASF proceedings. I suspect that their usefulness could be in cross-examination and perhaps as a small brick to support the views expressed by SB's witnesses. That being so, there is a basis for the submission that the requirements of CPR 31.17(3)(a) could be satisfied.

[40] The judge in his judgment allowing use of the documents in the BASF proceedings made it clear that an appropriate order could protect the interests of the owners of the documents. It seems that he was right. Despite the evidence which suggests prejudice, there is no reason to think that their interests could not be protected by a similar order in the Apotex proceedings to that made in the BASF proceedings.

[41] The present case is peculiar in that the judge who heard the BASF proceedings and considered the documents is hearing the Apotex proceedings. That presents particular difficulties as he considered the documents in the BASF case and mentioned them in his judgment. However his recent judgments suggest that he believed that they were at best of little relevance to the issues in the Apotex proceedings. That of course must be a provisional view as the case is still proceeding.

[42] Even so, the knowledge of the judge presents a problem. Can the judge both put out of his mind and be seen to put out of his mind the documents? If the judge finds in favour of SB, Apotex could be left with a real suspicion that the documents had been a brick in the reasoning, perhaps unconscious reasoning, of the judge.

[43] The interests of justice are paramount. In the present case, the interests of the owners of the documents can be protected by an order under CPR 31.22. The interests of SB favours modification of the order made in the Generics proceedings to allow the documents to be deployed in the Apotex proceedings. There is a real argument that they would be discoverable under CPR 31.17 and refusal of use could reflect adversely on the administration of justice. In those circumstances I conclude that the documents should be released from the CPR 31.22(2) order for use in the Apotex proceedings with an order protecting the interests of the owners of the documents in the way that the judge did in the BASF proceedings.

[44] I would allow the appeal and make an order similar to that made by the judge in the BASF proceedings.

CHADWICK LJ.

[45] I agree that the first appeal should be dismissed, for the reasons given by Aldous LJ. I agree, also, that the second appeal should be allowed, on the basis that the interests of the owners in preserving the confidentiality of their documents can adequately be protected by the order which he has proposed. Like him, I take the view that, in the unusual circumstances that the judge has already considered the documents in the BASF proceedings, confidence in the administration of justice requires that they should be available to be deployed in the present proceedings.

LATHAM LJ.

[46] I agree.

First appeal dismissed, second appeal allowed.

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

A v Head Teacher and Governors of Lord Grey School

[2003] EWHC 1533 (QB)

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

STANLEY BURNTON J

12–15 MAY, 27 JUNE 2003

Education – Pupil – Exclusion – Permanent exclusion of child of compulsory school age from school – Whether breach of right to education – Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt II, art 2.

On 8 March 2001 there was a fire at the defendant school. The claimant, who was a child of compulsory school age, and two other boys were suspected of starting the fire and were later charged with arson. The claimant was excluded from the school for a period intended to cover the resolution of the police investigation. That period was extended several times as the investigation continued. The school sent work home for the claimant and he took required examinations at the school in May. Criminal proceedings against the claimant were formally ended on 19 June. The school wrote to the claimant's parents setting up a 'reintegration meeting' on 13 July to discuss the details of the claimant's return to the school. Neither the claimant nor his parents attended that meeting. The school subsequently removed the claimant from its roll. Neither the exclusions nor the removal from the roll complied with the requirements imposed on the school by the School Standards and Framework Act 1998 nor the relevant Department of Education circular. A general responsibility for the education of children of compulsory school age was placed on local education authorities by s 13[a] of the Education Act 1996, while s 19[b] imposed a particular duty to make arrangements for the provision of suitable education for those children of compulsory school age who, inter alia, by reason of exclusion from school or otherwise, would not receive such education. The local education authority offered the claimant tuition and his family declined the offer. In proceedings against the school the claimant sought damages for breach of his right to education under art 2[c] of the First Protocol to the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (as set out in Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998).

Held – Expulsion from a school of a pupil who had no access to alternative educational facilities could cause a breach of art 2 of the First Protocol to the convention, and if so, the school authority could be liable for damages. However, if the cause of the unavailability of alternative efficient education was the action or inaction of the local education authority, on whom duties were imposed by ss 13 and 19 of the 1996 Act, it would be the education authority that had caused the infringements of the pupil's art 2 rights. That was the position whether the expulsion was lawful or unlawful. In the instant case, although unlawful, the school's decisions to exclude the claimant until the termination of

a Section 13, so far as material, is set out at [54], below

b Section 19, so far as material, is set out at [56], below

c Article 2, so far as material, provides: 'No person shall be denied the right to education …'

the prosecution, and then until a reintegration meeting could be held, were sensible and reasonable and did not give rise to liability for breach of art 2. And while the exclusion of the claimant from school after 13 July and his removal from the register had been both unlawful and unreasonable, the education authority, as a result of the claimant's exclusion, had, under s 19(1) of the 1996 Act, undertaken its responsibility for his education. Therefore, although the school's decisions to exclude the claimant after 13 July and to remove him from the roll were unlawful and could have been challenged by judicial review, they did not give rise to a liability in damages for breach of his rights under art 2 of the First Protocol. Accordingly, the claim would be dismissed (see [83], [84], [93]–[95], [105]–[114], below).

Yanasik v Turkey (1993) 74 DR 14 considered.

Notes

For the right to education, see 8(2) Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) para 166.

For the Human Rights Act 1998, Sch 1, Pt II, art 2, see 7 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (2002 reissue) 536.

Cases referred to in judgment

Belgian Linguistic Case (No 2) (1968) 1 EHRR 252, [1968] ECHR 1474/62, ECt HR.

Campbell and Cosans v UK (1982) 4 EHRR 293, [1982] ECHR 7511/76, ECt HR.

Kjeldsen v Denmark (1976) 1 EHRR 711, [1976] ECHR 5095/71, ECt HR.

R (on the application of B) v Head Teacher of Alperton Community School [2001] EWHC Admin 229, [2001] ELR 359.

R (on the application of Holub) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] 1 WLR 1359, CA.

R (on the application of M) v Barking and Dagenham London BC [2002] EWHC 2483 Admin, [2002] All ER (D) 64 (Aug).

R v Head Teacher and Independent Appeal Committee of Dunraven School, ex p B [2000] ELR 156, CA.

R v Independent Appeal Panel of Sheffield City Council, ex p N [2000] ELR 700.

Runa Begum v Tower Hamlets London BC [2003] UKHL 5, [2003] 1 All ER 731, [2003] 2 AC 430, [2003] 2 WLR 388.

S v Brent London BC [2002] EWCA Civ 693, [2002] ELR 556.

Sulak v Turkey (1996) 84-A DR 98, E Com HR.

Whitman v UK App No 13477/87 (4 October 1989, unreported), E Com HR.

Yanasik v Turkey (1993) 74 DR 14, E Com HR.

Claim

The claimant, A, a child of compulsory school age, claimed damages for breach of his right to education under art 2 of Pt II of Sch 1 to the Human Rights Act 1998 against the defendant, the head teacher and governors of the Lord Grey School, Milton Keynes, arising from his exclusion from the school following a fire at the school on 8 March 2001. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Carolyn Hamilton (instructed by the Children's Legal Centre) and Yvonne Spencer of the Children's Legal Centre for the claimant.

Jonathan Moffett (instructed by Alex Jack) for the school.

Cur adv vult

27 June 2003. The following judgment was delivered.

STANLEY BURNTON J.

INTRODUCTION

[1] In these proceedings, the claimant, A, claims damages against the Head Teacher and Governing Body of the Lord Grey School in Milton Keynes on account of his exclusion from the school following a fire on 8 March 2001. This is my judgment on the issues of liability, which were ordered to be tried separately from the question of the amount of any damages to which the claimant might be entitled.

THE PARTIES

[2] The Lord Grey School is a maintained secondary (foundation) school. The local education authority is Milton Keynes council (the local education authority). Its head teacher is Ms Despina Pavlou. The local education authority, Ms Pavlou and the school governors all have powers and duties under the Education Act 1996 and other statutes and statutory instruments, and they are all unquestionably public authorities for the purposes of the Human Rights Act 1998. I shall sometimes refer below to 'the school', by which I mean the person responsible for the decisions made on its behalf, which in virtually all cases was Ms Pavlou.

[3] The claimant is aged 16. On and before 8 March 2001 he was a pupil enrolled at the school. On that date he was aged, almost, 14, and therefore of compulsory school age.

RELEVANT EVENTS

[4] On 8 March 2001, during the lunch hour, a fire was discovered in a room at the school. The fire brigade were called. The fire officer formed the view that the fire had been started deliberately, and the police were informed. Three boys, the claimant and two others, had been seen leaving the room, which was out of bounds so far as they were concerned, when the fire started. They had not raised any alarm. The police cautioned the boys, searched them and took them to the police station.

[5] On the date of the fire, the head teacher was away. The deputy head teacher, Mrs Sue Telfer, took the view that the three boys who were suspected of involvement in the fire should remain at home on the following day, a Friday, and on Monday 12 March 2001, until the school knew what was going to happen in relation to criminal proceedings. She explained that to the families of the three boys. In the case of the claimant, that was to his older brother B, since his parents were away on their pilgrimage to Mecca. There is an issue as to the effect of their conversation, which I address below.

[6] The claimant and the other two boys were released on police bail. On 29 March 2001, they were charged with arson. The claimant's case was that he had no involvement in the arson, that the fire had been started by one of the other two boys, and that he, the claimant, had not known what that boy was going to do.

[7] The head teacher, Ms Pavlou, returned to the school on Friday 9 March 2001. She discussed the situation with Ms Marilyn Barby, the head of student services of the local education authority. Ms Pavlou thought it appropriate for the boys not to return to school. Ms Barby agreed.

[8] Ms Pavlou thought that the fire had been a student prank that had got out of hand. She expected the police investigation to be completed speedily, and to result in a reprimand of the three boys. She expected that to happen by the end of March 2001, and she thought that the boys could then return to school. However, according to her witness statement, on about 20 March 2001 Ms Pavlou was informed that two of the boys had failed to report to the police station as they had been required to do. It appeared, therefore, there would not be a speedy resolution of the police investigation. As a result, she wrote to the claimant's parents on 21 March 2001, stating that, having spoken to the police and the local education authority, 'your son remains excluded from school until the end of the term'. The spring term ended on 5 April 2001. The school had been sending work home for the claimant. Ms Pavlou's letter stated: 'Should you require further work for A during the period of his exclusion please contact the school and it will be arranged.' The letter gave as the reason for the claimant's exclusion his alleged involvement in the fire. Finally, Ms Pavlou stated:

> 'Under the terms of the 1986 [sic] Education Act I must inform you that you may, if you wish, write to the Chairman of Governors of The Lord Grey School to discuss any aspect of this matter with him.'

The claimant's family did not contact the school for further work for A; nor did they write to the governors.

[9] The school continued to send work home to the claimant until 14 May 2001, the date of the last of the standard assessment tests (SATs). The work, in english, maths and science, was largely revision-based and self-assessing. It did not require to be returned to the school for marking: the answers were provided, enabling the claimant to check the correctness of his answers himself. The claimant spoke to Ms Amanda Rutherford, his form teacher, about this work on a number of occasions. She was concerned that he had enough work.

[10] Mrs Telfer wrote to the claimant's parents on 25 April 2001. She stated:

> 'I am now in a position to write to you concerning A's attendance at school following exclusion. I have been made fully aware of the progress being made into the investigation regarding the recent fire at Lord Grey and understand that the boys are to return to the police station on 14th May. Having taken advice I am therefore further excluding A until 15th May when I will contact you again. A should not return to school until an appointment has been made for you and him to come into school to discuss re-admittance with Ms Pavlou. As A is to sit SAT's examinations shortly I have arranged for Mathematics, Science and English work to be sent home and have agreed with staff that he be allowed into school to sit his exams. He should report to me on the date and time of his exams and I will take him to the appropriate room. Under the terms of the 1986 [sic] Education Act I must inform you that you may, if you wish, write to The Chairman of Governors at The Lord Grey School, to discuss any aspect of this matter with him.'

[11] The SATs took place between 8 and 14 May 2001. According to the claimant, he did not know the date and time of the first examination, and was telephoned by his head of year on 8 May to be told that the examination had started, and that he should come immediately to the school. He did so, and was given additional time to make up for that lost at the beginning. His results in the examinations were slightly better than had been predicted before the incident of 8 March.

[12] By 25 May 2001, the prosecution of the three boys had not been resolved. Mrs Telfer wrote again to the claimant's parents on 25 May:

> 'It is regrettable that I have again to write to you with regard to your son's education at Lord Grey. We understand from the police that your son has now been charged with the offence of Arson against Lord Grey and that he has entered a not guilty plea. As we are in a situation where some of the witnesses in the case are students at Lord Grey we feel that we cannot allow the boys to return until the court case has been heard. Obviously when the proceedings are over we would welcome the opportunity to discuss the way forward. Until then I am making a referral to the access panel for alternative provision for A so that his education may continue. If you wish to discuss the matter further you may contact me at school. Your son is now being excluded for a further 20 school days from 14th May. We will continue to set work as appropriate and would ask that you make contact with school to arrange to collect it. Under the terms of the 1986 [sic] Education Act I must inform you that you may, if you wish, write to The Chairman of Governors at The Lord Grey School, to discuss any aspect of this matter with him.'

[13] On 4 May 2001, Mrs Telfer signed a referral form in relation to the claimant. Most of it was completed by the head of the lower school, Ms Waring. It gave the date and duration of exclusions as '9 March 2001 to present'. In the box headed 'What has precipitated this referral?' was written:

> 'A is excluded pending a court appearance for suspected arson at Lord Grey School. Referral to Access Panel is requested as the Headteacher is not willing to negotiate transfer to another school at this stage given the circumstances and severity of the incident. If A is deemed to be innocent then the Headteacher will be willing to negotiate re-integration at that stage.'

The form stated that the parents had been consulted about the referral, and had voiced no opinions about it. In the box headed 'What support do you feel would be appropriate for this pupil?' was written: 'Appropriate support would be to provide materials/supervision/advice etc pending A's court appearance. A is an able student.' The comments on the claimant as a student were very positive: 'A is an able and motivated student. He is usually pleasant and cooperative. Behaviour issues were not relevant before the incident.'

[14] The personnel/resourcing committee of the governors of the school met on 8 May 2001, and were informed that the three boys involved in the fire had been excluded.

[15] The referral form was not immediately sent to the local education authority. Although she signed it on 4 May 2001, Mrs Telfer wrote on it as the date of referral 25 May 2001. She was unable to recall the reason for the delay. There is an issue as to when the form was sent to the local education authority. According to Mrs Telfer, it was sent on the stated date of referral. However, Ms Barby's letter to Ms Pavlou of 12 June 2001 states that it was received on 8 June 2001, which suggests that it was enclosed with Mrs Telfer's letter to Ms Barby of 6 June 2001. In that letter, Mrs Telfer stated that Ms Pavlou would prefer the boys to be referred to the access panel rather than negotiate other schools, and that the school would be happy to discuss reintegration following the outcome of the court case. In her letter to Ms Pavlou of 12 June, Ms Barby stated that the referrals would be considered by the access panel on 19 June 2001, and stated: 'Until you are advised of the outcome of the referrals you should continue to provide the boys with work.' Ms Pavlou wrote a note to Mrs Telfer on the letter: 'Sue—Please ensure that this is happening.' a

[16] On 18 June 2001, the Crown Prosecution Service wrote to the solicitor acting for the claimant in the criminal proceedings, Mr Lovegrove of Lovegrove & Co, to inform him that the proceedings had been discontinued on the ground that there was insufficient evidence for there to be a realistic prospect of conviction. b

[17] On 19 June 2001, the claimant went to court and the criminal proceedings were formally ended. He and his brother, B, went to the school. B told Ms Pavlou that his brother had been to court and been found innocent and should return to school immediately. Ms Pavlou told him that she would act to arrange the claimant's re-entry to school as soon as she received written confirmation of the court's decision. c

[18] When the local education authority's access panel met on that day, 19 June, they did not know that the criminal proceedings against the claimant had been discontinued. The panel recommended that the claimant be provided with tuition by the pupil referral unit at their Manor Road Centre whilst the police concluded their inquiries and a decision was taken by the school as to A's future there. d

[19] Mr Tim Read, the flexible learning co-ordinator of the local education authority, sent a letter dated 27 June 2001 to Ms Pauline Clark, the head of the Manor Road Centre, informing her of the access panel's decision. He stated that tuition was to be provided by the pupil referral unit until the end of term in the first instance, ie until 20 July 2001. Mr Read also wrote to the claimant's parents on 27 June, informing them of the access panel's decision that the pupil referral unit would provide tuition until the end of term whilst the exclusion issues were resolved with the Lord Grey School, and stating that Ms Clark would contact them shortly to arrange a meeting with them and A. He gave them Ms Clark's telephone number. The letter was copied to Mrs Telfer at the school and to Ms Clark. As a result of the decision of the access panel, Ms Rutherford was told by Mrs Telfer that it had assumed responsibility for the claimant's education. She had probably already ceased to have contact with him, following the SATs (see her witness statement). She did not resume contact with him or hear from him again. e f g

[20] On 22 June 2001, Milton Keynes magistrates' court sent a fax to Mrs Telfer informing her that the criminal proceedings against the claimant had been discontinued. Ms Pavlou wrote on the fax: 'Please chase—setup re-entry meetings. School disciplinary review?'

[21] By letter to the claimant dated 28 June 2001, Mr Lovegrove, the claimant's solicitor, confirmed the discontinuance of the prosecution, and stated that that 'brings this matter to an end'. h

[22] Ms Pavlou received official notification of the discontinuance of the criminal proceedings against the claimant by the Thames Valley Police's letter of 29 June 2001. She wrote to the claimants' parents on 3 July 2001 stating that she was aware that the prosecution had been dropped and— j

> 'A meeting now needs to take place between you the parents and the school to discuss the way forward. A meeting has therefore been arranged at 10.30 am on Friday 13th July. Please confirm you will be able to attend the meeting.'

She wrote to them again on the following day, as follows:

> 'I am writing with regard to the fire incident at The Lord Grey School. We have now been informed that the Crown Prosecution Service has decided to discontinue proceedings against A. A reason has not been given, though the school has been asked to consider a civil action. Should you wish A to return to school, we will need to meet to discuss a way forward. I am mindful of the fact that A has been out of school for some considerable time and am therefore keen that he should return as soon as possible. However, the room (T37) is still out of action. It is up to A and his two friends to repair the damage, either through physically painting the room or paying for it to be repaired. I have arranged a meeting for Friday 13th July at 10.30 am. Please confirm with my P.A. Carole Horton, that you will be able to attend.'

[23] The meeting was arranged for 13 July 2001 in order to give the claimant and his family adequate notice of the meeting, but also because Ms Pavlou wanted all of the members of staff who would be involved in his reintegration to be present. Those included Mrs Telfer, Ms Waring as head of the lower school, his form tutor, Ms Rutherford, and the business manager, Mr Jason Falkner. According to Ms Pavlou, Friday 13 July was the earliest date when all of them could be available.

[24] The school made arrangements for the reintegration meeting. A draft 'school contract' was prepared, to be signed by the claimant, accepting normal disciplinary obligations, with the school agreeing to support his reintegration. It was envisaged that the boys would redecorate the fire-damaged room under the supervision of a painter and decorator as part of the school's citizenship programme on 16 and 17 July 2001.

[25] There is a conflict of evidence as to the communications between the school and the claimant's family preceding 13 July. Neither the claimant nor his family attended the meeting. Nor did one of the other boys, whose name also included 'A'. One of the boys did attend and was accepted back into the school. From what he said, Ms Pavlou got the impression that the absent boys had stayed away because they were not prepared to help restore the room. Ms Pavlou concluded that the claimant and his family were not interested in reintegrating into the school. She sent to the claimant's family a letter dated 13 July 2001 in which she stated:

> 'Following your failure to appear at the meeting organised this morning at The Lord Grey School, I am removing A from our school roll and am writing to confirm to the Access Panel that other provision should now be made for A's educational provision. I will not be pursuing a civil action against you regarding the arson offence, but your failure to attend the meeting confirms to me that it would be entirely unsuitable for A to continue further at this school. If you would like further clarification of this matter or wish to discuss future educational provision you should contact either Tim Read ... or Jennifer Gurney ... both of whom are based at Manor Road.'

The letter was copied to the chair of the governors of the school, among others.

[26] Neither the claimant nor his family replied to Ms Pavlou's letter until November 2001.

[27] Despite the letter of 13 July the school took no step internally to remove the claimant from its roll until the autumn of that year.

[28] There is a conflict of evidence as to the family's contact with Mr Read and Manor House, to which I refer below.

[29] After the summer holidays, the claimant did not return to the school.

[30] On 28 September 2001, the local education authority's education welfare service completed a notification of absentee form relating to the claimant. As to his school, it stated: 'None/Ex-Lord Grey'. In the body of the document, it stated: 'A—phoned N/R (no response). 01st October—N/R. 02nd—N/R. 03rd—Poss gone to Bangladesh? Advised Jenny of the above. Case closed.'

[31] Ms Pavlou received a letter dated 5 October 2001 from Ms Barby, who stated: 'We understand that (the claimant) is still in Bangladesh so a place is not required for him at present.'

[32] Mr Read met the claimant's father on 18 October 2001. In his letter to him dated 22 October 2001, Mr Read stated:

> '1. I will ask Marilyn Barby, Team Leader—Pupil Support, to provide tuition for A as soon after 29 October as possible.
>
> 2. In your search for a school place, be it The Lord Grey or another school, the following contact numbers may be useful to you for advice and support ...
>
> I would advise you to decide quickly whether you wish A to return to The Lord Grey School and arrange an interview there or at another school as soon as possible so that he can resume his education on a full-time basis.'

[33] Mr Read wrote to Ms Barby on the same date, stating:

> 'We need to provide tuition for A as he has been out of school for a considerable time. This should be for a short period whilst he is supported back into school. The family are considering Lord Grey but, after legal advice did not attend the meeting offered because of the conditions set out in the letter. The Education Welfare Officer failed to make contact with the family to mediate a return to Lord Grey and the PRU did not provide tuition at the end of last term. I have advised the family that we will try to provide tuition as soon as possible after half term ...'

[34] The local education authority's education welfare service completed a second notification of absentee form on 1 November 2001. It stated that Mr Read had been in touch with A's brother, B, and had asked the writer to contact the family to inquire what they wanted for the claimant. Below that it stated:

> '02nd phoned Marilyn to ask what I am to offer. She is going to phone back. B rang. We spoke at length. I said I would phone him back on Monday. They want him back at Lord Grey. 05th spoke to Marilyn—to advise them to write formally to Lord Grey. Spoke to Mrs Das (CAB) who enquired what is happening, why etc. Phoned and spoke to B. Advised to write to Lord Grey ...'

[35] The following notes were made on a local education authority notification of absentee form dated 5 November 2001: '06th phoned B—Ans Mach left message for him to call. 08th spoke to Lord Grey. They believe they have been approached by A's family (letter).'

[36] On 6 November 2001, the claimant's father wrote to Ms Pavlou, formally requesting the claimant's reinstatement. He stated:

'We did not attend the meeting on 13.7.01 as we had an appointment with a solicitor at the same time. My eldest son, B, explained the matter on 13.7.01 when we cancelled the appointment and requested an alternative appointment but none was given to us. This is a very important year for A and he has already missed ten months of schooling. He has already attended the SATs tests but missed the revision period.'

[37] Ms Pavlou wrote a note on the letter, intended for the deputy head teacher: 'No! Sue—I will write a letter if necessary, or "speak" to Marilyn. But there is no way he is coming back.'

[38] Mrs Telfer replied to the claimant's father by letter dated 14 November 2001:

'Your letter to Ms Pavlou has been passed to me for response. As you rightly state you were offered a meeting to discuss A's return to Lord Grey in July. Ms Pavlou's PA confirmed your attendance prior to the date and we were disappointed that you did not arrive. On return to school in September we tried to contact you and were told that A was out of the country. As we heard nothing for at least six weeks his name was removed from the roll and his place allocated to a student on the waiting list. We are now oversubscribed in the year group and unable to take A back onto the school roll. You would be advised to contact your nearest secondary school or the Local Education Authority for a school place.'

[39] The Lord Grey School removed the claimant from its roll some time after 7 September 2001. He never returned to the school. Since 21 January 2002, the claimant has attended Leon School, where he is due to take ten or eleven GCSE subjects.

[40] It follows that the claimant was without schooling between 8 March 2001 and 21 January 2002.

THE EVIDENCE CONCERNING 13 JULY 2001

[41] According to B's witness statement, his parents had a meeting with their solicitor that day; he telephoned the school and told Ms Carole Horton that his parents could not attend the meeting; she called back and said that no alternative meeting could be offered. His parents saw their solicitor, Mr Lovegrove, who advised them not to go to the meeting. His sister (who did not give evidence) called the school to request an alternative date 'in the light of that advice'; the school said they would call back, and never did.

[42] According to Ms Pavlou, on 4 July 2001 she was told that B had telephoned and said that the family could not attend the planned meeting because his parents had gone to Mecca. She asked Ms Horton, her personal assistant, to telephone back and tell B that his parents' attendance was not essential, provided the claimant attended the meeting. Ms Horton later told her that B had said that his parents had been advised by their solicitor not to attend the meeting. This led Ms Pavlou to cause the message to be passed to B that it was she and not the family's solicitor, who ran the school, and that if the claimant wanted to return he should make every effort to come to the meeting. This bout of telephone calls led to the second letter of 4 July. Ms Pavlou asked Ms Horton to telephone the family for confirmation that they would attend, and she said that they would do so. On the morning of 13 July itself Ms Pavlou was informed that the claimant's parents had telephoned to say that they did not have transport. Ms Pavlou offered to send the school minibus. She was then informed that they had again telephoned, to say that they would make their own arrangements to get to the school. Ms Pavlou concluded from the claimant's failure to attend that he and his family had no interest in his reintegration into the school.

[43] The evidence of Ms Horton, Ms Pavlou's personal assistant, who was not cross-examined, only partially supports Ms Pavlou's. She confirms that B telephoned to say that the family had difficulty in attending the meeting because they were due to meet their solicitor on 17 July and did not want to attend the meeting until they had done so. She was instructed by Ms Pavlou to telephone back to say that Ms Pavlou, and not their solicitor, was responsible for the management of the school. She did so; but she had no recollection of the response. Her notebook records a telephone conversation on 6 July with B, referring to difficulty, presumably in attending on 13 July, his telephone number, and the words 'solicitor Tuesday 17th'. Her note also includes 'only time available' and 'no decisions will be made on that day', which I suspect were her notes of what Ms Pavlou asked her to convey to B or his parents. Her notebook records a telephone call on 13 July noted as follows: 'cancelled appointment re: another appointment—no transport today. A—fire—late evening.' Ms Horton had no recollection of this conversation.

THE WITNESSES

[44] The claimant gave evidence, as did his brother, B. Neither of his parents nor his sister was called.

[45] The claimant is an obviously intelligent and articulate boy, and generally a good witness. His recollection was however unreliable in a number of respects, such as the number of meetings between his family and Mr Read: his evidence was that there were two such meetings; I accept Mr Read's evidence that there was only one. The claimant complained that he had not received enough schoolwork during the period between 8 March 2001 and the SATs. However, in cross-examination he accepted that he had spoken to Ms Rutherford regularly during that period, and had not told her that he did not have enough work.

[46] His brother, B, was a hopelessly confused and unreliable witness. His English is reasonably good and I am unable to attribute his confusion to any language difficulty. He confirmed that his parents, on the other hand, speak very little English indeed. B was in the process of opening a new business during the spring of 2001, and for that reason did not want to get involved with the school. From March 2001 he had both a day job and his business of an Indian take-away. He said that the family had decided not to contact the governors of the school following Ms Pavlou's letters of 21 March, 25 April and 25 May 2001.

[47] The most egregious example of his confusion was in his evidence relating to the family's meetings with Mr Lovegrove, the claimant's solicitor, in the period around 13 July. Ms Horton's note indicated that there was to be a meeting with Mr Lovegrove on 17 July. B's witness statement indicated that there had been a meeting on 13 July (presumably before the time fixed for the school meeting), at which the family were advised that they should not attend the meeting. Mr Read's letter of 22 October also indicates that he was told that the family did not attend the meeting because they had received legal advice, and because of the conditions set out in the letter of 3 July 2001. On the other hand, the letter of 6 November states that there was a meeting with Mr Lovegrove on 13 July, which was the reason for the family's non-attendance at the school. B seemed to suggest at different times that there were one, two or three meetings with Mr Lovegrove, eventually stating that there were meetings before 13 July, on 13 July itself and on 17 July. None of these meetings is documented in any way: I infer that Mr Lovegrove wrote no letter to the claimant or his family (since none has been produced, though privilege has been waived), no attendance note has been produced and he wrote no letter to the school. Mr Lovegrove's own letter of 28 June 2001 indicates that there were no ongoing instructions from the claimant or his family. It is improbable that there was time for a meeting with Mr Lovegrove before 10.30 am on 13 July.

[48] It is improbable that, if he was consulted over the meeting and advised the family to decline to attend, he would not have written to the school or to the claimant's family. It is particularly improbable that he would not have written to the school on the claimant's behalf if there had been a meeting with him after the family had received Ms Pavlou's letter of 13 July. I am driven to the conclusion that there was no such meeting with Mr Lovegrove on any date, and that he was not consulted about the school meeting. That is not to say that there was no meeting arranged for 17 July; but if it was arranged, the family did not go to it, presumably having decided to cancel it.

[49] B's evidence in relation to his attempts to contact Mr Read and his conversation or conversations with Ms Clark was also difficult to accept. He initially said that he did not contact Ms Clark; when reminded of his witness statement, he said that he had. He denied refusing an offer of tuition made by Ms Clark. According to his witness statement, when he spoke to Ms Clark, she said that she knew nothing about the referral. Mr Read's unchallenged evidence was that Ms Clark told him at the beginning of July 2001 that she had contacted the claimant's family and that they had declined the offer of tuition. B denied this. A civil evidence notice was given in respect of that evidence of Mr Read, on account of Ms Clark's inability to attend through illness. While it is unsatisfactory to decide an important issue of fact on the basis of hearsay, I do prefer it to B's evidence. It is improbable that Ms Clark, who had received a copy of the letter of 27 June 2001 from Mr Read to the claimant's parents and a memorandum from him to her of the same date, would have said that she knew nothing about the referral, and likely that, if she had, B would have referred her to that letter; if he did not, it is more likely that she would have undertaken to look into the matter and to revert to him.

[50] According to B's witness statement, he tried getting in touch with Mr Read from 13 July on, but kept getting his voicemail. In cross-examination, he was unsure about the voicemail. He could not explain why he did not get in touch with Ms Jennifer Gurney, as suggested in Ms Pavlou's letter of 13 July. It is difficult to reconcile B's evidence on this with that of Mr Read, which I accept, to the effect that he did not have a voicemail system at that time; secretaries were available between 9 am and 4 pm to take a message, which would be passed on to him. An answering machine was sometimes used, but only out of working hours. I accept his evidence that it was not until the middle of October 2001 that he first heard from the claimant's family, asking him how to get the claimant into school. As a result of that contact he met the claimant's father on 18 October 2001.

[51] Ms Pavlou was a careful witness, who was trying to give me her recollection of events. In certain respects, however, it is difficult to reconcile her evidence with the contemporaneous documents, and some caution is required in considering what she had to say.

[52] Mrs Telfer was an impressive witness, whose evidence I accept without reservation. She was willing to admit a failure of recollection, even though the matter in question might be seen as reflecting negatively on her, and an excuse might have been suggested: I refer to her delay in sending out the referral form.

[53] Mr Read too was an impressive witness. His evidence was that he met the claimant's family on one occasion, on 18 October, and advised them as to their options. At that time, the family were unsure whether they wanted the claimant to return to the Lord Grey School: they were concerned that he might be victimised or be the centre of attention. I prefer Mr Read's evidence, which is consistent with the documents, to that of B and of the claimant on the issue whether there was one meeting with him (Mr Read) or two. I also reject the evidence of B that when the family met with Mr Read they wanted the claimant readmitted to the Lord Grey School. It is evident from Mr Read's letter of 22 October 2001 to the claimant's father that they were undecided at their meeting whether they wished the claimant to return there.

THE RELEVANT STATUTORY PROVISIONS

[54] The Education Act 1996 places responsibility for education of children of compulsory school age on parents and on local education authorities. A general responsibility for education is placed on local education authorities by s 13:

> '(1) A local education authority shall (so far as their powers enable them to do so) contribute towards the spiritual, moral, mental and physical development of the community by securing that efficient primary education, secondary education and further education are available to meet the needs of the population of their area.'

[55] Their functions in respect of the provision of primary and secondary schools are set out in s 14.

> '(1) A local education authority shall secure that sufficient schools for providing—(a) primary education, and (b) education that is secondary education by virtue of section 2(2)(a), are available for their area.'

[56] Section 19(1) imposes a particular duty on local education authorities:

> 'Each local education authority shall make arrangements for the provision of suitable ... education at school or otherwise than at school for those children of compulsory school age who, by reason of illness, exclusion from school or otherwise, may not for any period receive suitable education unless such arrangements are made for them.'

[57] Parents of children of compulsory school age are under a duty to secure their suitable and efficient full-time education either by regular attendance at school or otherwise (see s 7). If he is a registered pupil at a school, it is their duty to cause him to attend regularly (see s 444(1)). However, by s 444(3), a child shall not be taken to have failed to attend regularly by reason of his absence from the school '(a) with leave, (b) at any time when he was prevented from attending by reason of sickness or any unavoidable cause ...'

[58] Leave of absence is the subject of the Education (Pupil Registration) Regulations 1995, SI 1995/2089. Regulation 7 relates to the keeping of an attendance register, in which must be recorded the presence or absence of every pupil, and in the case of an absence, whether or not it is authorised. In the case of a pupil who is not a boarder, reg 7(3) provides that an absence is to be treated as authorised for the purposes of that regulation if '(a) he has been granted leave of absence in accordance with regulation 8; (b) he is unable to attend—(i) by reason of sickness or any unavoidable cause …'

[59] Regulation 8 provides that leave of absence may only be granted by a person authorised on their behalf by the proprietor of the school. In the present case, the proprietors were the school governors; the person who was authorised to give leave of absence was the head teacher. There are restrictions on the granting of leave of absence for the purposes of enabling a pupil to undertake employment, or to go away on holiday, but otherwise the purpose of leave of absence is unspecified.

[60] Removal from the school roll (ie deletion from the admission register of the school) is the subject of reg 9. It prescribes the grounds on which the name of a pupil of compulsory school age must be deleted from the admission register. The only relevant sub-paragraph of reg 9(1) is (g):

> 'that [the pupil] has been continuously absent from school for a period of not less than four weeks and both the proprietor of the school and the local education authority have failed, after reasonable enquiry, to locate the pupil …'

In addition, sub-para (k) requires the deletion of a pupil from the admission register 'where the pupil is registered at a maintained school, that he has been permanently excluded from the school …' However, sub-para (k) is subject to reg 9(4)(d):

> 'the permanent exclusion of a pupil does not take effect until the governing body have discharged their duties under section 66 of the (Schools Standards and Framework Act 1998), and—(i) the relevant person has stated in writing that he or she does not intend to bring an appeal under section 67 of the 1998 Act; (ii) the time for bringing an appeal has expired and no appeal has been brought within that time; or (iii) an appeal brought within that time has been determined or abandoned.'

[61] Regulation 13 requires the proprietor of every school maintained by a local education authority to make a return to the local education authority of pupil absences other than absences due to sickness or leave of absence granted by the school in accordance with reg 8. Lastly, reg 14 requires entries on an admission register or attendance register to be written in ink and so that any corrections are apparent.

[62] The division of responsibility between the governors of a school and the head teacher is the subject of the Education (School Government) (Terms of Reference) (England) Regulations 2000, SI 2000/2122. As might be expected, they prescribe: '4.—(1) The governing body shall exercise their functions with a view to fulfilling a largely strategic role in the running of the school.' On the other hand:

> '5.—(1) The head teacher shall be responsible for the internal organisation, management and control of the school, and the implementation of the strategic framework established by the governing body.'

[63] The exclusion of pupils is the subject of ss 64–68 of the Schools Standards and Framework Act 1998:

'64. Power of head teacher to exclude pupils.—(1) The head teacher of a maintained school may exclude a pupil from the school for a fixed period or permanently.

(2) The head teacher may not exercise the power to exclude a pupil from the school for one or more fixed periods such that the pupil is so excluded for more than 45 school days in any one school year.

(3) A pupil may not be excluded from a maintained school (whether by suspension, expulsion or otherwise) except by the head teacher in accordance with this section.

(4) In this Act "exclude", in relation to the exclusion of a child from a school, means exclude on disciplinary grounds (and "exclusion" shall be construed accordingly).

65. Exclusion of pupils: duty to inform parents, etc.—(1) Where the head teacher of a maintained school excludes any pupil, the head teacher shall (without delay) take reasonable steps to inform the relevant person of the following matters—(a) the period of the exclusion (or, if the pupil is being permanently excluded, that he is being so excluded); (b) the reasons for the exclusion; (c) that he may make representations about the exclusion to the governing body, and (d) the means by which such representations may be made.

(2) Where the head teacher decides that any exclusion of a pupil for a fixed period should be made permanent, he shall (without delay) take reasonable steps to inform the relevant person of—(a) his decision, and (b) the matters specified in paragraphs (b) to (d) of subsection (1).

(3) Subsection (4) applies where the head teacher—(a) excludes any pupil in circumstances where the pupil would, as a result of the exclusion—(i) be excluded from the school for a total of more than five school days in any one term, or (ii) lose an opportunity to take any public examination, (b) excludes a pupil permanently, or (c) decides that any exclusion of a pupil should be made permanent.

(4) Where this subsection applies, the head teacher shall (without delay) inform the local education authority and the governing body of the following matters—(a) the period of the exclusion (or, if the pupil is being permanently excluded, that he is being so excluded), or (b) his decision that any exclusion of a pupil for a fixed period should be made permanent, and (in either case) of the reasons for it.

(5) In this section and in sections 66 and 67 "the relevant person" means—(a) in relation to a pupil under the age of 18, a parent of his; (b) in relation to a pupil who has attained that age, the pupil himself.

(6) Where regulations under paragraph 4 of Schedule 11 require the governing body of a maintained school to establish a discipline committee, references in this section and sections 66 to 68 to the governing body of such a school shall be construed as references to their discipline committee.

66. Functions of governing body in relation to excluded pupils.—(1) Subsections (2) to (6) apply where the governing body of a maintained school are informed under section 65(4) of any exclusion or decision to which that provision applies.

(2) The governing body shall in any such case—(a) consider the circumstances in which the pupil was excluded; (b) consider any representations about the exclusion made to the governing body—(i) by the relevant person in pursuance of section 65(1)(c) or (2)(b), or (ii) by the local education authority: (c) allow each of the following, namely—(i) the relevant person, and (ii) an officer of the local education authority nominated by the authority, to attend a meeting of the governing body and to make oral representations about the exclusion; and (d) consider any oral representations so made.

(3) In a case where it would be practical for the governing body to give a direction to the head teacher requiring the reinstatement of a pupil, they shall in addition consider whether he should be reinstated immediately, reinstated by a particular date or not reinstated.

(4) If the governing body decide that the pupil should be reinstated, they shall forthwith—(a) give the appropriate direction to the head teacher, and (b) inform the relevant person and the local education authority of their decision.

(5) The head teacher shall comply with any direction of the governing body for the reinstatement of a pupil who has been excluded from the school.

(6) If the governing body decide that the pupil should not be reinstated, they shall forthwith—(a) inform the relevant person, the head teacher and the local education authority of their decision, and (b) in addition in the case of a pupil who is permanently excluded, give the relevant person notice in writing referring to that decision and stating the following matters—(i) the reasons for the decision, (ii) his right to appeal against the decision, (iii) the person to whom he should give any notice of appeal, (iv) that any notice of appeal must contain the grounds of appeal, and (v) the last date on which an appeal may be made.

(7) Where—(a) the head teacher of a maintained school excludes a pupil otherwise than as mentioned in section 65(3), and (b) the governing body receive any representations made in pursuance of section 65(1)(c) or (2)(b) by the relevant person about the exclusion, they shall consider those representations.

(8) Regulations may provide that, where a governing body of a maintained school are required under this section to take any step, the duty must, subject to such exceptions as may be prescribed, be performed within the prescribed period; but such a provision shall not relieve the governing body of the duty to take any step which has not been taken within that period.

67. Appeals against exclusion of pupils.—(1) A local education authority shall make arrangements for enabling the relevant person to appeal against any decision of the governing body under section 66 not to reinstate a pupil who has been permanently excluded from a school maintained by the authority.

(2) Schedule 18 has effect in relation to the making and hearing of appeals pursuant to arrangements made under subsection (1); and in subsections (3) and (4) "appeal panel" means an appeal panel constituted in accordance with paragraph 2 of that Schedule.

(3) The decision of an appeal panel on an appeal pursuant to arrangements made under subsection (1) shall be binding on the relevant person, the governing body, the head teacher and the local education authority.

(4) Where on such an appeal the appeal panel determines that the pupil in question should be reinstated, the panel shall either—(a) direct that he is to be reinstated immediately, or (b) direct that he is to be reinstated by a date specified in the direction.

68. Exclusion of pupils: guidance.—(1) This section applies to any functions of—(a) the head teacher or the governing body of a maintained school, (b) a local education authority, or (c) an appeal panel constituted in accordance with paragraph 2 of Schedule 18, conferred by or under any of sections 64 to 67 and Schedule 18.

(2) In discharging any such function, such a person or body shall have regard to any guidance given from time to time by the Secretary of State.'

[64] The Secretary of State gave guidance in Department for Education and Employment Circular 10/99 ('Social Inclusion: Pupil Support') (the circular). It has been amended since the times material to these proceedings. Paragraph 6.3 of the circular stated:

'Before reaching a decision, the head teacher should:

- consider all the relevant facts and firm evidence to support the allegations made, and take into account the school's policy on equal opportunities. If there is doubt that the pupil actually did what is alleged, the head teacher should not exclude the pupil;
- allow the pupil to give their version of events;
- check whether an incident appeared to be provoked by racial or sexual harassment;
- if necessary consult others, being careful not to involve anyone who may later take part in the statutory review of their decision, eg a member of the Discipline Committee.'

[65] Paragraph 6.4 stated that exclusion should not be used for, among other matters, 'punishing pupils for the behaviour of the parents, for example, by extending a fixed period exclusion until the parents agree to attend a meeting'.

[66] Paragraph 6.5 was as follows:

'The law allows head teachers to exclude a pupil for up to 45 days in a school year. However, individual exclusions should be for the shortest time necessary, bearing in mind that exclusions of more than a day or two make it more difficult for the pupil to re-integrate into the school. In all cases of more than a day's exclusion, work should be set and marked.'

[67] It is also necessary to refer to paras 6.6 and 6.7:

'6.6 A decision to exclude a child permanently is a serious one. It is a final step in the process for dealing with disciplinary offences when a wide range of other strategies have been tried and have failed, including the use of a Pastoral Support Programme. It is also an acknowledgement by the school that it can no longer cope with the child. The Secretary of State does not expect a head teacher normally to exclude permanently a pupil for a "one-off" or first offence.

6.7 A head teacher considering excluding a pupil for a single block of more than 15 school days in a term must plan:

- to enable the pupil to continue their education;
- how to use the time to address the pupil's problems; and
- with the LEA, what educational arrangements will best help the pupil to re-integrate into the school at the end of the exclusion. The school will usually be expected to meet some of the costs for this but the exact arrangements will need to be agreed with the LEA.'

[68] Annexe D to the circular dealt with procedures for excluding a pupil. Under the heading 'Responsibilities of the head teacher' and 'Informing parents about the exclusion', it stated:

'1. A head teacher who excludes a pupil should make sure the parent is notified immediately, ideally by telephone, and that the telephone call is followed by a letter within one school day. An exclusion should normally begin on the next school day.

2. Letters about fixed period and permanent exclusions should explain:

• why the head teacher decided to exclude the pupil and the steps taken to try and avoid exclusion:

• the arrangements for enabling the pupil to continue their education, including setting and marking the pupil's work;

• the parent's right to state their case to the Governing Body's Discipline Committee;

• who the parents should contact if they wish to state their case (usually the Clerk to the Committee);

• the latest date the parent can put a written statement to the Discipline Committee;

• the parent's right to see their child's school record;

• if the exclusion is for a fixed period, the length of the exclusion and the date and time the pupil should return to school;

• if the exclusion is for lunchtimes only, the length of the exclusion (normally no more than five school days) and the arrangements for providing a meal for any pupil entitled to free school meals;

• if the exclusion is permanent, the date the permanent exclusion takes effect, and details of any relevant previous warnings, fixed period exclusions or other disciplinary measures taken before the present incident;

• the name and telephone number of a contact at the LEA who can provide advice on the exclusions process and the telephone number for the Advisory Centre for Education (ACE) helpline ...

All correspondence should be in plain English and avoid unnecessary jargon. Exclusion cases should be treated in the strictest confidence.

3. A head teacher who extends a fixed period exclusion or, exceptionally, converts a fixed period exclusion into a permanent exclusion, should again write to the parent explaining the reasons and making the other points above. Where an exclusion is extended there is a new right for the parent to state their case to the Discipline Committee.'

[69] Paragraphs 4 and 5 of Annexe D were as follows:

'4. The head teacher should inform the Governing Body's Discipline Committee and the LEA immediately of:

• all permanent exclusions;

• all exclusions which result, separately or in total, in the pupil missing more than five school days in any one term, or which deny pupils the chance to take a public examination.

Short fixed period exclusions of one to five school days should be reported termly, unless the LEA asks for more frequent reports.

5. For each exclusion reported the school should give:

- the name of the pupil;
- the length of the exclusion;
- the reason(s) for the exclusion;
- the pupil's age, gender, ethnicity, and whether they are on the SEN Code of Practice or have a statement of special educational needs;
- whether the pupil is looked after by the Local Authority.'

[70] Paragraph 6 of Annexe D stated that the governing body should set up a discipline committee to review the use of exclusion. Paragraph 7 was as follows:

> '7. If the exclusion is fewer than five days, the Discipline Committee cannot direct re-instatement, but should consider any statement from the parent. For exclusions of more than five days in a term, or where a pupil loses the opportunity to take a public examination, the Discipline Committee should consider the exclusion and decide whether the pupil should be re-instated ...'

[71] Annexe D required the clerk to the discipline committee, on receiving notice from the head teacher that a pupil has been excluded for more than five days, to set up a meeting of the discipline committee to consider the exclusion within specified time limits, and take other preliminary procedural steps.

[72] Chapter 6 and Annexe D of the circular were replaced with effect from January 2003, after, therefore, the events in question in these proceedings, by Department of Education and Science guidance, 'Implementing behaviour and attendance: guidance on exclusion from schools and Pupil Referral Units'. Paragraph 11.1 of Pt 1, dealing with decisions to exclude, is as follows:

> 'A reintegration meeting with parents following the expiry of a fixed period exclusion is good practice. However, a fixed period exclusion should not be extended if such a meeting cannot be arranged in time or the parents do not attend.'

A new Pt 5 is entitled 'police involvement and parallel criminal proceedings'. It had no counterpart in the earlier circular. It includes the following statement:

> '1.1 A school-related incident may sometimes also be the subject of a police investigation which may subsequently result in criminal proceedings. This can mean that the evidence available to head teachers, Discipline Committees and Independent Appeal Panels is very limited. They may not, for example, be able to hear relevant witnesses or to consider relevant material; it may not be known whether a criminal charge is to be brought; if a charge has been brought, the eventual outcome of any court proceedings may be uncertain.'

Under the heading: 'Head teacher's decision to exclude and consideration of the circumstances by the Discipline Committee' are the following statements:

> '2.1 A head teacher should not postpone his or her decision to permanently exclude a pupil simply because of the possibility that criminal proceedings might be brought in respect of the same incident. In these circumstances, a judgement must be made on the basis of the evidence available. Relevant considerations include the fact that: a) a serious allegation has been made against the pupil by another pupil or member of staff at the school which is the subject of a police investigation which may result in criminal proceedings being brought; b) pending the conclusion of any such criminal proceedings, the pupil's continued presence in the school may have an adverse effect on the complainant and other potential witnesses, and on the promotion of good order and discipline at the school generally.'

[73] Finally, it is necessary to refer to ss 6 and 8 of the Human Rights Act 1998, and to arts 6 and 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950, and art 2 of the First Protocol (as set out in Sch 1 to the 1998 Act). The first sentence of the first paragraph of art 6 is:

'In the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law.'

Article 14, entitled 'Prohibition of discrimination', is as follows:

'The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status.'

Article 2 of the First Protocol, headed 'Right to education', is as follows:

'No person shall be denied the right to education. In the exercise of any functions which it assumes in relation to education and to teaching, the State shall respect the right of parents to ensure such education and teaching in conformity with their own religious and philosophical convictions.'

THE LEGAL SUBMISSIONS OF THE PARTIES

[74] Ms Carolyn Hamilton accepted that the provisions of the 1996 Act on which the claimant relies do not of themselves give rise to any liability in damages for breach of statutory duty. It follows that the only arguable cause of action of the claimant is that created by ss 6 and 8 of the Human Rights Act 1998, for breach of the claimant's convention rights. The convention rights asserted are those under arts 6 and 14 of the convention and art 2 of the First Protocol.

ARTICLE 6

[75] Ms Hamilton also accepted that, on the basis of the current jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights, the right to education under art 2 of the First Protocol is not a civil right within the meaning of art 6. She none the less submitted that damages should be awarded for breach of art 6. She submitted that just as the House of Lords had assumed, in Runa Begum v Tower Hamlets London BC [2003] UKHL 5, [2003] 1 All ER 731, [2003] 2 AC 430, that rights under s 193 of the Housing Act 1996 were civil rights within the meaning of art 6, so I should assume that the right to education is such a right, even though (as she conceded) it was not. This submission is irrational. Article 6 applies only to the determination of civil rights and obligations and to criminal charges. It has no application to what is conceded not to be a civil right (or obligation) and is not a criminal charge.

ARTICLE 14

[76] Ms Hamilton submitted that the claimant had been excluded from school because of his suspected conduct and his parents' failure to attend the meeting of 13 July 2001. She submitted that discrimination under art 14 involves a difference of treatment for which there is no reasonable and objective justification; that there was no such justification for the claimant's exclusion from school; and that therefore he was the subject of unlawful discrimination.

[77] This submission ignores the words 'or other status' in art 14. It is not every difference of treatment that engages art 14. The difference must result from some personal attribute or characteristic of the claimant by which persons or groups of persons are distinguishable from each other (see Kjeldsen v Denmark (1976) 1 EHRR 711 at 733 (para 56)). A difference of treatment based solely on conduct does not engage art 14. Ms Hamilton was not able to point to any ground of discrimination that engages art 14.

ARTICLE 2 OF THE FIRST PROTOCOL

[78] Ms Hamilton's submissions under this head were more substantial. She submitted that there could be no justification for any interference with the right conferred by this article if that interference was unlawful under domestic law. Any unlawful interference with this convention right, therefore, gives rise to a liability in damages. It followed that if the claimant's exclusion from his school was unlawful under English domestic law (ie our law apart from the convention), there was an unjustified interference with his right to education for which the school authorities, which wrongfully excluded him, are liable in damages. The head teacher is liable as the person who decided on his exclusion; the governors are liable for their failure to establish a discipline committee to consider the claimant's exclusions.

[79] Mr Jonathan Moffett disputed these submissions. He accepted that the domestic lawfulness of an exclusion from school (or other prevention from attendance) is relevant to the question whether the convention right has been unlawfully interfered with. But he disputed that domestic unlawfulness of itself constitutes a breach of art 2 of the First Protocol.

[80] The authorities on art 2 of the First Protocol are relatively sparse. They were admirably summarised by Mr Moffett in his skeleton argument:

> '23. The broad right to education referred to in the first sentence of art 2 of the First Protocol comprises three individual rights (see Belgian Linguistic Case (No 2) (1968) 1 EHRR 252 at 281 (para 4); R (on the application of Holub) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] 1 WLR 1359 at 1367 per Tuckey LJ): (1) a right of access to such educational establishments as exist; (2) a right to an effective (but not the most effective possible) education. An "effective" education is an education which reaches a minimum standard; and (3) a right to official recognition of academic qualifications. In the present case, only the first two of these individual rights require consideration.
>
> 24. The right to education is not an unqualified right. In particular, the right to education calls for regulation by the state, regulation which will vary in time and place according to particular circumstances (see Belgian Linguistic Case (No 2) at 281 (para 5)). Provided such regulation does not injure the substance of the right to education and is "reasonable", it will not breach art 2 of the First Protocol (see Belgian Linguistic Case (No 2); Campbell and Cosans v UK (1982) 4 EHRR 293 at 307 (para 41)).
>
> 25. One aspect of the regulation of the right to education is the operation of a system of disciplinary sanctions. Accordingly: (1) the right to education does not preclude disciplinary measures such as suspension and expulsion from an educational establishment (see Yanasik v Turkey (1993) 74 DR 14 at 27; Sulak v Turkey (1996) 84-A DR 98 at 100); (2) the operation of reasonable disciplinary sanctions will not give rise to a breach of art 2 of the First Protocol (see Whitman v UK App No 13477/87 (4 October 1989, unreported) (para 1)); (3) where, as part of the operation of a system of disciplinary sanctions, a school makes reasonable demands before it will allow a child to return to school, but there is a failure to comply with those demands, the responsibility for any lack of education does not lie with the school (see Whitman v UK App No 13477/87 (4 October 1989, unreported)); (4) the fact that there is an opportunity to challenge a disciplinary measure is relevant to the assessment of whether it gives rise to a breach of art 2 of the First Protocol (see Sulak v Turkey (1996) 84-A DR 98 at 100); (5) art 2 of the First Protocol does not confer a right to be educated in a particular school (see Yanasik v Turkey; R (on the application of B) v Head Teacher of Alperton Community School [2001] EWHC Admin 229 at [62], [2001] ELR 359 at [62] per Newman J; S v Brent London BC [2002] EWCA Civ 693 at [9], [2002] ELR 556 at [9] per Schiemann LJ); and (6) the fact that a child can be educated otherwise than at school while he is excluded from a school may mean that no breach of art 2 of the First Protocol arises (see S v Brent London BC).'

[81] I accept these propositions as accurately reflecting the authorities to which reference was made.

[82] Of particular relevance is the decision of the European Commission of Human Rights in Yanasik v Turkey (1993) 74 DR 14 at 27, in the course of which they stated:

> 'Moreover, the Commission considers that in principle the right to education cannot be allowed to impinge on the State's right to regulate education (cf (Campbell and Cosans v UK (1982) 4 EHRR 293 at 307 (para 41))) and that this right does not exclude all disciplinary penalties. It would not be contrary to Article 2 of Protocol No. 1 for pupils to be suspended or expelled, provided that the national regulations did not prevent them from enrolling in another establishment in order to pursue their studies.'

[83] In my judgment, it has to be borne in mind that the duty created by art 2 of the First Protocol is imposed on the state, and not on any particular domestic institution. It does not create a right to be educated in any particular institution or in any particular manner. Expulsion from a school of a pupil who has no access to alternative educational facilities, such as enrolment in another school or education through a pupil referral unit, may cause a breach of art 2 of the First Protocol, and if so the school authority may be liable for damages; but if the pupil is able to have access to efficient education elsewhere, no breach of his convention right will be involved. If the cause of the unavailability of alternative efficient education is the action or inaction of the local education authority, on whom duties are imposed by ss 13 and 19(1) of the 1996 Act, it will be the local education authority, rather than the school authority, that will have caused the infringement of the pupil's rights under art 2 of the First Protocol. If suitable and adequate alternative educational facilities are available, but the pupil's parents decide that their child should not use them, then the local education authority will in general not have caused an infringement of art 2 of the First Protocol.

[84] In my judgment, this is the position whether or not the expulsion from school is lawful under domestic law. Just as compliance with domestic law may not justify a withdrawal of educational facilities for the purposes of art 2 of the First Protocol (as where, for example, the statutory provisions concerning disciplinary sanctions permit or require exclusion from education in what are objectively unreasonably wide circumstances and that sanction is imposed unreasonably), so domestic unlawfulness does not of itself necessarily amount to an infringement of art 2 of the First Protocol.

[85] Against this legal background, I turn to consider the events in question.

DISCUSSION

[86] The first issue to be addressed is the characterisation, under domestic law, of the claimant's absence from school following the fire, between 8 and 20 March 2001. Mr Moffett submitted that the claimant had been given leave of absence. The claimant's case is that he was excluded.

[87] The 1996 Act and the 1995 regulations envisage only four categories of absence from school on the part of a child of compulsory school age: exclusions; leave; inability to attend by reason of unavoidable cause, such as illness; and unauthorised absence. Exclusion is enforced absence by decision of the school; leave is absence at the request or instigation of the pupil or his family to which the school has agreed. The fact that a parent accepts that the circumstances warrant exclusion cannot convert an exclusion into leave of absence.

[88] Mrs Telfer's note, made on 9 March 2001, states that following the fire and the three boys being taken to the police station she spoke to B and: 'I explained to all the families that it would be sensible for the boys to remain at home on Friday and Monday until we knew what was going to happen.' On that basis, the claimant's absence was, at least so far as his family was concerned, consensual on the Friday and Monday. As mentioned above, however, the claimant did not return to school after the Monday, or indeed at all. In evidence, Mrs Telfer accepted that it was her intention that the boys should not come into school until a decision had been made about them. I find that she made her intention clear to the families, including B. Doubtless all three families accepted the good sense of the decision, following a serious incident in circumstances where it was not known what action would be taken by the police. However, as stated above, that fact does not convert the school's decision that the boys should not come in into an application by the families for leave of absence. In my judgment, the claimant was excluded from school during the period from 8–20 March 2001. It is not surprising that this is how Ms Pavlou subsequently viewed his absence (see her letter of 21 March 2001).

[89] The next questions are whether this period of exclusion was reasonable in the circumstances and lawful. Of its reasonableness I have no doubt. The school was faced with a difficult situation, in which what may have been a schoolboy prank but might have been a serious offence had been committed. It was reasonable of the head teacher not to make a decision as to how the matter should be dealt with until she knew the outcome of the criminal proceedings. There would otherwise be a risk that she would deal with it in a manner inconsistent with the criminal court's decision; in particular, she might take the view that the matter was not serious, whereas the youth court, on what might be a more thorough investigation of the facts, might take a far more serious view. Given the potential seriousness of the matter, and the undesirability of the three boys coming together with the pupils who were witnesses against them, it was reasonable for them to be temporarily excluded. A decision had to be taken immediately following the fire and the action of the police: in my judgment it was clearly a reasonable, and indeed sensible, decision in the circumstances.

[90] Neither Mrs Telfer nor subsequently Ms Pavlou interviewed the claimant before making the decision to, in effect, exclude. The omission to do so was inconsistent with the guidance in the circular, and in any event with the general principle that a decision to exclude should not be made without giving the pupil affected an opportunity to meet the case against him (see, e g R v Head Teacher and Independent Appeal Committee of Dunraven School, ex p B [2000] ELR 156). I do not criticise them for this. The guidance is not mandatory, but regard must be had to it. I do not think that regard was had to it by either Mrs Telfer or Ms Pavlou, but if they had considered it, I think that their decision would have been the same. The position of a head teacher when a pupil has been accused of a serious crime (and arson is a serious crime) and the police are conducting an investigation that may lead to a prosecution, and even worse if the pupil is charged, is a difficult one. There is a risk that an interview with the pupil will be regarded as an attempt to cause him to incriminate himself. Interviews with other pupil witnesses may lead to accusations that their evidence has been corrupted, or of interference with the criminal process. There are obvious risks of at best friction and at worst intimidation or interference with witnesses if the accused pupil is allowed to return to school and mix with his fellow pupils. If nothing is done, the impression may be given that the incident was unimportant, which carries with it a risk to school discipline. Finally, while the police investigation or prosecution is pending, it may be sensible for the head teacher to take action not on the basis that the accused pupil has been guilty of anything, but on the basis that there is a substantial accusation against him the truth of which has not been determined. I do not therefore find it surprising that the 2003 amendment to the circular is cautious in the advice it contains for head teachers in this situation, or that, significantly, it does not mandate head teachers to interview a pupil suspected of a serious crime before deciding on a temporary exclusion. Of course, very different considerations apply to a permanent exclusion.

[91] Similar concerns are reflected in the judgment of Moses J in R v Independent Appeal Panel of Sheffield City Council, ex p N [2000] ELR 700. In that case, he gave leave to apply for judicial review of a decision of an independent appeal panel to reinstate a pupil accused of sexually assaulting another pupil, in circumstances where a prosecution was pending and his alleged victim remained a pupil at the school. Moses J said (at 701–702):

> '(5) ... I am told that on present researches of counsel it is accepted that as a matter of law the panel is bound to consider whether the proposed defendant in the criminal proceedings is in fact guilty of the offence. I find that a startling proposition, and I would, were I deciding it, require a lot of persuasion that it was the true position in law.
>
> (6) It seems to me that by far the best approach would be for the panel to accept that it cannot investigate the truth or otherwise of the charge and consider a free-standing separate issue, namely whether it is in the best interests of the school, all the pupils, the other pupil particularly concerned and of course the pupil who is charged, for that pupil to be excluded, bearing in mind that the truth or otherwise of the accusation cannot be determined until the criminal proceedings. It seems to me that the panel is making all sorts of difficulties for itself in attempting to decide the issue of guilt or innocence with its hands tied behind its back. There will be many pupils who feel unable, on legal advice, to assist the panel because they will want to keep their defence fresh for the criminal charge. Indeed, the complainant herself might regard it as wholly undesirable that she should have to give an account to the panel while the criminal charge is pending.' a

I agree with these comments.

[92] Furthermore, Ms Pavlou had in fact been advised by the police not to interview the pupils who were the subject of their criminal investigation; and that their investigation would not take very long to complete. In addition, it was b reasonable for her to take the view that the arson was a serious matter and that all of the pupils of the school should appreciate that it was so regarded by her. In addition, the local education authority had advised that it was appropriate for the boys to remain at home (see Mrs Telfer's note of 9 March 2001). Lastly, the claimant's family had not objected to his non-attendance.

[93] The exclusion was none the less not a lawful exclusion. It was not a c permanent exclusion; nor was it an exclusion for a fixed period. An exclusion must be one or the other. An indefinite temporary exclusion is not known to the law. In addition, none of the requirements of s 65(1) or (3) of the School Standards and Framework Act 1998 was complied with. As a result, the governors could not comply with s 66. These defaults flowed to some extent d from the failure of Mrs Telfer to appreciate that an exclusion was involved, and the failure of Ms Pavlou to address the issue whether the claimant was being excluded and if so the legal requirements relating to exclusion. Clearly, at some stage Ms Pavlou appreciated that there had been an exclusion (see the terms of her letter of 21 March). She did not, however, comply with the guidance in the circular requiring that the exclusion be notified in writing to the parents. That e should have been done.

[94] There followed fixed periods of exclusion from 21 March to 13 July. Again, no interview was sought of the claimant. Again, I consider that it was none the less reasonable for Ms Pavlou to decide to exclude the claimant while criminal proceedings were pending against him. However, her letters did not contain f the information required by s 65(1)(c) and (d). In my judgment, the last paragraph of the letter of 21 March was insufficiently specific to comply with the requirements of those provisions. Given that this exclusion was prompted by the local education authority (see Ms Pavlou's witness statement), s 65(4) was complied with so far as it was concerned. The governors were informed of the exclusion by copy of the letter of 21 March, as required by that subsection. However, they did not act as g required by s 66(2) and (3).

[95] There were similar defects in relation to the letters of 25 April and 25 May 2001. Moreover, the 20-day exclusion made by the letter of 25 May expired on 15 June, but nothing was done at its expiration to resolve the claimant's position. In any event, the maximum 45 days' temporary exclusion expired on 6 June. It h follows that the claimant's exclusion after that date was unlawful: the school was compelled, by reason of that maximum, in the absence of a request from his parents that he continue to stay away from school, either to exclude the claimant permanently or to permit him to return to school.

[96] I do not think that the failure to include in the exclusion letters a notice j complying with s 65(1)(c) and (d) had any practical effect. Ms Pavlou's letters informed the family of the possibility of approaching the governors, and no reason was given why they did not do so. I find that if the letters had complied with the statutory requirement, the family would not have appealed to the governors. The governors (by their discipline committee) did not comply with the requirement of s 66 that they consider the exclusion of the claimant.

[97] Complaint is made of the delay between the school learning of the discontinuation of the prosecution and 13 July. I think it was reasonable of the school to await formal notification of the discontinuation. They received that on 3 July and the parents were written to on that date. Given that the requirement of a reintegration meeting is good practice, and understandably so, that Ms Pavlou considered (reasonably, as I find) such a meeting crucial to the successful integration of the claimant, that she could not organise a meeting at which those required could be present before 13 July because of their commitments, I reject the suggestion that the meeting should have been arranged for an earlier date. In any event, if it had been I have no reason to believe that the outcome would have been any different.

[98] In the absence of reliable evidence from the claimant's family, the true reason for their failure to attend the meeting cannot be known. I have no credible explanation from them. The claimant's sister, who was involved in the telephone calls that day, did not give evidence. No reason for her absence was given. I accept Ms Pavlou's evidence as to the telephone calls on the day relating to transport. Ms Horton's evidence that she told the family that 13 July was the only date available for them to come to the school for a meeting was not disputed. Given that evidence, and the inconsistencies in the family's reasons for their non-attendance, I conclude that, ultimately, they chose not to attend the meeting, and that they had no good reason not to attend. It is conceivable that they feared a civil action, or objected to their son participating in either the redecoration of the room or paying for it. The cost of redecoration would have been substantial for the claimant's family: but they did not know what that cost might be when they decided not to attend. It may be that the family were undecided whether they wanted the claimant to return to the school: they were, I find, undecided when they met Mr Read on 18 October; and this is the most probable reason.

[99] None the less, I have to say that Ms Pavlou's letter of 4 July could and should have been more gently worded, given the means, background and difficulties with English of the claimant's family. The suggestion of civil proceedings was unnecessary. The letter gave the impression that the redecoration of the room was a precondition to the reintegration of the claimant, rather than something that would be discussed at the meeting. It was entirely reasonable for the school to want the three boys to show their community responsibility by undertaking the redecoration of the room. However, the claimant and his family might have had good objections to the requirement, which should be considered by the school. A firm decision should have awaited the meeting rather than preceded it.

[100] I regret that I also criticise Ms Pavlou's letter of 13 July. While I fully sympathise with her insistence on a reintegration meeting, her response was precipitate. First, given that neither she nor Mrs Telfer had spoken to anyone in the claimant's family, so that Ms Pavlou was relying on messages passed on to her, and the differences in the information she had received, it was appropriate to try to find out why the family had not attended. Secondly, there was a real risk that by acting as she did she was punishing the claimant for a decision of his parents (cf para 6.4 of the circular). Thirdly, the school was dealing with a family whose parents knew little English. The possibility of misunderstanding or confusion could not be excluded. Even if it would have been very difficult to have organised a similar reintegration meeting for a later date, an explanation of the claimant's non-attendance should have been sought. If necessary, Ms Pavlou would have had to consider the possibility of a reduced meeting, or a different reintegration task for the claimant.

[101] Mr Moffett submitted that the letter of 13 July was intended to precipitate the claimant's return to the school, and indeed according to Ms Pavlou's evidence that was her purpose. Regrettably, the terms of the letter were such as to be more likely to have the opposite effect.

[102] In addition, the information given to the family was that the claimant was being immediately removed from the school roll. There were no legal grounds to do so. As a matter of law, the letter constituted his permanent exclusion. However, the information before Ms Pavlou did not justify permanent exclusion. A wilful refusal by the claimant personally to attend a reintegration meeting or to accept any responsibility for his failure to raise the alarm on 8 March might have given grounds for exclusion: but his part in the non-attendance at the meeting was unknown.

[103] The governors should also have considered Ms Pavlou's letter of 13 July as effecting the claimant's permanent exclusion and fulfilled the duty imposed on them by s 66 of the School Standards and Framework Act 1998, taking into account the guidance in the circular. If there was not one already, a discipline committee should have been established for the purpose.

[104] However, the claimant failed to plead, before the beginning of the hearing, that if the governors had fulfilled their statutory duty, and (through their discipline committee) considered the claimant's exclusion, they would have directed his reinstatement, and that accordingly their failure to perform their statutory duty resulted in his inability to return to the school, and interfered with his rights under art 2 of the First Protocol. As a result, no witness statement had been served by any governor of the school, and in particular no witness was available to say what they would have done if they had considered the claimant's exclusion. It was for this reason that the only plea made in the amended claim form for which I gave leave to amend was that the failure to hold a discipline committee hearing to consider the exclusion, of itself, contravened the claimant's convention rights under art 6, and art 2 of the First Protocol. So far as art 2 of the First Protocol is concerned, this plea is insufficient: a claimant seeking damages for breach of his rights under art 2 of the First Protocol must show that the breach of domestic law which he alleges caused the interference with his right to education under that article.

[105] The removal of the claimant from the school roll, in the autumn of 2001, was also in my judgment unlawful. The only relevant sub-paragraph of reg 9(1) of the 1995 regulations, and that relied upon, is sub-para (g). I have considerable doubt as to its application. It is intended to relate to voluntary absence from school, not to absence caused by the school. It was hardly surprising that the claimant was absent from school following Ms Pavlou's letter of 13 July. The sub-paragraph that should have been applicable to the registration of the claimant at the school was (k), but the school cannot rely on it by reason of reg 9(4)(d). It is difficult to see that both (k) and (g) can apply to the same set of facts. Be that as it may, however, in my judgment, neither the school nor the local education authority made reasonable inquiry to locate the claimant before his removal. The only inquiry made by the local education authority, so far as the evidence shows, consisted of three telephone calls to the claimant's home on 1, 2 and 3 October 2001. The suggestion that he had gone to Bangladesh appears to have been pure surmise. The only inquiries made by the school consisted of Mrs Telfer's attempts to telephone the family early in the term. Those telephone calls were made 'without success'. How often, on what dates and at what times of day she telephoned is not in evidence. No letter was sent to the claimant's home by either the local education authority or the school to cover the possibility that no one was at home when the calls were made. No one sought to visit his home. These telephone calls did not amount to reasonable inquiry. Regulation 9(1)(g) requires that both the local education authority and the school should have made reasonable inquiry to locate the pupil in question (see R (on the application of M) v Barking and Dagenham London BC [2002] EWHC 2483 (Admin), [2002] All ER (D) 64 (Aug)).

[106] These failures of the school and the local education authority to observe the requirements of the relevant statutes and regulations disclose a regrettable ignorance of those requirements. They could and should have been challenged at the time. It is unfortunate that they were not. It is understandable that an immigrant family, whose parents' command of English is poor, should not have done so. However, as I have held, apart from the failure to comply with its statutory obligations, the school's decisions to exclude the claimant until the termination of the prosecution and then until a reintegration meeting could be held was sensible and reasonable, and in my judgment does not give rise to liability for breach of art 2 of the First Protocol.

[107] Different considerations apply to the claimant's exclusion from school after 13 July. His exclusion and removal from the register were not reasonable nor justified under domestic law. In the circumstances, the only defence to the claim for damages for breach of art 2 of the First Protocol is that appropriate educational facilities were none the less available to the claimant but that either he chose not to avail himself of them or that the responsibility for the missed period of education was that of the local education authority.

[108] The local education authority had undertaken responsibility for the claimant's education as a result of his exclusion. That responsibility arose under s 19(1) of the 1996 Act. It may be that the words 'by reason of ... exclusion from school' should be read as referring to a lawful exclusion (although this would be contrary to the general rule that an unlawful administrative action is valid and effective unless and until it is quashed), but if so an unlawful exclusion is in my judgment within the expression 'or otherwise'. The local education authority did not provide tuition for the claimant because, as I have found, the family declined the offer of tuition. It follows that the school was not the cause of the claimant's lack of suitable education between the 13 July and the end of the summer term.

[109] The cause of the claimant's lack of schooling or education during the autumn of 2001 is more complex to ascertain. There is no explanation for the family's failure to contact Mr Read or Ms Gurney, who were referred to in Ms Pavlou's letter of 13 July, until October 2001. In addition, I find that until early November 2001 he and his family were uncertain whether they wanted him to return to the Lord Grey School (see eg Mr Read's letter of 22 October). If that uncertainty was the result of the school's unreasonable or unlawful actions, it might be responsible for it. However, I have no evidence from the family as to whether it was caused by, for example, Ms Pavlou's letter of 13 July, or resulted from the fact that the claimant had been accused of involvement in arson. B's evidence, that at the meeting with Mr Read the family expressed their wish that A should return to the Lord Grey School, is inconsistent with Mr Read's letter and his evidence, and I reject it.

[110] Furthermore, nothing had occurred to bring to an end the local education authority's responsibility for the claimant's education under s 19(1).

Although Mr Read said that he was unaware, during the autumn of 2001, that the claimant was out of school, he and Ms Gurney and Ms Barby had all been copied into the letter of 13 July, from which it was apparent that he had not returned to the Lord Grey School, so that the section applied. It was the local education authority's responsibility to provide suitable education for him. a [111] It follows that there were educational facilities available to the claimant. The evidence, which consists only of the cross-examination of Mr Read, does not justify a finding that if the claimant had sought access to the tuition services of the Manor Road pupil referral unit, they would have been inadequate. Moreover, it must be the case that if the family had made contact with Mr Read (or, presumably, Ms Gurney) soon after receipt of Ms Pavlou's letter of 13 July, the claimant would have been admitted to another school much earlier, and possibly in time for the beginning of the autumn term. b c

[112] In these circumstances, the claimant has not proved that his lack of schooling in the autumn, prior to his father's letter of 6 November 2001, was caused by the school.

[113] After the school had refused to permit the claimant to return, on the ground that its roll was full, it continued to be the responsibility of the local education authority (who were notified of the refusal by copy of the letter of 14 November 2001) to provide tuition pending the claimant's admission to an alternative school. d

[114] It follows that, although the decisions to exclude the claimant and to remove him from the roll were unlawful, and could have been challenged by judicial review, they did not give rise to a liability in damages for breach of his rights under art 2 of the First Protocol. e

Claim dismissed.

Aaron Turpin Barrister.

Graham v Entec Europe Ltd (trading as Exploration Associates)

[2003] EWCA Civ 1177

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

POTTER, CHADWICK LJJ AND CRESSWELL J

6 AUGUST 2003

Limitation of action – Latent damage – Three-year limitation period – Three-year limitation period for negligence actions where facts relevant to cause of action not known at date of accrual – Claimant seeking to rely on three-year limitation period in negligence action in respect of latent damage – Loss adjuster aware of potential claim – Whether knowledge of loss adjuster appointed by claimant's insurers in subrogated claim attributable to claimant – Whether claimant's cause of action prima facie time-barred – Limitation Act 1980, s 14(5).

In 1991, following the development of cracks in his bungalow, the claimant claimed upon an insurance policy with his insurers. The claimant also obtained advice from a structural engineer on his own behalf. The engineer concluded that the cracking was caused by shallow foundations coupled with clay shrinkage exacerbated by the presence of at least one oak tree. The insurers retained H, a chartered surveyor and loss adjuster, to investigate the damage on their behalf. In April 1991, H reported to the insurers, and the defendant geotechnical engineers were appointed. They gave advice supporting the installation of underpinning to the foundations and the remedial works were completed in August 1992. Within weeks, minor cracking appeared within the part of the property which had been underpinned. By the end of summer 1995, it became apparent that the cracking was significant and continuing. H was again instructed by the insurers to investigate the further movement and report on the adequacy of the work carried out. After further investigation, it became apparent that the defendant had not followed national guidance for house-building near trees. In November 1996, H was told that a geotechnical engineer had reported that the principal cause of the problem was clay shrinkage caused by the root water demands of the surrounding oak trees, but he did not receive that information in writing until July 1997, whereupon he reported back to the insurers. After consideration, it was decided that the cost of further works could not be justified and the bungalow was 'written off'. Accordingly, when proceedings were brought in July 2000 for the wasted costs of the defendant's work, the claim was brought by the insurers in the name of the claimant, the insurers having become subrogated to the claimant's rights of recovery on payment of his original claim under his policy. A preliminary issue arose as to whether the claim was barred under the Limitation Act 1980. The judge determined that the claimant personally did not have the relevant knowledge for the purpose of time starting to run until he was given a copy of the report in July 1997. She went on to find, however, that H, as an experienced loss adjuster, had the necessary knowledge prior to July 1997, since he had been made aware of the contents of the expert report in November 1996. She concluded that H's knowledge was knowledge which was to be imputed to the claimant for the purpose of s 14A[a] of the 1980 Act and that the claim was therefore time-barred. On the claimant's appeal, it fell to be determined whether a loss adjuster appointed by a claimant's insurers in a subrogated claim could have knowledge attributable to the claimant for the purpose of s 14A of the 1980 Act. Section 14A(5) provided that: 'For the purpose of this section, the starting date for reckoning the period of limitation under sub–s (4)(b) above [i e three years] is the earliest date upon which the plaintiff or any other person in whom the cause of action was vested before him first had both the knowledge required for bringing an action for damages in respect of the relevant damage and the right to bring such an action.'

Held – In relation to a subrogated claim, for the purposes of consideration of the date upon which the claimant acquired the relevant knowledge under s 14A of the 1980 Act so as to start time running for limitation purposes, the nominal claimant was fixed with the knowledge of the insurer for whose benefit the action was brought. Section 14A(5) appeared to have particularly in mind the situation where a plaintiff sued as the assignee of another. However, it plainly contemplated that, at any given time, it was the knowledge of the person in whom the cause of action was vested that was relevant. The effect of the doctrine of subrogation in relation to contracts of indemnity by way of insurance was similar to that of an assignment of the assured's policy rights against a tortfeaser. The doctrine conferred upon the insurer, on payment of the loss, the right to receive the benefit of all rights and remedies of the assured against third parties. In those circumstances, it was plainly appropriate to construe the word 'plaintiff' in s 14A(5) as extending to a plaintiff whether suing in his or her own name, or in the name of another by way of subrogation. The knowledge of a loss adjuster investigating and advising on a claim on behalf of insurers for the purpose of pursuing a subrogated claim by those insurers was to be treated as knowledge of the insurers for the purposes of s 14A(5). Moreover, the judge's finding that the loss adjuster had the requisite knowledge by November 1996 was a finding which she had been entitled to make on the evidence. Accordingly, the appeal would be dismissed (see [36]–[39], [43]–[46], below).

Notes

For negligence actions where the damage was not discoverable within the limitation period, see 28 Halsbury's Laws (4th edn reissue) paras 888, 1071.

For the Limitation Act 1980, s 14A, see 24 Halsbury's Statutes (4th edn) (1998 reissue) 713.

Cases referred to in judgments

Mirza v Birmingham Health Authority [2001] All ER (D) 449 (Jul).

Nash v Eli Lilly & Co [1993] 4 All ER 383, [1993] 1 WLR 782, CA.

South Pacific Manufacturing Co Ltd v New Zealand Security Consultants & Investigations Ltd, Mortensen v Laing [1992] 2 NZLR 282, NZ CA.

Spargo v North Essex District Health Authority [1997] PIQR 235, CA.

a Section 14A, so far as material, is set out at [22]–[25], below

Appeal

James Graham appealed with the permission of Judge Alton sitting as a High Court judge at Birmingham given on 24 January 2003 from her order of that date whereby she held, as a preliminary issue, that Mr Graham's claim against the respondent, Entec Europe Ltd (trading as Exploration Associates) in respect of negligent advice as to the causes of and recommendations for remedial works in respect of subsidence of a bungalow was time-barred pursuant to s 14A(4)(b) of the Limitation Act 1980. The facts are set out in the judgment of Potter LJ.

Graeme Sampson (instructed by Beachcroft Wansbroughs, Birmingham) for the claimant.

Kristina Stern (instructed by Eversheds, Newcastle-upon-Tyne) for the defendant.

Cur adv vult

6 August 2003. The following judgments were delivered.

POTTER LJ.

INTRODUCTION

[1] This is an appeal from the judgment dated 24 January 2003 of Judge Alton sitting as a High Court judge at Birmingham on a preliminary issue, whereby she held that the claim of the claimant against the defendant in respect of negligent advice as to the causes of and recommendations for remedial works in respect of subsidence at the bungalow, Offchurch, Leamington Spa, Warwickshire, was time-barred pursuant to s 14A(4)(b) of the Limitation Act 1980.

[2] The remedial works were completed by August 1992. However, further cracking in the structure of the bungalow became evident within a month thereafter, which later developed to the extent that further works of rectification were necessary, thus giving rise to these proceedings. Given the appearance of cracking in September 1992, the primary limitation period in respect of the claimant's cause of action expired well before proceedings were commenced on 14 July 2000. The question before the judge was whether or not, for the purposes of s 14A of the 1980 Act, the claimant was possessed of the requisite knowledge as to his cause of action prior to 14 July 1997. The defendant asserted that the claimant knew or ought reasonably to have known of the cause of the damage shortly after it allegedly occurred in 1992–93. The claimant asserted that the requisite knowledge was not available until he was aware of the final conclusions of experts appointed to advise his insurers' loss adjusters in September 1997.

[3] The principal question raised by the appeal is whether a loss adjuster appointed by a claimant's insurers in a subrogated claim can have knowledge attributable to the claimant for the purposes of s 14A of the 1980 Act. A subsidiary question arises as to whether that loss adjuster should be deemed himself to have knowledge at a point prior to delivery of the report of an expert appointed by him to investigate the cause of the loss to which the claim relates.

THE FACTS

[4] In 1991, following the development of cracks in his bungalow, the claimant claimed upon an insurance policy with his insurers, the (Royal &) Sun

Alliance (the insurers). Since the insurers would only finance remedial work designed to rectify actual damage and would not bear the cost of additional works designed to prevent the risk of future damage to parts of the property not currently affected, the claimant obtained advice from Chmiel Overton, structural engineers, on his own behalf. Chmiel Overton reported their view that the cracking was attributable to a combination of shallow foundations together with clay shrinkage exacerbated by the proximity of at least one oak tree which suggested to them that either mini-piling or traditional underpinning might be required.

[5] The insurers retained Mr Handford, a chartered surveyor and loss adjuster, to investigate the damage on their behalf. In April 1991 he reported to them the substance of Chmiel Overton's report.

[6] The defendants, who are geotechnical engineers, were instructed. Between July 1991 and 6 August 1992 they made reports and gave advice supporting the installation of traditional underpinning to the foundations, which scheme was adopted by the claimant with the approval of the insurers, the claimant having decided not to finance the additional costs of installing underpinning to the property as a whole.

[7] The remedial works were completed in August 1992. Within weeks, minor cracking appeared within that part of the property which had been underpinned. The claimant was initially advised that this might simply be 'bedding down' of the works; however, monitoring was instituted under the supervision of Chmiel Overton. The monitoring confirmed that the property continued to be subject to subsidence movement in the area which had been underpinned and, by the end of summer 1995, it was clear that the cracking was significant and continuing.

[8] Mr Handford was again instructed on behalf of the underwriters. He sought authority to investigate the suitability and adequacy of the works carried out, already being concerned that the works might not have been appropriate. He sought authority to appoint other structural engineers to investigate the further movement and to report upon the adequacy of the work carried out stating in a letter to insurers dated 14 November 1995:

> 'There are two very large mature oak trees in close proximity to the property and, in hindsight, the scheme of stabilisation work with traditional underpinning may not have been appropriate. We therefore propose to instruct the other engineers to investigate the cause of further movement, ascertain whether any further remedial work is required and finally to consider whether or not there has been any negligence on the part of the insured's own engineers.'

[9] The insurers then authorised Mr Handford to instruct engineers, and Mr Turner, of Robert Turner and Partners, a civil/structural engineer, was appointed, his letter of retainer making clear that he was instructed to undertake whatever investigation was required to determine the cause of the further movement and whether the rectification works undertaken were structurally sufficient, particularly in view of the proximity of two of the mature oak trees.

[10] After visiting the site Mr Turner sought the advice of Mr Finch, an arboriculturist, to advise on the influence of the oak trees. In his letter of instruction dated 4 March 1996 Mr Turner informed Mr Finch:

'I have not, as yet, written my report on the present condition of the building, as I would like you to visit the property, inspect the damage, and let me have your preliminary views concerning the possible influence of three mature oak trees that surround the structure.'

[11] On 4 June 1996 Mr Finch reported to Mr Turner, the report being copied to Mr Handford and the claimant.

[12] In that report Mr Finch noted that, while extensive ground investigations and soil tests had been carried out by the defendants, their engineering report had made no reference to the likely effects of the adjacent trees and they had concluded that there was little evidence that the adjacent oaks were contributing to the movement. He noted that the underpinning depth recommended by the defendants for remedial works at the front of the property did not correspond with the guidance provided in National House-Building Council Practice Note Number 3 (1985) Building Near Trees, which suggested that significantly greater foundation depths would be appropriate in the context of high water demand deciduous trees on medium-shrinkability soil. He concluded:

'Based on the information to date it is highly likely the adjacent trees are involved in the movement that have led to the recurrence of structural damage. It is vitally important for the cracks to be monitored together with the building level on a monthly basis for a period of at least 12 months and that the extent and depth of the underpinning is established. When these facts are available I can then submit a tree management programme for your consideration.'

[13] Monitoring was instituted and maintained in accordance with Mr Finch's recommendation. Meanwhile, in July 1996, Mr Turner appointed Mr Eaton, a geotechnical engineer, to attend on site and open trial holes to enable an independent view of ground conditions to be given. Mr Eaton investigated in August 1996 but did not submit a report until November. Meanwhile, Mr Handford reported direct to the claimant, stating that no conclusions had been reached at the site meeting and that boreholes were required. On 12 September 1996 he reported to the claimant:

'Having recently discussed the matter with Mr Turner, we understand that he is awaiting receipt of the arboriculturist's and geotechnical reports but the suggestion is that possibly root growth from the rear oak trees is causing desiccation of the soil at a lower level than the depth of the underpinning, hence the need for bore-hole investigation.'

[14] Mr Eaton reported in November 1996 to Mr Finch the arboriculturist. The conclusion to his findings was as follows:

'It is impossible to escape the conclusion therefore that the principal cause of the distress of the perimeter elevations is, and always has been, clay shrinkage due to the root water demands of the surrounding oak trees, in particular. It is inconceivable that this degree of desiccation could have imposed itself upon the foundation soil in the short period that had intervened since the completion of the underpinning.'

[15] His recommendation as to necessary further works of rectification was that further underpinning be undertaken based upon piles. He said the scheme would be structurally complex and costly as a result, which in turn placed doubt on the long-term viability of the existing dwelling.

[16] Mr Finch did not copy Mr Eaton's report to Mr Handford or submit a report of his own at that stage. However, the judge found that, Mr Handford having spoken to Mr Turner shortly after Mr Finch had sent his report to Mr Turner, he would have been told a summary of Mr Eaton's findings.

[17] Mr Turner did not submit a written report to the claimant or the insurers at this stage, as he was continuing to await monitoring results from Chmiel Overton. Having received these in February 1997, he forwarded them to Mr Finch with a request to submit his report as soon as possible. Mr Finch reported on 8 April 1997. While concurring with Mr Eaton as to the most likely cause of desiccation, he concluded that, though he had no specific evidence, he suspected that the building was suffering from seasonal movement superimposed on heave as a result of root severance during the underpinning works. He recommended that level monitoring was continued and past results reviewed and recalculated.

[18] Following further monitoring, on 17 July 1997 Mr Finch again reported, saying:

> 'Based on the evidence to hand I consider the cause of the structural damage to this property is the result of the indirect actions of the adjacent oak tree on the clay soil supporting the foundation.'

[19] He concluded there was no available tree management solution to the problem and supported Mr Eaton's proposal for sleeve piling.

[20] Mr Turner finally reported to Mr Handford by letter dated 30 July 1997 which concluded:

> 'Quite independently the geologist, the arboriculturist and ourselves have come to the conclusion that the scheme of underpinning that was carried out did not properly address the problem of desiccation of the clay sub-soil caused by the presence of the mature oak trees, and this had led to the ongoing and progressive damage that started within a month or so of the work being completed. In fact it is debatable in the view of the geologist and ourselves if any scheme of repair will be entirely successful due to the maturity and close proximity of the trees to the building.'

[21] Mr Handford reported back to the insurers. After further consideration it was decided that the cost of further piling work guaranteed to stabilise the building (if indeed a contractor could be found to guarantee the work) could not be justified and the claimant's bungalow was 'written off'. Accordingly when proceedings were eventually brought in July 2000 for the wasted costs of the original work of piling, they were brought by the insurers suing in the name of the claimant, the insurers having become subrogated to the claimant's rights of recovery upon payment of his original claim under his policy.

SECTION 14A OF THE 1980 ACT

[22] Section 14A(5) provides:

> 'For the purposes of this section, the starting date for reckoning the period of limitation under subsection (4)(b) above [ie three years] is the earliest date on which the plaintiff or any person in whom the cause of action was vested before him first had both the knowledge required for bringing an action for damages in respect of the relevant damage and a right to bring such an action.'

[23] Section 14A(6) provides:

'In subsection (5) above "the knowledge required for bringing an action for damages in respect of the relevant damage" means knowledge both—(a) of the material facts about the damage in respect of which damages are claimed; and (b) of the other facts relevant to the current action mentioned in subsection (8) below.'

[24] For the purposes of this appeal we are not concerned with the 'other facts ... mentioned in subsection (8)'. However, s 14A(7) provides:

'For the purposes of subsection (6)(a) above, the material facts about the damage are such facts about the damage as would lead a reasonable person who had suffered such damage to consider it sufficiently serious to justify his instituting proceedings for damages against a defendant who did not dispute liability and was able to satisfy a judgment.'

[25] Finally, s 14A(10) provides:

'For the purposes of this section a person's knowledge includes knowledge which he might reasonably have been expected to acquire—(a) from facts observable or ascertainable by him; or (b) from facts ascertainable by him with the help of appropriate expert advice which it is reasonable for him to seek; but a person shall not be taken by virtue of this subsection to have knowledge of a fact ascertainable only with the help of expert advice so long as he has taken all reasonable steps to obtain (and, where appropriate, to act on) that advice.'

THE JUDGE'S DECISION

[26] On the basis of the facts found by the judge as already summarised, she held that the claimant did not personally have the relevant knowledge for the purposes of time starting to run until he was given a copy of the Turner report. She observed:

'50. ... Nor is it appropriate, ignoring for the moment questions of agency, to impute to the claimant any further knowledge which the experts may have had but which had not as yet been communicated to him. The 1980 Act deals specifically with the question of constructive knowledge by s 14A(10) quoted above. Here the experts—a whole range of them—were instructed promptly. I accept that the final report of Mr Turner was delayed ... It may well be that a point does arrive when it is no longer reasonable to tolerate delays by an expert instructed on a claimant's behalf. But I do not find that such point had been reached in this case such as to warrant the imputing of knowledge to the claimant pursuant to s 14A(10).'

[27] That finding is not challenged on this appeal.

[28] The judge went on to find, however, that Mr Handford, as 'an experienced loss adjuster with prior experience in the handling of subsidence claims', had the necessary knowledge well prior to July 1997, having been made aware of the contents of the report of Mr Eaton, the geotechnical engineer, in November 1996 (see [14]–[16], above).

[29] The judge stated:

> '55. Whilst it does not appear that he was sent a copy of Mr Eaton's November 1996 report, I accept that as he spoke to Mr Turner shortly after its receipt that it was likely that he was informed at the time of Mr Eaton's conclusions although he does not now recall. I also accept that he would have understood those conclusions.
>
> 56. By this point I find that Mr Handford did have the necessary knowledge as to the material facts about the damage, attributability of that damage to the act or omission of the defendants and the identity of the defendants. True it was that he was waiting for and pressing for Mr Turner's final report and was being told that more monitoring results were wanted/expected, and later that a further report from Mr Finch was expected/had been received. But the reality was that no one was anticipating that there would be some new information negating the findings already reported; rather that any further information would confirm those findings and assist in finally determining what if any scheme of remedial works should be adopted. In so far as he needed that final report, it was also to provide the evidence to pursue a recovery and to reinforce any recommendations he might make. Given Mr Handford's knowledge of these facts, they were facts also ascertainable by the claimant in the period pre-July 1997 had he chosen to inquire rather than to leave everything to Mr Handford and underwriters.'

[30] Finally, the judge held that Mr Handford's position as loss adjuster was that of an investigator appointed as agent of the insurers to investigate and progress the claim rather than himself being an expert whose help was sought and awaited in order to ascertain the facts upon which a claim might be based, and that, as such, Mr Handford's knowledge was knowledge which was to be imputed to the claimant for the purposes of s 14A of the 1980 Act. She made that finding on the following grounds.

[31] The judge stated:

> '39. The defendant's case is not so much that knowledge of persons such as Mr Handford or Mr Turner should be regarded as knowledge of the claimant on the basis that their knowledge was to be attributed to the claimant pursuant to s 14A(10)(b) but that where, as here, the original advice, though addressed to the claimant was passed to underwriters who thereafter proceeded to finance the work in reliance thereon and hence ... [were] ... responsible for ensuring that any works be redone or that appropriate compensation was given to the insured and ... [were] ... subrogated to the claim as a consequence, then one should treat the knowledge of underwriters' expert loss adjuster as the claimant's knowledge for the purposes of s 14A(10)(a). Effectively, counsel was submitting that underwriters should be treated as being tantamount to the claimant or at least the claimant's agents for the purposes of acquiring knowledge. Accordingly, it was submitted that the knowledge of Mr Handford the loss adjuster was the relevant knowledge on the basis that Mr Handford had in turn been appointed by underwriters to investigate the claim as their and their claimant's agent and not as an expert and hence his knowledge was both their knowledge and the claimant's knowledge.

40. In factual terms, it to a very great extent reflects the reality of what was happening if the court were able to treat underwriters through Mr Handford as 'the claimant' for the purposes of the Act. Underwriters had paid/reimbursed the cost of the original design and underpinning works, although it would appear that the contract was in the name of the claimant himself. Apparently, and I derive this from the evidence of Mr Handford, where potential problems arise in respect of rectification works funded by insurers, they do hold the claim/book open and hence regard themselves as responsible for ensuring that any further losses to the insured are made good ... Indeed it was plain that Mr Handford's approach was not to consider whether the claimant could pursue a claim but whether his "principals" (ie underwriters) could pursue recovery ... It appears to have been treated as a foregone conclusion that underwriters would make whatever payment was necessary to reimburse the claimant's losses and would themselves make whatever decisions as to who should be sued for what and when. As a consequence of this ... the claimant ... left matters very much in the hands of loss adjusters and underwriters to deal as they thought fit. There was no conflict between him and underwriters; it was their problem what to do, not his ...

43. ... where as here, the claimant ... [leaves] ... all decisions about any potential claim, whether it existed, against whom and what investigations ought to be pursued to establish the strength of the claim and whether or not legal proceedings should be commenced, to others in circumstances where the claimant would, in the event of proceedings be a claimant in name only, there is powerful argument for construing the section, if the wording permits, as embracing the knowledge of the real claimants and treating that as the knowledge of the claimant. That result would give effect to the spirit of the Act by concentrating upon the knowledge of the person or body who in reality had the right and interest in pursuit of the claim. It can be achieved without doing violence to the wording of the section as it would be appropriate to treat underwriters' (and their loss adjuster charged with investigating and reporting on the claim) knowledge of facts as facts ascertainable by the claimant for the purposes of s 14A(10)(a) in the same way as a solicitor's knowledge derived from investigations carried out on behalf of a client must surely be treated as the client's knowledge (see Mirza v Birmingham Health Authority [2001] All ER (D) 449 (Jul) at paras 39–40).'

THE GROUNDS OF APPEAL

[32] Two grounds of appeal have been argued in this case. As originally drafted, the first ground asserted that the judge erred in law in finding that Mr Handford, the loss adjuster appointed by the claimant's insurers, was the plaintiff/claimant for the purposes of s 14A of the 1980 Act. However, as argued by Mr Sampson for the appellant, this resolved into a submission that Mr Handford was the agent of the insurers and not of the claimant and that therefore his knowledge could not be attributed to the claimant for the purposes of s 14A. Albeit the claimant relied upon the information acquired and reported on by Mr Handford as the de facto investigator of the claim, that was a matter of convenience only. Nor was Mr Handford, as opposed to the insurers, the person subrogated to the claimant's claim. Nor, finally, was he a person in a position analogous to that of a solicitor to the claimant (cf Mirza's case, above), being in no contractual or other agency relationship with the claimant for the purpose of investigating the claim.

[33] I accept as a matter of analysis that Mr Handford was not the agent of the claimant. He was the loss adjuster appointed by the insurers for the purpose of investigating the claim upon their behalf and, as such, his responsibility was to report to the insurers. It is true that, at one point in his evidence, Mr Handford spoke of his 'primary function' as being 'to deal with the claim and to assist the policy holder'. However, he summed it up in this way:

> 'I believe that we have a duty of care to the policyholder. As I said at the beginning, loss adjusters are bound to deal with the claim impartially and assist the policyholder as best we can. But at the end of the day our client is the insurer and it is from them that we take instructions.'

[34] In acknowledging that loss adjusters owe a duty of care to the policyholder when acting in the course of their retainer for the insurance company, Mr Handford was making a concession which was neither necessary to the issues nor, as yet, recognised by English law (cf the view of the New Zealand Court of Appeal in South Pacific Manufacturing Co Ltd v New Zealand Security Consultants & Investigations Ltd, Mortensen v Laing [1992] 2 NZLR 282 and the discussion in Clarke The Law of Insurance Contracts (3rd edn, 1997) pp 842–845 (para 30–12)). However, that is by the way. If Mr Handford had reported to the claimant information sufficient to endow the claimant with the requisite knowledge to start time running, then the claimant would have been fixed with that knowledge; however, the judge held that Mr Handford did not do so and that finding is not the subject of appeal.

[35] More pertinently, however, upon my reading of the judgment, it appears that Mr Sampson's fire is misdirected. Its seems clear that in paras 39, 40 and 43 of the judgment quoted at [31], above, the judge was not attributing knowledge of Mr Handford to the claimant, but was treating it as the knowledge of the insurers and was going on to treat the insurers' knowledge as being knowledge of the person 'who in reality had the right and interest in pursuit of the claim'.

[36] In the course of the appeal before us, Mr Sampson eventually conceded that, in relation to a subrogated claim, for the purposes of consideration of the date upon which the plaintiff acquires the relevant knowledge under s 14A so as to start time running for limitation purposes, the nominal plaintiff/claimant is fixed with the knowledge of the insurer for whose benefit the action is brought. In my view Mr Sampson was right so to concede. Like the judge, I consider that the spirit and purpose of the 1980 Act is to concentrate upon the knowledge of the person who has the right and interest in pursuing the claim.

[37] Section 14A(5) treats the starting date for reckoning the period of limitation under sub-s (4)(b) as the earliest date on which the plaintiff 'or any person in whom the cause of action was vested before him' first had the requisite knowledge. That provision would appear to have particularly in mind the situation where a plaintiff sues as the assignee of another. However, it plainly contemplates that, at any given time, it is the knowledge of the person in whom the cause of action is vested which is relevant. The effect of the doctrine of subrogation in relation to contracts of indemnity by way of insurance is similar to that of an assignment of the assured's rights of action against a tortfeasor. The doctrine confers upon the insurer, on payment of the loss, the right to receive the benefit of all rights and remedies of the assured against third parties which, if satisfied, will extinguish or diminish the ultimate loss sustained. Accordingly the insurer is entitled to exercise in the name of the assured whatever rights he possesses to seek compensation for the loss from third parties. One of the differences between subrogation and assignment is that an insurer exercising rights of subrogation against third parties must do so in the name of the insured. However, this does not detract from the fact that the subrogated rights of the insurer vest in him by operation of law upon the payment of the assured's loss and, if an assured is unco-operative in this respect, the court will act to compel him to lend his name to proceedings brought by the insurer provided the insurer tenders an indemnity as to costs. In those circumstances, as it seems to me, it is plainly appropriate to construe the words 'the plaintiff' in s 14A(5) as meaning/extending to a plaintiff whether suing in his own name or the name of another by way of subrogation. That, as I understand it, is the construction favoured by the judge and it is one which I would adopt.

[38] I would also hold that the knowledge of a loss adjuster investigating and advising on a claim on behalf of insurers for the purpose of pursuing a subrogated claim by those insurers is to be treated as the knowledge of the insurers for the purposes of s 14A(5). In the course of argument, Mr Sampson acknowledged that it is the custom of many insurers to investigate claims through their own 'in-house' loss-adjusting department. He was unable to suggest any logical reason for distinguishing between the position of such an insurer, who plainly would be fixed with the knowledge of his employee, and the position of an insurer who, for purposes of economy or business efficiency, delegates the task to an independent loss adjuster such as Mr Handford.

[39] Accordingly, I would reject the first ground of appeal.

[40] The second ground of appeal is that the judge erred in law and fact in concluding that Mr Handford had obtained sufficient knowledge for the purposes of s 14A(10) when he was still awaiting a report from an expert consulting engineer whom he had instructed to report on the cause of the subsidence. As a general proposition, Mr Sampson submitted that a claimant (in this case the insurers suing by way of subrogation) who properly seeks the advice of an expert to establish grounds of claim against a defendant should not be fixed with knowledge prior to the delivery of that expert's report. Mr Sampson relied in support of that proposition upon the observations of Purchas LJ in Nash v Eli Lilly & Co [1993] 4 All ER 383 at 396, [1993] 1 WLR 782 at 796 when, in considering the almost-identical provisions of s 14(3) of the 1980 Act, he stated:

> 'It is to be noted that a firm belief held by the plaintiff that his injury was attributable to the act or omission of the defendant, but in respect of which he thought it necessary to obtain reassurance or confirmation from experts, medical or legal, or others, would not be regarded as knowledge until the result of his inquiries was known to him or, if he delayed in obtaining that confirmation, until the time at which it was reasonable for him to have got it.' a

[41] He relies also upon various other observations in cases of personal injury in which the court has made clear that belief or suspicion is not sufficient to establish knowledge. See for instance Spargo v North Essex District Health Authority [1997] PIQR 235 at 242 per Brooke LJ: b

'(4) On the other hand she will not have the requisite knowledge ... if her state of mind is such that she thinks her condition is capable of being attributed to the act or omission alleged to constitute negligence, but she is not sure about this, and would need to check with an expert before she could be properly said to know that it was.' c

[42] Mr Sampson submits that, given that it was reasonable for Mr Handford to seek expert advice, it follows that it was reasonable for him to wait for delivery of a final report from Mr Turner, rather than reporting back to the insurers with what he understood would be the effect of that report when received, but which had not yet been confirmed. d

[43] In my view there is no substance in this ground of appeal. So far as the general submission is concerned, it does not seem to me that any broad rule of thumb can be applied in cases of this kind. Nor does it seem to me that the observations of the court in relation to the state of knowledge of, or appropriate inferences to be drawn by, claimants in personal injury cases who e lack experience of claims or dealing with experts are of real assistance in relation to the position of an experienced loss adjuster investigating a case of the instant kind on behalf of an insurance company. Between paras 51 and 56 of her judgment, the judge looked with care at the state of knowledge of Mr Handford based upon the series of experts' reports which he received. I f have already quoted her findings at [29], above. The judge, having studied the reports and heard the witnesses, made findings of fact which cannot be open to successful challenge on this appeal and which were plainly apt to imbue Mr Handford with the requisite knowledge well before the final report of Mr Turner was to hand by the end of July 1997. Even when those facts were confirmed in July 1997, for reasons which are obscure, the claimants none the g less delayed for a period of some three years before issuing proceedings.

CONCLUSION

[44] For the reasons set out above, I would dismiss this appeal.

h

CHADWICK LJ.

[45] I, too, would dismiss this appeal. I agree that, for the purposes of s 14A(5) of the Limitation Act 1980, the relevant knowledge is the knowledge of the insurers; and that, in the circumstances of this case, the knowledge of the loss adjuster, Mr Handford, is to be treated as the knowledge of his principals, j the insurers. I agree, also, that the judge's finding that Mr Handford had the requisite knowledge by November 1996—after speaking to Mr Turner—was a finding of fact which she was entitled to make on the evidence. For my part I would treat that as a finding of actual knowledge: I do not think that s 14A(10) of the 1980 Act is engaged in this case.

CRESSWELL J.

a [46] I agree that the appeal should be dismissed for the reasons given by Potter LJ. I also agree with the additional observations of Chadwick LJ.

Appeal dismissed.

Alexander Horne Barrister.

Note

Wardlaw v Farrar

[2003] EWCA Civ 1719

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION
DAME ELIZABETH BUTLER-SLOSS P, BROOKE AND LATHAM LJJ
11, 27 NOVEMBER 2003

Practice – Civil litigation – Case management – Directions – Clinical negligence actions – Published and unpublished literature upon which expert witness proposing to rely – Best practice in multi-track actions in county courts and High Court.

In the course of giving judgment, with which Latham LJ and Butler-Sloss P agreed, BROOKE LJ said:

'[23] The standard form of order made by the High Court masters in the Queen's Bench Division in clinical negligence cases now contains these provisions:

> "Any unpublished literature upon which any expert witness proposes to rely shall be served at the same time as service of his statement together with a list of published literature and copies of any unpublished material. Any supplementary literature upon which any expert witness proposes to rely shall be notified to all other parties at least one month before trial. No expert witness shall rely upon any publications that have not been disclosed in accordance with this direction without leave of the trial judge on such terms as he deems fit ... Parties to agree the trial bundle ... not less than seven days before the hearing."

[24] Now that so many relatively heavy clinical negligence actions in the multi-track are being conducted in county courts, in addition to district registries of the High Court, it is essential that best practice should be followed throughout the country in relation to case-management directions in the multi-track in this specialist field.'

Kate O'Hanlon Barrister.

End of Volume 4